I am delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs is on the Front Bench, and I welcome her to her new responsibilities. I am also pleased that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs and other right hon. and hon. Members are in the Chamber. I was delighted when, as a Minister in the former Lord Chancellor's Department, I had the opportunity to attend the launch of the Community Legal Service in April 2000 by the then Lord Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend Lord Irvine of Lairg. This Saturday, it will be exactly six years since the establishment of the CLS, and it is important that Parliament should assess the service so far and try to map out its future.

Last Thursday, after months of consultation on a paper entitled "Making Legal Rights a Reality" the Legal Services Commission, with impeccable timing for our debate, released its strategy document outlining the future of the service between now and 2011. In February, Lord Carter of Coles published his interim report on reforming the procurement of legal aid—we await his final report with great interest. I was pleased that last week on Budget day the Legal Services Commission took the opportunity quietly to inform its contract partners that it will review its decision to terminate funding of the specialist support services after a relaunched consultation is complete. I will refer to that announcement a little later.

The great post-war Attlee Government identified three requirements for a just society—free state education, free health care, and free access to justice. Although the provision of the last requirement has generally had a lower profile than the first two it is no less important. Protecting the vulnerable and ensuring the legal rights of everyone requires an efficient, effective and co-ordinated legal service. The Legal Services Commission and the CLS were established under the Access to Justice Act 1999. The vision behind the CLS was to ensure that everyone in society has access to justice through quality-assured legal advice, representation, education and information. It is not a single body or organisation—it is defined in terms of its purpose, which is to promote the availability of legal services in civil law, including all the organisations and bodies that fund or provide civil legal advice services, with the Legal Services Commission acting as guardian of the service. Although an exciting concept, its very structure poses serious practical difficulties.

[Keith Vaz]

It is perhaps easier to describe the CLS as a near-equivalent in law of the national health service. Like the NHS, the CLS should allow everyone the opportunity to receive specialist advice according to their need. As in medicine, legal advisers specialise in different fields. Welfare, education, employment rights and family law are just some of the common areas that the service covers. For the client to be best served, he or she should have access to the correct specialists. To continue the medical analogy, one would not go to see a dermatologist about a sore throat.

I shall raise several issues in the debate. After six years, the challenges and problems that the service faces can be clearly identified. Research from the legal services research centre shows that there are likely to be over a million unsolved legal problems each year, and that only half of those with a legal problem choose to seek legal advice. Of those who do seek guidance, one in seven fail to receive any legal advice. It is also much more likely that if a client is facing one legal problem, they will also experience another related legal issue.

The main challenges are the funding of the civil legal aid budget, the recruitment and retention of trained lawyers and advisers, the identification of the needs of the public, and the provision of a seamless legal advice service. The funding of the CLS has been identified as the most important concern of those working in the service. In spite of efforts to control spending, the annual legal aid budget has risen from £1.5 billion in 1997–98, to over £2.1 billion last year, a rise of approximately 40 per cent., or a 10 per cent. increase in real terms.

Despite the rise, practitioners and consumers complain that the sum is not enough to retain good lawyers or to provide a first class service. The £2.1 billion funding has to be shared with the criminal defence service, as well as funding the administration of the Legal Services Commission. In the past seven years, spending on criminal legal aid rose by 37 per cent. in real terms. As funding for civil legal aid is not ring-fenced, that rise has resulted in civil legal aid falling by 13 per cent.

That has meant increasing pressure on legal advice providers in all areas that the CLS covers, and it is important that before the situation becomes critical, funding of the civil legal aid budget is put on a more sustainable and secure footing. This is a call not for unrestrained spending—obviously, there is a limit to the amount that can be spent—but to take forward proposals that can reduce pressure on the service.

Lord Carter seeks to provide a solution to the problems of funding legal aid. His recommendations include cutting the bureaucracy of the Legal Services Commission, and bringing in a market-based system for legal aid allocation and fixed-rate fees for certain types of cases. These proposals should be studied carefully. However, should the number of cases requiring criminal legal aid continue to rise, there will be a corresponding fall in the proportion of the budget allocated for the CLS.

Unfortunately, Lord Carter did not put the recruitment and retention of current legal aid practitioners in the terms of reference of his report. The circumstances that the CLS faces in its efforts to provide legal advice have been well reported. It is a common sentiment of those working in legal aid that the system is facing a crisis, as more lawyers leave the service and fail to be replaced by younger newly qualified practitioners. Kevin Martin, president of the Law Society, has used such words as "meltdown" and "disaster".

The implications for a member of the public wishing to receive specialist legal advice can already be seen. What are known as advice deserts are becoming more common. These deserts are areas in which few or no legal aid solicitor is available. For example, the town of Leatherhead has not one single legal aid solicitor, and in the whole of Kent there are no legal aid solicitors offering housing advice. This puts advice organisations such as the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux in an impossible situation.

One bureau in the west midlands tried to advise a man whose ex-wife's new partner was in breach of a court order concerning access to the client's children. The client had a very real concern that his children were at risk from his ex-wife's partner, but the bureau was unable to find a community legal service solicitor within a 15-mile radius to help process an injunction. There are thousands of similar cases.

We must be clear that the failure to retain or recruit new solicitors for legal aid work is not the fault of those solicitors. It is not the case that these practitioners wish to work only on cases that pay well. Many newly qualified solicitors are likely to emerge in the legal world burdened with debt. After seven years of study, many students graduate holding loans of over £20,000. A solicitor with a sense of social justice who practises wholly in legal aid is likely to earn less than a new recruit to the Metropolitan police. They must start paying back their debt and look to secure their future, but the amount that they would get paid under legal aid does not allow them to do so. We must wait for the final version of Lord Carter's report. I hope that it contains proposals on fixed-fee cases that are sufficiently attractive to halt or even reverse the decline in the number of legal aid solicitors.

At the moment, two different services are attempting to cover the gaps in service left by those advice deserts. The specialist support service was created with organisations such as Shelter and the Child Poverty Action Group, and it includes people who have the relevant expertise to help those with problems in areas such as housing and family law. The tiny amount of £2.9 million a year is spent on the specialist support service, but, as my hon. Friends know, until last week the LSC had decided to terminate its funding. Last Wednesday, the LSC reversed that decision, and it will start a new consultation process, and I hope that the service and the consultation process will be improved. I welcome that U-turn and pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), who led the campaign to get the LSC to reconsider its decision.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way and initiating this important debate. I know that he is as pleased as I am that the LSC has reversed its decision on the specialist support service following the Constitutional Affairs Committee report. Does he think that that threat to the specialist support service showed the LSC's lack of understanding of the complex nature of the legal advice that is required? Citizens advice bureaux, other voluntary organisations and CLS direct need the back-up of the experts at the specialist support service to ensure that some of the most vulnerable people receive high quality legal advice.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is right. As I have said, I believe that her leadership of the campaign resulted in the change. It is vital that we have a good consultation process, because if the consultation is good, the case will be made to keep the service going.

The second service that was meant to relieve pressure on the Community Legal Service is CLS Direct, which is a telephone and internet service that members of the public approach directly. In some cases, an individual will have a query that can be answered without the need to see a solicitor. Last year, more than 210,000 calls were made to the telephone service, with more than 500,000 visitors to the website. This afternoon, my office phoned CLS Direct on behalf of Mrs. Valerie Volpi, who has suffered a fall, to see where and how she could seek guidance. After two attempts, we got through the automated system and managed to speak to a human being. We were told that unfortunately it could offer advice only on debt, housing and welfare benefits, but that it could provide Mrs. Volpi with the telephone number for her local CAB.

The system is too bureaucratic. I have used the website and found it to be satisfactory in the way in which it provides explanations of basic points of law. With improvements, CLS Direct could be a very useful service, although there needs to be a campaign to raise awareness of its existence. I was very disappointed to find at a recent Select Committee meeting under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed that the acting chief executive of the LSC was unable to recall the number of the service, which is, for the benefit of the House, 0845 3454345. Although those services complement the work of the CLS, they cannot form a mainstream option for the provision of legal advice, because they will not be able to cope if the number of legal aid solicitors continues to decrease.

The final area in which the CLS is under challenge concerns the clustering of legal problems. A survey showed that 46 per cent. of all respondents with justice problems reported two or more problems, of whom 47 per cent. reported three or more problems. Clustering can best be understood as a domino effect resulting from an initial legal aid problem. For example, a mother suffering from domestic violence due to her situation has a greater chance of becoming homeless, suffering poverty or experiencing other issues of family law. Of course, the longer it takes to deal with the initial situation, the more chance there is of its entering into other areas of civil, even criminal, law, requiring greater specialist knowledge, greater expense and the involvement of other authorities. Alternatively, situations can arise that immediately relate to several areas of law. It is incumbent on the Legal Services Commission to formulate a strategy that can quickly identify and deal with such cases to ensure a seamless service. That requires an holistic approach that has not yet been answered by the current network of CLS partnerships.

In the five-year plan for the CLS that has just been published, the LSC informs us that it will abandon those partnerships and look towards the establishment and use of community legal and advice centres, which are intended to bring together specialists from a variety of legal fields to create a one-stop shop for legal advice.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I understand that 12 of those centres are likely to be set up, including one in our own city of Leicester. Does my hon. Friend share my optimism about how they might operate, drawing on his distinguished service in the Belgrave law centre before he became an MP? Is he as happy as I am about the need to roll them out into the deserts that he mentioned? I am not sure that Leicester is necessarily one of those, but I am sure that it is a good place in which to pilot because of the multiple groupings of problems.

Keith Vaz: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. He is absolutely right. Leicester is a great place to pilot the new scheme. I am sure that that has nothing to do with the fact that I have secured this debate. One of the CLS's senior officials, the director of children's services, has said that it has had more pilots than British Airways. It is extremely important that we look carefully at the situation to assess whether the pilots are successful, but I am glad that they are coming to Leicester.

I seek an assurance from the Minister that there is no question of the funding for the Law Centres Federation being removed. She comes from a long and distinguished tradition of involvement in this movement, and I would be very sad if she, of all Ministers, decided that this was the time to take away funding from Citizens Advice or from the Law Centres Federation.

Civil legal aid is usually overshadowed by the criminal legal aid branch. However, the CLS fulfils a vital role in ensuring a just and equitable society. For the clients involved, civil justice problems can have a devastating impact on their life. It is extremely important that we proceed to map out a very careful plan for the CLS. The Department for Constitutional Affairs, under the current Lord Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend Lord Falconer of Thoroton, and an excellent team of Ministers, has modernised our legal process beyond recognition, and that will be one of the true legacies of this Labour Government. However, it should not take away the intrinsic elements that have made our legal system the envy of the world.

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): I thank my hon. Friend for choosing the important issue of legal aid as the subject of this debate. I congratulate him on his speech, which I will draw to the attention of Lord Carter and which will of course be studied by the Legal Services Commission as well as by other hon. Members.

I thank my hon. Friend for the warmth of the welcome that he gave me in my new portfolio of responsibilities. I particularly value it as it comes from him, as he has done so much in this House since 1987 consistently to raise the issues of access to justice and the vital part that good quality legal services play in that. I hope that he will bear with me, as I took over this portfolio of responsibilities only last week.

Like my hon. Friend, I am in politics because I want to be part of the effort to tackle poverty and social exclusion. Like him, I represent a constituency where there are still problems of social exclusion. Like him, I regard it as important to ensure that my constituents have not only good schools and hospitals and a job, but their legal rights. We have tried—indeed, he has been part of trying—to make the law fairer. We have brought in laws that make things fairer for tenants, for employees, and for people who face discrimination. However, like him, I believe that there is only any point in those laws—and all other laws that exist to make society fairer—if everyone has access to good legal advice and the law is accessible to all. That has been our concern since we came into government in 1997.

I acknowledge that, as my hon. Friend said, a great deal of unmet legal need continues to exist. Our concern about that was the basis of our introducing the Community Legal Service. Since then, I hope that there have not been too many legal initiatives, but several projects have tried to improve the quality of legal advice and assistance and get it to those who need it most. My hon. Friend mentioned CLS Direct. He is right that, as yet, it deals only with debt, housing and welfare benefits, but it already provides advice to 2,000 people a week. Many of those would not get legal advice in any other way. That applies especially to young people, who want to get advice and information on the internet. However, I agree with my hon. Friend that the service needs further publicity.

We are also finding new ways to provide legal services so that, for example, we take them to where people are. That includes providing them at county court, where people face, for example, actions for housing possession, instead of expecting them to go to the lawyer's office. That helps 400 people a week throughout the country. My hon. Friend rightly said that we need a seamless service instead of making people go from pillar to post. That lies behind the one-stop shop service in Leicester that he and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) mentioned.

The number of people helped with legal advice for civil matters is 20 per cent. higher than last year, especially with housing, mental health, debt and benefit problems. However, I am not here to tell hon. Members that all is rosy. We know that there is more to be done and that there are problems to tackle. The Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs highlighted those.

One of the problems is that less money is spent on legal aid for family and civil cases now than in 1997. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East said, the overall legal aid budget has increased from £1.5 billion in 1997 to £2.1 billion this year. However, that increase has been taken up with extra spending on criminal legal aid, which has increased from £734 million in 1997 to £1.169 billion this year. That is a 37 per cent. real increase against a background of a fall in the number of criminal cases.

However, the amount spent on civil and family legal aid has gone down from £755 million in 1997 to £722 million, which, when one takes inflation into account, is the equivalent of a £200 million—or 22 per cent.—real terms cut. That is one of the reasons why we have asked Lord Carter, to whom we are grateful, to review legal aid services. We are not simply waiting for his final report. We have already introduced the Criminal Defence Service Bill and tighter controls on the high cost criminal cases.

Our aim is to have a properly funded criminal legal aid system and to ensure that the civil and family system gets a larger share of the overall legal aid budget. My hon. Friend raised the important issue of specialist support services. He rightly paid tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), who raised the matter not only in the Select Committee but in the Lobby with me on several occasions. She actively pressed that important point and I can confirm that the Legal Services Commission has committed itself to continuing to fund specialist support services while it undertakes a proper consultation on the future.

I shall, of course, ensure that I keep the House regularly updated on the progress towards our shared objectives and I look forward to working with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East, the Chairman and other members of the Select Committee, and many others who are interested in that important issue.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Royal Mail/Post Office

1. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What recent discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues on the future of the Royal Mail and Post Office in Scotland. [60656]

5. Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): What recent discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues on the future of the post office network in Scotland. [60660]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I regularly meet ministerial colleagues and we discuss a range of issues.

Mr. Reid: The Government's plan to abolish the Post Office card account in four years time will, according to Post Office management, lead to the closure of 10,000 of the country's 14,000 post offices, which will mean that hardly a rural post office will be left in Scotland. Surely that cannot be allowed to happen. Will the Minister back those Scottish pensioners who have chosen to collect their pension at a post office, and will he urge the Department for Work and Pensions to retain the post office option for pensioners after 2010?

David Cairns: I have completely given up hope that when the Liberal Democrats raise the issue of post offices, they might pause for a moment to reflect on the £2 billion of investment that this Government have put in to help sustain the post office network. Hundreds of millions of pounds of investment will enable people to access universal banking. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the commitment on the Post Office card account runs out in 2010; moreover, more than 70 per cent. of people who have such accounts also have bank accounts. It is this Government's investment in the Post Office that is giving it a fighting chance, and I fail to see how the hon. Gentleman's party's policy of privatising it would help.

Mr. Weir: Is the Minister not being a little complacent about the future of the Post Office? Does he not know, for example, that Citibank, which runs the Post Office card account, has transferred such accounts to another provider without even telling those who have them? Does he not feel that the Government's card account policy, which is undermining the situation prior to 2010 and also the future of post offices, is in utter confusion? Will he get the Department for Work and Pensions to look again at this ridiculous decision?

David Cairns: As I just said, no decision has been taken on how the situation will work out after 2010. I point out again that it is thanks to this Government putting thousands of millions of pounds into the Post Office—including an additional £300 million into sustaining the rural network—that it has any kind of future at all. The hon. Gentleman's policies would allow the post office network to wither on the vine, but we are not prepared to do that.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that when the Post Office decides to sell premises—it decided, for example, to sell the post office in Coatbridge town centre to Spar—it would be appropriate for consultations to take place, but not during the Christmas and new year period? Moreover, when applications for drink licences are part of the project, it might be courteous to inform the Member of Parliament concerned and, indeed, the Member of the Scottish Parliament.

David Cairns: Obviously, the Post Office's commercial arrangements for disposing of its assets are primarily a matter for it, but I would of course hope that it could extend to my right hon. Friend—who is well known in this House as a diligent and hard-working MP who represents his constituents' best interests—the courtesy of informing him of such decisions. Of course, he is talking primarily about the Crown post office network, which represents less than 4 per cent. of the total network and loses more than £70 million a year. The Post Office has some tough commercial decisions to take, but that should not short-circuit the normal planning application process, or the courtesies to which my right hon. Friend refers.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): Last week, the Department for Work and Pensions said that the new products and services available from the Post Office from 2010 would be based on customers actual behaviour and requirements. How will the requirements of customers in Scotland, particularly those in rural areas, be factored into those products and services?

David Cairns: This is precisely the point: it is because people's shopping habits are changing that we have to take these difficult decisions. More and more people are choosing to have their benefits paid directly into bank and building society accounts, which is why we invested money to make sure that the Post Office is part of the universal banking network. Had we not done so, it would have had absolutely no chance whatsoever. The hon. Gentleman mentions rural post offices, but he would do well to remember that when his party was in power, 3,500 rural post offices closed, so he is in no position to lecture anyone on this issue.

Employment Statistics

3. Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of trends in unemployment in Scotland. [60658]

7. Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the latest rate of employment in Scotland. [60662]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Scottish labour market is in its strongest position in decades, with more people in work and fewer unemployed than ever before.

Ann McKechin: My right hon. Friend may be aware of the article in Monday's edition of The Herald, showing that Glasgow's and Edinburgh's economic performance outstripped that of every other city in the United Kingdom, with the exception of London. Does he agree that that represents a success for the employment policies of this Government, who are spending much more time and money on ensuring that more people in Scotland enter the employment market?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is good that both Edinburgh and Glasgow are doing extremely well in terms of economic performance. It is good to see so many people in work today, whereas a decade ago many were out of work. There is still more to do, particularly in Glasgow, where there are still many people who could, with appropriate help, get back to work. What has happened shows that those who opposed the new deal almost 10 years ago were wrong to do so.

Mr. Devine: My right hon. Friend will be aware that when the Conservative party was in power, unemployment in my constituency was in excess of 20 per cent. When I was working in a health centre, I saw doctors prescribe anti-depressants, but if they could have prescribed a job people would not have needed to come to the health centre. Today's figures are only a tenth of what they were. Does my right hon. Friend agree that "caring, compassionate conservatism" is a contradiction in terms?

Mr. Darling: Anyone who visited West Lothian during the Tory years will have seen exactly what happened to thousands of people who were out of work and left with no prospects whatever. Livingston now has one of the highest employment rates in the country. The constituency is doing well precisely because we have built a strong and stable economy with good job prospects. Scotland is now a place where people want to come and do business.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I am sure that we all welcome the employment figures overall, but there are still 285,000 people in Scotland on incapacity benefit, many of whom would like to find work. Will the Secretary of State explain how the loss of 1,500 staff from the Department for Work and Pensions in Scotland over the next two years—on top of the 1,500 jobs already axed—will help claimants with the support that they need to find work?

Mr. Darling: First, let me welcome the hon. Lady to her new position as the Liberal Democrat shadow Secretary of State for Scotland. The fact that she welcomes the low levels of unemployment is good, but it is a pity that when we introduced the new deal the Liberals opposed it—[Interruption.] They were in favour of the concept, but against providing the money to pay for it.

As for the hon. Lady's question about the DWP and Jobcentre Plus, at one point the DWP employed more than 100,000 people. However, unlike many banks and insurance companies, which have automated their payment procedures and changed the way they work, the DWP has not done so. What is happening in the DWP and Jobcentre Plus now is the result of having to take account of new IT systems and different ways of working, which will help to provide a better service. If the hon. Lady has visited one of the new Jobcentre Plus offices, she would know that they are a world apart from what they used to be 10 or 15 years ago. They provide effective help, so that people who lose their jobs can have the support that they need to get them back into work as quickly as possible. I suspect that none of the difficult decisions would have been taken by the Liberal Democrats.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Scottish Coal, which operates surface mines in my constituency and elsewhere in Scotland, is currently consulting on making up to 150 redundancies, largely as a result of consecutive rises in gasoil duty? The straw that broke the camel's back was last week's Budget announcement. Will my right hon. Friend meet me urgently to discuss the problem and will he ask the Chancellor to examine the practical implications of his policy in that regard?

Mr. Darling: I am aware of the Scottish Coal announcement that was made last week. I or my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be happy to meet my hon. Friend to discuss the matter.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): What does it tell us about employment prospects in the fishing industry when Banff and Buchan colleges have been forced through financial pressure to discontinue all training courses relating to that industry? Does the Secretary of State realise that this is the only such training provision on the mainland of Scotland, which educates through mates and skippers tickets the vast majority of people across the UK? How does that square with what the Chancellor said last Wednesday about a rosy future for further education colleges? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that those courses represent training in a strategic industry and should be protected for the future of employment in that industry?

Mr. Darling: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the funding of further education colleges in Scotland is a matter for the Scottish Executive. Because we are increasing the amount of money spent on education more generally, Scotland has benefited, but what courses are appropriate is a matter for the Scottish Executive and further education colleges.

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is no coincidence that one of the longest periods of stability in the economy in our history has resulted in the remarkable reduction of unemployment that we have seen since 1997?

Mr. Darling: That is right. One of the main reasons for such high unemployment in the 1980s and 1990s was the fact that, under the previous Conservative Government, we saw two of the deepest recessions of the last century. Many individuals and their families suffered in consequence. Now that we have a strong economy, we have had growth in each consecutive quarter since we came to power—and we have had very low levels of unemployment, with record numbers of people going into work. We have also been able, crucially, to increase the amount of money given to families, particularly those with children, in order to help them do well for themselves and to adapt to changing labour market conditions.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): Is it not complacent of the Secretary of State to base his view of Scotland's economy on only one set of employment figures? Is he not aware of the growing concern among the business community and economists in Scotland that recent growth was due to expansion of the public not the private sector—an unsustainable trend in the long run?

Mr. Darling: No, I think the hon. Gentleman is wrong on all three counts. First, I did not base what I said on one recent set of employment statistics. If he looks at the employment statistics issued over the past few months and the past few years, he will see that unemployment is at an historically low level and that employment is at an historically high level.

The size of the public sector in Scotland has not changed much over the past few years but, yes, there are more doctors, more nurses, more teachers and more police. We are in favour of that, but the Conservatives are pledged to reduce public expenditure, which inevitably would result in less resources being available for it.

The hon. Gentleman referred to surveys. The last few business surveys have actually been extremely optimistic about Scotland's prospects. Indeed, Scotland, like the rest of the United Kingdom, continues to be a very good place to do business, which is why so many people are in work. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make comparisons, why does not he cast his mind back to 10 or 20 years ago when the position was completely different?

David Mundell: I know that the right hon. Gentleman, like his right hon. Friend the Chancellor, prefers to talk about the past rather than the present and the future, but he cannot dispute the fact that 51 per cent. of Scotland's gross domestic product is in the public sector, compared with 40 per cent. in the UK as a whole. Does he think that the proportion in Scotland is too high, too low or just about right?

Mr. Darling: I refer the hon. Gentleman to what I said a few moments ago. The size of the public sector has not changed that much, but I make no apology for the fact that we are employing more teachers, more doctors and more nurses. I would have thought that most people in Scotland would think that that is a good thing. At the same time, despite what the hon. Gentleman says, employment prospects in Scotland are good—as is the number of people in work—but we are not complacent, as there will be changes and constant challenges from different parts of the world.

I am happy to talk not just about the present but the future too, because as long as we maintain our present policies and maintain stability—taking the right decisions about public expenditure, instead of being locked into a wholly dogmatic rule that there must be public expenditure cuts regardless of what is required—and stick to the course we have set, the prospects for Scotland and the United Kingdom are good. If the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues were to get into power, many of the things to which people are becoming accustomed would be lost.

Ms Katy Clark (North Ayrshire and Arran) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the latest figures are far from a one-off? In my constituency, there has been an increase of more than 25 per cent. in employment since 1997, although the constituency has still not fully recovered from 18 years of Tory rule, when industry after industry was closed. Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the recent initiative to create an Irvine bay regeneration company to bring investment to my area and create jobs, because our goal of full employment is vital in ensuring that we spread prosperity throughout the whole community?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right. She is right, too, to stress the importance of regeneration, not just in her constituency but in certain other parts of Scotland. Most of us can remember what Ayrshire was like 10 or 15 years ago, when thousands of people were not only out of work, but had no prospect of ever getting any work. A second generation of people was growing up with no prospect of getting work. The position is different now, but we cannot be complacent—we must constantly be aware of the fact that there are still people we need to help to get into work, but the strong economy and background created by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has benefited my hon. Friend's constituency as well as every other constituency in Scotland.

Sub-post Offices (Closures)

4. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Whether he has made an assessment of how many sub-post offices in Scotland may close when (a) the rural subsidy ends and (b) the Post Office card account is phased out. [60659]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): The Government have committed £300 million to rural post offices over the next two years. No decision on the future funding or size of the network beyond that time has yet been made.

Malcolm Bruce: I thank the Minister for that answer, but is not it the case that phasing out the rural subsidy and ending the Post Office card account—a betrayal if ever there was one—will leave pretty well every post office in rural Scotland non-viable? What will he do to ensure that those post offices have a viable future? Will he co-ordinate with other Government agencies to ensure that they do not face oblivion? Earlier, the Minister criticised the Liberal Democrats, but at least we have a plan for investment in the Post Office. What is his?

David Cairns: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman used one "p" word, plan, but did not use another, privatisation. Privatisation is the Liberal Democrat solution, coupled with their plan to abolish the Department of Trade and Industry, which is where the subsidy comes from, and spend its budget elsewhere. The Liberal Democrat peer Lord Greaves said that if the plan to privatise the Post Office goes through,

"it moves us to the right of David Cameron."

That is hardly a healthy position for the Liberal Democrats to be in.

Child Poverty

6. Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Central) (Lab): What assessment he has made of progress in Scotland towards the Government's target of reducing the proportion of children living in low-income families by a quarter by 2004–05.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): In 1998–99, there were an estimated 290,000 Scottish children in relative low-income families. By 2005, that number fell to 190,000, a reduction of 34 per cent., which exceeds the Government's child poverty target for the period.

Mr. Sarwar: I thank the Minister for that reply and I hope that Members from both side of the House welcome that progress. Does my hon. Friend agree that there are still low-income families in the east end and south side of Glasgow? Does he further agree that the increased minimum wage and better jobs are the best ways to help disadvantaged children?

David Cairns: Absolutely; I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said a moment ago, there are more people in work in Scotland today than at any time in the nation's history. With measures such as the minimum wage, the working tax credit and the child tax credit, we are making work pay for those families. Spending per head in Glasgow is higher than in any other part of Scotland, which is quite right because of the deprivation and poverty that still exist there. An enormous amount of progress has been made. We are making tremendous inroads into reducing poverty with a view to eradicating it altogether, but all of that would be put at risk if we stopped the funding going into areas such as Glasgow, which would be the inevitable consequence of the election of the Conservatives.

Devolution

8. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What devolution issues the Advocate-General has considered since 28 February. [60663]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I should declare an interest: I am a non-practising member of the Faculty of Advocates.

As the House will know, Her Majesty the Queen has approved the appointment of Neil Davidson, QC, as Advocate-General from 21 March. I am told that since 1 March, 59 devolution issues have been intimated to the Advocate-General.

Miss McIntosh: May I declare a similar interest? I am also a non-practising member of the Scottish Bar. I think that it is rather longer since I ceased to practise.

I add my congratulations, as I have already done in writing, to the new Advocate-General and welcome him to his position. I regret that this is the first time ever that we have had a Law Officer who is not a Member of either House and so cannot be exposed to the full scrutiny of the House. Will the right hon. Gentleman take the earliest opportunity to ask the new Advocate-General his views on why, increasingly, the public are being excluded from criminal trials before the High Court in Scotland? Does the right hon. Gentleman share my concern at that and will he look closely at the reasons for it?

Mr. Darling: I can correct the hon. Lady on one point: Neil Davidson is a Member of the House of Lords. Unless I am very much mistaken, he was introduced about 20 minutes ago. If I am wrong and a message comes from the other place, I will happily stand corrected—and I will want to know why, as well. In relation to her other point, I am not aware of people being excluded. Clearly, the conduct of affairs in the Scottish courts is a matter for the Scottish Executive and the Lord Advocate. If there is a problem, I will certainly look into it, but I am not aware of one.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I, too, add my words of congratulation to Neil Davidson, QC, who was a very good Solicitor-General in his day. One of the functions of the Advocate-General is to ensure that legislation coming before the House is Human Rights Act compliant. How on earth did the previous Advocate-General manage to make that judgment in relation to the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill and will that now be considered again?

Mr. Darling: I shall pass on the hon. Gentleman's good wishes. I think that I am right in saying that the new Advocate-General specialised in human rights legislation when he was in private practice, so I am sure that he will be only too happy to consider the issue from the other side of the fence.

In relation to the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, I am aware of the general concern in the House and outside it. The objective was to try to introduce legislation that would make it easier to get rid of what might loosely be called red tape. It is also important, though, to make sure that we have a correct balance between doing that and having proper safeguards. I understand that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office is reflecting on that at the moment.

Labour Market Statistics

9. Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment he has made of the most recent labour market statistics for Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [60664]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer that I gave earlier to Questions 3 and 7.

Mr. McFall: Has the Secretary of State seen the recent Royal Bank of Scotland report that indicates that private sector employment in Scotland has risen in each of the past 12 months? Given that situation, will he take up the challenge that the Chancellor set out in his Budget last week so that we plan for long-term challenges, ensure that the globalisation agenda, with the increasing drive from China and India, is taken on in Scotland, and ensure that Scotland's private sector is indeed the engine of growth for the country?

Mr. Darling: I did see that recent report. It was encouraging that the bank said that Scottish manufacturing appeared to be in better shape than that in many other parts of the country. My right hon. Friend is also right that at a time when there is huge expansion of the Chinese and Indian economies, as well as in other parts of the world, we must ensure that we can adapt and capitalise on our strengths, such as education, so that we can continue to generate jobs and see our economy grow.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): What specific measures are the Government taking to make Scotland an even more attractive place for doing business to the private sector and, especially, to encourage high-skill industry in Europe to locate to Scotland?

Mr. Darling: The single most important thing is to ensure that we have a stable economy with low interest rates so that firms coming into Scotland can plan ahead for the future. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the help that the Scottish Executive give on training and supporting companies, when that is necessary. They generally help firms and encourage them to come and invest, and that policy has been hugely successful. As I said a moment ago, we must be mindful of the fact that there are challenges from all over the world, but I am confident that Scotland will continue to do well, and many recent surveys recognise that.

Child Poverty

10. Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): What assessment he has made of progress in Scotland towards the Government's target of reducing the proportion of children living in low income families by a quarter by 2004–05. [60665]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave a few moments ago to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar).

Miss Begg: While it was slightly disappointing that the Government did not hit their target on reducing child poverty, that was partly because the target was very ambitious, and it does not detract from the fact that a large number of children in Scotland have been taken out of poverty. In the next stage, the Government will obviously have to work with the Scottish Executive. There were welcome measures in the Budget, especially regarding the child trust fund, and money was also made available to the Scottish Executive for education. Will my hon. Friend discuss with the Scottish Executive how we can ensure that that money is targeted on helping to lift more of Scotland's children out of poverty.

David Cairns: May I just correct my hon. Friend on one point? Although it is true that the Government just failed to meet their target on the reduction of poverty throughout the UK, we actually exceeded the target in Scotland—we met and went beyond it. Of course, that was due to the excellent close partnership that exists between the Government and the Scottish Executive. The measures that we are putting in here, such as the child tax credit, the working tax credit and a 26 per cent. increase in child benefit, together with the measures that the Scottish Executive have put in place have, as a package, meant that we have made great progress on reducing poverty. That shows that the partnership works, and that Opposition parties that want to break that partnership—or mess about with it, as the Liberal Democrats want to do—are playing with fire.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): Is not the fact that many of the lowest income families face benefit withdrawal rates of 70, 80, or even 90 per cent. one of the major reasons why many children still find themselves living in poverty? Is not tackling that problem, which means that many people are paying effectively higher rates of tax than the top rate of tax, vital for improving incentives to work and thus helping more children out of poverty?

David Cairns: If that were the case, there would have been no reduction in child poverty, but instead there has been a 34 per cent. reduction, which is way ahead of target. That proves that the hon. Gentleman's analysis is wrong and that the child tax credit is helping the poorest families and those on average incomes. The child tax credit, together with all the other measures that we have put in place—the working tax credit and big increases in child benefit—is the reason why we are seeing remarkable and dramatic reductions to poverty in Scotland, so I simply cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Identity Cards

11. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Whether the introduction of identity cards in Scotland will differ from the process in the rest of the United Kingdom. [60666]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The introduction of identity cards is a reserved matter. The procedure for issuing them will be exactly the same in Scotland as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bone: Is the Secretary of State happy that the people of Scotland will have a compulsory identity card imposed on them when the Labour manifesto promised a voluntary scheme?

Mr. Darling: I believe that people will support the idea that people have to identify themselves, especially for the purposes of social security payments and in relation to employment and nationality and immigration matters. The whole point of the legislation is to enable us to set up a database. Hon. Members should remember that most people are required to prove their identity now, not just to open bank accounts, but to get passports and so on. It makes sense to put that on a proper basis. When the surveys are carried out, some people are surprised to learn that most people in Scotland do not think that there is anything wrong in principle with having to say who they are when accessing a public service.

Pension Credit

12. Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of pension credit on pensioner poverty in Scotland. [60667]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): Tackling pensioner poverty is one of this Government's priorities and the pension credit is helping to achieve that. In Scotland, there are currently 338,000 individuals in receipt of pension credit.

Michael Conna[illegible]ank my hon. Friend for that answer. I know [illegible]000 of his constituents and 5,500 families in my constituency are in receipt of pension credit. However, there are two worrying things. During the election, it was the one issue that pensioners came to me to shake my hand on—although they do not do such things publicly in a gathering—and say that it had changed their lives and lifted them from poverty. First, is it not concerning that 1.2 million pensioners are not claiming their pension credit, the value of which is £1.6 billion? Secondly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. One question will do in view of the hour.

David Cairns: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the pension credit is making a big difference, with an average award of an additional £40 for pensioners, and more for the poorest pensioners, which makes a big difference to poor pensioners in his constituency and in mine. Obviously, we want 100 per cent. take-up of the pension credit. I hope that every Member of Parliament will lead the campaign, as I know he is doing in his constituency, to ensure that every pensioner claims what they are entitled to, because it can make a very big difference to their lives.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Power Commission

16. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the implications for the work of her Department of the recommendations of the Power commission. [61520]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): The Power inquiry made many recommendations about parliamentary and democratic processes and it is a welcome addition to the debate on democratic engagement in Britain.

Richard Burden: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does she agree that three issues need to be included in any effective response to the way in which the Power inquiry dealt with the problem of the public's disconnection from the political process? Does she agree that the first thing to address is the need for transparency in party funding, something that should apply equally to Opposition parties and to Government parties? Secondly, does she agree that election, not appointment, should be the cornerstone of any House of Parliament that plays a role in framing the laws of this country? Thirdly, as the Government are—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a long supplementary question. Two points are good enough.

Bridget Prentice: Perhaps my hon. Friend will let me know what the third point is on another occasion.

My hon. Friend is right about transparency in party funding. We have set up the Phillips review to look at that. We are also in positive talks across parties about that transparency. On reform of the House of Lords, he knows that there will be a free vote in this House on the subject.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Do Ministers in the Department agree with the first proposal of the Power report, namely, that there should be a rebalancing of power from the Executive and quangos to Parliament and local Government? If so, is she willing to commit her Department to talks with the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats on how we achieve that sooner rather than later?

Bridget Prentice: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his post at this Question Time and look forward to engaging with him on these questions in future.

The Department will make a structured response to the Power inquiry. We will identify a number of solutions before we provide that. I know that the inquiry is looking forward to meeting people at the beginning of May to make further progress on some of the debates that it had. It has raised a number of key issues and we will want to respond to them as positively as possible.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): One recommendation of the Power inquiry concerns how Parliament might have greater powers to initiate legislation, launch public inquiries and take action on public petitions as methods of communicating better with the public. Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity of the forthcoming Joint Committee on the powers of the House of Lords to look at those aspects of the way in which this House works?

Bridget Prentice: Many of those issues will be taken into account in the debates on the reform of the House of Lords. At the end of the day, it is for the Commons to make a decision in a free vote about the composition and structure of the House of Lords. As my hon. Friend will be aware, my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has already met the political parties, and is holding discussions with them about the way in which we can take that discussion forward.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I welcome the hon. Lady to her enhanced responsibilities. She will be aware that the Power commission recommended a substantially elected second Chamber, and the Lord Chancellor has begun discussions in the hope of bringing that about. Does she not agree with the commission that the main purpose of doing so is to try to establish a second Chamber that has greater legitimacy in holding the Government to account? If so, how does she reconcile that with the Labour manifesto commitment to legislate to weaken the ability of the House of Lords to scrutinise the legislation, as the two do not add up?

Bridget Prentice: I do not agree that the two do not add up. When we look at reform it is important that we decide what the relevant processes are and what the House of Lords should do. Most Members of Parliament agree that that is how we should proceed before we decide the composition. I hope that in discussions now and in the near future we can come as close as possible to consensus. There is a wide variety of opinion in the House, as was clear the last time that the issue was debated, when not one of eight options was finally agreed. There is therefore much to discuss and I am sure that we all look forward to doing so.

Small Claims Court

17. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What changes she plans to make to the jurisdiction of small claims courts. [61521]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): The Better Regulation Task Force in its report, "Better Routes to Redress", recommended that research should be carried out into the potential impact of raising the current small claims limit for personal injury cases of £1,000. Work is currently under way to renew all case claim limits.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for her reply. On the point of principle, does she accept the distinction between most other cases and housing disrepair and personal injuries? Does she agree with a wide range of organisations, including the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers, the Law Society, Irwin Mitchell—a big law firm—and the TUC that those special cases require much lower jurisdiction so that people can claim their costs if they win their case?

Ms Harman: The point of principle is to make sure that there is as much access as possible to justice for people who suffer a wrong and require redress. That is the overarching principle, and we will hold discussions with the legal profession, trade unions, insurers, consumer groups and advice agencies. We will look at the work of Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs and the Civil Justice Council when considering the issue, and we will take people's views into account, including those of hon. Members.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Would not the most valuable improvement in the small claims court be to ensure that its judgments are more effectively enforced? On personal injuries, would it not be a little odd if we allowed a long set limit entirely to erode the opportunity for any small personal injury cases ever to go to the small claims court?

Ms Harman: The right hon. Gentleman makes an important point, and we will bear it in mind.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): May I amend Question 21, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady should ask Question 18.

Nia Griffith: May I amend Question 18, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must await a ministerial answer to Question 18 before asking a supplementary question.

Specialist Support Services

18. Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): If she will reverse the decision to end funding for specialist support services. [61522]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): On 22 March, the Legal Services Commission announced that it had reviewed its earlier decision to terminate those contracts and had informed providers that the contracts will continue.

Nia Griffith: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I tabled the question before the decision was announced, which is why I wished to amend it. Can the Minister confirm that she will ensure that there is full consultation with all the relevant bodies, including the Welsh Assembly Government in the case of the Welsh specialist support service, and that she will announce the responses on the Floor of the House?

Ms Harman: The Legal Services Commission will have learned lessons from what happened and understood the points made by hon. Members, including my hon. Friend and her colleague from Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), and the Select Committee. The aim is to ensure that people have as much expert high quality advice as early as possible to resolve legal disputes.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): We welcome with some relief the announcement by the Legal Services Commission of its intention to postpone its earlier decision. The Minister did not mention that the Government supported the Legal Services Commission in the ending of funding for specialist support services. However, with reference to the proposed review, is the Minister aware that the vast majority of affected lawyers do not want the cuts and believe that they will not save money but will create an even larger shortfall in provision, affecting primarily the poorer and most vulnerable in our society?

Ms Harman: I make two points in response to the hon. Gentleman. First, the Legal Services Commission makes its own decisions about how it disburses money for the not-for-profit sector. It was a matter for the commission, which has revoked its earlier decision. We welcome that. Secondly, on support for the not-for-profit sector, before 1997, £11 million per year was spent in support for legal services in that sector. Now that figure is £78 million, so the hon. Gentleman is not right to try and give the impression that funding for that sector's provision of legal services has been cut. Quite the reverse is true.

Departmental Pay

19. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): If she will make a statement on levels of pay in her Department. [61523]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): The pay offered by the Department for Constitutional Affairs is generally competitive and enables us to employ staff with the skills that we need to provide good quality public services, while making the best use we can of the resources available.

Mr. Llwyd: I hear what the Minister says, but she will know that levels of pay for the third and fourth pay scales in her Department lag behind 6 per cent. and 14 per cent. respectively, compared with average pay in the civil service. What discussions has she had with the Treasury about harmonising pay with other Departments?

Bridget Prentice: We would all agree that pay discrepancies are undesirable. We inherited a variety of pay levels as a result of the creation of Her Majesty's Courts Service. We are holding a review of pay and structures throughout the Department, which I hope will address the issue.

Fine Defaulters

21. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): What further steps she plans to take to assist the courts in dealing with people who do not pay fines and who jump bail. [61525]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): Implementation of the new enforcement framework under the Courts Act 2003 was completed yesterday. It includes measures to elicit prompt payment and severe sanctions for defaulters. From April 2007 the national enforcement service will build on current initiatives to strengthen enforcement of all court orders across the criminal justice system.

Mr. McFadden: I am sure the Minister will agree that her constituents and mine want a society with rules, and expect those rules to be enforced. How is it envisaged that the announcement about cracking down on those who evade paying fines will be implemented? Will she consider asking the courts to request more community service penalties where people do not have the financial ability to pay fines?

Ms Harman: It is important that there is a wider range of penalties for those who default. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important that if a court makes an order, it is enforced. If people come to court as a victim or a witness and give evidence, and see a fine or a compensation order imposed which is never paid, that adds insult to injury. We must make sure that non-custodial orders are properly enforced. Then people will feel that justice is being done, without every offender having to be sent to prison.

Coal Health Claims (Solicitors' Fees)

22. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): When she last met the Law Society to discuss fees for solicitors involved in coal health claims; and if she will make a statement. [61526]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): The Government share my hon. Friend's concerns about solicitors double-charging successful claimants. I had a useful meeting with the chairs of the Law Society's regulation board and consumer complaints board on Thursday 23 March—last Thursday—to discuss the matter. The Law Society assured me that it views the matter very seriously and is doing all it can to take disciplinary action and to process claims for redress. I assure my hon. Friend that I will continue to monitor progress on the issue with the Law Society.

Paddy Tipping: Claimants, backed by their MPs, are working with the Law Society to take up individual cases of redress. Rather than pursuing cases individually, will the Minister pursue the Law Society to take a more comprehensive approach so that we can learn lessons, so that firms can be audited and so that all claimants, rather than just individuals, can be compensated?

Bridget Prentice: My hon. Friend has made a good point. The Law Society has assured me that it, too, takes the matter very seriously. It is planning an advertising campaign using local media to alert those consumers who are entitled to the repayment of fees by their solicitors. I have discussed the issue of taking a more generic approach with the Law Society, which is examining the matter. I can also tell my hon. Friend that the Law Society has already referred 45 solicitors to the tribunal, although no cases have yet been heard.

Community Legal Service (Specialist Support)

23. Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): What role her Department played in the process which led to the decision by the Legal Services Commission to end the provision of specialist support services under the community legal service. [61527]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): The Legal Services Commission is the public body charged with the planning and delivery of legal aid, and it is for it to enter into or terminate community legal service contracts and to decide how the money is spent.

Kerry McCarthy: In my constituency, there is woeful under-provision of expert legal advice, particularly for asylum seekers and people who are going through the immigration service, which means that many people are actually pursuing hopeless claims or have been left without any legal advice. I am concerned that the acting chief executive of the LSC seems to think that that need can be met by the Community Legal Service Direct, and I wonder whether the Minister agrees with his take on the matter.

Ms Harman: CLS Direct, which allows people to phone up and get early legal advice, is an important service that is doing an important job, and it is going to expand. However, I agree with my hon. Friend that there is a problem, which particularly applies to poorer people in socially excluded areas, with getting access to family and civil legal aid. The truth of the matter is that we have greatly increased the legal aid budget since we entered government in 1997. Despite the fact that there have been fewer criminal cases in the courts, most of the increase—in fact, nearly all of it—has gone on criminal legal aid, and civil and family legal aid has experienced a cut of £200 million, or about 24 per cent. I hope that all hon. Members will join me in trying to make sure that we get a fairer balance within the increased legal aid budget between family and civil legal aid on the one hand and criminal legal aid on the other.

Peerages (Nominations)

24. Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Whether the Government plan to change the way nominations to the House of Lords are made. [61528]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced last week, our plans include bringing forward the last stage of House of Lords reform over the coming months, which will include membership and the systems of appointment. As promised in our manifesto, we will allow a free vote on the composition of the House of Lords. The Prime Minister has also made it clear that any reforms will be consistent with the primacy of this House.

Mr. McGovern: Given the recent publicity about loans to political parties, which in my view was not so much about the fact that loans were made or who made them, but the implication that those loans were being used to buy privilege, surely the solution is to allow voters to decide who sits in the other place—it would take a very rich person to make a loan to every voter.

Bridget Prentice: As I have said, there will be a free vote on the issue when it comes before the House. On loans, we intend to amend the Electoral Administration Bill to make it compulsory for political parties to disclose any loans that they receive, which will obviously affect all political parties. I am sure that we will work together constructively to find a solution that allows for transparency and fairness.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What role does the Minister envisage the Prime Minister retaining in nominating people to the House of Lords?

Bridget Prentice: My apologies for my slow response, but I did not catch the hon. Gentleman's question at first. The Prime Minister has already said that he is relinquishing his role in the honours system. We will examine House of Lords reform in the round, and there will be a debate on both the composition and processes of the House of Lords. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern) has a view on whether the House of Lords should be entirely elected, and the matter will come to this House as a free vote. The Government have set up the Appointments Commission, and we want to ensure that representation in the House of Lords fairly reflects the wishes of this House.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Should we not all congratulate the Prime Minister on changing his views on the House of Lords? He was resolutely against election and in favour of appointment, but events have so conspired that he has very publicly changed his mind.

Bridget Prentice: I am delighted that my hon. Friend has been able to ask a question on this issue which I know has worried him for many a long day. The Prime Minister, along with the rest of the House, will be able to participate in the free vote. He will be able to express whatever opinion he wishes then.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Does the Minister agree that any inducement offered to secure an honour or peerage is an act of criminality? Is the Minister prepared to be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime?

Bridget Prentice: The matter of the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 is for the prosecuting authorities to deal with.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Leader of the House was asked—

Honours

30. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): If he will bring forward proposals for a Select Committee to be established to make recommendations on the awarding of honours. [61512]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): The system for making recommendations for honours has only recently been reformed and the Public Administration Committee can, of course, re-examine the working of it whenever it sees fit.

Hugh Bayley: Public confidence in the honours system is draining away and it is not only because of concerns about party funding. Honours go disproportionately to the establishment, the rich and famous, and civil servants, and women still receive far fewer honours than men. Few people have heard of the Appointments Commission, but they have heard of Parliament. Can we have a statutory Committee of both Houses of Parliament to oversee the honours system in a transparent and accountable way?

Nigel Griffiths: While I am a strong supporter of such statutory Committees, they require the full co-operation of all the parties. They cannot work if one party alone comes clean while the main Opposition parties hide their sources of support.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I do not think that my party is hiding anything, and I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will consider that comment. It is not only the future system that needs addressing, but the shabby events of recent months and years. In that light, does he agree—and will he use his personal authority to ensure—that the Public Administration Committee and the Constitutional Affairs Select Committee, which are looking into the issue, should have all the access to all the information that they need and all the people they need to see as witnesses, be they civil servants, party apparatchiks, donors, Ministers who knew and Ministers who did not know, consistent with self-incrimination and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is quite long enough.

Nigel Griffiths: What this House wants is full disclosure of the donations by Michael Brown and others to the Liberal Democrats. I am sorry that even today the Liberal Democrats cannot commit themselves to revealing the names of their donors and loaners. It is important that there is full co-operation—[Interruption.] There will be full co-operation from this side and we want full co-operation from the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that he has always regretted it when he has not taken the most radical course of action available. May I remind my hon. Friend that two years ago a Committee of this House recommended a radical and comprehensive reform of the honours system? Does he think that my right hon. Friend now regrets that he did not embrace that more wholeheartedly?

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend is being uncharacteristically uncharitable about the steps that have been taken since that distinguished Committee reported in 2004 and the actions in 2005 that set up eight committees that look across the range of areas. Independent appointments are made to those committees, which make recommendations to the Prime Minister. That system seems to have worked rather well. Of course, if improvements can be made, the House waits to hear them.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will accept that if confidence is going to be restored in the system, political rants in answer to serious questions in this House will not help that process. During Constitutional Affairs questions, the Minister said that the breaches of the 1925 Act were a matter for the prosecuting authorities. That is indeed the case, which is why Scotland Yard has been called in to investigate whether the Labour party has been selling peerages. Does the Deputy Leader of the House agree that any system that is put in place to restore public confidence needs to be independent of Members of Parliament, and particularly of the Prime Minister?

Nigel Griffiths: The Prime Minister has already made it very clear that he wishes to stand aside from taking such decisions on nominations, which will require legislation in this House and full co-operation. I think that the hon. Member—[HON. MEMBERS: "Right hon."] I am sorry. I think that the right hon. Member should perhaps have declared her close interest in this. I understand that the tax exile, Lord Ashcroft, made a contribution of some £25,000 to her election campaign. She would have done well to tell the House that, and also to tell the House that she will now disclose all the lenders to the Conservative party.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Disabled Parking (Parliamentary Estate)

31. Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab): How many parking places for disabled drivers there are on the House of Commons estate. [61513]

Nick Harvey (representing the House of Commons Commission): There are four marked parking spaces for disabled drivers in Star Chamber Court and two in Norman Shaw car park. The roadway markings in Star Chamber Court will be redrawn over the Whitsun recess, with some minor remarking done over the Easter recess to clarify that the two bays affected by the new bollards remain available for use.

Mrs. Riordan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for those reassurances. However, the disabled parking bays in Star Chamber Court have for many months been eaten into by alterations. As they need to be longer and wider to allow for disabled access, could the hon. Gentleman reassure me that four, not three, disabled parking bays will be put back into full use?

Nick Harvey: I can offer the hon. Lady that assurance. We will make certain that four are available for use, and if those do not appear to meet the necessary demand we can always consider other possibilities as well.

Environmental Performance

32. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): What further steps the Commission plans to take to improve the environmental performance of the House. [61514]

Nick Harvey: New energy and water policies were adopted by both Houses in late 2005, bringing the parliamentary estate closely into line with efficiency targets set by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for Government Departments. Work with the Carbon Trust since April 2004 is also helping to identify a range of measures that can improve our environmental performance.

Norman Baker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that during the debate on 3 November, serious concern was expressed on both sides of the Chamber about the lamentable environmental performance of this House. Can he confirm that the comments that Members made on that occasion, including those in my report, "How Green is Your Parliament?", will be taken forward and that we will have a full debate later this year when we can consider whether the House has made significant progress on that matter or is still spending almost half a million pounds on useless canopies?

Nick Harvey: My hon. Friend's dedication on this issue is known across the House, and he did indeed produce a helpful report late last year. I have already indicated to him that many of the suggestions that he made are being taken up by the House authorities. Later this year, the Commission will produce a further annual report, and I very much hope that time will be made available for a debate on it in the autumn so that my hon. Friend has the chance to satisfy himself that progress is being made.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Further to the question by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), the unwanted environmental protection screen cost £422,000. Would not it have been cheaper to supply each of the 646 Members of Parliament with a £20 umbrella from the Commons Shop, costing £12,920 and saving £409,080 that could have been invested in energy-saving measures?

Nick Harvey: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in thinking that the principal reason for the walkway was environmental– many users of the parliamentary estate had slipped there because of the wet surface. It is also the principal access to the House for disabled people, and the need for a walkway had been identified in that regard. The cost of the walkway has been addressed previously during questions in this House.

Cleaning Services

33. Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): On how many occasions since 10 October the brass fittings in the lift to the Special Gallery West have been polished. [61515]

Nick Harvey: The brass fittings in the lift to the Special Gallery West have not been polished for many years. Following professional conservation advice, the policy has been that, to prevent damage, such metalwork should not be polished but regularly cleaned with a dry chamois leather or duster.

Mr. Bacon: I thought that we would hear something about conservation. Could we please have some consistency? One has only to visit the Ways and Means Corridor or the Library Corridor to see fittings treated differently. Tourists now visit parts of the Palace that look shabby because of lack of cleaning. It is a disgrace.

Nick Harvey: As I explained, we are following advice in adopting our policy. Given the mixture of heritage and modern brass in the Commons, it would be difficult to begin distinguishing between them. It is therefore considered safer to avoid polishing and let a protective patina build up.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Leader of the House was asked—

Business Committee

34. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If he will bring forward a motion to establish a House of Commons business committee. [61516]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): We have no plans to alter the current arrangements for setting House of Commons business.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I thank the Deputy Leader of the House for that non-reply, which was courteously delivered. Does not he accept—as the Leader of the House will accept, as he attended a Hansard Society seminar this morning—that most other legislatures in the world have a business committee? The devolved institutions—the Assemblies in Wales and Northern Ireland and the Parliament in Scotland—have Business Committees. Does not the hon. Gentleman believe that it would help the House to have a business committee and thus bring the business closer to the people who comprise the House, not only Ministers?

Nigel Griffiths: No. Is that direct enough?

Far East Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees

3.31 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): With permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the outcome of the review that I announced on 12 December 2005 of the Government's ex gratia payment scheme for former far east prisoners of war and civilian internees.

The review has been thorough. It has been an immense undertaking, requiring a check of nearly 30,000 claim and policy files to determine whether consistent eligibility criteria had been used for civilian internees over the life of the scheme. The review has confirmed that the eligibility rules, based on the 1950s Japanese asset scheme, were the basis for making payments between the introduction of the scheme on 7 November 2000 and March 2001.

The civilian eligibility criteria under the 1950s scheme were based on normal residence in the United Kingdom at the time of internment. We now know that that was not consistent with the birth-link criterion introduced from March 2001. The birth-link criterion was introduced to expand eligibility, not restrict it. Consequently, the number of former civilian internees who qualified increased by 40 per cent. However, some 245 claimants who were paid under the Japanese asset scheme criteria cannot, on the evidence available, be shown to meet the birth-link criterion.

Furthermore, some 13 claimants who would have met the Japanese asset scheme criteria were denied payments because they failed to meet the birth-link criterion. Fewer than 20 claimants were paid in error around the time of the introduction of the birth-link criterion, apparently on the basis that they were recorded as British on contemporary camp lists.

I have considered a wide range of options for how we should proceed in the light of those inconsistencies. I have listened to the views of the Association of British Civilian Internees of the Far East Region. I have met the chair of the all-party group on far east prisoners of war and internees, my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), and other colleagues.

I have also looked again at the principle that to qualify, claimants should have a close link to the United Kingdom. That principle has underpinned the scheme from the start, and the fact that decisions were originally based on a 1950s scheme whose criteria included normal residence in the United Kingdom before internment is consistent with that. I have considered very carefully whether this is still a reasonable basis for the Government's definition of those to whom the country owed a debt. I have concluded that it is—a view that was supported by the courts.

I understand the argument put forward by many that all those who were British subjects at the time—and interned on that basis—should qualify for a payment. However, anyone born in a British colony was a British subject, and many of those people are now the citizens of a country that was given independence, and have never had a close link to the United Kingdom. I have therefore concluded that the right course of action is for there to be a further widening of the scheme to include those who have made some clear commitment or contribution to the United Kingdom.

On that basis, I have decided to make certain changes to the criteria for civilian internees. First, I am clear that we must include those who were rejected under the birth-link criterion but who would have met the Japanese asset scheme criteria, whether or not they had a Japanese asset scheme record. It would be unfair and improper if, as a matter of policy, claimants who were identical in all significant respects should have succeeded before March 2001 but failed thereafter. These rules will also apply to new claimants.

Secondly, I have decided to introduce a new provision to include those who have resided in the United Kingdom for at least 20 years since world war two, until November 2000, when the scheme was introduced. I have had discussions with the all-party group and with ABCIFER, and I have listened to their views. Indeed, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon and his colleagues, and to Ron Bridge of ABCIFER, whose comments and advice have been extremely helpful as we have all sought to resolve the matter before us. I have chosen the figure of 20 years as a reasonable measure of an individual's commitment to the United Kingdom, meaning that they are likely to have spent at least part of their working life here. This is consistent with the original principle that British civilians should have a close link with the United Kingdom in order to qualify.

Eligibility will go to anyone who was alive on 7 November 2000, when the scheme was introduced, or to their spouse or estate if they have since died. It will also extend to members of the armed forces of our former colonies, including the Indian army, who similarly meet this residence requirement and were held as prisoners of war. We have previously had reservations about a residence criterion because of the difficulty of providing supporting evidence. However, the 1950s scheme was residence based, and we expect the numbers now to be much smaller, both of which considerations suggest that the task before us should be manageable.

We also need to resolve details of how the 20-year rule should be applied. We will publish details of the qualifying criteria as soon as they are agreed, and I would ask potential claimants not to apply until then, so that when they do so they can provide the evidence required to process their applications. To that end, I can announce that ABCIFER and the chair of the all-party group on far east prisoners of war have accepted my invitation to join me in a working group to consider how we should take forward these points and resolve them. We assess that the change could admit some 500 new claimants, although the figures cannot be estimated with certainty.

I should also comment on the birth-link criterion. This was found by the High Court to have resulted in unlawful indirect discrimination. The judgment is the subject of appeals from both sides, and I have decided that we should not take any decisions on its future until that appeal is resolved. The review has shown that, in part at least due to the scale and urgency of the desire on all sides to make payments, there have been shortcomings in administration of the scheme. Those are the subject of a separate ongoing investigation due to be completed in the summer, and I will make a further statement to the House at that time. But our review has shown that the numbers adversely affected—that is, those who met the Japanese asset scheme criteria, but were rejected because they did not have a birth link—represent a very small proportion.

I apologise deeply for the fact that a number of people did not receive the payment that they should have received. We will address those cases as a matter of urgency, in particular contacting those whom we know to have been affected. The Government have made payments in excess of £250 million since the scheme was introduced, and more than 25,000 people have benefited.

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will recognise that the steps I have announced today address the one outstanding group who could reasonably claim to have a close link to the United Kingdom based on residence since the war. I am confident that the revised eligibility criteria are a fair reflection of our country's debt to those for whom it could be reasonably said that we have a responsibility. On that basis, I ask the House to support the scheme that I am announcing today, and I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): First, I thank the Minister for advance notice of his statement. I welcome the widening of the scheme announced today and his further apology to the House—the fourth that he has had to make. I also welcome his promise that he will deal as a matter of urgency with those who have not received the payment that they should have done. I am afraid that that is as far as my welcome can extend. Following such a thorough and lengthy review—nearly four months in the making—the House could reasonably have expected a comprehensive statement resolving all the outstanding issues and bringing matters to an honourable conclusion. That is not what we have.

I have some questions on the statement. For the avoidance of all doubt, can the Minister confirm that the first change to the criteria means that the 13 claimants to whom he referred, who would have met the Japanese asset scheme criteria, but were denied payments because they failed to meet the birth-link criterion, will now be paid the £10,000? Can he confirm when they can expect to receive payment? In answer to a written question that I tabled, the Minister confirmed last week that 162 cases were awaiting decision. I would be grateful if he would update the House on when he expects those cases to be decided.

Given that problems have arisen with the scheme—which, I acknowledge, was welcomed on both sides of the House—because, as the Minister acknowledged, the Ministry of Defence did too much in haste and was not clear about the details, I am concerned about the way in which he made the announcement about the 20-year rule. He has admitted that the details of how the rule should be applied have not yet been resolved and that the number of new claimants cannot be estimated with certainty. There is a danger that he will have raised expectations again, only to see them dashed when the details are resolved. Given the history of this scheme, does he agree that it would have been better to conclude the work on the details prior to today's statement? I welcome the inclusion of ABCIFER and the chairman of the all-party group in the working group to resolve those details, and I would be grateful if the Minister could confirm when he expects those details to be finalised and when he will be able to publish them.

The Minister touched briefly on the birth-link criterion. Recognising that legal action is ongoing, if the result of the appeal goes against the Government, will he commit to coming to the House at the earliest opportunity thereafter to make an oral statement setting out the implications for the scheme?

The Minister also mentioned the investigation being conducted by David Watkins, and confirmed that he expects the final report to be available to him by the end of June. In answer to a written question, he confirmed to me that he will make a statement to the House as soon as possible after that. Will he also confirm that he expects that to be an oral statement, enabling Members of the House to raise the questions that they will no doubt have?

Finally, can the Minister say when he expects to be able to report to the House that the whole matter has been resolved, that all outstanding issues have been cleared up, and that he will not have to return to the House to make further statements?

Mr. Touhig: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's welcome of my announcement—and I have no problem in coming here four, five or 400 times to apologise. If we have got something wrong, we should own up and apologise. That has been my policy, and it is the policy of this Government.

The hon. Gentleman raised several points, to which I shall seek to respond. Yes, we have identified 13 claimants who have not been paid. I want that matter resolved as quickly as possible, and if there is any doubt, it should be resolved in favour of the claimants. Yes, a number of claims are yet to be decided—he mentioned the answer that I gave him about the 162 cases. I want to be certain that we get the criteria absolutely right before I reintroduce payments under the scheme, and I hope that the House will bear with me on that.

Yes, the scheme was introduced in haste. Everyone, on all sides, felt that it was time for us to show our appreciation and sense of value, given the horrible suffering undergone by some of the people concerned. It was felt that that should be recognised properly. We tried to do it rather quickly and—as my statement made clear, and as will doubtless be made clear in the report that I will present to the House later this year—we did not get it right, perhaps because of the speed with which we were acting.

I cannot give a view on the details of the 20-year rule at this stage. The delay does not mean that I do not have views, or that work has not been done. I have been hugely impressed by the advice and information given to me by ABCIFER and by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon. For that reason, I want to involve them in the working group so that we can get the criterion right. I do not want to come back and say, or hear my successor say, "Sorry, we got it wrong again." I want to take account of the important contribution made by ABCIFER and by my hon. Friend, and to do a bit of work on that criterion. I hope that the first meeting of our working group will take place immediately after the recess, and that a week or so later we will announce the details of the criterion that will apply to the 20-year rule.

[Mr. Touhig]

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the birth link. If, at the end of the day, the appeal is lost and the birth-link criterion is declared unlawful, we shall not be able to proceed with it. My original ambition was for an arrangement allowing people to qualify under the Japanese asset scheme, plus the birth link, plus any other grounds for qualification; but if the birth link proves to be unlawful, that will not be possible.

I am always pleased to come back to the House and make an oral statement, and I shall press for such a statement—but of course that is not entirely in my gift.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I thank the Minister for giving notice of his statement. I welcomed the scheme originally introduced by the Government, which put right wrongs that have lasted half a century or so, and I welcome the good news that 500 people will now share in the result of the Minister's statement. Will he confirm, however, that there are still some 4,000 other people who were interned by the imperial Japanese army on the basis that it believed them to be British and they believed themselves to be British? If that is so, and if contemporary camp lists exist—presumably the imperial Japanese army inquired about people's nationalities and beliefs—does that not constitute sufficient grounds?

Is it not the case that the Ministry of Defence started out with an excellent scheme, but has somehow managed to cause confusion and despair? While it is indeed welcome that 25,000 people have benefited and an additional 500 will benefit, surely something should be done for the nearly 4,000 who believed they were British and whom the imperial Japanese army believed to be British—indeed, it was the very reason why they were interned.

Mr. Touhig: I accept that there are others, although I cannot be precise about the numbers that the hon. Gentleman gave. I will make inquiries and give him the figures that are available to us.

There is clearly an issue. As I have said, people feel that because they were interned as British by the Japanese, they should be paid under the scheme regardless of whether they have any link with this country in the sense of ever having lived here. We do not share that view; we take the view that there should be a close link with the United Kingdom. That is why we originally introduced the birth link and why I now propose to introduce a criterion of residence.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the problems that we have experienced with the scheme. But as an old friend of mine, Dick Murray—a Dubliner and a lovely fellow who, sadly, has now died—would say, "If I were going in that direction, I wouldn't start from here." Clearly there are lessons to be learned.

I have had some wonderful letters from people around the world saying how much they appreciate what we have done. I had one today from a 96-year-old lady who does not qualify, but who received an apology from me and £500 in recognition of the maladministration that the ombudsman said was the fault of the MOD—a judgment to which we responded. The lady says in her letter:

> "It is a testament to the integrity of the British people that they have assisted and respected their aged subjects who were the prisoners of war of another nation."

She also invites me to visit her in British Columbia, and gives me her telephone number.

I think that what we have done thus far is well appreciated, but I take the hon. Gentleman's point and I will get back to him about the numbers.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I welcome my hon. Friend's statement today and thank him for the very constructive way in which he has engaged with the all-party group and ABCIFER in trying to find a satisfactory solution to this long-running difficult problem. His approach is very welcome compared with the stonewalling that we had from the Ministry of Defence for far too long on this issue. He has come up with a workable solution that will, as far as I can see, deal with all the outstanding claims that we can identify relating to people who live in the UK. ABCIFER and I look forward to working with him to ensure that the outstanding debt of honour to all those who were imprisoned by the Japanese is honoured as quickly as possible, straight after the East recess.

Mr. Touhig: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. We have a very constructive and useful working relationship and, as I said in response to the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), my hon. Friend and ABCIFER have an important contribution to make in helping me to get the criteria right, and I look forward to ensuring that we do so.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is the Minister aware that more than 2,500 Royal Norfolks were captured by the Japanese when the Singapore garrison surrendered? All those prisoners of war suffered appalling brutality, and many died on the River Kwai rail project. There are very few survivors left, but many impoverished widows. Of course I welcome today's statement, but does the Minister agree that it is a disgrace that the Japanese Government have not given more money to the survivors—more than about £100 or so per prisoner—and that surely the second richest country in the world should be doing more to help those survivors and the impoverished widows who are still left?

Mr. Touhig: The Government, and previous Governments, have made quite clear this country's views about the Japanese Government's attitude in the past to apologies and compensation. I cannot add much more to what the hon. Gentleman says; I am sure that it is a view shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House. However, the Japanese Prime Minister has made an apology. People may well feel that that should be expressed more tangibly, but although I accept the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, my first responsibility is to do something about the people for whom we are responsible. It is our duty to do that, and I am seeking to do it.

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): Although my hon. Friend's statement is very welcome, this issue has always been not just about consistency, but about equity—not just about money, but about honour—and it is important that when the scheme finally comes to fruition, it covers as many people as possible, including my constituent, Mr. Peter Hall. Will my hon. Friend ensure that when the details of the criteria are worked out and the guidelines are issued, they are interpreted as generously as possible?

Mr. Touhig: Yes, I will certainly do that, working within the framework that I have announced today. A number of colleagues will know that I have been very much involved with the miners' compensation scheme—I have 500 cases in my constituency—and I share the point made by my hon. Friend: what is important for most people is not money, but recognition for the suffering, pain and horrors that they endured. We as a country must recognise that debt of honour; this is a tangible way to do so. There is no way that we can ever put right the wrongs and horrors that those people suffered.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): I thank the Minister for the statement, and specifically for the tribute that he has paid to my constituent, Ron Bridge, of ABCIFER. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that this a very good example of lobbying—quiet, constructive, fact-based and very persistent. Will he say a little about whether the scheme will be retrospective? A lot of the people eligible will be elderly, but some people whose eligibility for the extension will now be established may already have died. Will the scheme cover eligible people who have died and will the money be paid to their families?

Mr. Touhig: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said about Ron Bridge, who, as I say, has been extremely helpful, informative and constructive in the discussions that I have had with him. Yes, as I have made clear, the scheme will apply to those who were alive on 7 November, when the scheme was originally introduced. If people have died, their widows and estates will benefit as a consequence of the proposal introduced this afternoon.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Of course I welcome the announcement today, and as my hon. Friend says, it is right to take a little time to ensure that we get things right this time. My constituent Jim Hodson was a beneficiary of some of the £250 million that the Government made available, and we cannot thank the Government enough on behalf of those POWs of the Japanese. However, as has been mentioned already in the Chamber, there is a clear message to the Japanese Government: they ought to be shamefaced, and they ought to find the money to compensate the people who are still left. We should not let the Japanese Government off the hook. We ought to send them that clear message, and I hope that the Government will raise it on every possible occasion, and say that those people were used as slave labour by the imperial Japanese army, so the people of Japan ought to compensate them properly before it is too late.

Mr. Touhig: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome for the scheme. I have dealt with his second point, which has already been made by Opposition Members, and I have no doubt that Members' comments will be taken into account by the Japanese and their Government. Whether they respond is a matter for them, but there is no doubt that there are strong feelings on this issue in all parts of the House, and this is the place where they should be expressed.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I welcome the Minister's statement, and I commend the work of ABCIFER and the cross-party pressure applied by a number of Members, particularly as it affects Diana Elias, a constituent of mine. Nevertheless, is not the delay that has led to this situation a travesty? To get to this point, the Government have had to be dragged through the courts and have had to deal with both the parliamentary ombudsman's complaints and the Public Administration Committee. Will the Minister confirm that he will fully adopt the ombudsman's recommendations? Will he recognise the fact that for constituents such as Diana Elias, the fight not to be treated as a second-class citizen—as someone who is "not quite British enough"—has taken not five years but 60 years to win? In that time, Mrs. Elias's sister and cousin have died, and her brother-in-law has recently been diagnosed with cancer and has only a few months to live. Will the Minister acknowledge that although one could say, "Better late than never", for many it is indeed too late and they have died as second-class citizens?

Mr. Touhig: I do acknowledge the pain and suffering that Mrs. Elias, her family and others have gone through throughout this process. As I said at the beginning of my statement, there were problems with the criteria that we introduced, which were not consistent. Until I appeared before the Public Administration Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, we believed that they were consistent, and it is the inconsistency that led to some of the difficulties. I fully understand the views that he expresses, and I can only say that I sincerely apologise to Mrs. Elias and others for the grief and worry that has been caused by the manner of the scheme's operation. I am seeking to put that right today to the best of my ability, with, I hope, the support of the whole House. My understanding, based on evidence given in court and on matters considered by the parliamentary ombudsman, is that Mrs. Elias qualifies for the scheme. I hope that that will be the case.

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend warmly for his statement, which shows that he has been determined to get to grips with this mess; I hope that his close-link criterion will indeed sort it out. I also thank the parliamentary ombudsman for an excellent investigation that drew attention to the maladministration and injustice in the scheme, and Professor Jack Haywood, whose case went to the ombudsman for investigation. His complaint, reflecting those of others, was not that he wanted the money, which he did not. Rather, he was incensed by being told, in effect, that he was not British enough, despite a lifetime of distinguished service to this country. Has the Minister not said today that Professor Haywood and the ombudsman are right? If so, that is the right outcome.

Mr. Touhig: I thank my hon. Friend for making those points, and I pay tribute to people such as Jack Haywood, who have fought consistently on this issue. There has never been any doubt in my mind, or any other Member's mind, that he is totally British, and I very much regret the inference that he and others have drawn that they are not sufficiently British to qualify. My understanding is that under today's proposals, Professor Haywood will qualify. I might disagree with some of the points made by the ombudsman, but it would be churlish and wrong of me not to pay tribute to the work done by the ombudsman on Parliament's behalf, and to the work of the Public Administration Committee, chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). I believe passionately that the Government are answerable to this place for their actions, which is why I am here. It is right and proper that Committees such as my hon. Friend's ensure that the Executive are held to account. The work done by the ombudsman points out where we get things wrong—and with the best will in the world, Governments do not get everything right. I am admitting where we got it wrong and seeking to redress that.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Last time, I asked the Minister to deal with the question of civilian and service volunteers who now live in the Irish Republic—or the Irish Free State, as it used to be. Will my hon. Friend clarify the position of those people, and how the announcement will affect them? Several hon. Members have, over the past 20 or 30 years, raised the question of parallel circumstances in Germany. I. G. Farben, for example, held and used people not under the Geneva conventions, but as slave labour. I urge the Minister to stick his chest out and remember that eight Conservative Prime Ministers, under 31 years of Conservative government, did nothing to address this issue. He should be proud to have been able to implement the change, notwithstanding the hiccups and shortcomings.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Quite a few years of Labour government, too.

Mr. Touhig: Let us hope and pray that there will be many more years of Labour government, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am sure that the country feels that way. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) for his kind comments, but I cannot specifically answer his query about citizens of the former Irish Free State, now the Irish Republic. I realise that I owe my hon. Friend an answer, so I shall look further into the matter and answer him then. My hon. Friend also asked a question about other prisoners of war—

Andrew Mackinlay: No, slave labour.

Mr. Touhig: Slave labour, or those interned as a result of conflict. We take the view, as does the House, that those who had to endure Japanese prisoner of war camps had an exceptionally horrible existence. That is exemplified by the fact that 25 per cent. of prisoners of war in the far east died in captivity, as opposed to about 5 per cent. in Europe. That shows why we feel that it is important to do something to recognise the suffering that so many of our fellow citizens had to endure. I hope that the House will welcome what I am doing, and I look forward to working with ABCIFER and the all-party group and updating the House with further statements at the appropriate time.

Point of Order

4.2 pm

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you provide some guidance on parliamentary inquiries into what is commonly called the loans or cash for peerages scandal, particularly when Scotland Yard detectives have asked for such inquiries to be delayed, lest they adversely affect police investigations or even a possible criminal trial?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice that he intended to raise that matter. As I understand it, no charges have yet been brought, so the normal sub judice rule would not apply. It is therefore for Committees of the House to take their own decisions about the conduct of their business. I understand that the Select Committee on Public Administration has decided to delay its inquiry, which is entirely a matter for a Committee of the House in these circumstances. I hope that that helps the hon. Gentleman.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to raise a point of order?

John Hemming: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, he should say so. It is not enough to stand in his place, as I am unsure why he is rising. Is this a separate point of order or further to the previous point of order?

John Hemming: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought I had given you notice of my intention to raise a point of order in respect of an answer given yesterday by the Minister for Local Government. That Minister said that he did not accept the premise that the Government have a policy on what the council tax should be or on whether the council tax should be allowed to increase beyond the rate of inflation. I wish to clarify for the House the fact that the Government have had a policy on the council tax, which is called CTSS, council tax for standard spending, and ANCT, assumed national council tax. It is also important to note, for clarification, that the council tax has gone up beyond the rate of inflation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that I received no notice that he intended to raise that point of order. I am afraid that his point does not fulfil the criteria for a proper point of order, but he has had his opportunity to put his remarks before the House.

Aid Effectiveness (Independent Evaluation)

4.4 pm

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the Secretary of State, when reporting on departmental expenditure, to publish an independent evaluation and measurement of the effectiveness of United Kingdom bilateral aid projects in reducing poverty and a comparison of the effectiveness of different projects and forms of aid in reducing poverty; to require the Secretary of State to redirect resources towards the most effective projects and forms of aid; and for connected purposes.

Throughout the past year I have been struck time and again by the commitment of people from all walks of life to the campaign to make poverty history. It captured public imagination and galvanised support across social boundaries and partisan divisions in a way that few other grassroots campaigns have managed to achieve in recent years. Many people still wear their "Make Poverty History" wristbands, not just from forgetfulness or as a fashion item, but from a lasting desire to see the overarching goal of the campaign realised—that the grinding poverty and misery that so many people on the planet face daily should be consigned to the dustbin of history.

Aid is only one part of a complex set of issues that can make a difference to the developing world, but more aid, delivered more effectively, has a key role to play in ending global poverty. However, as 2005 grew to a close I sensed some disillusion in the "Make Poverty History" campaign, as domestic concerns about terrorism and security diverted attention from it, and the disappointing outcome of the Hong Kong trade summit seemed to lead to a dissipation of the excitement and energy of some of the activists.

The best way to restore enthusiasm to all the people who campaigned, marched and wrote letters to us all is for the Government to demonstrate real follow-through on the rhetoric and to show tangible progress on meeting the eight millennium development goals that form the bedrock of our international development strategy. To that end, much better linkage must be shown between high-level development rhetoric, the nature of our international aid and interventions and the outcomes achieved on the ground in terms of poverty reduction, lives saved, children educated and all the other relevant indicators that the public understand and seek.

My Bill aims to strengthen that linkage. I pay tribute to the work of the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke), whose International Development (Reporting and Transparency) Bill has stimulated much discussion about how we can lock Department for International Development Ministers into a clear framework of accountability. His Bill represents an extremely useful and substantial step forward, especially as it places Parliament at the centre of the accountability process. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on both the Bill and the skilful way in which he is piloting it through this place. I am extremely impressed by the degree of cross-party consensus it has achieved.

My Bill would provide a useful complement to that of the right hon. Gentleman. At its heart is a requirement that the Secretary of State regularly publish an independent evaluation of UK aid projects. In recent years, calls have been made repeatedly for greater evaluation, and more independent evaluation, of DFID activities. The sixth report of the International Development Committee in the last Parliament urged DFID to ensure the independence of evaluation by, first, increasing the proportion of evaluations conducted by external evaluators and, secondly, ensuring that the results of all its evaluations were made publicly available. Above all, it said that careful thought must be given to the ways in which the monitoring of DFID's progress against the millennium development goals can be more closely integrated with the monitoring of the Department's individual programmes and projects.

A year after the Select Committee report, the Department published an internal document entitled "How Effective Is DFID?", which observed:

"Compared with some other agencies, DFID spends a much lower proportion of its budget on independent evaluation, and evaluates a much lower proportion of its activities."

My Bill would help to close the gap in independent evaluation and meet some of the criticisms that have been raised.

Let us be clear: we are not talking about the mere reporting of data and the repackaging of departmental data. That would not be good enough; it would be no substitute for a systematic and independent assessment of effectiveness. As the DFID effectiveness report demonstrated, a large volume of performance information may already be available, but there is "generally insufficient information on the links between DFID's inputs and interventions on the one hand, and the positive outcomes observed on the other".

Higher priority must be given to performance assessment and evaluation so that DFID can better understand its own organisational effectiveness and its contribution to successful international development.

The Bill would certainly make sure that such evaluation received higher priority by making it a statutory requirement. Again, I emphasise the importance of independent evaluation. To quote again from the DFID effectiveness document: the Department "needs to be more confident about independent verification and assessment by its partners and others, and to increase the resources allocated to evaluation".

My Bill also requires the Secretary of State to publish a comparison of the different types of aid project and the different forms of aid that we support. DFID spends about £4 billion each year on a variety of programmes that are delivered through different mechanisms. Some of that spending takes the form of bilateral aid; some is multilateral. We need to achieve a far better understanding of the relative effectiveness of the main types of aid that we provide. The independent evaluation envisaged in the Bill should, I hope, provide the evidential basis, which will in turn lead to better decision making about which aid programmes should be targeted to ensure the greatest possible reduction in poverty.

Anyone who has spent any time at all reading through the literature about aid effectiveness will be aware that the territory is hotly contested. There is a great deal of conflicting evidence about what constitutes good aid and what constitutes bad aid. Measuring the effectiveness of aid is difficult and it is easy to talk about it in general terms, but it is essential that every effort is made to improve this discipline. I have been extremely impressed by the DFID officials whom I have met and by the Secretary of State, who brings unquestionable commitment to his job. I am confident that they would wish this agenda to be developed in their Department.

The rigorous, independent evaluation of our aid spending promoted by the Bill should not just ensure best value for taxpayers' money—by securing the best possible poverty reduction outcomes—but strengthen and sustain public support for our aid. Over the past year, a huge number of people have invested their time, resources and energy in campaigning for an end to the obscene levels of poverty in the developing world. They are not just looking for warm rhetoric from this place or even for grand announcements that focus on the funding for our aid programmes and other inputs. Instead, they want to see and understand the outputs—the real, tangible difference being made by our international aid—and to see how much further there is to go before poverty really is made history.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stephen Crabb, John Bercow, Tim Farron, Mrs. Sharon Hodgson, Mr. Gary Streeter and Daniel Kawczynski.

AID EFFECTIVENESS (INDEPENDENT EVALUATION)

Mr. Stephen Crabb accordingly presented a Bill to require the Secretary of State, when reporting on departmental expenditure, to publish an independent evaluation and measurement of the effectiveness of United Kingdom bilateral aid projects in reducing poverty and a comparison of the effectiveness of different projects and forms of aid in reducing poverty; to require the Secretary of State to redirect resources towards the most effective projects and forms of aid; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 157].

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [22 March.]

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

4.13 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): This year's Budget equips British business to meet the challenges of globalisation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. May I ask anyone who has a cell phone still switched on please to switch it off? It is causing disturbance.

Alan Johnson: The Budget enhances Britain's strong economy, entrenches stability and widens opportunity. Today, there are 105,000 more self-employed people, 575,000 more businesses and 2.4 million more people in work than there were in 1997. Crucial sectors such as the pharmaceutical, aerospace and financial services sectors are thriving. Our scientists are leading the way in areas such as stem cell research and nanotechnology. Last year, our economy grew faster than those of France, Germany and the eurozone as a whole. The Budget builds on that success while meeting the growing challenges of globalisation, including, in particular, the phenomenal growth of China and India.

Raising productivity is central to meeting the challenge. We are now in the longest period of sustained productivity growth since the 1960s. We have closed the productivity gap with Germany, overtaken Japan and halved the gap with France. Britain is the only G7 country to have kept up with US rates of productivity growth, in stark contrast with France and Germany.

Our success is all the more remarkable for having been achieved at the same time as an increase of 2.3 million in jobs. Achieving productivity growth and high employment at once is not an easy trick because one often rises at the expense of the other, but it is the formula for national wealth. We know that we still have further to go to raise Britain's productivity. The Budget enhances the drivers of productivity—innovation, investment, skills, competition, enterprise and investment.

Since 1997, we have invested unprecedented sums in Britain's science base. Funding levels are now double what they were. We also introduced the research and development tax credit and put in place a target to increase the share of national income that we spend on R and D from 1.8 per cent. to 2.5 per cent. by 2014. Today, there are 750,000 more science, engineering and technology graduates than there were in 1997, and the share of firms bringing new products to market is up by 50 per cent. Our world-beating proportion of scientific papers and citations has increased. In addition, the number of university spin-outs has trebled, and they now run at an average of 200 a year. In the past two years, 18 spin-out companies—with a combined value of more than £600 million today—gained listing on the London stock exchange.

The Budget builds on that record and advances the goals of the 10-year science and innovation framework to ensure that we maximise the impact of science funding. Raising levels of business R and D is key to raising productivity. Since 1997, business R and D investment has increased by 20 per cent. in real terms, and the R and D tax credit is driving the new investment that we need. So far, £1.5 billion of support has been claimed, and Deloitte has assessed the UK's R and D tax credit as being among the world's most attractive regimes.

The Budget sets out our intention to extend the higher rate of the R and D tax credit to companies with between 250 and 500 employees. Business lobbied for such a measure and Sir George Cox recommended it in his review of creativity in business. We will also widen the remit of the technology strategy board to stimulate innovation in the areas that offer the greatest scope for productivity improvements. I am delighted to announce today the latest £80 million competition for the collaboration R and D fund under the technology programme. It will help to fund new collaborative research in vital areas underpinning our technology strategy, such as low-carbon energy technologies and innovative manufacturing processes.

To improve productivity, the links between science and innovation are crucial. We have set out plans for a radically simplified allocation of the £1.5 billion a year that we invest in scientific discovery to make the best use of that investment.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Am I right in saying that business investment has fallen to its lowest level for the past 10 years? Does it worry the right hon. Gentleman, as a former higher education Minister, that various university science and chemistry departments have closed recently?

Alan Johnson: Business investment has grown on average by 5 per cent. a year since 1997, compared with a growth of 3.4 per cent. in the previous 10 years. It was worth £77 billion in 1996, but is now worth £113 billion, and it will rise to £126 billion by 2008. Yes, I am concerned about the closure of chemistry departments—I think that that happened at Sussex—but the hon. Gentleman and

[Alan Johnson]

I know that universities are independent. If he looks around the university world, he will see good stories from other universities throughout the country.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I apologise for arriving just after the right hon. Gentleman started his speech. On research and development and, especially, pulling what I call the basic research out of universities and into wealth creation, why did the Chancellor not examine in his Budget statement putting solid third-stream funding into the research councils and making that available to industry? Without that, surely we will start robbing Peter to pay Paul by taking out basic research money and applying it to knowledge-transfer and third-stream funding systems.

Alan Johnson: I am coming on to announcements in the Budget on R and D, particularly in the health service, but in terms of our total science base, doubling the amount of money available for science, operating through both the Higher Education Funding Council and the research councils, is the right way forward. We are always willing to consider more investment. It is crucial to get science and innovation into the same place.

The Budget also announced the creation of a single budget—this is pertinent to the hon. Gentleman's comments—for the Medical Research Council and NHS health research, worth at least £1 billion a year. That will ensure a more coherent framework for health research and development. We will now look at the best institutional arrangements to achieve that. We have also decided that the Harwell site, which includes the Rutherford Appleton laboratory, and the Daresbury site should become the Harwell and Daresbury science and innovation campuses respectively. We will develop those campuses to ensure that their facilities are internationally competitive, support world-class science and maximise opportunities for knowledge transfer.

As well as a strong science base, we need to invest in the scientists of tomorrow. Since 1997, the number of new science teachers has increased by 30 per cent., but we must do more, and the Budget includes incentives for more physics and chemistry graduates to move into teaching. We are also giving pupils a right to study three separate sciences at GCSE and increasing funding for after-school science clubs.

We need to improve mechanisms to turn our great science base into greater wealth. Over the next two years, we will put £100 million into the enterprise capital funds scheme to help high-risk, high-growth companies bridge the equity gap—the funding problem that they experience when they are too big to finance from their own resources, but too small to be of interest to venture capitalists. We will also launch a scholarship scheme to help UK science, engineering and technology graduates develop entrepreneurial skills by spending six months in the US with leading universities and enterprises. The scheme will be administered by the National Council for Graduate Entrepreneurship and the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation in the United States.

Tackling regulation is vital to the success of enterprise—another key driver of productivity. At the Department of Trade and Industry, we have demonstrated that we are serious, with our £1 billion regulatory simplification plan, which will produce a significant cut in business burdens. The Budget includes further measures, with a commitment to cut the time business spends filling in tax forms and returns, as well as cutting the administrative burdens of tax audits and inspections. We are also putting the recommendations of the Hampton review into law, as well as ensuring more risk-based targeted enforcement at local authority level. That will release the vast majority of honest and compliant businesses from unnecessary and time-consuming interventions.

A number of schemes are in place to support enterprise. We need to ensure that they are accessible, focused and well targeted. At the DTI, we have already reduced more than 100 business support products to fewer than 10, so they are better tailored to customer needs. The Budget extends that principle and aims to reduce the number of business support schemes from 3,000 to 100 by 2010. More than £2 billion a year is spent on business support. The review will ensure that we get value for money.

It is also vital that we examine the effectiveness and efficiency of our regional structures. The regional development agencies were created as a response to global pressures, where local action is often the right response. Our review will ensure that the RDAs have the links, incentive and powers they need to drive economic growth regionally.

We must also improve the way in which we market our strengths abroad and help British business to meet the challenges of globalisation. The new chief executive of UK Trade and Investment, Andrew Cahn, shares that ambition. Before the summer, we will publish a new five-year strategy for UKTI. It will aim to deliver maximum value for business and the taxpayer. We are intensifying our efforts to expand UK trade into India and China. We are also putting £9 million of new investment into a global R and D strategy to attract more business R and D to the UK, and to promote Britain's innovative firms abroad.

Another major challenge identified in the Budget is gender inequality at work, which, according to the women and work commission, costs Britain £23 billion a year in lost gross domestic product and prevents the economy from reaching its full productive potential. Since 1997, a combination of tax credits, the minimum wage and the new deal has made work pay and boosted employment, particularly among women, so that a record 70 per cent. of women are in work and our overall employment rate of nearly 75 per cent. is among the highest in the world. Our aim is to increase it to 80 per cent.—higher than any major economy has ever achieved—so helping more women back to work will play a vital role. The Work and Families Bill, which is proceeding through the House, will help everyone better to balance their work and family responsibilities.

The Budget boosted child care. Today, there are 1.2 million more child care places than in 1997—an increase of 90 per cent. All parents are entitled to help with child care, either through tax credits or vouchers. The Budget helped employers to support parents with child care, both through the tax system and through capital grants to help small and medium-sized employers to establish workplace nurseries. Further help is available for low-skilled women who find it difficult to access the job market and move up the skills ladder. Those and other measures will help to address the issues highlighted by the women and work commission, and they follow last week's announcement of an increase in the national minimum wage to £5.35, which will benefit 1.3 million workers, two thirds of whom are women.

A growing economy depends on safe and sustainable energy supplies, but climate change endangers the very future of our planet. Today, I have published our microgeneration strategy alongside the climate change review. It sets out what more we can do to boost the use of decentralised energy in our homes, schools and businesses, thus taking forward the Budget announcement of an initial extra £50 million for microgeneration technologies, which is additional to the £30 million that has already been announced.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD) rose—

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD) rose—

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD) rose—

Alan Johnson: I will give way to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey).

Mr. Davey: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way. I am sure that my hon. Friends have much better questions than I have, and that he will give way to them shortly. Given the Secretary of State's welcome statement on microgeneration, what is the cost of Budget resolution 47, which is entitled, "Corporation tax (nuclear decommissioning)"? Is it designed to help the proposed sell-off of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., and why was a press notice not issued giving the details of the tax change?

Alan Johnson: I do not know whether all three Members wished to ask the same question but, on that resolution, we are the first Government to tackle seriously the problem of nuclear decommissioning. It is an horrendous task, and it is split between various agencies that have such a complicated connection to one another that it almost impossible to explain it on a grid. We must rationalise the issue and ensure that elements in public ownership that do not need to be in public ownership to meet our objectives on decommissioning are put into the private sector. We must ensure, too, that the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority has the right resources to carry out its important task.

Martin Horwood: The Secretary of State applauded the Chancellor's inclusion of microgeneration budgets for Government buildings, but he was curiously silent about the clear skies programme, which supported household microgeneration but has run out of funds. Will he confirm whether it will be abolished or replaced, perhaps by another scheme to encourage household microgeneration?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman was right about replacement, as we have made it plain that the clear skies scheme will be replaced by another scheme. Our microgeneration strategy will help schools and public buildings by removing problems with planning consent and so on. The money that has been provided will be used to encourage householders to become involved in microgeneration. A colleague who is much more deeply involved in microgeneration in his own home than I am has to pay £8 a therm to buy back the energy that he sells to the national grid. Such issues have to be tackled. The strategy is for microgeneration in schools, public buildings and the home.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): The Secretary of State is outlining the steps that the Government are taking to reduce CO_2 emissions, and I look forward to his remarks. As the Prime Minister said on Australian television today, Great Britain accounts for only 2 per cent. of CO_2 emissions. China is the main polluter and will continue to be so in the future. What steps is the Secretary of State taking to have discussions with his Chinese counterpart to encourage China to take similar steps?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely important point. We cannot solve the problem domestically. The kind of initiatives that we have taken with the G8, which was extended to include Brazil, China, India and other developing countries, are continuing under the Russian presidency of the G8. The hon. Gentleman asks what steps I have taken. At the EU-China summit last year when the UK had the presidency, one of the important objectives of our trip to China was to begin to share with China some of the clean coal technology, such as carbon capture and carbon storage. It is crucial that we do not use the emerging carbon sequestration technologies only in Europe, and that we share our scientific lead with China and India.

David Howarth: May I bring the Secretary of State back to Budget resolution 47 and ask what precise changes in corporation tax are being proposed for nuclear decommissioning?

Alan Johnson: I have dealt with Budget resolution 47.

The microgeneration strategy will examine how we can tackle the obstacles to take-up. In particular, we will look at the planning regime, the potential rewards available from exporting electricity back into the grid and the possibility of developing an accreditation scheme, so that people know which products and installations to trust. We will also work with the industry to develop a scheme for installing microgeneration in schools so that we can educate the next generation about the need for energy efficiency and renewables.

It is vital that British business takes advantage of new energy-efficient technologies to reduce its costs and help the environment. Over the next 10 years up to £1 billion will be invested in a new national institute for energy technologies in a 50:50 partnership between Government and business. BP, EDF Energy, E.ON UK and Shell have already expressed interest in taking part.

We will also bring forward a detailed consultation on what more we can do to promote large scale commercial deployment of carbon capture and storage. As the Budget and the current energy review show, we are serious about tackling climate change and will take the tough decisions necessary to deliver real reductions in carbon. We have seized the agenda since 1997. As a result, we have beaten our Kyoto targets.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): The Minister says that the Government are serious about reducing carbon emissions and tackling global warming and climate change. Will he give a commitment to the House today to look again at the imbalance in connection charges between the north of Scotland and the south of England—the south of England being subsidised and the north of Scotland being charged about £24 per kilowatt to connect to the grid—to assist in making large scale off-shore wind production financially attractive?

Alan Johnson: I can give the assurance that in the energy review that is one specific aspect that we will be examining. I agree that the problem needs to be resolved.

The climate change levy package has saved over 28 million tonnes of carbon since it was introduced, and is expected to save a further 6 million tonnes a year, so that by 2010 it will account for 40 per cent. of the UK's total carbon reductions. The Budget announced that from next year the climate change levy will increase in line with inflation. Even after taking into account these increased rates, business will still benefit from the overall climate change levy package. The 0.3 per cent. reduction in national insurance contributions brought in at the same time as the levy saves business £900 million a year, whereas the levy costs about £600 million a year. The Conservative party remains opposed to that progressive measure. If we were to follow its approach, there would be a further 6 million tonnes of carbon a year in the atmosphere, which is equivalent to the combined emissions from Birmingham, Leeds, Manchester and Sheffield.

Climate change is not only an issue for business. The Budget includes measures to insulate a further 250,000 homes over the next two years, bringing forward annual carbon savings of 35,000 tonnes and reducing annual household bills by around £20 million. We will also put £5 million over the next two years into a new large-scale trial of smart metering, which will be matched by private sector funding. That will help us, as consumers, to understand and look harder at our own energy consumption.

In conclusion, this is a forward-looking Budget. It equips today's Britain for tomorrow's vital challenges. It reduces burdens, promotes competitiveness and raises productivity. It is a Budget for business and it is a Budget for industry, and I commend it to the House.

4.35 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I have watched all 10 of the Budgets delivered by the Chancellor, and none of us who has watched him doubts that they are always skilfully honed. He is a master of propaganda rather than enlightenment. We have long since learned that what is in the Budget on the day is not what matters and that most of the pain lies in the small print that is not announced on the day.

All Budgets need time to settle for everyone to digest them. This Budget does not involve great drama, because there is no fundamental restructuring or revolutionary changes of gear. There is no real point in engaging in an auction of hyperbole in which one side says that the Budget is all fabulous and the other says that it is all disastrous. This Budget needs a more dispassionate assessment of the context in which it has been designed. [Interruption.] Even in this House, there are moments to stand back and consider the long-term trends, which is exactly what I want to do today.

I shall admit something else to enliven the House. Some say that the two sides of this House have so converged that one can no longer tell us apart, but they are totally wrong. Labour has had to prove over the years that it understands and embraces market economics, while we have had to reassert our belief in social justice, but what divides us is tax and the power of the state. The Chancellor is inclined to tax anything that moves and do anything that he can get away with; we believe in lowering taxes wherever possible and that any new tax must be justified. The Chancellor believes that state action and centrally directed initiatives are the solution to most national problems; we believe that the creativity and aspiration of the individual, free from state interference, is the greatest engine of progress and improvement. We appreciate more than the Chancellor that only private prosperity can pay for public services—when we think of wealth, profit and prosperity, we say, "Go make it", while he says, "Go take it".

The Chancellor makes much of his fiscal rules: first, that he should balance the budget over the economic cycle, and secondly, that he should borrow for investment, not merely for spending. However, he took some pride in rejecting what he called a third fiscal rule, namely that spending should rise more slowly than growth. Perhaps that policy marks the difference between us, because it contains both a grave admission and the seeds of its own destruction. If spending increases more slowly than growth, then the state takes a smaller proportion of GDP. If spending increases ever faster than growth, which is the opposite of the fiscal rule that he has rejected, then the state takes an ever-larger proportion of GDP, which leads to more spending, higher taxes and greater borrowing—what was 40 per cent. can become 50, 60, 70, 80 or 90 per cent. The effect is a bit like flesh-eating bacteria: it is so self-consuming that if one were to carry the Chancellor's course to its logical outcome, the British economy would disappear up its own origins. But fortunately the people can stop it.

Everything is up against its limits. That is not my opinion, but that of the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, the hon. Member for Harlow (Bill Rammell). I have a little clip that states:

"A Government minister who admitted that Labour had taxed people to 'the limit' was rebuked by the Treasury last night"—

[Interruption.] I am told that that was quite right. It continues:

"Bill Rammell, the higher education minister, said, while launching a White Paper on further education: 'We are probably about at the limit of what people are prepared to pay to improve public services.'

The Treasury issued a firm rebuke to the minister".

The Chancellor is running out of tricks and wheezes to expropriate any more revenue, but that admission signifies what is to come. With a majority of only 97 in Harlow, the Minister knows something about being up against his limits.

The danger is that the Chancellor will run out of flexibility. As The Economist said:

"If, for example, the economy runs into trouble later this decade, then his plans for apparently modest public spending growth may yet prove unaffordable, just when they might be most needed. The chancellor was fortunate to inherit a strong economy whose public finances were improving sharply. If Mr Brown's inheritance as prime minister is a weakening economy and a chronic budget deficit, he will have only one person to blame: himself."

This is the Chancellor who has doubled the council tax and destroyed pensions. This is the Chancellor who is guilty of causing the pain of ever-rising council tax and who is guilty of the unforgivable larceny of seeing the best-funded pension provision in Europe reduced to ashes.

It is not the little announcements in the Budget that will be dwelt on, but the underlying trends and pressures that Britain faces. It is not a million quid here or there, but the incidence and burden of tax and our competitive position and skills base that will determine our prospects in the longer term.

Even now we can see that the Chancellor's favoured structures are coming under strain. NHS deficits are a major crack in his ill-crafted model of public services. He can boast about the extra billions, but not only do they have to be paid for, they are not solving the problem. We do not have a perfect national health service: we have deficits, closures and lay-offs. He may well have doubled his spending, but now he will have to double the size of the House of Lords to pay off the deficits.

Competition in the modern world is becoming more and more ferocious. Comparative weakness can be seized on, with the swift transfer of capital to better options. Comparative advantage is more and more difficult to define and retain. Mature economies such as ours, with higher welfare costs and high social standards, carry those costs while having at the same time to compete with the likes of India, China and eastern Europe—all at a different stage of development. Our fortunes will not be shaped in any sudden way by the contents of one Budget. They will be determined by the gradual and continuing force of global competition. Despite what the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said a moment ago, there are some very worrying trends.

Britain has dropped from fourth to 13th in the World Economic Forum competitiveness table since 1997. Just today, we learn that The Economist intelligence unit survey of how favourable a country is for foreign investment shows that the UK has fallen from fourth to seventh, because of concerns about tax levels, regulation, poor transport infrastructure and low levels of productivity. It is no triumph to be overtaken by Finland, Holland and Ireland.

Productivity growth has slowed under this Labour Government and, last year, it actually fell to zero for a time. Under the last Conservative Government, we were catching up with France and the USA, but under this Government we are losing ground. Last year, business investment, at 9.1 per cent. of GDP fell to the lowest level since records began and the number of new companies registered actually fell.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): On a point of fact, does the hon. Gentleman accept that annual average productivity growth in this cycle has been 2.3 per cent., against 2 per cent. in the last cycle—[Interruption.] I see that the shadow Chancellor is trying to give the hon. Gentleman the answer, but perhaps he could respond to my question.

Mr. Duncan: The hon. Gentleman is always changing the cycle and the base in order to churn out statistics that suit him. We take a broader and more honest view of the figures.

The Chancellor talks a lot about skills. In his Budget, as if it were some communist five-year plan for tractor production, he said of the UK:

"By 2020, it will need 14 million highly skilled workers. And of 3.4 million unskilled jobs today, we will need only 600,000 by 2020."—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 292.]

The extraordinary certainty with which he asserts those figures is distressing enough, but not all parts of Government share in his enthusiasm for science-based skills. It was staggering to be given a letter that an Ofsted inspector wrote to the children of a primary school in my constituency after an Ofsted inspection—a practice that I do not think is appropriate, particularly when it includes the sentence:

"we think that you ought to spend more time on subjects other than English, mathematics and science."

[Interruption.] I will repeat it for the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), if he really thinks that he approves of such a letter. An Ofsted inspector has written to primary school children suggesting that they ought to spend less time on mathematics, science and English. How are we going to reach the required standards in our primary schools if that is the attitude of Ofsted inspectors?

Let me take an article by Sir John Rose from the Chancellor's newly appointed business advisory council, who says:

"The key to competitiveness and productivity is a strong educational base that can create a well-educated workforce."

No one can disagree with that. He goes on:

"In our schools, some of the key, science-based subjects are in decline. The number of sixth-formers taking A-level physics, for example, has fallen 30 per cent. over the past 15 years. More generally, there has been a decline in science and maths as a proportion of A-level passes.

At university level our students are increasingly failing to find engineering-based subjects attractive—the number of electronic and electrical-engineering students has fallen by more that 30 per cent. in the past two years alone. More than half of all engineering doctorates awarded in Britain are gained by overseas students."

At least that is an example of what may be good advice heading in the direction of the Chancellor.

As if the skills problem were not bad enough on its own, we have the added burden of regulations. Every single year, the EU alone issues 100 to 150 directives and 3,500 regulations.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): I am sure that my hon. Friend will share my disgust at some of the daft regulations that come out of Europe. Speaking as the Member for the home of the international organ festival, does he share my slight glimmer of hope that there may be an exemption for the pipe industry, and will he urge the Government to press forward with making sure that that industry is exempt from this daft regulation, which may threaten our liturgical music?

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The hazardous waste directive banning the use of lead in new electrical products appears to threaten the restoration and building of church organs. We were partly heartened by the response of the Minister for Industry and the Regions, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael), in Trade and Industry questions last week. He said that restoration would not be subject to the directive, but he was ambiguous and ambivalent about whether newly built organ pipes would be exempt and said that they would have to apply for an exemption. Will the Secretary of State apply for a general exemption on the industry's behalf, or will each company have to apply for an exemption individually?

Alan Johnson indicated dissent.

Mr. Duncan: The right hon. Gentleman declines to tell the House. He should be on top of the issue and able to tell us. The Budget is about the prosperity and success of business, many of them small businesses such as those that make and restore organs. If the Secretary of State is not prepared to tell us whether they are going to be able to survive the regulatory regime that we are discussing, he is not doing his job properly.

I have found no end of examples of directives, many of which would suffice as a paragraph but are, when they come to us, seven, eight or nine pages long. We have the Food (Jelly Confectionery) (Emergency Control) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2004, which runs to six pages, and the Food (Jelly Mini-Cups) (Emergency Control) (Scotland) Regulations 2004. When I wrote my election address, little did I appreciate that we were so severely at risk from an imminent invasion of jelly cups. Those who show enough enterprise to start or run a business quickly find themselves swimming in treacle. They immediately get an enormous book. We need a "Treacle Swimming Emergency (Britain) Order" to rescue their prospects. Any business person faces an enormous burden and uncertainty under the Government.

The operating and financial review was a sad and sorry tale. Was the Secretary of State told about it before the Chancellor abolished it? [Interruption.] One Minister claims that he was while the Secretary of State shakes his head. The Chancellor abolished the operating and financial review. Companies subsequently said that they would prefer to have it because they had spent all the money preparing for it. The Chancellor then said that we would have it back. A statutory instrument was passed to get rid of it but it remains in the Company Law Reform Bill. That is a mess. Businesses need certainty and consistency so that they can decide how to invest and know how they spend their money.

Mr. Davey: Does the hon. Gentleman know whether the Department realised that the Chancellor would abolish the home computer initiative? He probably knows that Department officials were being given computers but will now be charged £200 a year because of the Chancellor's decision.

Mr. Duncan: The hon. Gentleman is right. The Department website stated:

> "One of the most effective ways of realising the potential of the workforce and the organisation is for employers to make computers for home use available to as many employees as possible. Basic computer and technology skills are now regarded as essential for the majority of jobs ... Home Computing Initiatives ... are an extremely powerful catalyst for any organisation that wants to exploit the clear and indisputable link between individual learning, workplace productivity and overall competitiveness."

The Chancellor has not only scrapped those initiatives and is sending a bill to many employees, but work-life balance goes out of the window.

There have also been some strange announcements about corporation tax. Two changes were announced. First, the 0 per cent. rate has been abolished—the Institute for Fiscal Studies described that as an "unfortunate experience". The Chancellor made the bizarre claim in the Budget that that "simplification" would save business £9 million. Secondly, thresholds remain unchanged and have not even been uprated with inflation. We now have more corporation tax than Sweden.

Eight years into the Government's tenure, there are 3,000 business support schemes. Every time the Chancellor opens his mouth, he seeks a headline and launches a scheme. Eight years on, there are so many that they are out of control and lack any coherent structure. It is no wonder that the Government have set a new target. They said:

> "We will work ... to reduce the number of business support services from around 3,000 now, to no more than 100 by 2010."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 642W.]

The difference between 3,000 and 100 is so massive that it makes one wonder why the Government have not done something about it earlier.

Business likes a stable framework in which it can invest. It does not like erratic public policy. We have had the saga of the operating and financial review and, as the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) pointed out, we now have the saga of laptops.

During this Parliament, Qinetiq and Westinghouse have been sold. However, we have not had any clear statement of the Government's policy on privatisation and the sale of assets. At least—one might also say, "at last"—the Chancellor has said something in the Budget about his future intentions. If he is to dispose of £30 billion of assets before 2010, I hope that he will at least make some shares available to the general public and not treat them, as his special adviser does, as old grannies in blouses to be contemptuously dismissed as irrelevant to wider share ownership.

The Secretary of State referred to the energy review. Almost all the Government's existing policy objectives have not been fulfilled. Today, we have had the climate change programme review, which shows that we are missing our emissions targets. A second objective was to seek reliability in energy supplies, yet we have recently experienced a gas balancing alert and punitive gas prices. A third objective was to eliminate fuel poverty, but the Government estimate that the number of vulnerable households in fuel poverty is due to rise by 1 million. The climate change levy is a tax on energy, but we need to bear down on emissions. We are taking the energy review seriously, but it seems as though the Prime Minister is semi-detached from his own.

The Chancellor hardly dared to mention pensioners in the Budget. That was hardly surprising, given that what he has not already destroyed, he cannot now afford. At a time when the hard-pressed private sector is carrying an ever-growing public sector, this Secretary of State did a deal. He caved in to the unions over central Government pensions and has thereby enraged those who work in local government. Those in the private sector are working longer and have less pension security, and today we have seen the biggest strike since 1926. One estimate puts the total liabilities in unfunded public sector pensions at nearly £1 trillion. Is the Secretary of State still prepared to claim that he is the Minister responsible for public pensions?

Alan Johnson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the shadow Secretary of State for Health, who said that he thought that that was the right deal to do, and that it was fair to staff who were already in post?

Mr. Duncan: I always agree with my Front Bench colleagues, although I have little doubt that the Secretary of State has misinterpreted what my hon. Friend said.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan: No, I will not.

In looking back at the Budget, we need to look at the broad direction in which our economy is heading, and in which it risks heading further. We need an economy with lower regulation and higher skills. We need one with more consistency and less chop and change. We need one with an imaginative infrastructure that extends to areas that, at the moment, are denied the opportunity that they deserve. We need one with people in it whose working life can give them security in old age, and one that has an energy mix that is competitive, sustainable and safe. We lack a Government who actually know something about business. We need a Government who appreciate that without wealth there can be no welfare, without prosperity there can be no attack on poverty, and without a thriving business community we risk decline.

This was a do-nothing, hold-on-for-dear-life Budget. The Chancellor desperately hopes that he will be able to slip in under the wire to No. 10 before he is rumbled. However, the real cost of this Chancellor is hundreds of billions in higher taxes and annihilated pensions. In the years to come, we are all going to pay a heavy price for his stewardship of our economy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. May I remind all right hon. and hon. Members that there is a 12-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches?

4.57 pm

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington) (Lab): I refer the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

It is always a huge pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), although his speech was somewhat less dispassionate than he had promised. He was obviously in Tiggerish mood, and somewhat less gracious than usual. I would have thought that any right hon. or hon. Member would recognise that to be able to deliver 10 Budgets in a row is a pretty remarkable achievement on the part of any Chancellor of the Exchequer. For those Budgets to have coincided with, and contributed to, our remarkably successful economic climate is without parallel in modern times. So perhaps the shadow Chancellor, the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), will offer a bit less criticism and a bit more credit to my right hon. Friend when he rises to speak later.

The test of whether a modern Budget works consists of three things. First, we must determine whether it provides for sound economic management. Here, my right hon. Friend has again confounded the prophets of doom, including many Conservative Members, who seem to take perverse pleasure in predicting the imminent decline either of the British economy or of the public finances. I have heard much the same speech from the Conservative Front Bench over the past nine years. In the real world, however, I have yet to see any such decline. Who nowadays talks of mass unemployment, sky-high interest rates or out-of-control inflation?

It is true that Britain faces many challenges in the future, and I will come to some of them in a moment. However, credit is due to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. As the International Monetary Fund put it in December,

"macro-economic stability in the UK remains remarkable,"

When the shadow Chancellor gets to his feet later today, I hope that he will have the good sense and good grace to concur with that judgment.

Secondly, however, successful Budgets must look beyond today's achievements and face tomorrow's challenges. In the end, politics is about the future, not the past. Political parties that are wedded to the past tend to remain stuck in it, which is precisely why the Conservatives remain in opposition. Success goes to those who have the strongest claim on the future. Again, in that regard, this Budget has much to commend it—above all, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has just said, its commitment to increased funding of education and science as recognition that our country's future competitiveness will rely increasingly on access to skills and technology.

That brings me to the third test of success for any Budget—whether it works politically as well as economically. Here, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor laid down a dividing line in his Budget that caused the Conservative party—I notice that the shadow Chief Secretary has departed—some discomfort, to put it politely. The Conservatives' adoption of a third fiscal rule might have seemed a good wheeze when it was dreamt up, but the Budget has exposed it for what it is. Going into the next election promising cuts in public expenditure, particularly in education, will leave the Conservative party no further forward than it has been at the two previous elections.

[Mr. Alan Milburn]

I speak with some feeling on that. My party had to learn the hard way during the 1980s that when one gets the fundamentals of tax and spend wrong, one pays a very high political price. Conservative Members might note that former President Clinton is in town today, and we all welcome him. The Conservative party would do well to heed the advice of President Clinton's famous election campaign slogan—it is the economy, stupid, not stupid economics, that wins elections.

When Labour won office a decade ago, the key policy question that faced Britain was how to end the stop-go economic cycle and how to modernise public services. In both regards, although, of course, there is more to do, there is much progress to report. There are new questions today, however, which are different from the old ones. They boil down to this: how can we ensure that our response to globalisation, including increased competitive pressure from India and China, is characterised by the building of a genuinely inclusive society when there are huge pressures going in the opposite direction?

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry indicated in his speech, globalisation demands many policy responses from Government—fiscal discipline, economic stability, open markets not economic protectionism, a limit on regulation. It also requires investment in skills, technology and infrastructure. In the end, however, important though each of those policies are, the most important policy response is none of those—instead, it is the building of a society in which every citizen gets the chance to contribute and to progress. We now live in a highly competitive world, in which every talent wasted is not just a loss to the individual but a huge economic drag on the country. Britain can succeed economically only if we are mobile socially. Here, bluntly, we have no reason for complacency and much to concern us.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor reported, it is true that life is steadily getting better for most people—living standards are rising. We all know, however, that in recent decades birth not worth has become more and more a key determinant of life chances in our country. Social mobility has slowed down when it ought to have been speeding up.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): I am listening with interest to the right hon. Gentleman's homily to the future. Can he explain how, after nine years of Labour Government, the gap between the richest 10 per cent. and the poorest 10 per cent. in our country is wider than it has ever been?

Mr. Milburn: I will come to precisely that. The hon. Gentleman might have read, I think, the most authoritative study on inequality, mobility and poverty by Professor Hills of the London School of Economics. He says that it is likely that in the last two years for which figures are available, the widening of the inequality gap, which widened massively during the 1980s, has been halted. What we know for sure is that poverty has been reduced, particularly among children and pensioners. The truth is, however—we see it in the hon. Gentleman's constituency as much as in mine—that the gap remains stubbornly and persistently wide. While more people are better off, poverty has become more entrenched. There is a glass ceiling on opportunity in our country. We have raised it, but we have not yet broken through it.

There are many welcome measures in the Budget that will help the position. Increasing the value of tax credits is one; yesterday's White Paper, with its focus on skills, is another. But as Amartya Sen, winner of the Nobel prize for economics, has noted, social inequality is best tackled and mobility best advanced if we tackle the root causes, not the symptoms. That must mean moving beyond simply correcting low wages and family poverty after the event, towards policies that spread opportunity and help people to realise their own aspirations for progress.

The biggest inequity today in our country is not between income groups, but between those who own shares, pensions and housing and those who rely purely on wages and benefits. That is why I believe, in common with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, that the biggest contribution to enhancing social mobility is to establish Britain as an asset-owning democracy. After all, people rarely spend their way out of poverty. It is far better to encourage people to own assets, so that they have a real stake in the future. I therefore welcome the Budget announcement about the child trust fund. I also welcome the extension of home ownership: indeed, I want it to go further. Just as we are extending home ownership, we should seek to extend employee share ownership to give people a greater stake in economic success.

My party won by becoming a party of aspiration. Our means of beating poverty should involve unleashing aspiration. That brings me to another area in which more reform is needed to combine the values that the Labour party, at least, has always supported—social justice and fairness for all—with the modern ambition that people rightly have to progress. I refer to the sensitive issue of taxation.

The Chancellor told the House that he had had scope for tax cuts, but had chosen not to make them. He rightly announced, however, that he was uprating tax credits in line with earnings. In effect he was announcing a tax subsidy for working households, and I welcome that. Tax credits have made a real difference in raising living standards and incentivising people into work. Before their introduction, thousands of low-income families faced marginal tax rates in excess of 70 per cent. Some were even clobbered by rates of over 100 per cent. That meant that for every £1 earned in wages, more than £1 was taken off in tax.

Today, over half a million fewer low-income households face such insanely high marginal tax rates than was the case in 1997. However, as the Red Book itself confirms, the number facing marginal tax rates of 60 per cent. or more has increased by nearly 1 million, largely as a consequence of the workings of the tax credit system. The Institute for Fiscal Studies has warned that, without remedial action, that could worsen work incentives.

I was brought up to believe that hard work and endeavour would be rewarded, not penalised. The tax system needs to reflect those values. On fairness grounds, it surely cannot be right for people towards the bottom of the income scale to face higher marginal taxes than those at the top. It is for that reason that I welcome the Chancellor's plan for a review of the feasibility of aligning income tax and national insurance contributions for low-income families. I believe that the review should consider additional ways of making direct, targeted cuts in the tax burden on low-income families, building on our introduction of the 10p starting rate of tax in 1999, so that we can spring more people from the poverty trap. Such radical action is needed if we are to unfreeze social mobility in our country.

Of course, there is much that this Labour Government have already done of which we can be proud. No Conservative Government would ever have introduced a national minimum wage, made universal child care a new arm of the welfare state, or helped millions of pensioners out of poverty. The Budget is a further step in the right direction, but we need to do more to help more people through that glass ceiling. An 80–20 society, in which 80 per cent. do OK but 20 per cent. are left behind, might be good enough for the Conservatives, but it should not be good enough for us. That is why I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to keep moving forward with reform. The longer that we are in government, the greater the need to keep on changing to keep pace with the times in which we live.

5.9 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): It is a privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), who is a former Treasury Minister and therefore speaks with some authority on these subjects. I was disappointed that he said nothing about a subject that he knows even more about—the national health service, on which the Budget has been remarkably silent—and I want to put a specific question to the ministerial team.

All hon. Members are worried about the implications of the NHS funding crisis, and I want to make a specific point to which the Minister may be able to reply by 10 o'clock. One of the Government's great achievements in health has been the roll-out of cancer screening—a major challenge to which there has been a huge response. The next step, which was to start in three days' time at the beginning of the financial year, was to begin a programme of bowel cancer screenings—something long awaited by people in the cancer campaigning world. Stories have been reported in the press and to me by a leading charity in the field that, at the very last moment, the programme has been pulled because of financial difficulties in the Department of Health. I wonder whether the Minister could set my mind at rest on that issue this evening.

Mr. Willis: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that, at a cancer briefing this morning, the Minister responsible announced that the bowel cancer programme would be rolled out from Rugby, where an existing programme has been in place for the past five years, yet not a single other roll-out place was named? Is that not highly cynical?

Dr. Cable: It is because, as my hon. Friend implies, the pilot schemes have been run already and have proved highly effective, but what had been promised was a universal scheme, which now seems to be in the process of being abandoned.

I congratulate the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), on his emollient and consensual approach—at least, he started like that. He is someone who describes himself, like some of his colleagues, as a fellow liberal. I am not sure how far up the Back Benches that view is to be found, but it is a good start, and perhaps we saw a new style of debate today, which has been characterised by one wag as the debate between new Labour and blue Labour, although I do not know how the hon. Gentleman positions himself.

The overall Budget debate has been somewhat frustrating, because we are essentially dealing with two different issues, one of which is the Government's overall economic performance and the other is the Budget, which has become a somewhat ritualised event. Most of the decisions have been made in the spending review and the pre-Budget report. The sum total of what is proposed amounts to 45 measures, costing £380 million. That is less than one tenth of 1 per cent. of all Government spending—well within the margin of error of any Government forecast. We are talking about a series of changes—some of which are very welcome and sensible, such as the spending on schools and science—that have absolutely no impact whatever on the overall macro-economy.

On the macro-economic picture, the view that I have taken ever since I took on my current role is to acknowledge the positives, and it is certainly still true that we have steady growth, low inflation, rising employment and fairly low unemployment, although unemployment has now risen for 12 of the past 13 months, which may be the beginning of an ominous trend. However, the Government tend to spoil their own very positive narrative with endless spin, hype and exaggeration. One little phrase always creeps into the Budget statement that reveals a lot: it is a lovely line about how they have the best period of steady growth, going back to 1700, or the Tudors—or the Normans, I am not sure. That nice line is true in one sense, but it is produced by a sleight of hand by using quarterly data.

If we use annual data, we could argue that after 1949, for example, there were 25 years of steady growth. It is worth reflecting back on that period, because many of the strengths and weaknesses of the current long boom were apparent then. As some of us dimly remember from our childhood, it was a period of steady growth and rising living standards. Many of our parents were for the first time enjoying consumer durables bought on hire purchase. It was also a period of low unemployment, low inflation and general optimism; however, there was a fundamental problem that we see reproduced today.

Back then, the structure of the economy and of demand was very unbalanced—it was led by consumption. Of course, in those days such imbalance appeared in the form of crises, because consumption spread over into imports and produced balance of payments crises. That no longer happens because of the liberalisation of capital markets; nevertheless, we have the same problem today. Consumption has grown by 3 to 3.4 per cent. a year since the mid-1990s, while the economy as a whole has grown by about 2.8 per cent. As a result, household savings ratios have fallen from 10 per cent. to less than 5 per cent., and the end product is a growing problem of personal debt. The Minister will have seen this morning's report from the Financial Services Authority—a very conservative regulatory body not given to hype or outrage—which points out that some 2 million families, over and above the 500,000 who have already defaulted on debt, are on the edge and in considerable difficulties in terms of managing domestic debt problems.

Figures published by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development a few weeks ago point out that the comfort that we derive from low interest rates is illusory. Because of low interest rates, people are borrowing very heavily, which means that principal repayments are growing much more than they did in earlier generations. People are also taking on credit card debt, which has to be serviced monthly. The OECD concluded that the share of household income being spent on debt servicing is approaching 20 per cent. The same was true in the early 1990s, when the last economic boom crashed disastrously under the previous Conservative Government. In many respects, the conditions today are very similar, and we can expect a painful correction in the years to come.

The other parallel with that period is also very striking. Throughout the 1950s and certainly in the 1960s, as we moved into the Wilson era, politicians talked endlessly about productivity growth and science, because in comparative terms there was an underlying weakness in the UK economy. That weakness was very apparent, because Germany, Italy, France and Japan were recovering from the wartime period. It is less apparent now because the real breakthroughs are occurring in non-G7 countries, but the problems are still very real.

As quite a few economic analysts have pointed out, in the past few years the British economy's productivity growth has fallen. A report published this morning by the Economist Intelligence Unit shows, for example, that Britain is now the seventh biggest recipient of inward foreign investment; last year, it was the fourth biggest. That is very strange and difficult to explain. Britain has a very open economy—unlike France, Italy and Spain, we have no problem with foreign acquisitions and mergers—yet foreign investors are very reluctant to come here. According to the EIU's analysis, a combination of very complex business taxation—incidentally, the corporation tax threshold was not raised this year, so more companies have been dragged into the higher rates—regulation and poor infrastructure is having a cumulatively damaging effect on the Chancellor's claim that he is overcoming problems of low productivity.

On the Budget's specifics, one has to judge them on whether the Government are meeting their declared fiscal objectives in terms of the golden rule and the debt rule, and the Government themselves say that they are. Sadly, although the fiscal rules were a good idea and a very good way of restoring confidence in public finances, they have been discredited by the Government's marking their own exam papers in a favourable way. I acknowledge that the Government propose to take the big and positive step of introducing legislation to make the Office for National Statistics more independent, but there is another part to all this that is not happening. There should be a much greater degree of independence in the auditing of the Government's own accounts. An independent examination should be made of their assumptions and forecasts, and of whether they have actually met their rules. That would be a small step, but it would do an enormous amount for Government credibility so I cannot understand why they do not take it.

Because the Government have not taken that step, many little details in the Red Book raise suspicions about what they are trying to do; for example, in 2007–08 and beyond there is no contingency fund in public spending. The contingency fund was extremely important for funding the Iraq war, but it now appears to have disappeared, which implies a highly optimistic approach to future budgeting. Perhaps the Chief Secretary can explain what has happened.

There are some optimistic assumptions about the clampdown on tax avoidance. I am all in favour of tougher measures to clamp down on tax avoidance and I wish the Government well in their efforts, but they assume that they will achieve a 100 per cent. success rate and raise an extra £1 billion a year from those measures. Have the proposals been independently audited? Has anyone in the tax industry been able to confirm that the figures are meaningful and sensible?

Items on the spending side need to be questioned, too. During his Budget statement, the Chancellor said that an additional £970 million would be spent on public housing through shared ownership schemes, which at the time I thought was positive and encouraging. However, although I and other people have searched through the Red Book, there is no reference to that sum anywhere. Shared ownership is difficult to operate, but it appears that the figure simply reflects commitments made last year and the year before, so it is not a new commitment at all. Can the Government confirm that?

Various other spending items need some explanation. Perhaps the Chief Secretary can advance it. For example, it is stated there will be a 5 per cent. real cut in the spending of the Treasury, the Cabinet Office and the Department for Work and Pensions. I am all in favour of tightening up discipline in spending Departments, especially if they can reduce headquarters overheads—the principle is splendid. However, when Gershon reported just over a year ago, he argued that any cuts beyond 2 per cent. a year would be likely to result in a deterioration of service provision. How do the Government square that with their proposals?

We already know from our constituents who are grappling with the problems of Jobcentre Plus that when they are put out of work it can take weeks to receive an answer to a call or to regularise their payments. There are already serious problems in the DWP. We know from National Audit Office reports that the Inland Revenue is falling short in its revenue collections by about £3 billion a year because it cannot get codings right. How taking out large swathes of capacity in that department will help is not clear. Where will the real savings of 5 per cent. come from?

I have questions about the £30 billion that the Government plan to raise from privatisation, or asset sales. I have no problem with the principle, but the Government have already experienced considerable difficulty in realising maximum value for the public from asset sales. I closely followed the Qinetiq deal, where clumsy intervention by the Treasury, pushing the Ministry of Defence into selling the assets prematurely, resulted in the taxpayer receiving only a fraction of what should have been achieved by the sale. One has to be a bit sceptical about whether those sums will be realised.

What guarantees will underpin asset sales? One of the biggest sales will be shares in British Energy. In principle, there is no reason why there should not be a private shareholding in the company, but if I were buying a share in British Energy I should want to know about its long-term business. The only way that can be secured is if the company is guaranteed an expanding new nuclear power programme. It is difficult to see how privatisation can proceed without the kind of guarantee about which the Government claim to have an open mind. There is clearly a link between the two.

I have some specific questions about tax measures, one of which has been touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) and relates to the strange events surrounding the tax concession on work-based laptop computers. I quote to the Chief Secretary what his colleague the Chancellor said in 1999, when the measure was introduced. He said:

"We hope this new measure will encourage businesses to loan computers to their employees and that it will be as successful as a similar scheme developed in Sweden, where household computer use increased dramatically as a result. There are real benefits to businesses, employees and the wider community."

Well, why has the measure been pulled? As I understand it, it was pulled at about 24 hours' notice, following warnings from the Revenue about the difficulties. What has happened? Why was there no consultation?

I have just had an angry e-mail from one of my constituents who runs a business in that sector. He writes:

"As a business we have spent months working with other suppliers to set up processes, systems and contracts to help businesses finance this scheme. In fact we had just embarked on a scheme to provide finance for small to medium sized businesses so they would be able to let their employees take advantage of the scheme."

That has been completely undermined by the lack of consultation and by peremptory announcements.

Unfortunately, that follows a pattern. Last year, we had the self-invested personal pensions scheme. Partly as a result of warnings from Liberal Democrat Members, it was clear that the Government were opening the door to all kinds of problems related to giving tax relief on second homes and luxury holiday homes overseas. They had to retreat and did so in an embarrassing way, when people had already invested in the arrangements.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Surely the hon. Gentleman appreciates that, if there are concerns that tax reliefs are being abused and it is necessary to withdraw them because they are being used for avoidance purposes, it would be totally inappropriate to consult on those occasions.

Dr. Cable: Surely the obvious answer is that it is best to think those things through in advance.

That is not the only example. The film subsidy tax relief scheme had exactly the same problem. Before that, there was company tax incorporation, which had to be reversed, and reversed back again. There is a fundamental lack of thought about the practicalities of many of the schemes, which is ultimately very wasteful.

The main taxation measures that the Government introduced were in relation to the environment. The Liberal Democrats certainly support the principle of environmental taxation and would like to see more active use made of it. However, it was striking that on the day before the Budget, the Environmental Audit Committee, which is an all-party Committee, criticised the Government for allowing environmental taxation to fall as a share of gross domestic product. That is at a time when, as we were reminded this morning, carbon emissions targets are not being met.

Of the specific measures, we support the very modest increase in the taxation of what are called Chelsea tractors. Frankly, the research of the RAC, for example, suggests that, in order to have an impact and to change behaviour, the differential needs to be about £1,000 rather than £200. None the less, the measure is a move in the right direction. We welcome, in principle, the increase in the climate change levy. It is a clumsy tax, based simply on the manufacturing sector. We have argued for a more broadly based carbon taxation system, but since we support the principle of environmental taxation, we do not disagree with what the Government are trying to do.

Given that the Government claim to be really using environmental taxation, I am perplexed about why there is nothing whatever in the Budget on the aviation sector. Interestingly, air passenger duty, which is the one tax mechanism that the Government have, has been frozen. Why is that? There are many ways in which the Government could do something, through environmental taxation, to curb emissions in the aviation sector, but they have done absolutely nothing. The question is, why?

The major weakness of the Budget relates to the big opportunities that were missed. One question—this is a slightly technical point that I raised with the Chancellor in Treasury questions—is why the Chancellor missed the opportunity of the lowest real interest rates for 300 years to refinance large parts of the Government debt. The Government have rolled out a programme—they describe it in the Budget—for more active use of the gilts markets, but reputable economic advisers and former members of the Monetary Policy Committee have pointed out that billions could have been saved if the Treasury had been quicker off the mark in taking advantage of the market opportunities.

A more fundamental point is that there is absolutely no indication of where the Government are heading in terms of the long-term reform of local government finance. That is important because, as we all know, council tax is highly regressive. That completely undermines the basic objective that the Chancellor is trying to achieve: greater fairness and equity throughout the tax system. There is a lot of anger among pensioners about the loss of the £200 rebate, but that, in itself, is a symptom of a bigger problem. The tax is not perceived as fair or legitimate, and it needs to be reformed so that it is linked to people's ability to pay. Moreover, the local government tax system produces only 25 per cent. of local revenue, which is not consistent with the approach of local decentralisation of which the Government claim to be in favour. We have had no indication of where the Government are heading.

The Chancellor also missed the big opportunity of giving us an indication of where the Government are heading on pensions policy. There was a report in the Financial Times on the day before the Budget of a blazing row about the matter that was supposed to have taken place between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor. I do not believe everything that I read in newspapers, but the article seemed singularly plausible because it argued that the Prime Minister had asked the Chancellor what he was doing about the Turner report. The Turner report's key recommendation was on how to create a system with a decent level of state pension to get away from mass means-testing, which has all the disincentive effects at which the right hon. Member for Darlington hinted. Turner offered a way forward, but we know that the Chancellor is passionately opposed to it. There is a fundamental division in the Government on not just pensions policy, but the fundamental question of the best way of dealing with poverty and redistribution. There is a question whether we should use complex benefits, or general measures such as those proposed by Turner on pensions.

[Dr. Cable]

I do not doubt the Chancellor's commitment to social justice because he clearly believes in it passionately. However, he has created a highly complex system of benefits that causes big disincentives. At the end of the day, the system has proved to be wholly ineffective because all the evidence about income and wealth distribution suggests that that problem is getting worse and certainly no better.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): Since 1997, the Government's objective has been to build a strong economy and a fairer society with opportunity and security for all. That has been the backdrop of every single Budget that the Chancellor has delivered, including last Wednesday's. I have heard all of them, and before the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) leaves the Chamber, may I also say that I heard a number of Conservative Budgets before them? The hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that there is little difference in the mind of the public, but that is not the perception of my constituents. They recall this Chancellor's contribution and contrast that with Black Wednesday, which, the Treasury estimated, cost £3.3 billion. The then Chancellor, Norman Lamont, raised interest rates during the day from 10 per cent. to 12 per cent. and then to 15 per cent. and authorised the spending of billions in an effort to keep the pound in the range allowed by the exchange rate mechanism. I am not complaining about the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton leaving the Chamber; I am sure that he will read my speech as carefully as I listened to his.

I want to be positive today and highlight the benefits to the economy and my constituents of the past nine years and the measures in the Budget. Inflation is set to remain low and stable. We are entering the 10th year of real growth under this Government, who are the only Government in British history to be on course to maintain 10 consecutive years of uninterrupted economic growth.

The economy has generated 2.3 million additional jobs since 1997. Britain has 75 per cent. of adults in work—a higher rate than those in America and the euro area. There are 170,000 more people in work than a year ago. In Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill the number of people out of work is 1,738, and 38,100 people are in work. What a remarkable transformation of employment opportunities! We could only dream of such figures during the years of the Conservative Government. However, even unemployment statistics can mask the personal misery endured by families torn apart and left with no dignity or future, as we saw when unemployment continued in an upward spiral and grew substantially in the '80s. Unemployment has been tackled most successfully, and the Government are now addressing the issue of incapacity benefit claimants.

My constituency is ranked No. 10 in the list of those claiming the most incapacity benefit. The top locations include Lanarkshire and Liverpool, and six of them stretch across south Wales. That should come as no surprise, because those were the heartlands of heavy industry, employing miners, steelworkers, shipbuilders and foundry workers—all doing heavy, dirty and often dangerous employment. In the case of the mineworkers, the Government have almost completed the largest personal injury compensation scheme in the world, yielding £1.8 billion for respiratory disease and £1.2 billion for vibration white finger.

However, the Department for Work and Pensions pathways to work project needs to be sensitive to that historical background and the enormous contribution that many workers from those communities have made to the wealth-creating industries. On Monday 10 October 2005, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions published the Department's principles of welfare reform, which contain the values and principles that shape the Government's vision of the future welfare state. There can be no quarrel with that considered approach, provided that the principles are maintained and advisers treat incapacity benefit claimants with respect and dignity. It is also crucial to provide skills. A high-skill economy will help to deliver faster productivity and growth and ensure that the UK is well placed to prosper in the global economy. That is our response to globalisation.

The national minimum wage is an important cornerstone of Government strategy, aimed at providing employees with decent minimum standards and fairness in the workplace. Decency and dignity for all employees has replaced the old Dutch auction of employers competing against each other on the basis of who can pay the least to the fewest, which has no place in a fairer, modern Britain. The wealth we were promised in those days never did trickle down, but now we have the Low Pay Commission recommendations in place for the adult rate of the national minimum wage to rise to £5.35p from October 2006. I welcome that.

On health, the NHS budget has doubled since 1997, and will have almost trebled by 2008. The Red Book refers to admirable progress in accident and emergency units. Governments have their responsibilities; so do health authorities. Monklands accident and emergency unit, which serves my constituents, is earmarked for closure. I wholeheartedly support the retention of that vital health service facility. I congratulate my local newspaper, the Airdrie and Coatbridge Advertiser, on its outstanding role in promoting the retention of that unit. Praise is also due to the Kirkintilloch Herald, which has established a reputation second to none for campaigning on health issues. None the less, they also recognise the unprecedented investment in health made by the Chancellor.

The pretentious fury about the Chancellor's speech exhibited by the Conservative Front Bench team was about playing the man, not the ball. The Chancellor's consistent support of the national health service simply proves that actions speak louder than words. The administrators responsible for the provision of our health service have a difficult job—but heavens, how much more money do they want to provide the range of services that we need? The Chancellor has responded, so it is their responsibility to act. [Interruption.] I told the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton that he would enjoy what I said, and I am sorry that the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), too, will only have the pleasure of reading my speech.

Trusts should be able to live within their budget allocation and they should accept that priorities are just as important to patients as they are to consultants.

Martin Horwood: Our primary care trust keeps within its budget. It is a three-star PCT that has balanced the books and broken even in recent years. Why, therefore, have closures of ward and hospitals, as well as the rationalisation of everything from mental health services to obstetrics been announced in Gloucestershire today?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman might be able to catch your eye later, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, if he will forgive me, I have only a short time available so I shall concentrate on my own constituency.

Home owners have benefited from low and stable interest rates, with a current rate of 4.5 per cent. The jewel in the crown of economic success is the lowest mortgage rates since the 1950s, cutting mortgage costs for the average mortgage payer by about £4,000 a year. Scotland's housing market is set for another boom year, with prices rising at twice the rate for the UK as a whole according to Halifax Bank of Scotland, Britain's biggest mortgage lender. Even so, Martin Ellis, chief economist at the Bank of Scotland, has pointed out:

"Scotland remains the most affordable part of the UK."

Coatbridge in my constituency recorded the biggest house price increase in the UK during 2005, with an average rise of 36 per cent.. That is tangible evidence of prosperity across the UK, and not only for the wealthy.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): On home ownership, my right hon. Friend will know that until a year or so ago, the number of people who owned their own property had increased by 1 million. That figure appears to have increased again to 1.5 million, so can we now call Labour the party of the home owner?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right—the party has truly produced a property-owning democracy.

The Chancellor dealt with overseas aid, and it was significant that the Leader of the Opposition did not think that it was worth dealing with the subject at any length. I welcome what the Chancellor said and did. The House will be aware that the International Development (Reporting and Transparency) Bill, which I introduced, is a small contribution to reducing third-world poverty. More specifically, Parliament and the House must become much more proactive, better informed and far more focused on the huge resources and practical strategies needed to tackle those problems.

I consulted both the Treasury and the Department for International Development, and I record my sincere gratitude to the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for International Development. My approach is founded on the belief that we have obligations to one other beyond our front door and garden gate, and we have responsibilities beyond our national borders. If Governments, business, non-governmental organisations and faith groups work together, this generation, with its energy, technology and global reach, does indeed have it within its power, if it so chooses, finally to free the world from poverty, disease, illiteracy and want. I believe that the Budget contributes substantially to that end.

5.45 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I draw the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I have not missed many Budgets, if any, since I entered the House, and I have never heard a Budget that had less content than the Budget that was delivered last week. It has already vanished from the newspapers, it contained very few measures, and it did not seem to attract the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer very much. He is plainly bored by the job that he holds, which he has held for a long time. He is impatient, we all know, to go to another.

The Chancellor can be a considerable and effective parliamentary debater, but I have never heard him put less effort into delivering a speech, so he gave a very boring speech. As the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) remarked, searching through it for what we used to regard as Budget measures produces a thin harvest. The Chancellor could not afford to do anything in the Budget, and did not particularly wish to do anything, so there was very little in it.

I am one of those who believe that we need an annual Budget. It is a strange performance that we go through, but the House debates economic policy so infrequently on the Floor that it is valuable to have a five-day annual debate. I do not want to go back to Budget speeches that used to be long, impenetrable, detailed expositions of fiscal and monetary measures, macro-economic indicators and the outlook for the economy, but we need more fact than the political presentation that we get from the Chancellor, and from his colleagues in subsequent days.

It would be nice to have a statement of fiscal policy, a description of all the fiscal measures being introduced that day, including the ones in the press releases, and a more dispassionate outlook as to where the economy is going. Because many of the financial commentators in the newspapers just take the Treasury briefing, if we have a Budget of the kind delivered by the Chancellor last week, we often have a debate about economic policy in the United Kingdom that is not based on a sound factual footing.

I shall try to fill the gap. I have spent a few days trying to work out where we are and what the Chancellor is doing. He deliberately took content out of the Budget by moving the difficult things out. Let me begin with fiscal policy. The Chancellor is raising taxation rapidly and increasing the tax burden, which is going up to levels that we have not seen since the 1980s. He is preparing to restrain spending growth drastically; he just did not want to say so in his Budget statement.

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

The Chancellor got rid of the specific tax measures in the pre-Budget November statement. He got over the humiliation of finally admitting that his growth forecasts were all wrong, but more importantly, he imposed yet more tax burdens on the oil industry, which will raise £2 billion in a full year, and he floated the idea of a development land tax, about which we will no doubt hear more in due course.

In the Budget, the Chancellor has relied on his old weapon of fiscal drag—not raising the thresholds for each level of tax in line with inflation, so as to produce more and more income. That leaves all our constituents baffled about why they feel they are paying more tax, although the Chancellor has not announced any increase in taxation. All Chancellors use it; the present Chancellor uses it every year, and he is using it heavily. The Red Book forecasts that by 2010, compared with the present, another 1 per cent. of national gross domestic product will be taken by income tax and national insurance.

As has already been pointed out, corporation tax thresholds have not been raised at all—not in line with inflation, not at all—so corporation tax take increases as well. The Chancellor is raising his revenue rapidly. He needs to; I shall return to that. He has put off—I do not regret it—the comprehensive spending review a little. I do not know why. It will be completed by mid-2007. He gave us hints of the beginning of that with what has already been described for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, the Treasury, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Cabinet Office. Their baseline will be taken down by 5 per cent. per annum in real terms, compared with their baseline for 2007–08. I imagine that the Ministers responsible will think of nothing else, because we have been given no idea how it will be achieved.

The Chancellor forecasts that public spending as a whole will increase by 1.9 per cent. each year between 2008 and 2010, which is less than half the level of recent growth and less than the likely growth rate of the economy. We have no idea where those cuts will be made, and we have no idea how the public services will cope when some of them are in crisis even following the ridiculous largesse since 2000. Unless reform is initiated, this will be a tight public spending round.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne) rose—

Mr. Clarke: The Chief Secretary must deliver the public spending round—I have worked with some tough Chief Secretaries, and I hope that he has got the knuckledusters ready.

Mr. Browne: Like most hon. Members, I have enormous respect for the right hon. and learned Gentleman. However, I do not want him to continue to labour under the misapprehension that the comprehensive spending review 2007 was a Budget announcement. I am sure that he knows that I made a statement to this House in July setting out the fact that there will be a comprehensive spending review rather than a normal spending review. Indeed, I set out all the work streams, some of which are now reporting.

Mr. Clarke: I realise that spending is not usually a matter for the Budget, although I used to include it. However, when one considers fiscal policy, spending is still relevant to the debate. The Government are raising tax and are about to cut spending growth drastically—they argued that we were being draconian when we urged such measures in the past. There are no longer any fiscal rules by which to judge the matter. The golden rule has been discredited since the ridiculous change to the timetable for the cycle. The sustainable investment rule would be sensible, if the accounting devices for Network Rail, unfunded pension commitments and the private finance initiative made any sense. The Chancellor is flying by the seat of his pants on fiscal rules. In its annual country report, the International Monetary Fund recommends that he should start putting in some fresh fiscal rules to correct those discrepancies.

Although the Budget does not contain a Budget judgment, we should know what it is. Chancellors usually loosen policy, tighten policy, try to redress the public finances or feel that they can be expansive. This Chancellor is tightening policy, and he has only just started. He must do so because of many factors that we warned him about, given his years of irresponsibility since 2000.

The real economy is in the doldrums at the moment. Let us not start the fancy swapping of statistics, which involves real-terms figures, cash figures and choosing particular funny years. Everybody knows that the economy is going through a period of marked slowdown, because the 1.8 per cent. gross domestic product growth in 2005 was the lowest since 1992. Why is GDP growth slowing down? It has been based—I refer hon. Members to my previous Budget speeches—on a sea of household debt, and public debt and borrowing, for the past six years. That was not sustainable, and what is not sustainable always stops, which is why GDP growth has started to slow down. There has been a drop in consumer demand and a drop in public investment and spending. Those trends will continue, and will not pick up rapidly.

Last year consumer demand grew by 1.9 per cent.—the lowest growth since 1995. It will not pick up, and I shall briefly explain why. First, household debt is about 150 per cent. of household incomes. People will not add much to absolute debt, so they are not going to spend above their incomes any more. The disposable income of the average household in this country has gone up by only 1 per cent. in each of the past two years. Furthermore, I have referred to the tax burden, and the Governor of the Bank of England mentioned it when he discussed falling demand.

We have rising unemployment—there has been a slight hiccup in unemployment, which has been a good field hitherto—and last month's increase in the claimant count was the biggest since 1992. I am most struck by the fact that next year the percentage of the working age population in employment in this country will be lower than that in the German Democratic Republic. People are more insecure about their jobs than they used to be.

The pensions crisis is making people worried, which will cause the savings ratio to increase, and consumer demand will not come back. When one examines the Chancellor's proposals and considers what the Chief Secretary must do in the public spending round, it is clear that public investment is not going to carry on providing all the growth in the economy in future years.

The economy is slowing down markedly and I cannot see any reason why it should bounce back in a hurry. I think that we could be in for several years of lacklustre performance, and I think that we have got there because the Government took too short-term a view and disregarded the warnings when the Chancellor went in for tax and spend. Since 2000, the Chancellor has made the economy ever more dependent on shoving in demand, either by encouraging consumers to borrow too heavily or having the Government spend too highly. Now, the economy will slow down. I have not even touched on global influences such as oil prices and commodity prices, which still have not had their full effect on our growth potential. There will be no quick bounce back.

I have described where I think that we are, so what are my conclusions? The Chancellor has done nothing of significance in the Budget, except to announce small measures and drift on in the manner that he has already proposed. I would like us to seek to achieve so much more. What economic policy now lacks is ambition. It has become fashionable to talk about the challenge from India and China, and one can add to that Brazil and the entirety of south-east Asia. Globalisation is transforming the world in which we are competing, and the pace of technological change has never been faster, so we must be much more competitive than we ever were.

To make our economic growth sustainable, we need to rebalance it. We will need some years in which growth is led not by consumer demand and public spending, but by investment, trade and productivity, and we must do things to encourage that.

Mr. Love: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is discussing business investment, which is one way to rebalance the economy. The conditions for business investment could not be better, because the stock exchange is going up and interest rates are low, yet business investment is not happening. In the Budget judgment, the Chancellor suggests that business investment will increase in the next couple of years, but although all the conditions are right, how can we be sure that that will happen?

Mr. Clarke: The Chancellor says that every year, but the record, as the hon. Gentleman has conceded, is dreadful. Business investment in the fourth quarter of last year was 9.1 per cent. of GDP—the lowest figure recorded in this country since records began in 1965. Our business investment record is very poor, and, as hon. Members have said, people are being deterred from investing in this country by high levels of complicated corporate taxation, by rising levels of regulation and by falling or dull demand in this country. We must address why this country is not producing the necessary level of business investment.

Productivity is another area in which our performance has been dreadful.

Edward Miliband: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: If I give way again, I will have no more injury time.

Ever since he was shadow Chancellor, this Chancellor has stressed the need to improve our productivity level, but he has a dreadful record on it. The Red Book includes an extraordinary set of international comparisons, which the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), who tried to intervene a moment ago, has unwisely used. I refer him to a very good article in last week's Financial Times. The presentation in the Red Book of our productivity record compared with that of the Americans, the Germans and the French is completely bogus, because our record is dreadful. The Red Book uses output per employee, but output per hour is the best measure. Our performance is extremely poor, and it remains miles behind that of the French, the Americans and the Germans, so it is not true that we are closing the gap. Output per hour in this country increased by zero in the year to the third quarter of 2005.

Edward Miliband: One year.

Mr. Clarke: One year—of course! The Red Book uses funny time scales and considers output per man. On all measures of productivity, this country is underperforming.

Edward Miliband rose—

Mr. Clarke: I am not going to give way.

Productivity in the public sector has been dropping like a stone as huge sums of money have gone into increased payrolls, huge pay rises, reduced work loads and reduced performance in service after service.

We must consider innovation, because our research and development record is extremely poor. As a proportion of GDP, research and development spending in this country is now down by 3 per cent. compared with 1997, when this Government took over, and the burden of taxation and regulation is constantly referred to.

In policy terms, the Chancellor is contributing nothing to that long-term challenge. He is burned out in his current job, and I just wish his successor luck in trying to do something to put some life into his lacklustre legacy.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's time is up.

6 pm

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): It is slightly daunting to follow a former Chancellor of the Exchequer in a Budget debate. I spent the morning at the Treasury Committee taking evidence from the Governor of the Bank of England. I must say that the Governor's analysis of the current economic outlook bears very little relationship to the scenario just presented by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

I welcome the Budget's focus on the economic performance of cities as a driver of regional economic growth, especially the importance placed by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on science and the creative industries, which are certainly key to the economic prosperity of Bristol and the surrounding city region. Bristol has been designated one of the first six science cities in the UK and the universities are leading the field in several areas of scientific research. The city is also host to many creative entrepreneurs, especially Aardman Productions, which has just brought back its fourth Oscar from Hollywood.

I wish to talk today about the need to raise levels of enterprise and investment in our most deprived areas if we are to raise overall levels of enterprise and productivity. We know that significant amounts of regeneration funding have gone into those areas, but that alone—welcome though it is—will not deliver fundamental and lasting change: creating thriving and successful business sectors in those communities will.

The Government have introduced a range of initiatives over the years, including enterprise areas, business improvement districts, new entrepreneur scholarships, the Phoenix fund and the business incubation fund. I could go on. I was pleased to see continued support in the Budget for measures such as the local enterprise growth initiative. So far, £126 million has gone into deprived areas and a second bidding round will start soon. I hope that one day my constituency will benefit from that.

Government support is not, in itself, enough. We need a long-term transformation in the business environment in poorer communities, and to achieve that the private sector has to play a part. The Budget included a very useful paper entitled "Financial services in London", which I read with great interest. It rightly focused on the City's internationalism—it was sub-titled "Global opportunities and challenges"—which is, after all, the reason for its past pre-eminence and its continued success and prosperity. However, we also need to look at whether UK financial institutions could do more to help regeneration in our poorest areas.

When the Treasury Committee went to the USA recently—a country with higher productivity than the UK and a much stronger enterprise culture—we visited City First bank in Washington DC, which is a community development financial institution, or CDFI, that serves a community that is 87 per cent. black and 9 per cent. Hispanic. The bank is playing a key role at the heart of its community in cultivating a crop of new entrepreneurs and business that are rooted in their communities, bringing new wealth into them.

The bank's clients also include many customers in the not-for-profit sector, who were not well served by major banks, including day-care centres, homeless shelters, sheltered housing operators, churches and charter schools. Those depositors know that by putting their reserves into City First, at a competitive rate, they are also having a positive impact on the local community. The team at City First act not just as bankers, but as business advisers, working with clients on, for example, drawing up cash-flow projections. They nurture their clients, through good times and bad, and they can do so because they are part-funded by mainstream banks. The mainstream banks benefit from the new markets tax credit, and also meet their obligations under the Community Reinvestment Act—I shall return to that later.

There are, of course, significant differences between the UK and the US banking systems, but we can learn lessons from the US. A vibrant CDFI sector in the UK could help to fill the funding gap that is left by a lack of access to mainstream finance and could act as a bridge between deprived communities and the more successful mainstream economies. It could also improve the sustainability of regeneration funding through increased loan financing, as compared to grant funding.

There has already been some analysis of the need for such organisations in the UK. Bristol city council commissioned some research in 2002 that looked at the support available for local business start-ups. In particular, it looked at Barton Hill, an estate in my constituency that is in a ward ranked 133rd on the national index of deprivation. The estate benefits already from £50 million regeneration funding under the new deal for communities scheme, but that alone is not enough to turn round its fortunes.

The study found that there was no lack of agencies providing enterprise support in Bristol. In fact, there was an over-provision of agencies and an under-utilisation of funds. In some cases, the resources were overlapping, or poorly targeted, or the agencies did not fully understand or meet the needs of micro-entrepreneurs. I very much welcome the decision, highlighted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry today, to cut the number of business support services from 3,000 to 100 by 2010. Streamlining the support will make accessing it much easier for small businesses.

The Bristol study noted that there was a raft of community finance initiatives, such as a loan guarantee scheme provided in partnership with a mainstream financial institution. But application processes were complex, and they had not been drawn together or developed in the context of an integrated strategy. The study also found that barriers to personal finance, such as the lack of a bank account or the absence of any savings or assets, were also significant barriers to entrepreneurship. We know, however, that mainstream financial institutions are increasingly deserting such communities, to the extent that they no longer even provide cashpoint machines, let alone set up branches.

The Bristol study recommended the creation of a broad-based CDFI, which would bring together existing loan funds; encourage closer partnerships with, and between, credit unions; link in advice services, such as the excellent Bristol debt advice centre in my constituency; and bridge the gap between access to personal banking facilities and enterprise finance. A CDFI in Bristol could also, as in the United States, have a role to play in supporting voluntary sector and not-for-profit groups, of which there are many in my constituency, doing immensely valuable work. They all too often struggle to access funding, can secure only short-term funds, or are hit by cash flow problems as they get caught out by the complexities of endless bidding rounds. A community bank could help them negotiate their way through the maze, by providing loan finance, cash-flowing shortfalls and offering business advice and support.

The Government have already taken some important steps to promote the development of CDFIs in the UK. They have established a trade association for CDFIs—the Community Development Finance Association—and the Bridges community development venture fund has invested £20 million in our most deprived areas. Most importantly, the Government have introduced the community investment tax credit, which gives a tax incentive to investors in accredited CDFIs, and requires them to make onward investments. So far, that has enabled CDFIs to raise some £35 million of new capital for onward lending to small businesses and social enterprises in disadvantaged communities. CDFIs have financed more than 9,500 businesses and individuals, sustained more than 85,000 jobs, created more than 10,000 jobs and leveraged another £160 million in additional funds, on top of the £400 million they already have available to lend and invest.

That represents real progress, but there is still a long way to go before the sector is as vibrant and as much a part of the local economy as it is in the USA. There are three possible ways to encourage our financial institutions to do more to lend and invest in disadvantaged areas, and to support the development of CDFIs. The first is to offer a reward or incentive for investment, through measures like the community investment tax credit, which the Government have already done. The second, which was recommended by the social investment task force in 2000 but has not yet been implemented, is to force disclosure by the banks of the extent of their investment in, and provision of services to, disadvantaged communities. Only one bank, Barclays, does that voluntarily, and I suggest that the time has come to encourage—or perhaps do more than encourage—other banks to follow suit. The third and more radical approach would be to adopt the US approach and legislate to require banks to invest in deprived communities. In the USA, under the Community Reinvestment Act of 1977, deposit-taking financial institutions can choose whether to provide banking services directly to under-served communities, or to invest in CDFIs that do, but they have to do one or the other. That activity is monitored by federal regulators, and taken into account when banks are applying for charters, or for approval of bank mergers, acquisitions and branch openings. At the last audit, only 5 per cent. of banks were judged to have failed to comply with their obligations under the CRA, which has led to a huge growth in the CDFI industry and greatly increased access to capital for low-income communities. The bank that we visited in Washington said that without that legislation they would not exist, and neither would the businesses set up for their customers.

I spoke earlier of the company based in the Barton Hill area of my constituency that has just returned from the Oscars. Who knows what other talent is out there that, if cultivated, nurtured and supported, and if given half a chance and helped by financial institutions, would go on to similar success?

In conclusion, I very much welcome the measures proposed by the Chancellor in his Budget, particularly the focus on support for enterprise investment, and I hope that we can build on those measures for years to come.

6.10 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I hope that the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy) will forgive me if I do not follow her remarks, which I am sure were of a very high quality.

I want to deal with a matter that is at the heart of the work that I do in Parliament—efficiency savings. As the parties move closer and closer together ideologically, the debate will increasingly centre on which party can achieve such efficiency savings. The Chancellor claims that through the Gershon review he can save £21 billion. I support that target, which approaches 5 per cent. of Government spending—a worthy aim.

However, there are various problems, the first of which concerns baselines. In our ordinary life, if we are given a utility bill, compare it with last year's and see that we have saved £20 having spent £200, it is clear that we have made a 10 per cent. saving. Unbelievably, in most Government Departments that clear baseline on individual projects is not available. For instance, the National Audit Office found that out of 300 projects that it looked into under the review, 180 had no baseline. How can one make accurate claims if one does not know one's starting point? That is surely the first essential in any walk of life. The situation is not surprising, because although it has been a requirement on local government to have a professionally qualified finance director since 1988, there is no such requirement on Whitehall Departments. As far as I know, no permanent secretary has ever run a project, although they are highly intelligent people.

In the 2005 Budget, the Chancellor claimed that he had already achieved £2 billion-worth of efficiency savings. If one looks in the detail of the Budget report, though, one finds that only £1.2 billion of efficiency savings is listed. So where has the rest gone? The devil is in the detail. To this day, there is still no full NAO access to the Office of Government Commerce breakdown of the £2 billion claim. The NAO has therefore had to conclude that Departments are not sufficiently subject to OGC challenge. The first problem, therefore, is that we do not know the baseline—the starting point—for these efficiency savings.

The second big problem is that of double counting. The vast majority of efficiency savings, which are now the bedrock of successive Budgets, were already under way before the efficiency programme began. In the NAO sample of 20 projects, 17 were initiated before publication of the Gershon review in July 2004. Many efficiency savings are simply added on to existing programmes rather than being new programmes.

The third problem sounds quite technical but is very significant—it is the inclusion of non-cash-releasing schemes. Perhaps the former Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), will understand what I am talking about, but I will try to explain. The £21 billion saving includes non-cashable elements. That is where I would claim, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I am putting the same inputs into a particular programme—it may be number of cancer operations—but getting significantly enhanced outputs. That is a non-cashable release. The position is much less clear than with cashable releases. The Gershon review claims that two thirds of the £21 billion saved is based on cashable savings, but the pre-Budget report shows that in fact the figure is only 48 per cent.—so where has the rest gone?

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

I bring those three problems to the House to try to get a more rigorous discussion of what is now a central element of the Budget debate. Let me turn to why they occur. Unbelievably, the accounts of the Department for Work and Pensions have been qualified by the Comptroller and Auditor General for 16 successive years. An army of 115,000 staff is employed by that one Department, most of whom are not delivering money to the poor but working out entitlements. We are buried in a system that is increasingly based on means-testing, complexity and bureaucracy, and riddled by fraud and error. We now see that the Inland Revenue, which has been the most successful and efficient Government department, is being sucked into this vortex. Previously, it very efficiently took money from the middle classes. It is not expert at delivering money back to poorer people, and its reputation has suffered from it.

The Comptroller and Auditor General already audits Budget assumptions. I propose a much clearer audit trail throughout its forecasts and claims, all of which should be independently validated. I say this to my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor, although perhaps it is too radical a suggestion: why should not the Opposition parties, when they initiate the equivalent of the James review, offer to have their forecasts and proposed efficiency savings audited by the National Audit Office so that we can have an honest debate? I think that that is an interesting idea—I dreamed it up in my bath last night—and I will suggest it to the Comptroller and Auditor General.

As the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) suggested in his excellent speech, we increasingly have to replace complex, means-tested benefits and tax credits with raising tax thresholds. That is the key, because it can be argued for by compassionate Conservatives who are worried about the fact that as people on lower incomes increase their income, they are paying marginal rates of 60 per cent. tax—far higher than the rich. At the same time, middle class people will work out that as tax thresholds are raised their tax will start to go down. It is a canny thing to do politically—after all, we are politicians—as well as being the right thing to do for the economy and for the poor.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Does my hon. Friend recognise the huge cost inefficiencies in laundering taxpayers' money back to them? Would not it be simpler if we just raised the tax thresholds at which people start paying tax, and would not that help a huge number of the least-well-off families in our society?

Mr. Leigh: I entirely agree with that sensible proposition, which I hope the Minister has noted.

Helen Goodman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leigh: Of course I give way to my fellow member of the Public Accounts Committee—a very effective member and former teenage scribbler in the Treasury, according to Mr. Lawson.

Helen Goodman: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I do not think that he was paying attention to the Budget speech last week when the Chancellor said:

"One option would be to raise that personal tax allowance further. But spending £500 million on a family tax cut in this way would give a two-child family on median earnings . . . £22 a year more, or 40p a week. However, using the same resources to raise the child tax credit will give that same family a tax cut worth £140 a year more, over six times as much".—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 295.]

Can the hon. Gentleman explain how his proposal would be in line with compassionate Conservatism?

Mr. Leigh: I just tried to explain it. We can argue back and forth about statistics, but I shall not do that. I simply make the perfectly good point that, in every Budget, tax thresholds should relate to the real world where there is growth and inflation. In a fair Budget, tax thresholds should do that, leaving aside the debate on tax credits.

If we are to have an honest debate and achieve the £21 billion of savings, which is achievable—after all, the private sector regularly makes 5 per cent. efficiency savings—on what could we spend the money? The number of people who pay inheritance tax is rising rapidly. This year, 37,000 people were paying it, whereas in 1996–97, the figure was15,000. The amount paid has doubled since 1997, from £1.6 billion to £2.9 billion. If one is spending £550 billion, one can address that tax. I hope that my hon. Friends on the shadow Treasury Bench will view the matter as a priority. It has a massive impact on behaviour and is not good for the way in which families plan inheritance. It often causes disputes, it raises only £2.9 billion and it should be a priority for a future Government.

We could increase efficiency in so many ways. For example, the Chancellor makes a great song and dance about spending £7.5 billion or more on the skills learning sector. The private sector already spends £20 billion because it reckons that too much public sector investment is academically based and not based on what is useful to business.

A sea change in public opinion may be occurring. New Labour's success was its realisation that it needed to marry its belief in social justice with economic efficiency. That was the headline claim. However, buried in that message was a clear realisation that, however compassionate one wants to be, one cannot win elections in this country if one hammers middle class people. I am afraid that, increasingly, middle class people, who are faced with the largest tax burden ever, are beginning to wake up to the fact that they are being hammered. The inheritance tax that I mentioned increasingly bites into ordinary middle class homes.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leigh: I am afraid that I cannot because I have had my two strikes. It is a ridiculous way to run such debates but I cannot give way now.

Middle class families pay a ridiculous amount for care homes. The amount of public money spent in Scotland is far more generous. We subsidise that. The average cost of a care home for an elderly relative is approximately £800 a week. People are forced to sell their homes to pay for that and we should examine the matter because it increasingly causes resentment, especially when people realise that there are more generous arrangements in other parts of the United Kingdom. There is, therefore, a sea change in public opinion.

I welcome aspects of the Education and Inspections Bill and some parts of the Prime Minister's objectives as he shepherds a reluctant party into the 21st century, because the only way forward should be based on choice and competition. One cannot achieve one's aims simply by setting new targets and more central direction. In 1999, there were 24,000 managers in the NHS. In 2004, there were 37,000—an increase of 55 per cent. We have reached the limit of what we can achieve through central targeting and Government diktat. In health, funding, directed by the GP, should follow the patient into any hospital in the private and public sector. In education, funding should follow the pupil into any school in the public and private sector. That is my personal view and not yet the view of my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench but I seek to persuade them and I will not waver from that.

In the next 12 months, as my party conducts its policy review, it must provide a careful and rigorous explanation of how it will achieve efficiency savings. It must identify one or two matters, such as inheritance tax, about which there are obvious anomalies. It must base its approach on what the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) described as an asset-owning democracy. He has left his place, but that aspect of his speech was wonderful. Why do we believe in an asset-owning and property-owning democracy—the great crusade of the 1950s—if we do not apply that to health, education and pensions? The challenge that faces my party is devising realistic policies to achieve that asset-owning democracy.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): It is a great privilege to follow the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who had interesting advice for the Labour party and Conservative Front Benchers. I am not sure whether we or the shadow Chancellor enjoyed it more.

David Taylor: I am keen to make the point that I would have made if the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) had given way to me. Did my hon. Friend detect some contradiction between two closely linked remarks? The hon. Gentleman said that inheritance tax raised a small or tiny amount of money but also described it as a swingeing imposition on the middle class. It cannot be both.

Edward Miliband: I agree with my hon. Friend about the contradiction and thank him for the extra time.

It is a privilege to speak in the Budget debate. I watched many Budget debates before I became a Member of Parliament, and it is a privilege to speak in the same debate as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the former Chancellor. I may not agree with everything that he said but he spoke with great authority and expertise.

The Budget comes at the same stage of the political cycle—when the Government are nine years into office and the Opposition are, I hope, destined to lose another two general elections—as the 1988 Budget delivered by Lord Lawson. I believe that this year's Budget avoids the macro-economic mistakes of Lord Lawson's 1988 Budget, and we can draw an interesting contrast between them.

The 1988 Budget was based on three underlying assumptions: tax cuts were the best route to economic success; poverty, which was not even mentioned, could be solved by economic growth—the rising tide would lift all boats—and neglect of the public realm was an inevitable price that would have to be paid for private affluence.

In place of those assumptions, the 2006 Budget proposes three alternatives. First, public investment is not a drain on the good economy but a pre-condition of it. Secondly, Government have a specific responsibility to use the proceeds of growth to tackle poverty and not simply let the distribution of wealth and income fall where it may. Thirdly, public splendour, not public squalor should be the counterpart of private affluence in the fourth richest country in the world.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Edward Miliband: I shall give way later, but I want to make some progress first.

I want to say a little about each premise. First, there is a genuinely interesting argument about the right response to globalisation and the balance between tax cuts and public investment. The question is simple: should it be a rule of economic policy that public spending must fall as a proportion of national income to provide room for a falling tax burden? The Budget, with its emphasis on the Chancellor's long-term ambition for education, rejects that premise because Labour Members believe that the right sort of public spending can contribute to economic growth and will not hinder it.

To put the problem in the context of today's global economy, there is what might be called a "race to the bottom" model of economic development, whereby we should try to cut taxes as much as we can to be competitive. The problem with that model is that it cannot answer some basic questions about our country and our economy. For example, business makes representations about transport investment at every Budget. A skilled work force—not only in higher education and schools but level 2 and 3 work force skills—is important, and I welcome the extra money for schools in the Budget. The science base is an essential driver of innovation and enterprise. Again, I welcome the extra resources for science teaching in the Budget. The right policies for welfare to work, as well as child care and parental leave, are vital. I believe that there is now cross-party consensus that the good economy must be about gender equality, too, and that those policies are important.

Mr. Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Edward Miliband: I will give way later, but I want to make some progress first.

[Edward Miliband]

We do not need to gaze into a crystal ball to see the effects of saying that public spending must fall as a proportion of national income, because that is precisely what we saw in the late 1980s and early 1990s, including under the stewardship of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe. By 1996–97, net public investment was just 0.7 per cent. of gross domestic product—£6.9 billion at today's prices, compared with the £27.5 billion proposed for next year. That is the lesson of British economic history. It is public investment that gets cut when a squeeze in public spending happens, because that is where the easy and less noticeable cuts can be made. We end up paying for that in our economy, which will do badly in public infrastructure and basic education, as ours has done for many years. It is completely unclear to me how a small country such as ours—as opposed to the United States—can compete on that basis. That is why the right kind of public investment must be at the heart of our remaining competitive in the years ahead.

Mr. Jackson: The debate seems to be coalescing around how we can achieve social justice. As we are getting into a history lesson, has the hon. Gentleman ever pondered the fact that his party voted against the greatest transfers of capital to working people in modern times, namely privatisation and the sale of council houses? Has he ever thought that one through?

Edward Miliband: I personally think that that was a mistake, yes, although there was a legitimate issue about the replacement of council and social housing stock, and it remains an issue today.

The second premise set out in my right hon. Friend's Budget was that poverty will not be solved simply by economic growth, and that it needs specific action. Given the increasing returns to skills and qualifications, the global economy has tendencies towards greater inequality. Our choice is either to accept this or to take action. The child poverty figures got a lot of publicity a couple of weeks ago because the Government missed their target of taking 1 million children out of poverty. That is true and it is a matter of regret. It is why we must do more. That is why I welcome the new measures announced in the Budget last week, including the decision to index the child tax credit to earnings.

I appeal for candour, particularly to the shadow Chancellor when he winds up the debate, if we are genuinely to tackle child poverty. The only reason why we have achieved what we have is because, in Budget after Budget, my right hon. Friend has taken specific measures to tackle child poverty. How do I know that? Because the figures show that by relying solely on the proceeds of economic growth and without his measures on tax credits, the number of children in poverty would have gone up by 1.5 million. Instead, as a result of the measures that we have taken, the figure has gone down by 700,000. Child poverty is at it lowest point for nearly 20 years. But hon. Members need not take my word for that. In a recent document published after the latest figures came out, the Institute for Fiscal Studies concluded:

"Child poverty has now fallen in every year since 1998/99, which is the longest period of sustained falls in child poverty since consistent data on relative poverty rate started to be available [in 1961]".

That is, it is the most sustained fall in child poverty for 45 years. But where are the Opposition on all this?

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): I commend the hon. Gentleman on his very thoughtful speech, but is he aware that that same report from the IFS makes it clear that, on the Government's present spending plans, they will not only miss their child poverty targets but slip even further behind them? So why has the Chancellor not committed more resources, if this is so central to his ambitions?

Edward Miliband: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that we should make it a priority to put money into tackling child poverty as resources become available in the years ahead, I completely agree with him, and I am sure that the shadow Chancellor will have heard his representations.

But where are the Opposition on this issue? The policy chief of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), gave a surprising interview to The Daily Telegraph on 23 December—it positively interrupted my pre-Christmas present buying—in which he said:

"Of course inequality matters. Of course it should be an aim to narrow the gap between rich and poor".

He went on:

"It's more than a matter of safety nets ... We should redistribute money."

So presumably the Conservatives support the measures that we have taken. In fact, the shadow Chancellor has never, to my knowledge, said anything positive about tax credits. Indeed, he has spent most of his time saying we should cut tax credits. Of course, tax credits alone will not solve the problem. Active labour market policies, Sure Start and greater educational opportunities matter as well. It is fine to have a policy review, as the Conservatives are doing, but I do not see how anyone who genuinely cares about poverty can say in advance—before their policy review concludes—that public spending must fall as a share of national income. How can they make that decision before the conclusion of their policy review, if they care about poverty?

Finally, I want to talk about how we can match growing private affluence with a strong public realm. In 1958, in "The Affluent Society", J.K. Galbraith wrote about the coexistence of private affluence with public squalor. It surely must be an aim of one of the richest countries in the world to show that this is not inevitable, and to create a public realm of which we can be proud.

The figures on schools investment given last week by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor are striking in that regard. Capital investment in schools was about £600 million in 1996–97, when the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe was Chancellor; it has risen to £6 billion today, and it will rise to £8 billion by 2010–11. Let us be honest: that £600 million was nowhere near what was required to prevent the condition of our schools from getting worse, let alone to improve them. I believe that we can see the difference that higher capital spending is making in all our constituencies.

This Budget opens important new fronts in the Government's mission to rebuild the public realm. For example, I care a lot about the long-neglected issue of youth spaces, youth clubs and youth institutions. We will never succeed in our campaign for respect among young people unless we give them decent spaces to which they can go. That is why I very much welcome the plan for a 10-year strategy for youth services. Of course that strategy must involve the voluntary sector—something that the Conservatives care a lot about these days. It must also reform the youth service, and draw in resources from the private sector. However, it is simply folly to pretend that these services can be built without public investment. I give the Opposition credit for saying that they care about these issues, but I say in all honesty that if they will the ends, they must also will the means.

Is not the Conservatives' problem that, in 2006, their heads tell them that the philosophy of the Lawson Budget of 1988 is no longer what the public want, and that they must bury it, while their hearts tells them that they must not? Fifteen years after Margaret Thatcher went, they still do not know whether to bury Thatcherism or to praise it. These are the contradictions that we now see exposed in their response to the Budget.

There are big questions to be answered about the condition of our country, about the challenges of globalisation, and about how to tackle poverty and strike the right balance between tax and spending. They are difficult questions, but last week my right hon. Friend set out a clear and principled course, and Labour Members can look forward to the arguments in the months and years ahead.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), who made a thoughtful speech emphasising the steps being taken to alleviate child poverty. He took us back to the Lawson Budget. I remember that Budget: the top rate of income tax was reduced to 40 per cent., and I think that I am right in saying that there was some movement in the House when that announcement was made. If anyone had said at the time that, nine years into a Labour Government, the top rate of tax would remain at the level fixed by Nigel Lawson, nobody would have believed them.

By committing themselves not to change the standard rate—or, indeed, the top rate—of tax, the Labour Government have got into tremendous difficulties. They have increased expenditure but, instead of raising taxes to meet that expenditure in a fair way, they have put increasing emphasis on taxes that are either regressive—such as the council tax—or difficult to collect, or that have damaged our international competitiveness. I believe that there are many hon. Members sitting alongside the hon. Member for Doncaster, North who would have preferred an honest Labour approach of funding increases in public expenditure by increasing personal taxation, which is a progressive, open, honest and cheap way of funding a Labour programme.

Greg Clark: Did my right hon. Friend notice that, in recalling the Lawson Budget, the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) made no reference to another of Nigel Lawson's principles, namely tax simplification? It was his ambition to abolish a tax in every Budget, but the ambition of the present Chancellor seems to be to add a new tax at every Budget. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is the wrong direction to take?

Sir George Young: Yes, indeed. There is one minor modification, which I shall come to in a moment, involving a tax that the Chancellor introduced relatively recently and has just abolished in haste.

I agree with those who say that if one considers the conventional economic indicators—growth, inflation, numbers of unemployed—one gets the impression of a benign economy. But I also agree with those like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who say that if one looks behind that, there are some worrying signs. For example, much of the current growth is funded by either private borrowing or high public spending, neither of which is sustainable in the longer term. One would have hoped for measures in the Budget to replace those engines of growth with other more sustainable ones, promoting an export-led recovery, private sector investment and an increase in private disposable incomes through productivity. When the hon. Member for Twickenham spoke about an adjustment in a few years' time, when the current engines of growth prove to be unsustainable, he put his finger on one of the more worrying long-term trends in the economy, which, in my view, the Budget did not address adequately.

I agree with the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) that if one wants to understand the overall impact of the Budget, the best thing to do is not to listen to it but to read the economic press about two days later, which gives a much better picture of what is going on. Any Chancellor must make a balanced decision between two imperatives: on the one hand, a pulverising if partial interpretation of the Budget to satisfy the audience in the Chamber, and on the other, a calmer more balanced interpretation from the wider world. We have moved too far towards the former. The selective presentation in Budget speeches is one contributory cause of the public's growing cynicism towards politicians, about which we are all concerned.

Yesterday, that point was well made to the Treasury Committee by Robert Chote of the Institute for Fiscal Studies. He rightly identified 45 policy decisions listed in the Red Book on pages 188 and 189. Seventeen of those were listed in the Chancellor's speech. Those 17 total £553 million, either in spending increases or tax reductions—good news. Twenty-eight, however, were either not mentioned or mentioned in passing, and those, totalling £780 million, were the bad news. I want to return to one or two things that the Chancellor did not mention.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) winds up, I hope that he will say that my party will vote against resolution 26 on income tax and computer equipment, which withdraws the tax allowance to encourage employees to work from home. In the Red Book, that change appears under "modernising the tax system". I am not sure why it appears in that category. If one wanted a justification of the accusation that the Chancellor was an analogue politician in a digital age, the withdrawal of that form of relief would be it. The relief was introduced only three years ago by the Chancellor, and it hits a number of buttons. It promotes a better work-life balance, reduces the need to commute and travel into the office, and promotes a wider understanding of IT through having more equipment in the home. I cannot understand why, at two weeks' notice, against a background of the Department of Trade and Industry promoting the scheme on its website, it is suddenly to be withdrawn. I hope that there might be second thoughts, and perhaps a postponement of the scheme for two years to allow the benefit to filter through.

I want to focus on one of the items not mentioned by the Chancellor in his speech—the cancellation of the pensioner council tax rebate. That has saved the Government £1 billion, but one will not find that figure in the Chancellor's speech or the Red Book. In the section, "Fairness for Pensioners", I read:

"The Government is committed to tackling pensioner poverty and rewarding saving, and to enabling people to meet their retirement income aspirations in an ageing society."

There is no mention of the cancellation of the rebate in that section, but it does mention the continuation of the winter fuel payments, which are of roughly the same value, and highlights free bus travel. I find it amazing that the Budget decision that perhaps has the greatest impact on the highest number of people was mentioned neither in the Budget speech nor in the Red Book. It seemed to me that the withdrawal of £200 from every pensioner household not on benefit might be worth just a passing reference under "Budget measures and their impact on households", on page 11 of the Red Book, but it is not there. It is glossed over in paragraph 1.36, which looks back to 1997 to give a slightly different perspective of what has happened to pensioners, in contrast to an earlier paragraph on families with children, which compares the position this year as against the previous year.

What has happened since last year for the Government to change their view on the pensioner rebate? In the pre-Budget report before the last election, the Chancellor said:

"A society is judged by its generosity to its children and the elderly, who have served the community all their lives."

He went on to say:

"This Pre-Budget Report therefore announces that, in addition to these existing measures"— the winter fuel payments—

"the Government will make a payment of £50 to households with someone over age 70 in 2005."

In the 2005 Budget, however, he increased that sum. On 16 March 2005, he said:

"In 1997, there was no winter fuel allowance. This autumn, we will again pay a £200 winter fuel allowance for pensioners—£300 for the over-80s. In the pre-Budget report, I announced a £50 council tax refund. Today, with the resources now available, I can announce that we will pay to every pensioner household, 65 and over, paying council tax, a refund not of £50 but a council tax refund of £200—a measure that is fairer and worth more to more pensioners than all other proposed schemes."—[Official Report, 16 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 269.]

The Budget 2005 Red Book made it absolutely clear that that was to help with the council tax:

"The Government understands the position of older people on fixed incomes facing pressures such as council tax bills."

The Chancellor went on to announce the additional item.

Last year, council tax had increased by £525 since 1997, when the Government took office. Against that background, it was worth introducing additional help of £200. This year, the council tax has increased by £579 since 1997, but that extra help is suddenly no longer available. The Government boast that the average council tax has gone up by £54, but not if one is a pensioner—for a pensioner, it has gone up by £254. That wipes out the increase in the state retirement pension for a large number of people. People wonder why there is any cynicism in politics. The most cynical decision that the Government have taken is to spend £800 million last year, just before a general election, on a £200 pensioner rebate, and a year later, when the council tax is even higher, to withdraw it and not even announce it in the Budget and the Red Book.

Will the Chief Secretary answer two questions? First, when the Deputy Prime Minister agreed with the Chancellor the sum for block grant for local authorities last December, did the Chancellor tell the Deputy Prime Minister that he planned to withdraw the £200 rebate and therefore make the presentation of the council tax even more difficult? Secondly, was it not the case that, if the council tax was about to be replaced, the Treasury might have been able to afford the rebate for another year or two? It has now realised that the council tax will not be replaced, probably for the lifetime of this Parliament, and for that reason has decided that it simply cannot afford to carry on with the £800 million or £1 billion cost of the scheme.

When the Chancellor gives his next Budget—I think that he will give another one—I hope that it will include a measure to deal with the issue that I have talked about, and to deal with the more strategic issue of what will replace the council tax in the longer term, and how we will come up with a fairer system of funding local government.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): The main Opposition speech today came not from their Front Bench but from the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). He was at his most recklessly expansive, making Cassandra-like prophecies of doom. Many of his comments, however, were a bit rich coming from him. He said that the reduction in the growth of spending in future had not been made clear. In fact, it has been announced repeatedly that, after 2008, there will be a slowdown in the growth of spending after an unprecedented surge of spending over many years. He talked of fiscal drag, but fiscal drag has been used by all Chancellors, not least the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that spending Departments would have to make significant cuts in future years without knowing where the money would come from, but efficiency savings were imposed year after year after year by Tory Governments without Departments having any idea of where the savings were to be made. He referred to low growth of 1.8 per cent. What he did not say, of course, is that that follows an unprecedented and unbroken run of high growth for eight years previously. He made several comparisons with 1992, saying that the level of this or that was lower than it had been then. I remind the House that 1992 is a very significant date: during that year, the Tory Government was unceremoniously pitched out of the exchange rate mechanism.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he did not know how the economy would bounce back. None of us can know, but we have heard the same thing time and again, and on each occasion the pessimism has turned out to be unjustified.

After all that rumbustious, knockabout criticism, which I suppose we are meant to enjoy, the only remedy that the right hon. and learned Gentleman could come up with was his proposition that we did indeed need improvements in productivity and investment. Of course we all agree on that, but it is exactly what this Government have been doing for years, not least in the Budget.

Let me now turn to a slightly more sober assessment of the Budget—

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Of course there are years in which growth in spending must be constrained below the growth of the economy, and the beginning of the 14 years of growth that we have enjoyed was accompanied by a long period of that kind, for which I was responsible. What I do not understand is why the Government put that in the Red Book and then deny that it is what they are doing, and why they attack the Conservative party vigorously every time we suggest that there is an urgent need to restrain the growth of public spending, as if we were doing horrendous damage to public services. The Chancellor is actually preparing to reduce growth in public spending below the likely rate of growth in GDP for several years following 2008, to remedy the problems that he has got into and the damage that has been done to the public finances since 2000.

Mr. Meacher: We should certainly see what happens after 2008, but I do not think that we need any lessons from the Tory party about the level of public expenditure. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman could give the Government credit for achieving a much higher run of public expenditure over many years than we have had [illegible] his prophecies of doom might carry rather more c[illegible].

The Budget c[illegible] many excellent provisions, not least on education, [illegible] surprisingly, one foundation of our national prosperity was not much mentioned. I refer to the state of our manufacturing industry. Prominent attention was given to knowledge-based services, but they account for only a fraction of total export earnings—less than a third of the earnings from the export of manufactured goods. They pay for only a quarter of the expenditure on manufactured goods that we want to buy. Yet our manufacturing base, which is the lifeblood of the country, is in long-term decline, and that continues. Output continues to fall and we are losing 100,000 jobs a year, without any prospect that the services sector will ever be large enough to compensate for the weakness of manufacturing. The facts are stark, and not just one Government are responsible. The position dates back over many decades. The share of manufacturing in total UK output has almost halved since 1979.

That is serious enough, but in recent years it has been accelerating. In 1970, fewer than 10 per cent. of manufactured goods sold in the UK were imported; now the proportion is 60 per cent. Whereas in other developed countries manufacturing output has been growing—although, admittedly, less than the services sector—the key point is that in Britain there has been not just a relative but an absolute fall in manufacturing in recent years. I do not think it an exaggeration to say that if those trends continued, manufacturing in Britain could almost face extinction within 30 years or so.

I am well aware that the decline in manufacturing jobs is seen in some circles as a sign of healthy efficiency rather than failure. Despite the avalanche of Chinese-made goods that is hitting western shops, the free trade lobby draws attention to the continuing expansion of manufacturing output in most developed countries. It recognises that jobs have been lost, but claims that that is because workers are replaced by new technology to boost productivity, while labour-intensive sectors such as the textile sector have given way to higher-tech ones such as IT and pharmaceuticals. Low-skilled jobs, they say, have moved offshore, while higher-value-added research and development, design and marketing have prospered at home.

There are several things wrong with that argument. First, China and India are not dominant merely in low-tech sectors. They are turning out a third of a million new engineers each year, and are rapidly entering high-tech and service areas such as design, software and digital technologies. Moving upstream—the current conventional wisdom—will not escape Asian competition at cut-price rates.

Secondly, where new jobs have been created in Britain over the past decade they have been largely low-paid, low-skilled and often part-time jobs in retail, catering, entertainment and care services.

Thirdly, there is a regional mismatch. Manufacturing jobs have been lost largely in the north, while the expansion of business and financial services has been skewed to the south. There is a danger that continuing manufacturing losses, combined with the lack of any effective regional industrial strategy—which we have seen in this country for about 30 years—will leave large swathes of the country outside the south and the south-east increasingly denuded of highly paid and attractive jobs.

It is also worrying that Britain has been hit harder than other developed economies. After the oil shock of 1973, US manufacturing output has grown by about 120 per cent. Ours has grown by 15 per cent. US companies now achieve more than twice the production level since then with the same number of workers, while British companies produce about the same as they did before with almost half as many workers. Productivity here has been almost exclusively at the expense of labour-shedding, and I think that that is perhaps the biggest failing of the British economy over the past quarter of a century.

How can that endemic failure be addressed, and how can de-industrialisation be halted, as I believe it must be? I think that the Government were absolutely right to identify the key problem as the well-documented gap between the productivity of the UK and that of its major competitors such as France, Germany and the United States. They have genuinely tried to raise Britain's traditionally low levels of skill, investment, research and development and innovation. Statistics show that over the past quarter of a century the UK seems to have closed the skills gap between us and the US, but there is still a significant skills gap between us and European countries such as France and Germany. Interestingly, in higher skills—at university levels—we just about match those countries, but we are still far behind when it comes to intermediate skills, by which I mean technical qualifications such as higher national diplomas. Many experts say that those represent the hinges of economic performance, and I think that they require more attention.

Another area of chronic UK weakness that still remains is investment. Despite all the Government's efforts—they have put in a great deal of effort—Britain has performed significantly worse than all its main competitors in terms of capital investment per worker hour. A recent cross-national study found that German, French, US and Japanese levels were no less than one third to two thirds higher than the UK level. That is a massive gap.

I accept that the UK record has strengthened markedly in the last decade. The quality of capital has also improved, which is important, and the impressive growth in information and communications technology investment has begun to have an impact on output growth. However, getting UK plc to invest adequately is still a big problem.

Britain also continues to lag badly in R and D expenditure. Again, many studies have shown that such expenditure contributes significantly to productivity growth. Despite the Government's welcome and substantial encouragement of business R and D, not least in the Budget, Britain still spends far less of its GDP on R and D—as much as 45 per cent. less than Japan and the US. Moreover, it is a serious weakness that British R and D, such as it is, has been much too heavily concentrated on two industries—defence and pharmaceuticals—instead of being cascaded across industrial sectors, where technological capability is now more important than price competitiveness.

Another factor is almost wholly ignored, which the Government should take on board. As the London McKinsey strategy consultancy recently commented, many UK manufacturers fail to implement management methods, including involving shop-floor workers in improving production, that rivals abroad have recognised produce results and have therefore taken on. Improving people management and working practices should be central to the Government agenda, rather than being treated as subsidiary to investment, innovation, skills and competitive labour and product markets.

Another worrying point is particularly disturbing at present: Britain's current manufacturing weakness, combined with the Government's neo-liberal ideology, has exposed some of Britain's most prized industrial assets—P&O, BAA, Standard Chartered Bank, Centrica, BOC and Pilkington—to foreign takeover. There is absolutely nothing wrong with the occasional foreign takeover, but industrial jewels such as those have been auctioned off—thus gaining, in effect, subcontractor status—to pay off very large deficits. Losses of that scale at the highest reaches of industry need to be stemmed if Britain's overall national manufacturing capability is not to be irredeemably mortgaged beyond democratic control.

Above all, if we think that market forces are paramount, let us look at the US. The US record has been built on not only unalloyed market forces, but on heavy R and D expenditure, channelled through the universities; on military Keynesianism; on Government procurement, as a protagonist for US industry; on a resort to protectionism, where foreign pressures become too great; and on a low dollar exchange rate to assist exports. If that is market ideology, we need more of it here.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) and to hear in his speech echoes of what, in my youth, we used to call the alternative economic strategy, which is much needed even today.

I was struck by something said by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). Of course, it is true that economic policy has become slightly boring under this Government, although that could be to the Chancellor's credit. Balance of payments crises were enlivening, but that was of little cheer to the people who suffered as a result. Not even the Chancellor, with his considerable reserves of self-belief, would argue that he has abolished the business cycle. Crises may not be as cyclical as they were under previous Governments, but they are structural, sectoral and spatial.

I want to talk about the pensions crisis, future and present, the manufacturing crisis, past and present—it may not have much of a future, as the right hon. Gentleman has argued—and the energy crisis that is looming on the horizon. I also want to talk about the north-south divide, which can hardly be called a crisis because it has been with us so long. Certainly, in Wales, we can trace it as far back as the collapse in coal prices in 1924. Despite its long pedigree, it is no less serious, and it has worsened under the Government's charge.

Let me take pensions first. I am not referring to the looming deficit in the public sector pensions, which is obviously very much in the forefront of our minds today; I am talking particularly about the problem of deficits in the corporate sector that have clearly caused 85,000 workers to lose their pensions over the past few years. Sadly, they have not been recompensed in full by the Government. There is a huge problem with pension liabilities in the private sector, and more and more companies are being pushed into bankruptcy, which is causing massive job losses. As a result, companies are increasingly diverting some of the money that would have been available for capital investment—we have heard about the downward pressure on business investment—to their pension schemes because of those liabilities.

A large part of the problem is of the Government's making—it is within their control—and I am talking about gilt yields, which have reached absurdly low levels under this Government. Of course, the lower the yield with gilts, the bigger the pension fund deficit. Long-term index-linked bond yields are now at 0.75 per cent. Although that is ridiculously low, it is, of course, very good news for the Government's Debt Management Office, but bad news for virtually everyone else: bad news for pensioners and for the companies that are facing huge problems.

Of course, the Government argue that there is no clear evidence that increased pension contributions have significantly affected business investment in aggregate, according to the Budget statement. They argue that there is record profitability in the corporate sector, so it should have the resources even to cope with those higher demands. The problem is that profitability is uneven in the corporate sector. Many of the companies, particularly in the manufacturing sector, that have final salary schemes and are therefore coming under the greatest pressure do not have the profitability that is evident in, for example, the banking sector. That argument simply does not hold.

The reasons for the problems with gilt yields relate to the fact that the Financial Services Authority has changed the rules on solvency for insurers, forcing them to hold more gilts, as a result of its interpretation of the bear market, and particularly to the introduction of the Pension Protection Fund, which, given the risk-based levy, is creating a huge incentive for pension funds to take on more long-term bonds, which are lower earning but lower risk. As a result, we have the bizarre position that the pensions industry is driving up the price of gilts, thus leading to lower yields.

Of course, the pensions industry will suffer more than any other because of falling yields. We have a vicious cycle. The Government are not issuing enough bonds. Promises were made. The industry was expecting £70 billion in extra bonds, but got only £63 billion. The analysis of most independent observers is that there is a structural deficit of long-term bonds running into hundreds of billions of pounds, given the need of pension funds to take on Government securities.

There is an insatiable demand, which will drive down gilt yields even further—thus driving more companies out of business, causing more pension fund deficits and possibly overloading the Pension Protection Fund, behind which the Government have so far refused to stand in the event of a major crisis. I hope that the Chancellor is not doing that because it is a source of long-term cheap finance. That would be an incredibility short-term policy, especially as the current position is not sustainable.

The manufacturing position has been well outlined by the right hon. Gentleman, and I need not support his comments further. We have experienced a serious fall in the growth of business investment, as well as in spending on R and D. The Government have said that one of the key long-term determinants of productivity growth is the amount of capital investment per worker. As has been argued, there has been a sustained, long-term failure on the part of the UK business sector to invest capital. I was interested to hear in the Budget statement the figures on business investment, which now include private finance initiative capital investment. Previously, expenditure on the health and education infrastructure would have been included under Government investment; now, it is included under business investment. If one removes that element from the figures, it is clear that business investment growth is even worse. We need to be absolutely clear that the £10 billion extra that is being included next year will distort the business investment figures.

In addition to problems with manufacturing and the poor record on business investment, the transport infrastructure is very poor. Incredibly, this week's official figures show that on average—I do not exaggerate—roads in Wales are resurfaced every 97 years. That is incredible. I can think of no other country in western Europe, let alone one in eastern Europe, that is in such a position. Moreover, there is the ongoing tale of UK workers with very low skills levels, problems with basic literacy and numeracy, and the problem of rising energy costs.

All of that feeds into the growing north-south divide. The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy) referred to the Government study on English cities, published at the time of the Budget, which itself pointed out that the "industrial powerhouses" of the past—Liverpool, Sheffield, Newcastle—have found that "the transition to a knowledge-led service-based economy has not been easy".

That is an understatement, if ever there was one. The report goes on to show that the problem is the "over-dominance of London" in the UK economy. We have been making that point ad nauseam for many years. Cambridge Econometrics' figures, published this week, show that the situation is getting worse under this Government. According to its report, growth in the past nine years has been slowest in Scotland and in the north of England, where gross domestic product rose by 6 per cent., rather than by the UK average of 24 per cent., over the same period. That is a huge divergence in economic performance. It is only because of the downturn in the London financial services sector in the past three years that the divergence has not worsened.

So what do we get? Because of recent problems with London's financial services sector, we get a report on the problems of London's financial services sector. Where was Government leadership on the problems of the manufacturing-based economies of the west and the north of these islands? We in Wales have experienced a net loss of 72,000 manufacturing jobs since this Labour Government took office. Indeed, under their policies there has been a net loss of 7,000 manufacturing jobs in the past year alone. They should not be sanguine about unemployment. Unemployment in Wales is rising twice as fast as in the rest of the UK—a pattern that we will begin to see in all the regions in which manufacturing is still the economic base. Of course, the intermediate business services that serve that sector are also vital to our economies.

Under this Labour Government, there are even 11 UK localities that have seen a real-terms decrease in gross value added per person. That is incredible: 11 localities are actually going backwards in real terms under a supposedly socialist, redistributionist Government. Four of the five localities at the bottom of that list are in Scotland and Wales. The stark message is that we will have less of the policy-based evidence-making that we have seen too much of under this Government. The UK's regional, local and national economies have become more divergent, more quickly, than even under the Government of Mrs. Thatcher.

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price), whose technical expertise in these matters is obviously very great. I want also to pay tribute to the speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), who unfortunately is no longer in his place. He took us back to the year 1988, which I remember very well. That year, I did my GCSEs, left school and met my future wife—so it was not all good.

I want to concentrate on how the broad macro-economic factors mentioned in the Budget will impact on my region of the north-east. With that in mind, I was particularly pleased that my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) contributed to this debate, and I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) is also hoping to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I warmly welcome the Budget's emphasis on addressing the drivers of productivity: improving competition, promoting enterprise, supporting science and innovation, raising skills levels and encouraging investment. Addressing these issues is a prime concern in my region. We in the north-east have reason to be optimistic, and given that it is my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's 10th Budget, it may be worth pointing out that in the past 10 years we have seen a 10 per cent. increase in the number of jobs in the region. The number of business start-ups is increasing and more young businesses are surviving—at a better rate, in fact, than in any other region. However, we need to address the long-term structural weaknesses in the north-east's economy and our economic performance in relation to the rest of the country.

Despite improvements, far too few people in our region are in employment. For example, unemployment in my constituency has fallen from 9.9 per cent. in 1996 to 4.6 per cent. now, but that is still too high. Although the north-east has broadly the same ratio of working people to the total population as the national average, some 11 per cent. fewer are economically active. It has been estimated that if the north-east raised the proportion of people in work to 80 per cent.—the Government's medium-term target—its output would increase by some £12 billion. That would have a tremendous impact on the UK economy, but more importantly, it would transform the lives of the people of the north-east.

Our skills profile is also relatively low. Despite real improvements since 1997, our region still suffers from appalling disadvantages at the lower end of the skills sector. More than a third of the working population have either no qualification or are qualified below level 2—four to five percentage points below the rest of the country. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has rightly identified, globalisation and intense competition from the likes of China and India will make it increasingly difficult for those with low skills to be part of our economy. For economic reasons, but also for social and moral ones, we as a country need to move away from low-paid, low-skilled work. On reading yesterday's Hansard, I was particularly struck by the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) and for Burnley (Kitty Ussher). I agreed with everything that they said in promoting manufacturing in the north-west and the midlands.

The north-east still has a relatively high proportion of manufacturing industries and jobs. Speaking as a Member who wants the north-east to retain and build on its reputation as an area of excellence in manufacturing, I believe that the threat from China and India means that we will have to be even more innovative, and provide the world with higher value-added manufacturing goods. The region therefore has to be even more determined to improve its skills base, and to do so faster than other parts of the country.

The third structural weakness is that our region's culture suffers from a relative lack of enterprise. Despite recent success, our region has significantly lower business start-up rates than other parts of the country. Both public-funded and privately funded research and development is disproportionately concentrated in the south of England. However, I hope that the expansion of R and D tax credits for small and medium-sized enterprises announced in the Budget will help matters.

The culture to which I refer goes back decades. The north-east has suffered greatly from the legacy of heavy manufacturing decline. In the 20th century, towns such as Hartlepool did not have the cultural identity to encourage enterprise. Men such as my grandfather were part of a mass work force in the shipyards, steelworks and factories. Tens of tens of thousands of men—they were predominantly men—were employed to do the same thing, often for years at a time. Innovation, enterprise and creativity were not encouraged because they were not considered necessary.

When decline came in the 1970s and 1980s, exacerbated by the policy decisions of the last Conservative Government, we saw mass unemployment and the subsequent social problems that accompany it. Culturally, the collective psyche of Hartlepool and the north-east found it understandably difficult to move on from the safe, risk-averse feeling of being part of a large work force to being risk-aware, innovative and ambitious, so I welcome the Budget announcements to encourage enterprise and instil a culture of entrepreneurialism. I agree with the excellent points in a similar vein made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy).

A local enterprise growth initiative—or LEGI—was announced in last year's Budget, to provide substantial sums to the most deprived areas to stimulate economic activity and productivity. The first round of successful applicants was announced recently and I was disappointed that Hartlepool was not included, although as my speech is about the north-east economy, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Communities and Local Government, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband), who secured LEGI funding. I hope that Hartlepool will be more successful in the second round of LEGI funding in 2007–08, because I genuinely believe that my constituency, which has some of the most deprived areas in the country, requires that investment to boost activity, performance and productivity.

I welcome the moves in the Budget towards enterprise education: the creation of the schools enterprise education network, the establishment of enterprise summer school pathfinders and the launch of the United States enterprise scholarship scheme for undergraduates. The argument that enterprise can be learned in a classroom may be sneered at in some quarters, but such schemes play a large role in embedding a can-do attitude and fostering an enterprise culture that provides young people with the confidence to start their own business or to suggest innovations in the workplace. In the long term, that must be good for the productivity of our economy.

Closely linked to the enterprise culture is the need for high skills in the workplace. The Chancellor's emphasis on education in his Budget statement was absolutely right. Education is the route out of poverty and the real way to transform lives. The opportunity to receive a good education should not be based on who a child's parents are or how much money they have. My right hon. Friend was right to point out that increased investment in education makes a real difference. We need only look at my constituency to see that.

In Hartlepool, we have doubled spending per pupil since 1997. We have increased the number of teachers and doubled the number of classroom assistants. As a result, Hartlepool has achieved the fastest improving education results in the country over the last few years. The percentage of 11-year-olds achieving the accepted level or above in English has risen from 48 to 79 per cent. The percentage of 14-year-olds achieving the accepted level or above in maths has risen from 47 to 75 per cent. In 1997, only 30 per cent. of children left school with five GCSEs at grades A to C; now, the figure is 53 per cent. More students than ever are going on to study A-levels and going to university. So it is quite insulting that on the day of the Budget the shadow Chief Secretary said, on "BBC News 24", that increasing state school spending was "not the answer".

My concern about those real improvements in education is that well-educated young people are moving away to university and being sucked into the economic powerhouses of London, the south-east and other cities, which means that towns such as Hartlepool are losing their foundation for ongoing economic success. A sense of place is vital to boost productivity and prosperity in deprived areas such as mine, and I hope that the initiatives announced in the Budget will do more to encourage people to stay in the north-east and grow businesses.

Obviously, there is more to do, but I am encouraged by the progress made so far and feel passionately that the Chancellor's announcements last Wednesday will improve matters still further.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): During the general election campaign, quite a few senior citizens in Shrewsbury told me that they were tempted to vote Conservative but would actually vote Labour because of the £200 grant that they would receive towards their council tax. They were under the impression that the Labour Government would help them with council tax and they were grateful.

Mr. Leigh: Was Leo Blair one of them?

Daniel Kawczynski: Leo Blair is one of my constituents, but I did not discuss that matter with him.

It now transpires that the £200 grant will be taken away. In Shrewsbury, council tax is due to rise by about 4 per cent. this year, which will add £50 to the bill for an average band D property, so senior citizens in Shrewsbury will have to find an extra £250 towards their council tax bills compared to last year. That is a disgrace. How does the Chancellor expect senior citizens in Shrewsbury miraculously to find an extra £250?

The Chancellor said a great deal about how he will help with concessionary travel, but Shrewsbury council officers say that the Government are not giving them enough money to provide it—there will be a shortfall of at least £200,000. That will have to come from the local council, which will have to raise taxes to meet it. On the one hand the Government take great credit for providing incentives, yet on the other, they shove the responsibility and cost of providing the services on to local authorities.

I feel passionately about the Royal Shrewsbury hospital, which I have described in the past as my beloved hospital. It is £30 million in debt, with a strong possibility of 300 job cuts there and at neighbouring Telford hospital in the coming year. I find that absolutely petrifying, as do my constituents. There are also threats to services.

There was nothing about health in the Budget and the Chancellor has let the problem of NHS deficits go to the wall. He does not seem to want to take responsibility for them. In March 2005, when I was a Conservative parliamentary candidate, a delegation from the hospital visited me. It included senior consultants, doctors and medical practitioners, who told me, "We are extremely concerned about the forthcoming financial deficits, but we are not allowed to raise our concerns publicly. We have been told that in the run-up to a general election we are to keep our mouths shut."

Edward Miliband: Did those nurses and doctors say whether they thought the NHS was better than it was in 1997?

Daniel Kawczynski: I think they said that some things were better but that other things were far worse.

We managed to highlight the problem in the local papers in March 2005, but a year later nothing has been done to address it. I am about to say something controversial—nobody has said this so far: we are all passionate about our country and we all want our Olympic contestants to do extremely well in the games, but when the Royal Shrewsbury hospital is £30 million in debt, my doctors and nurses face the sack and we have a crisis in the national health service, the Chancellor should not be giving £200 million to the Olympic team. Controversial. But that is how passionately I feel about the Royal Shrewsbury hospital.

My second point is about carbon dioxide emissions. I am a member of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which is looking into our obligations on CO_2 emissions. The Chancellor has imposed a tax on 4x4 vehicles and the Lib Dems have repeatedly campaigned about them, saying that they will tax 4x4s until the pips squeak. They fail to realise that many people in rural constituencies, living in villages such as Cardington, which is perched on top of a large hill, or running farms, need a 4x4 to get around.

[Daniel Kawczynski]

So, the Chancellor is penalising hard-working farmers and families who live in rural areas. By imposing the tax, he is certainly not going to stop super-rich people in Westminster from buying those large vehicles. Why is he using a blatant tool such as this to punish people who live in rural communities?

Martin Horwood: I note that the hon. Gentleman was casting some aspersions about the commitment of the Liberal Democrats to rural areas. Does he agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) when he said:

"The restructuring of vehicle excise duty is welcome but will not go far enough . . . The cost for gas guzzlers will be less than one full tank of petrol and brings with it no protection for the small number in rural areas who have a genuine need for four-wheel drive vehicles"?

Does he accept that that is actually our position?

Daniel Kawczynski: All that I know is that a lot of people in my constituency—farmers and people who live in rural areas—will be adversely affected by the tax.

I was visited by 45 ladies from the Shropshire women's institute. We had a splendid afternoon together.

Mr. Leigh: I hope that they kept their clothes on.

Daniel Kawczynski: Well, we discussed a range of issues. Many of them live in very rural communities and they highlighted their anger about the tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke about the moves that the Government are making to reduce CO_2 emissions and meet our Kyoto targets. As he knows and as the Prime Minister said on Australian television today, Great Britain accounts for only 2 per cent. of CO_2 emissions. I would have been far more impressed with the Chancellor if he had managed to bring to the House an agreement with the Chinese Finance Minister, Mr. Jin Renqing, and if he could convince him to take the matter seriously and to reduce China's CO_2 emissions. If the Chancellor could present the House with a treaty that the Chinese had signed to reduce CO_2 emissions, that would impress me. He is doing very little to make the Chinese more obliging on this matter.

There was no help for public sector workers. As has been mentioned already, today we have had the largest strike since 1926. Many public sector workers in Shrewsbury are striking today and feel very concerned about the fact that their pensions are going to be changed. They believe that some of the things that are happening in relation to the pension changes are contrary to the law of the land. I am sure that those things will be tested through the courts. What a shame that that the Chancellor did absolutely nothing in the Budget to help those people. I recently saw a delegation of such people in Shrewsbury. Some of them are strong Labour voters, but they informed me that they will never vote Labour again, which greatly encouraged me.

I do not think that farmers have been mentioned today, but, as I represent an agricultural constituency, I wanted to raise the issue. In particular, I want to talk about dairy farmers. I am so concerned about dairy farmers that I am setting up an all-party group on the issue. Some 70 Members have joined from all sections of the House. I am glad that the Chancellor has just entered the Chamber. What a shame that he failed to say a single thing about our farmers and the crisis that British agriculture is facing. He is so obsessed with Labour strongholds that he fails to remember the crisis of our rural community. There was not a single extra penny for that, in a week when there have been calls for the resignation of Lord Bach, who has appallingly mismanaged the single farm payments scheme, which has had appalling ramifications for Shropshire and Shrewsbury dairy farmers. In fact, I know of only one farmer who has received his single farm payment so far. We were promised that the bulk of our farmers would receive their payments by the end of March. It is now the end of March and next to none of them have received their payments. Before the Chancellor leaves the Chamber, I hope that he takes on board my strong concern—[Interruption.] No, he is not taking it on board; he is leaving—as usual. But I hope that, in the future, he does take on board the concerns of Shrewsbury dairy farmers.

Lastly, I will talk about something close to my heart. Today, I held a Westminster Hall debate on the provision of money to senior citizens who are in care homes or nursing homes. Unfortunately, not a single extra Member of Parliament attended my debate, which I was very disappointed about. However, the issue is huge and affects a lot of people in Shrewsbury. I have many people coming to see me who have had to sell their parents' home to pay for long-term care for them. I know that my generation will not be able to rely on the state to provide such care, which is why we will have to take out insurance policies to look after our parents, but members of this generation believe that it is the responsibility of the national health service and the state to provide long-term care in nursing homes. So I am very regretful—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) is making hand movements at me. I am not quite sure what he is trying to say.

Edward Miliband: The point that I was making is that, listening very intently to the hon. Gentleman's speech, I have heard lots of proposals for tax cuts and lots of proposals for more spending. I wonder whether he thinks that those two things add up.

Daniel Kawczynski: I have the benefit of not being on the Front Bench, so I can say what I like, quite frankly. On that note, I will conclude my speech.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I am pleased to take part in the Budget debate and to follow the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski), who seemed not to acknowledge that spending on the NHS is now at a record high and that we are going to have an increase of £6 billion next year. He displayed the attitude to climate change that Labour Members are becoming used to hearing: he willed the ends, but not the means. Indeed, from what he was saying about China, he seemed to be looking urgently for a translation from Shrewsbury to Shanghai. I am also pleased to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), who spoke about manufacturing, which is a concern in my constituency, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright), whose seat is in the north-east and who spoke eloquently and with compassion about the needs in the north-east.

Last November we held a conference in Bishop Auckland to examine the needs of the local economy, which is largely manufacturing based. We brought together small and large businesses, trade unionists, academics and policy makers to consider how to develop our manufacturing sector in an economy increasingly dominated by services and threatened by low-cost competition, and how we will ensure that workers have the skills needed to innovate and encourage entrepreneurship.

I believe that active government can make a difference to local economic success. In the north-east we should resist the temptation to engage in special pleading based on relative economic weakness. Instead, we must focus on using the potential of local people, too many of whom are still workless and, as my hon. Friend described, lack the skills and confidence to succeed. We need to create a framework that encourages businesses to innovate, invest and grow. That cannot be achieved through a laissez-faire approach that assumes that the market will take care of everything. It requires active intervention by Government agencies to embed skills in the work force, develop transport and communications infrastructure, and strengthen business networks.

At the conference, Professor Ian Stone of Durham university business school pointed out that 100 years ago the north-east economy had all the qualities that we need now: leading edge sectors, a strong demand for products and services, high levels of innovation, dynamic industrial clusters, a skilled work force, high productivity and growth, and net inward migration of skills. Of course there are examples of that today, such as NETPark, on the border between my constituency and the Prime Minister's. It is a partnership between the local authority, the university and the private sector to promote new technology. None the less, we need to strengthen such qualities.

George Cowcher of the North East chamber of commerce undertook an interesting survey of what manufacturing companies in my constituency wanted. Their priorities were work force skills, better transport infrastructure, less red tape, better business support and access to finance. Tommy Brennan of the GMB called for support for manufacturers and environmentally friendly technologies. I shall assess the Budget against those demands.

First, on work force skills, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is surely right to increase resources in our schools. There has been a tenfold rise in schools investment since 1997, and the 50 per cent. rise in schools investment next year will make a huge difference. For example, there will be a completely new school in the village of Byers Green, where teachers and pupils are now struggling in a 1915 building. The extra money for science teachers and new science clubs will be welcomed both in the Glaxo plant in Barnard Castle in my constituency and in Bishop Barrington school, which I visited recently. The school has had one new lab, but needs another one. The Chancellor's approach will build on collaborations such as that in the north-east process industry cluster, which provides visits and science training for local schools.

The new entitlement to, and grants for, further education for people up to 25 will have a significant impact in my constituency. Bishop Auckland college is now getting a completely new building to accommodate the 60 per cent. rise in students in the past five years.

On transport infrastructure, County Durham needs better roads going south and north. The extra £800 million outlined in the Red Book is enabling the A66 between North Yorkshire and County Durham to be dualled, which will both improve safety and cut business costs.

As someone who used to run a small voluntary organisation, which is a sort of small business, I am sympathetic to calls from business for less red tape. I am sure that business will benefit from the new code for risk-based regulation and the proposals to introduce that in Europe, too.

Manufacturers in my constituency said that they wanted business support and more streamlined one-stop shops. The growing role of the manufacturing advisory service, and a smaller number of business services offering more targeted support, represent the right way to go. There are young entrepreneurs in the north-east who will benefit from the national enterprise network of 200 summer schools. Accessing finance for small and growing businesses can be hard, so the proposal to expand the R and D tax credit, the new tax relief for investment in venture capital trusts and the £100 million of new money to double enterprise capital funds are all welcome.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals to support our renewables and energy efficiency industry will achieve three objectives—our climate change targets, our obligations to the developing world, and the sustainable development of our manufacturing base. The new environmental research institute and the seed-corn finance for the first enterprise capital fund for the environment demonstrate the Government's commitment to action, which contrasts sharply with the position of Opposition Members. In addition to the 5 per cent. biofuels quota, the increase in the duty differential for biofuels will be of particular benefit to Farmway—a farmers co-op in my constituency engaged in its manufacture.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool said, in the north-east, labour market participation is below the national average. Sue Stirling of the Institute for Public Policy Research north believes that if we could get recipients of incapacity benefit into work, we would close the gap. There is already a successful pilot at the Bishopgate medical centre to support people back into work, so the proposals to reform the linking rules for incapacity benefit, which discourage some people from experimenting with taking jobs, are very welcome.

Before the Budget, I met members of the Wear Valley pensioners association. One of the things that they most wanted to see was the extension of free bus passes nationwide, so I am sure that they welcome the £250 million that the Chancellor is providing for free bus travel nationwide next year. Such travel will be available to all 17,600 pensioners in my constituency.

In February I visited Mr. and Mrs. Hodgson, who had benefited from a Warm Front grant. Improving energy efficiency is the best way of tackling fuel poverty and meeting our climate change objectives, so I am especially pleased that the Chancellor has increased the number of households that will benefit by 250,000 over the next two years.

The people of Bishop Auckland are not focused on their own interests alone, however. During Fairtrade fortnight, many of them signed a petition calling for the Government to keep their promise to raise aid to 0.7 per cent. of GDP, so they will be pleased by the increase in development aid set out by the Chancellor.

Opposition Members simply fail to understand the significance of the Government's successes and long-term strategy for the British economy. Since 1997 unemployment in my constituency has fallen by 41 per cent., and it has fallen by 11 per cent. in the country as a whole. Prudent fiscal and monetary frameworks have brought new stability to the British economy, and low inflation and interest rates enable businesses to plan and invest. That has allowed a steady programme of investment in public services. The Conservative party is committed to cutting public spending as a percentage of GDP, irrespective of need or circumstances. However, it will not tell voters which services it would cut. People need to know, because those public services not only improve our quality of life, but provide the skills and infrastructure for our long-term economic success.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): As I rise to challenge the received wisdom that we are living in a land of milk and honey, I confess that I am gatecrashing the Chancellor's glee club on the other side of the Chamber. I have unashamedly looked at the Budget through the prism of the way in which it will affect my constituents and my constituency. There is a chasm between the Chancellor's rhetoric and the situation in the real world for business and the public services, which I shall touch on later in my speech. Such rhetoric includes:

"Britain is better placed than ever to be the global economy's success story"

and

"Preparing Britain for 21st Century—Challenge of Globalisation".

I find it hard to reconcile those comments with a Chancellor who is imposing a social market model on this country and squandering the golden economic legacy that was left by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

People have eschewed facts today, but facts are important, so let us consider the statistics. The tax take this year is £490 billion. Public expenditure is up by £207 billion since 1997. If one adds tax credits, as de facto welfare payments, into expenditure, 39 per cent. of our GDP is going on public expenditure. There will be £73 billion of public borrowing over the next two years, and tax will be up to 41 per cent. of GDP by 2011, or the equivalent of more than £7,000 a family.

Businesses have been much lauded by the Chancellor, but business investment is at its lowest for 41 years in cash terms. This country is 5 per cent. worse off for capital equipment than Germany and the United States. Output per worker has gone up by just 1.6 per cent. in the past nine years, which is well behind the figure for the United States of America. We know that the Chancellor has had to downgrade his growth forecast constantly, but we should also remember that he has got the tax-take projections wrong in the last six financial years. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe pointed out, growth per output since 1995 has, according to the university of Groningen, fallen behind France and Germany. We are something like fourth or fifth in the list of output and productivity in the G7.

The Budget is also marked by a sleight of hand. We have heard nothing about the private finance initiative and the £60 billion that is off-balance-sheet debt. As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said, we have heard nothing about the council tax bribe of £200—an urgent issue in 2005 before the general election, which is suddenly less urgent this year. We are constantly told by Labour Members that this is a Budget for the future that tackles the big issues, yet we have heard nothing about the Turner report or the structural reform of pensions. We have heard nothing except briefing in a turf war by the Treasury against Lord Turner and others.

Let me give one simple example of how the Government have done nothing for the most needy people in our society. The Alzheimer's Society has written that carers save the Exchequer £57 billion, but there is nothing for them except a slap in the face. They have been ignored.

Martin Horwood: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the policy of the Alzheimer's Society, and of the Liberal Democrats, to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on long-term care?

Mr. Jackson: A policy review is being undertaken by my party. We have a realistic chance of being elected to government, unlike the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

There are other gimmicks, too. The planning gain tax will be organised on a regional basis. Does that mean that my constituents in Peterborough, where there is high growth and lots of house building, will suddenly find that tax going to Thurrock, Great Yarmouth or other Labour-voting areas?

There was nothing about manufacturing in the Budget. I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), who has 30 years' experience in this place, and the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) for talking about manufacturing. In my constituency, in a city famous for its railways and engineering, 4,500 people have lost their jobs. Employment is down by 28.7 per cent. Under this Labour Government, whose members constantly attacked the Conservatives throughout the 1980s for their record on manufacturing jobs, we have seen a reduction from 15 per cent. of the economy to 12 per cent. of the economy. That is not a record to be proud of.

On the stamp duty threshold, even the Council of Mortgage Lenders has said that the policy will not work, because the threshold has not gone up in line with inflation and price rises. House prices in my constituency have risen by 100 per cent. in the past five years.

Reference was made to the impact of tax credits on the poorest in our society. There still is a 60 per cent. marginal tax rate. If someone on the minimum wage has the tax credits taken away when he works, the basic rate of income tax and the tax credit removal, combined with national insurance contributions, will mean that he pays a 60 or 70 per cent. real marginal rate of taxation. That is not good enough.

Yes, I pay tribute to the Government for at least trying to do something about child poverty, but the Chancellor should not forget the overall tax burden that falls on ordinary working families, not just the rich people in Chelsea tractors. I notice that the Chancellor paid tribute to the class war, keeping the "red in tooth and claw" leftist battalions on the Back Benches happy, but it was meaningless. It was student union gimmick politics—I am not referring to the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen).

I shall concentrate on two areas. We hear a lot about health and how health spending is the great panacea that will solve the problem of the NHS and the infinite demand for health care, but there was not a word about health in the Budget. Health is now embarrassing. The Secretary of State for Health said just two months ago that the deficit was unlikely to be more than £200 million. That is typical of this Labour Government: they are only out by a factor of five, because by the end of the financial year the figure is more likely to be £1 billion.

After nine years of the stewardship of the Chancellor, my constituency is losing 185 NHS jobs. Decent, hard-working and professional people are being thrown on the scrapheap. We have a cumulative budget deficit of £10 million over two years. Three wards are closing. That does not take account of the crisis in NHS dentistry in my city. Older people, children and young families are all being denied preventive dental treatment. We know that the Chancellor is keen on dentistry. He can get his teeth fixed at extremely high cost as part of his Trinny and Susannah-style makeover in preparation for moving next door to No. 10, but unfortunately my constituents cannot.

It is no good talking about gimmicks, such as paying consultants only a 1 per cent. increase in salary. The Chancellor knows full well that there are only 34,000 consultants, which is a drop in the ocean compared with the increase that he is paying to other health care workers. Together with things like the working time directive, "Agenda for Change" and the botched GP and consultant contracts, which overran by £390 million, that has brought a structural deficit to a majority of trusts. We need not even mention manipulation of the national tariff. I, and probably other hon. Members, cannot remember the last time the NHS so mismanaged the national tariff that it had to withdraw it and bring it out again.

The hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) will no doubt speak eloquently about the cuts in mental health services in Peterborough and Cambridgeshire. Those are the most destructive cuts. Many of the young people affected by the cuts are vulnerable and need help. Their services are being cut hugely.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Will the hon. Gentleman give us a comparison of the year-on-year increases in NHS expenditure under the Government whom he loyally supported with the year-on-year increases that we have seen in the NHS?

Mr. Jackson: Delighted to; obviously the hon. Gentleman has not been reading Hansard. For every year of the Conservative Administration, between 1979 and 1997 we spent 64 per cent. above the rate of inflation, and for every week that we were in power we spent £1 million on a new capital project. He will have to ask a trickier trick question next time. [Interruption.] Those are the figures, if he wants to check them.

On crime and policing, the Chancellor talks about police community support officers, but those are not fully trained policemen and women. They are decent civic-minded people who will do their best, but they are not policemen. We also hear about the regional forces that are being forced on our constituencies, allegedly costing more than £550 million, according to the Association of Police Authorities. The Government are going to fund that policy, possibly to the tune of £150 million, although no one wants it. It is a top-down approach. The police and local people are against it, but the Government have an arrogant disdain for local views and will go ahead with it anyway. As a result, we have to find £400 million from the council tax in my area and throughout the country—£400 million that is not being spent on crime fighting or tackling drugs, violent crime or antisocial behaviour, because it is being spent instead on new badges, new buildings and new management structures. That matters.

Let me give the detection rates for my basic command unit, the northern division of Cambridgeshire. Some 53 per cent. of sexual offences are detected, which means that 47 per cent. are not solved; 15 per cent. of burglary cases are detected, so 85 per cent. are not solved; and 20 per cent. of vehicle thefts are detected, which means that 80 per cent. are not solved. That is after nine years of a Government who came to power saying that they were tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is an old man in a hurry. Last week's Budget was a "cones hotline" Budget. It had no vision, it was full of bombast and hyperbole, and it was empty and vacuous. I note that the Prime Minister, even 12,000 miles away, has got his betrayal in first, so the Chancellor may not move next door very quickly. The Budget is full of gimmicks, and although it does not have any price tags or time lines, it includes the much vaunted reannouncement of education spending. It fails the people of my constituency and, above all, it fails the country.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) for referring to me as a class warrior. If that means that I battle for hard-working people to be better off, and for public services to be improved substantially, I am proud. I congratulate the Chancellor on another effective Budget that will keep the economy stable while boosting public services. I very much appreciate the extra £585 million that will be made available to schools by 2007 in direct payments. I am keen, too, to thank the Chancellor for £100 million to facilitate safer neighbourhood teams in wards throughout the country. In my constituency, for example, Grove Green, Forest and Snaresbrook wards will have safer neighbourhood teams from the beginning of next month, so I thank him for reducing the wait they would otherwise have had.

I am pleased that the Budget contains measures to tackle climate change, including an increase in line with inflation of the climate change levy from April 2007, the introduction of a new zero rate of vehicle excise duty for the small number of cars with the lowest carbon emissions, and a new top band for the most polluting new cars. It is incredible that the Conservative party, given its talk of consensus and its desire for green credentials, cannot embrace the levy, which is one of the biggest efforts in this country to tackle climate change. If the Conservatives think that a voluntary agreement would work, they are living in cloud cuckoo land. I urge them to get real and support the climate change levy.

Martin Horwood: The hon. Gentleman is a sincere supporter of green taxation, which Liberal Democrats support, too. Does he not think that it is rather disappointing that green taxes in total have fallen from 3.6 per cent. of national income in 1999–2000 to just 3 per cent., which is even lower than it was when the Conservatives were in power?

Harry Cohen: The gist of my speech is the measures needed to tackle climate change. At least the Chancellor has moved in the right direction, given the measures that I have already mentioned. It would certainly be a retrograde step if the Conservatives had their way with a so-called voluntary agreement instead of the climate change levy.

Aviation tax could be even more important than the levy. Figures from 2003 on carbon dioxide emissions from fuel combustion show that international aviation and marine bunkers were responsible for 3 per cent. of the world's total carbon emissions, or 223 million tonnes. That figure has since increased substantially. I shall return to aviation tax later, but I wish to deal with the taxation of oil companies, which is a complex issue and is not often raised unless the Chancellor refers to it or it is mentioned in the Treasury Committee. My perspective, however, is different. One of the Chancellor's greatest achievements was the introduction in 1997 of a windfall tax on oil companies that raised £5.2 billion, which was invested in the new deal—an employment strategy that put many young people into work. The new deal adopted four different approaches including, crucially, skills training. It transformed employment in this country and it was a great success.

Oil prices have gone through the roof, as have oil company profits. I tabled a question to the Treasury asking the Chancellor to "assess the merits of introducing a windfall tax on oil company profits".

A ministerial reply on 28 February said that in last year's pre-Budget report there was a package of changes to North sea oil taxation, but that

"the Chancellor committed to no further increases in North sea oil taxation for the lifetime of this Parliament".—[Official Report, 28 February 2006; Vol. 443, c. 680W.]

I thought that that was strange, given that there have been record increases in oil company profits. Indeed, although the new deal is still in place it has diminished, and we need to make a new effort on skills training, which is the biggest priority in the field of employment. The Government have delayed the introduction of a new approach called BoND—building on new deal, but another windfall tax could be utilised for that purpose.

I undertook some research in the Library. As I said, the windfall tax produced £5.2 billion in 1997. The pre-Budget report shows that the Chancellor will receive £6.5 billion from the continental shelf oil companies in the North sea over the next three years. However, in the pre-Budget statement the Chancellor pointed out:

"Our economy has had to withstand an oil price rise from around $25 to a current price of around $55, which is also close to the level of almost all future projections. Returns in the North sea"—

this is a key point—

"are now nearly 40 per cent. on capital, compared with ordinary returns of 13 per cent."

There is therefore scope for more taxation on oil companies. Indeed, the Chancellor told the Treasury Committee:

"The oil taxation change is on the basis that we expect oil prices to remain higher than what has been the previous range. The previous range was $22 to $28 and, even if the oil price was higher, OPEC expected oil to go back to between $22 and $28. We are now in a situation where at the beginning of the year it was $40, at one point it went to $70; it is now back to about $55. Our assumption is about $55 over the course of the next year."

There is therefore scope to increase oil company taxation by about another £1.5 billion quite comfortably over the lifetime of this Parliament. The windfall tax represented 10 per cent. of the taxes of those continental shelf companies. With the changes, we will get 8 per cent., but we could have got extra money from them. Their profits went up from £14 billion in 1997, which was a good year, to £21 billion per annum. We could have used the extra tax on their profits to improve skills training.

Aviation kerosene is duty-exempt. The Prime Minister has said that it might be included in a new emissions trading scheme as a first step. That is welcome, but the Chicago convention makes it illegal to tax fuel for international flights. The crisis is great. On 2 March The Independent reported:

"The boom in European air travel generated by cheap carriers is already threatening to wreck our attempts to bring climate change under control. Britons are forecast to take 101 million foreign trips by 2020", with

"a corresponding increase in carbon emissions."

The article continued:

"A tax on airline fuel is the obvious solution. That fact that the airline industry has been allowed to operate for so long paying no tax on their fuel is a scandal."

Oxfam has stated:

"Although aviation currently accounts for only 3.5 per cent. of total greenhouse gas emissions, it is one of the fastest growing sources of greenhouse gas emissions; because aviation also has the highest growth rate as a mode of transport, emissions from air travel are projected to increase five-fold by 2050."

Mr. Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one good way of reducing emissions in the long term would be to stop building additional runways for budget airlines?

Harry Cohen: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Government policy must deal with aviation in the round.

According to the Library,

"Domestic aviation (to and from UK airports only) accounts for 0.4 per cent. of UK emissions. Only domestic aviation is included in target figures but if international aviation were to be included the figure would rise to 5.7 per cent. of UK emissions",

and

"one fifth of all international passengers are travelling to or from a UK airport."

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The hon. Gentleman has just defeated his own case. If the United Kingdom imposed an aviation duty unilaterally, that would affect only domestic flights. Airlines would get their fuel from other countries. How would he propose to deal with that?

Harry Cohen: As I pointed out, we are in a position of leverage because such a high proportion of airlines use the UK. We would be a big player in that argument.

The Government will not say how much would be raised by an aviation tax, but in an answer in 2003 they stated that introducing duty at the ultra low sulphur diesel rate would raise £5.8 billion and at the heavy diesel duty rate, £6.6 billion, so in addition to the environmental effects the Exchequer could raise a lot of money by that means.

A number of steps should be taken. First, we should threaten to leave the Chicago convention and use that as leverage to renegotiate it. It is ridiculous that there is a convention preventing taxation on international flights. We should press for renegotiation. Secondly, the Budget refers to the continental shelf oil companies and the taxation regime is directed at them, but all oil companies are making huge profits on all their activities. An excess profits tax could be imposed on them without the petrol price having to be raised. If we do nothing with regard to aviation, we should do more in respect of individual travellers, based on the price of a ticket so that the rich pay more. There should be more tax on cheap tickets as well.

Finally, there are still great emissions and energy wastage from buildings—in London, for example, as much as from cars. The Government need to address that in their taxation regime. We need to tackle climate change and promote environmental protection. The Budget has made a start, but we need to do more.

8.15 pm

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): The Budget claimed to be a Budget for education and a green Budget, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) pointed out, there were disgraceful omissions from the Budget in those respects and also in respect of the NHS. I shall take each of those in turn.

Education takes many forms, including the learning of IT skills. I am pleased that in the debate many hon. Members have mentioned the home computing initiative. There is a long history of using computers in my family and my constituency. My father, Don Horwood, helped to build the very first programmable digital computer, Colossus, during the 1940s at Bletchley Park. Bletchley Park became GCHQ and moved ultimately to Cheltenham, so there is a good connection.

Many families are excluded from the IT revolution that took place during my father's lifetime, sometimes because of their low incomes and sometimes simply because of inexperience in IT. The home computing initiative was a valuable programme not only because it gave access to IT equipment, but because it improved the employment prospects of those on low incomes and their families, and increased the overall set of IT skills of the nation, thereby increasing our productivity—another Budget theme.

It is disgraceful that the home computing initiative was abolished in the Budget. That was not flagged up in the Budget statement, of course, but was buried in the small print. The home computing industry was not consulted or informed beforehand, despite the existence of an industry body, the home computing industry alliance. I have had angry e-mails from constituents who are in the industry and who are appalled that that was done at such short notice and in such a sneaky back-door way. It is a very unfortunate cancellation of a valuable scheme.

Support for the NHS has been identified by other hon. Members as a subject that was not mentioned in the Budget speech. It is an outrage that it did not rate even a mention at a time when the NHS is in financial crisis. I do not represent one of those legendary 6 per cent. of areas that are in deep financial crisis. I speak for an area represented by Cheltenham and Tewkesbury primary care trust, which, as my neighbour, the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) knows, has been in financial balance. It is a three-star primary care trust. We have an acute trust, Gloucestershire Hospitals Trust, which is a relatively low cost provider of services, doing exactly as the Government wanted it to do. We even have a mental health partnership trust, which is a three-star trust hoping to apply to be one of the first partnership trusts to gain the much-vaunted foundation status. That is precisely the kind of area that should not be in crisis.

Why, in that case, was it announced today that Battledown children's ward in my constituency will close as a 24-hour in-patient facility, despite pledges from all three primary care trusts and the acute trust last year that it would stay open? Why will St. Paul's maternity wing close in due course, and why will the Delancey rehabilitation hospital probably close? Why are adult mental health services to be rationalised, and a range of other services that were provided in both Cheltenham and Gloucester to be provided in only one place? I suspect that my neighbour, the hon. Member for

[Martin Horwood]

Cotswold, will be considering community hospitals and local NHS services in his constituency with some trepidation given the overall package.

Why has that devastating news been delivered to the people of Cheltenham today? The answer is that the Department of Health got its sums wrong. Initiative after initiative, contract after contract and target after target have been inadequately funded by the Department of Health. The result has been the requirement for some £29 million of savings across the three PCTs in Gloucestershire and £10 million lost to Gloucester Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust, even if it stands still on its current activity. That is an unacceptable attack on front-line services, and I agree with my hon. Friends that it could cost lives.

I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to leave the debate to meet the Secretary of State for Health tonight. I asked her why a PCT that is in balance and that has a low-cost acute trust provider is facing such cuts. She said, "We can't take funds other than from the NHS to bail out the overspending PCTs." "Can't"? The Chancellor keeps telling us that he has 10 years' experience. Why "can't" the political will be found to protect services, even in the areas of the NHS that have been in balance and that have done everything that the Government have asked of them? Furthermore, those events are taking place while the threat of pandemic flu hangs over the NHS—this is the very time when we should be looking at increasing capacity in the NHS, not cutting it.

Finally, the Chancellor claims to have produced a green Budget, but it is a very pale green. For all the Government's protestations, the simple fact remains that CO_2 emissions are going up, not down. Today's conveniently delayed climate change review—it is a shame that there was not enough time to produce it just before the Budget speech—makes it clear that the climate change levy has been frozen since its creation and that it will be increased only in line with inflation from 2007. Let us hope that climate change itself proceeds only at the rate of inflation with six-year pauses, although that is unlikely because, as the evidence shows, while the Government are slowing down, climate change is speeding up.

It is also disappointing that the Chancellor has only partially implemented Liberal Democrat policy by placing higher vehicle excise duty on the most gas-guzzling vehicles and introducing a zero rate for those vehicles that are the lowest consumers. However, the rate is feeble, and, as Conservative Members have pointed out, there is no protection for rural farmers who genuinely need such vehicles. Instead, the owner of a Porsche Cayenne, which the Environmental Transport Association lists as one of the worst offenders and which costs between £30,000 and £50,000, now faces an extra bill per annum of £30, which is rather less than the cost of one Porsche Cayenne windscreen wiper.

At this point in my speech, I must declare an interest because, like the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), I have got the builders in to plan an extension to my house. I plan to install a mini-wind turbine, a combined heat and power boiler and solar panels, but I was surprised to discover that some of the grants that I was hoping to take advantage of under the clear skies programme seem to have run out. There is no provision in the Budget, not even in the small print, on householder microgeneration. On an MP's salary, I may be able to afford to go ahead, but many others will not. Earlier in the debate, the Minister gave me a disingenuous answer on that point, because, although he discussed supporting microgeneration for the Government's own buildings, he made no firm commitment on householder microgeneration. Microgeneration has huge potential to reduce emissions and fuel poverty, to lower fuel bills for a wide section of the population and to more than fill the gap left by the nuclear industry were we to decide—rightly—to decommission it completely.

The truth is that the Budget has failed to support education and productivity, to save the NHS from financial crisis and to protect the environment. Unless the Chancellor fails with his next job application, it will go down as his greatest missed opportunity.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): The contributions to tonight's debate have been detailed and far ranging, and they show the in-depth interest and attention that all hon. Members pay to every single aspect of the Budget. So many themes have come out of the debate, but I want to concentrate on my concern about the Budget.

I want to make a plea to the Treasury, the Chancellor and the Department of Trade and Industry to deliver a cross-cutting Budget. We should examine how the different measures in the Budget can be joined up across Departments and linked to partners on the ground. We have heard so much about issues such as social justice and child poverty, but we need the capacity on the ground to make the measures in the Budget a reality. That is my plea to Ministers tonight.

It is a privilege to take part in this debate. This is my right hon. Friend's 10th Budget and many other hon. Members have commented about how the public finances are now on a level playing field. It is so important to take that forward. I am a member of the Environmental Audit Committee which has examined the pre-Budget report and other Budgets for their green capacity. The Committee's reports always seem to conclude that the Government should do more, but that is true no matter how much Governments do. However, we should give the Government credit for the real step change in the Budget, especially in the chapter on protecting the environment.

I welcome the progress on environmental issues. As the climate change review published today shows, there is still so much more that could be done. It is up to all of us to work collaboratively, whether through environmental improvements to our own homes, informing our constituents or getting our local authorities to adopt a leadership role on environmental issues. The Budget provides the foundations for real progress on environmental issues, not least in respect of microgeneration, at work, in schools and in all the public finance undertakings.

The Environmental Audit Committee is cross-cutting in looking at all Departments, and I want to look at some of the Budget measures in the same way, especially those that will have a real impact on my constituency. I hope that Ministers will work with north Staffordshire

MPs to ensure a joined-up approach from the Department of Trade and Industry, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Treasury. Unless we have that commitment, we will be unable to deliver services in north Staffordshire as we should.

I was interested in the remarks by my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) about the loss of manufacturing jobs. I wish to flag up our heartlands, especially north Staffordshire, where heavy industry is bearing the brunt of the globalisation that many other hon. Members have mentioned. It is vital that we do everything in our power to create new jobs, to support those who have already lost their jobs and to retrain and give new skills to those in low-paid jobs and who wish to move on. It is important that the review of Advantage West Midlands and the other regional development agencies that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry mentioned earlier looks at what manufacturing needs. We have the wonderful example of the Ceramic Industry Forum, which is looking in an innovative way at what needs to be done. The education maintenance allowance, which was piloted in Stoke-on-Trent, is another wonderful example, and it has now been rolled out across the country. I hope that other schemes can be piloted in Stoke-on-Trent and used to maximum effect across the country.

This is a Budget for the regeneration of the UK's towns and cities. I declare an interest because my constituency includes Burslem, the mother town of the Potteries. The £65.5 million announced this week by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for Renew North Staffordshire will give us unprecedented levels of investment in housing, and I hope that it will unlock many different opportunities for jobs and retraining. It will give us an opportunity to have sustainable methods of construction and to implement on the ground the warm homes policy that was again mentioned in this Budget. If the Government take a cross-cutting approach, this will all add up to a complete transformation of homes and jobs in our area.

I am pleased that the Lyons review was mentioned in paragraph 6.15 of the Budget. Some 7,800 jobs of the 20,000 proposed have already been moved out of London and the south-east, so there are still 12,000 to go. We have a site in north Staffordshire that could be used for relocation purposes under the Lyons review. It is a stone's throw away from the priority housing market renewal area, which would link up to Burslem. If the Government have the will, we can make it happen on the ground. The job losses that we face in north Staffordshire could give rise to opportunities for the innovative relocation of public services that would allow us to be a true engine of growth. That is the agenda that north Staffordshire wishes to convey to Ministers.

We have a wonderful resource centre that was originally launched by the Ceramic and Allied Trades union—now Unity. It has a proud record of upskilling and retraining the work force in north Staffordshire, and has had European funding. The education maintenance allowance offers the Government a model for ways of dealing with those in the traditional manufacturing areas who are losing jobs. They need only look at this gem to see how such projects can be rolled out still further.

It will come as no surprise to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions to know that I cannot miss this opportunity to lobby yet again on the LEGI—local enterprise growth initiative—fund, phase 2 of which is on offer under this year's Budget. I say categorically to my right hon. Friend that we need that funding for north Staffordshire. If we need extra assistance and capacity in building a project that will meet the criteria, I ask for an assurance that the Government will work with us to ensure that it will be in place as soon as phase 2 gets under way.

I wish briefly to refer to the Budget information on private finance initiatives—"PFI: strengthening long-term partnerships". We need firm commitments from the Government about the way forward for the public services. Some changes to health service funding are directly affecting the deficits that are occurring in primary care trusts and health trusts around the country. In north Staffordshire, we have a private finance initiative that is nearing the stage of closure. I acknowledge all the welcome investment in research and development in the health service and all the extra resources that the Government are putting in, but my plea is for Ministers to look closely at box 6.1 in the PFI information. I hope that, in the winding-up speech, the Chief Secretary can assure north Staffordshire Members that we can have some certainty about the PFI for the new hospital.

We currently have two hospital sites, which means all sorts of extra costs that make it difficult to deal with the current position and the huge scale of job losses. Above all, we need certainty and joined-up thinking from the Treasury and the health service that the PFI can go ahead.

8.35 pm

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I refer hon. Members to my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests and place on record my great pleasure at following the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley), a fellow member of the Environmental Audit Committee, who spoke with her characteristic sincerity and commitment to her constituents.

I do not know about other new Members, but I was thoroughly looking forward to my first Budget. After all, they used to mean something. However, now I am not so sure. With the big decisions increasingly taken elsewhere, the annual event appears reduced to the theatre of gesture politics. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) observed, it is increasingly thin gruel, as last week showed.

As a new Member, I applied three tests to the Budget. First, is it relevant to my constituents? Secondly, does it recognise what is needed to shore up the competitiveness of the British economy in a changing world? I speak as someone who has experienced trying to run a business in Brazil, one of the emerging giants that is set to change the global economy. Thirdly, does the Budget demonstrate that the Treasury is showing sufficient urgency in the face of climate change? I speak as a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, which placed on record only last week our concern about the possibility of institutional inertia in the Treasury in the face of the scientific evidence.

[Mr. Nick Hurd]

On the first test, there are things to welcome, including more investment in reassurance policing, increased focus on youth services and increased investment in child care. There are local concerns about the long-term funding behind that package, but there are things to welcome. However, they are overwhelmed by two key omissions.

First, there is bafflement in the local community at the silence about the national health service. Our local context is that we have two, much-admired hospitals, which have performed extraordinary feats at the cutting edge of cardiac care and cancer treatment. They are Harefield hospital and Mount Vernon hospital. Both face genuine uncertainty about their long-term future against the background of an overriding strategic imperative to cut beds in north-west London. Our primary care trust has a deficit of £30 million and the community is braced for announcements about real labour cuts that will cut deep into the local health community. Hillingdon residents are gradually realising that they can no longer rely on NHS dentistry, with the news that seven out of 10 Ruislip dentists intend to quit the NHS.

Financial crisis in the NHS underlies that theme, at a time of unprecedented investment. My constituents ask where the money has gone, who is responsible for the mess, who will sort it out and how that will be done. Was it unreasonable of them to expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the man with his hands on the levers of power, who expects to become Prime Minister, to explain at the Dispatch Box how the problems will be solved? He was quick to take the credit but reluctant to step up to the plate when the going gets tough. It is a test of leadership for a man who aspires to be Prime Minister, and he failed it.

A second concern is a failure to tackle a growing sense of insecurity in the community, especially among elderly people. Anxiety about the value of pensions is wrapped up in that but it is linked with concern about the rising costs of living, especially those associated with people's houses. Much has been made of the council tax, which is biting deeply, but rising utility bills and the costs of energy in the home are being talked about more loudly. Linked to that is confusion about the signals that the Government send about the need to set aside money for long-term savings. There is no more guilty agent of confusion in that mess than the Government's system of pension credit.

I am genuinely surprised at the Government's complacency in the face of the collapse of the savings ratio. I have even heard Treasury Ministers argue that that is a symptom of economic success. My concern arose when I visited the local headquarters of one of our main high street banks to find out what consumer attitudes were to pensions and savings products, and I was told, quite calmly, "We no longer bother to sell them. The public don't want them. They aren't interested, and we don't make any money out of selling them." That is where we have got to. That is the culture, the language and the atmosphere around savings in this country, and I would suggest that it represents a structural problem in the economy that requires more attention than simply chucking some money into child trust funds, however welcome that might be. It is in the Budget's failure to address the two key concerns of health and attitudes towards saving that it fails the first test of relevance to the concerns of my constituents.

The second test is to determine whether the Budget recognises what is needed to shore up the competitiveness of the British economy. It is generally accepted that that competitiveness has in the past been based on low levels of tax and flexible labour markets. It is becoming increasingly clear, however, that the management of the economy is now resulting in significant risks being taken with those advantages, the effects of which we might have to live with for some time.

Other speakers have been more eloquent than I can be in pointing out the fault lines that are becoming increasingly evident: in terms of growth, we are at the bottom of the EU pack; our productivity growth rates are at their lowest levels since 1990; and our business investment is down to 9 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Mr. Love: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the biggest factor in the competitiveness of the economy is the exchange rate? Given that we are running an enormous trade deficit at the moment, and that the exchange rate has not depreciated, would that not appear to be a reflection of international confidence in our economy?

Mr. Hurd: I accept that exchange rates are a factor in the competitiveness of an economy, but I would suggest that the more important factors are the levels of taxation and the flexibility of the labour markets. That has been proven over time.

When the hon. Gentleman intervened on me, I was going through a checklist of the fault lines in the economy. We must recognise the indisputable fact that we are now living with the highest burden of taxation for 20 years. It is not only the scale of the taxation but its incredible complexity that concerns my constituents. I understand—my Front-Bench colleagues may correct me on this—that some 3,500 pages have been added to the Yellow Book since 1997, which is the clearest possible evidence of the instinct to tinker and to add to complexity. The bottom line is that, when I hear the Chancellor speak, I do not believe that I am listening to someone with any real understanding of what it is like to run a business or to take risks in the pursuit of prosperity and the creation of wealth. That is also the growing view of businesses in my constituency. Another test failed.

The third test involves examining the sense of urgency, and the sense of ambition, shown by the Treasury in the face of climate change risk. This ought not to be in doubt, because I do not think that anyone doubts the Chancellor's sincerity in his mission to reduce poverty in Africa. He must therefore be aware that the biggest risk to that agenda will be the impact of climate change on the poorer regions of this earth. As I have said, the Environmental Audit Committee is concerned about the institutional inertia and lack of momentum at the Treasury, particularly in recent years.

The Budget has not won the Chancellor any new friends among the green movement. Friends of the Earth called it "utterly inadequate", adding that its measures would "collectively only make a small impact on emissions".

I happen to think that that judgment might be a little harsh, but I have no doubt that we are right to be concerned about the Treasury's lack of urgency and momentum, set against the backdrop of rising carbon emissions in this country.

Climate change presents an immense challenge, and the attitude of the British Government is enormously important, not least in regard to the international process that is key to finding a solution. The problem with that incredibly complex process is that it is going too slowly, and that it is being held back by concerns about the cost of mitigating climate change. In order to accelerate that dialogue, progress and momentum, we need proof that we can grow our economy and reduce carbon emissions at the same time—that we can green and grow. That is the key for harnessing support for these measures in the developing world.

Britain continues to have an historic opportunity to take the lead in making that case, but we need the will to accelerate the technology to deliver a sustainable low-carbon future. A modern, forward-looking, digital Government would be alive to the prospect of being in the vanguard of economic opportunity. They would recognise that the twin concerns of energy security—now very real—and the trend of fossil fuel prices reinforce that imperative. That requires real leadership and clear policy making to send the long-term signals that business men and our fellow citizens need.

Mr. Des Browne: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, who clearly has an extensive knowledge, no doubt developed from his Select Committee membership. Given the demonstrative leadership role that he wishes the Government to take, can he indicate to the House how he personally will be voting tonight in relation to the revalorisation of the climate change levy?

Mr. Hurd: Personally, I am a supporter of the revalorisation of the climate change levy—

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The answer is no.

Mr. Hurd: I know what the answer is. I happen to believe that the climate change levy has played a role. The Government are deluding themselves, however, if they think that that is the main piece on the chessboard and the bellwether with regard to climate change.

In the context of real leadership and clear policy making, we need long-term signals. Instead, we get muddled reviews—the climate change review announced today, an energy review over the next few months and, perhaps most importantly, the Stern review on the economics of climate change at the end of the year. We get incompetent management of key processes such as the definition of the national allocation plan in the first phase of the European emissions trading system. We get tolerance of inefficient taxation such as air passenger duty and a drift from the impressive momentum that the Government showed in terms of developing environmental taxation in their first Parliament between 1997 and 2001. All that drift, muddle and incompetence has served to undermine the credibility of the Government, who are increasingly seen as being good at words but having real problems, and struggling, with delivery. The test is not words but action. To be fair, the test is not the Budget but the reaction of the Treasury to the Stern review later in the year, which will set out what is possible for a brave Government prepared to show real leadership.

The second test is the inevitable row over the national allocation plan for the second phase of the EU emissions trading system and the age-old dialogue between the priority given to sustainability and the priority given to the arguments of competitiveness. That will tell us the reality of this Chancellor and his aspiration and commitment to preserving and enhancing our natural resources—the natural capital, which is an indispensable pillar of our global system of capitalism, and which we can no longer take for granted. Whether he passes that test or not, the Chancellor and I are at least agreed on one thing—we both hope that last week's Budget was his last.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in the first Budget debate that I have attended. I hope that I do not have to listen to 10 more Budgets from the Chancellor, but I listened closely to the one that he gave, I think, last week.

I was going to bring my worst instincts to the Chamber and talk about the fact that there was nothing in the Budget on pensions, as many of my constituents live in fear of their future—both those who are saving for retirement and those currently in retirement. There was nothing on council tax—a hidden stealth tax that goes up year on year, causing great distress to young and old alike in my constituency. I was going to talk about the problems with transport funding and the fact that my constituents are packed on to trains early in the morning on the One railway franchise as the Treasury pockets £50 million a year in franchise fees and fails to invest that money on the network. But I say, "Get behind me Satan," because I want to be positive this evening, on issues that matter to everyone in the House, including the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband).

I was absolutely delighted to hear the emphasis placed on education in the Budget. I have had the great privilege of visiting my primary and secondary schools in Hoddesdon, Cheshunt, Broxbourne, Waltham Cross and Northaw. It is the head teachers who make a difference in those schools. We are lucky and blessed to have excellent head teachers in my constituency. They work extremely hard for a great deal less money than I earn, put in a huge number of hours and are a credit to their schools and the community that they serve. On that point, I welcome the additional funding going directly to head teachers to spend on the things that really matter to them—IT, books and additional teaching resources. That money is very welcome, and I have to say that things have improved since Labour came to power nine years ago. Admittedly they should have improved, as Labour has spent a lot of money. When I visit my schools I see whiteboards and projectors, all of which have added to the educational experience of young people in my constituency. Nevertheless, that has created problems in itself, although I know that the budget was not there to deal with those problems. People are moving out of north

[Mr. Charles Walker]

London and gangs are regularly attacking our schools, stealing much of the equipment and creating a very hostile environment for young people. Perhaps that is happening in other Members' schools, and perhaps we could consider securing additional funds somewhere down the line to improve school security and the environment in which young people are educated.

One thing that I have noticed when touring my constituency—

Mr. Des Browne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Walker: I will happily give way.

Mr. Browne: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman gets around to touring his constituency. May I allow him an opportunity to welcome comprehensively the Chancellor's announcements of further investment in his constituency? Given his recognition of the need for further investment in the security of our communities, I am sure that he will wish to add a welcome for the investment in community support officers that the Chancellor also announced.

Mr. Walker: Of course I welcome additional investment in my constituency, if indeed it turns up. It is interesting that the Chief Secretary mentioned community support officers. I am working with a consortium of schools in my constituency, considering the possibility of part-funding CSOs to provide evening cover so that people who congregate around schools, wishing them harm and causing vandalism, can be moved on. I welcome any additional resources that we can find to finance community support officers.

As I was saying, one thing I have noticed is that the greatest difference between the private and public education sectors is class size. I believe that many of our public schools now have extremely good IT equipment and teaching facilities, but class size seems to be one of the key determinants of performance. I would welcome any measures introduced by the Government—or by our Government, when we win the next general election—that reduced class sizes and gave children from some of the most deprived parts of my constituency an even greater chance of achieving success. I do not believe that that wish is party political; I believe that it is shared by all the parties. We want the very best for our young people.

Having got that off my chest, however, I would like to be party political. Like many other Members—again, across the Chamber—I was extremely disappointed that the health service did not get a mention in the Chancellor's Budget statement. We have huge funding shortfalls in Hertfordshire, caused by and large by Government mismanagement. There is, for instance, the mismanagement of GP and consultant contracts, as a result of which too much money has been given in return for too little. Of course I want GPs and consultants to be paid properly, but the money should have been based on an increase in output and productivity.

What concerns me about Labour Members is all the chest-beating about the fact that they are spending more money. They are like the great apes that leap in, bang the ground and bang their chests. It is not about spending more money; it is about a return on investment. It is about output exceeding input. On that score, the Government have some work to do. Yes, they are spending more money, but are they securing a proper return on their investment for taxpayers across the country and in my constituency?

In the health service, we face significant front-line cuts throughout my constituency and across Hertfordshire. As I have said, we have huge deficits in our hospitals, but what concerns me most are the cuts in mental health services that affect the most vulnerable people in my community.

A health care professional asked me, "Why are you showing so much interest in mental health? As you'll find out, Charles, there are no votes in mental health." That is completely wrong, and I am sure that most hon. Members think so, too. Of course, I want outcomes for breast cancer and heart disease to improve, but people with mental health problems need a strong voice as well, and it is incumbent on hon. Members to give them that voice. I urge the Chief Secretary to look at NHS funding. I appreciate that there is no bottomless pit, but the £800 million shortfall is damaging the most vulnerable people in our society. They are not responsible for the problem, but they will pay the price. That causes me great concern.

So I come to a solution. May we perhaps consider clawing back some of the money that we will give to the European Union in the years ahead? I understand that we will make additional contributions to fund the lifestyle of French farmers. I love France; I love French markets, but given the fact that our health service is in financial crisis, is it really justifiable to give more money to the EU and to some of the richest countries in Europe? That is a hard sell in my constituency, and I imagine that it might be quite a hard sell in other hon. Member's constituencies. So thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me this canter through the sunlit uplands of Broxbourne. I have thoroughly enjoyed it. I hope that I have not upset too many people.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) has given us a real insight into his constituency, and the idea that lots of people are running away from those schools with whiteboards under their arms is a fantastic one to envisage.

Mr. Walker: It is a very serious problem. My children's school has been hit twice in three weeks. Almost a dozen schools in my constituency have been raided repeatedly and their IT equipment has been taken, and it does the hon. Gentleman no service to make light of that in the debate.

Mr. Willis: I feel utterly chastised, and I apologise.

I left the debate earlier this evening to attend a reception with the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) and Lord Crathorne. We are working with a group of young people who are blind. Most of them are also deaf, and many of them also have physical impairments. Returning to Budget debates should make us recognise the fact that the reality of what we are debating is an attempt to make people's lives better in our communities, wherever they are. I pay tribute to the Economic Secretary, who is sitting next to the Chief Secretary, for the support that he gave to Henshaw's college when he was a Minister in the Department for Education and Skills. I thank him for delivering on a promise that the Government made to put about £2 million into that project, and I do so with great sincerity.

I should like to concentrate my brief remarks on science. This was a Budget for science. Whatever we might think of other bits of the Budget, science came out of it very well indeed. The additional supply of science teachers, the offering of pure sciences to more young people, new support for carbon capture and storage, replacing the research assessment exercise system and extending R and D tax credits were all things that I support, and my Committee—the Science and Technology Committee—was very supportive of those things, too.

This was a somewhat unusual Budget. I, for one, was surprised by the extent of the changes in the Budget, and the associated "Science and innovation investment framework 2004–2014: next steps" reads more like a science White Paper than a Budget document. I do not think that I was the only person who was surprised by the announcements. They came as news, for instance, to organisations that will be affected by them. It appears that the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council, the Medical Research Council and even some parts of the Office of Science and Technology were informed of the changes announced in the Budget only the day before. It seems that the Chancellor cannot wait to put his plans for science and technology into action and that he has even taken responsibility for reorganising the research councils. So if the Chancellor is now running science policy, I wonder what the Minister for Science and Innovation and the Office of Science and Technology have left to do.

However, the real issue behind some of the changes announced in the Budget is: who in the Government is monitoring the UK's science capacity, and where and how? In the past couple of weeks, we have been debating the closure of the chemistry department at the university of Sussex and the loss in the past two years of four major chemistry departments, which produced the very chemistry graduates who will be among the 3,000 such teachers in our schools in a few years' time. I wonder who is monitoring the situation. It certainly is not the Higher Education Funding Council, which told my Committee last night that it had absolutely no plans to intervene in what is clearly a dire situation.

We recognise the huge investment that has been made in science—the £10 billion provided in this comprehensive spending review is massive additional funding—but although the money is going in, there remains a Luddite approach to many of our world-class science facilities. The Silsoe research institute, which has world-class expertise in agricultural engineering, and the Hannah research institute, which deals with nutrition, will close this Friday. Four Centre for Ecology and Hydrology institutions will close next year, at a time when environmental science should be at the heart of our agenda, instead of being trimmed at the margins. In the past 10 years, one in three science posts in publicly funded institutions have gone. I hope that the Minister will explain in his wind-up who is doing the planning for science. Who is pulling it all together and looking at a strategic science base for the UK?

I do not dispute the right of research councils to say that we do not need a particular element of science in this or that institute; nor do I question the fact that at times institutes will have to close. What I do question is the complete lack of a science plan outlining the capacity that we need in the coming years.

The replacement of the RAE system was a welcome announcement. It was handled well and I compliment the Government not only on getting rid, eventually, of the RAE system, but on introducing the new metric system and running the two systems side by side. However, what our universities do not want—I hope that the Minister will take this point on board—is to be running a full RAE system in 2008 and a full new metric system at the same time. Frankly, that would simply undermine much of what has to be done.

The really interesting announcement in the Budget was the reorganisation of research institutes. We Liberal Democrats and my Committee are pleased that the wealth of information in the NHS database will be used for research purposes, but where did the announcement on combining the Medical Research Council and the NHS database come from? Who will lead the organisation? Will it be Sir Colin Blakemore, or somebody brought in through open competition? What resources will the organisation have? The Chancellor mentioned a figure of approximately £1 billion, but the amount spent on the MRC and on the NHS database combined comes to £1.3 billion. So does this constitute a cut in medical research funding? It would be interesting to have an answer to that.

Finally, will the Minister say what is happening with the restructuring of this country's eight research councils? It seems that the Treasury is doing something that nobody else knows about. It is proposing that the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council surrender its grant-giving duties to the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, and that it then merge its facilities with the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils, creating a new "large facilities council". Whatever the proposal's merits—I accept that there are some—surely Research Councils UK should be doing such planning, not the Chancellor sat in the Treasury. Perhaps the Minister can reassure us on this issue.

Overall, however, this is a Budget for science that is to be welcomed, and it certainly will be appreciated in the science community.

9.4 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I apologise for not being in the Chamber for the whole debate, Madam Deputy Speaker; as you know, the Northern Ireland Grand Committee met this afternoon at 4.30.

In the limited time available, it is difficult to highlight the most important aspects of the speech I had prepared. Many thousands of manufacturing jobs have been lost in my constituency, but I want to flag up the serious situation of the multimillion pound fishing industry.

Northern Ireland fishermen have been told that they will receive no moneys for the 11-week closure of fishing in the Irish sea, pursuant to the cod recovery scheme, which is now in its seventh year and runs from mid-February until the end of April. As the House will appreciate, that announcement caused much alarm to fishermen, processors and their families and to local communities that rely on the fishing industry. Council regulation (EC) No. 2792/1999 governs the payment of compensation, and aid was paid under it in 2004 and 2005.

This year, we pressed for the renewal of aid to fishermen in Northern Ireland, and on 31 January 2006 my colleague Jim Allister, MEP, received from the Minister with responsibility for agriculture and rural development a letter indicating that payments beyond two years were prohibited by EU regulation. My colleague disputed that and invited Commissioner Borg to give the Commission's view about the regulation. On 8 March 2006, Dr. Borg wrote to our MEP saying that although the regulation capped compensation at a cumulative total of 12 months, in Northern Ireland payments had been made only for five months so seven months' compensation was still payable by the national Government, and could be spread over several years. Will the Government consider the modest request that £800,000 be allocated to allow suffering Northern Ireland fishermen to survive?

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) referred to the home computer initiative. I received a letter from a constituent, Philip Norton of Ballygowan, who said:

"By scrapping the Home Computing Initiative—a tax incentive introduced in 1999 and further clarified and enhanced in 2003 to enable greater take-up of PCs in the home—the Chancellor has removed one of the most popular and successful initiatives he has created in his time in power, and one that is still running in several countries throughout Europe."

He pointed out that only 10 days were left to sort out the matter, and he would appreciate it if the decision could be reconsidered and, if possible, reversed, as it will have a huge impact throughout the United Kingdom.

I welcome the planned reduction in the number of health trusts and boards in Northern Ireland under the public administration review. I hope that will result in the release of moneys that can be ploughed into front-line services. I have some real concerns about whether the changes can be rolled out without too much upheaval for staff and patients, but time alone will tell.

For a change, I want to record my delight about recent announcements about additional moneys for Herceptin for women suffering from breast cancer and the additional £2 million for beta interferon for multiple sclerosis sufferers, to end the postcode lottery among the Province's health boards. The latest announcement about anti-TNF drugs is a life-saving decision for many sufferers of rheumatoid arthritis, which is a crippling disease. We need ring-fenced funding for those drugs, so that no one who needs them loses out in future. In the past, people have been denied them simply because of where they happened to live.

With nine other MPs from across the UK, I had the pleasure of participating in a meeting with rheumatoid arthritis sufferers to help to compile a book highlighting their experiences with and without anti-TNF drugs. I met a young woman, Hazel Mark, who started showing symptoms of rheumatoid arthritis at the age of 11. She is now in her late 20s or early 30s and has been on Remicade for approximately one year. The transformation in her life has been miraculous. The things that we all take for granted, such as opening cans, lifting a baby and just being able to get out of bed, are now possible for Hazel. On behalf of people suffering from rheumatoid arthritis, I thank Ministers for the welcome news about anti-TNF drugs.

I also want to place on record my thanks for the additional £14.6 million, which the Minister for social development in Northern Ireland has made available for community funding. I had a meeting with him yesterday in my constituency. The news is welcome to the various women's groups throughout Northern Ireland, which will now be in a position, at last, to try to draw down that much-needed funding. The women's centres have been the sticking plaster of local communities throughout the years of the troubles. They do an amazing job in relation to education, preparing women to go back into the workplace, providing crèche facilities and so on. I pay particular tribute to the Ballybeen women's centre, which has done such sterling work over 20-odd years. I am glad that it will not have to go cap in hand looking for funding from various sources, but can avail itself of that much needed money to secure the work that it does in my constituency and throughout the Province.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Since there appear to be no more Labour Back Benchers waiting to speak—indeed, the Chancellor has not been praised for the past half an hour or so—I suppose that I should start by giving some praise to the Chancellor for the work that has been done over the years. It would be churlish not to say that, in Northern Ireland, we now have the lowest rate of unemployment and are the fourth fastest growing region in the United Kingdom, and that there have been economic successes. I am not looking for a job, so I can say that without anybody saying that I have an ulterior motive.

I fear, however, that the tightening that is hidden behind the Budget will affect that situation. Already we see the fiscal grip tightening on Northern Ireland. Regional rates have gone up, water charges are to be introduced and we are to have a charge for policing. Much of the economic success will be badly affected by the hidden tightening in the Budget. The Budget shows that the Government will face difficulties in the years ahead.

Let us consider the meaning of the Budget for the United Kingdom as a whole. Perhaps the clue was in the give-away line when the Chancellor compared himself to Nicholas Vansittart. He may well have been looking back longingly to the days when that Chancellor was able to get 39 resolutions through without any opposition. There were no Back-Bench revolts and there was nobody on the other side opposing the resolutions. On the other hand, Nicholas Vansittart was known for increasing the tax burden, complicated financial schemes for hiding the size of the national debt, paying considerable attention to affecting supposed economies and, of course, privatising naval and military pensions. Perhaps that is the real picture that we get from the Budget and the real picture of the current Chancellor.

I want to make three brief observations. Amid the financial machine-gun effect, with £100 million here, £20 million elsewhere, £15 million for microgeneration of energy, new boards for technology, and enterprise networks—those things will be rolled out—there are a number of worrying messages in the Budget.

The first message is that when the Chancellor says that he gives, it does not necessarily mean that we receive. He announced that there will be more direct payments to schools, with the money for primary schools going up by £13,000 a school and money for secondary schools increasing from £98,000 to £152,000. He said that the same increases would be announced for schools in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, but when the Secretary of State made the announcement for Northern Ireland, we found that a sum of £16 million would be spread among nearly 1,000 schools, but that does not work out at £13,000 a primary school and £54,000 a secondary school. I suspect that there is a lot of spin in the Budget and many initiatives that are simply regurgitations of money that has already been spent, and I could give further examples of that.

Secondly, more money does not mean better services. I heard Labour Members taunting Opposition Members who wanted tax cuts by asking how they could have tax cuts without cutting services. The fact of the matter is that since the Government came to power in 1997, with "education, education, education" as their agenda, there has been a 47 per cent. real increase in education spending, yet the Chancellor lamented in the Budget that there are still underachieving schools, people leaving school who need a second chance to get further education and A-levels and schools in which there are insufficient science teachers. Spending money has thus not necessarily improved services. In many cases, spending money has simply bloated bureaucracy. If the structures are right, it is of course possible not to take more in tax, yet still improve services. We had this debate on education the other week. If the right structures are in place, improvements can be made to services, even with less money.

Thirdly, if problems are identified, it does not mean that answers are given. The Chancellor talks about the need for enterprise and a competitive economy. We know that in Northern Ireland because we are heavily reliant on the public sector. We have an open and small economy that does not have internal economies of scale, so we have to export and thus must be competitive. During the years of the troubles, entrepreneurs were forced out by gangsters and so on, so we lost the enterprise culture. The problems have been identified, but I do not see much in the Budget to address them. If anything, the enterprise culture will not be stimulated, and let me give one example to explain why. The tax burden on local companies will increase. The Chancellor could have considered reducing corporation tax—we have seen the success of that elsewhere—but he did not, even though there was consensus about it and evidence that it could have led to an improvement.

I know that my time is nearly up, so I will conclude by saying that the Budget is not expansionary and will not address the problems that the Chancellor identified. Other hon. Members have pointed out that he has walked away from the great problems that face us, such as pensions and health. Many of the burning problems that the Government should be addressing have not been dealt with in the Budget, so although I accept that there have been successes, I have no hesitation in saying that this is not the Chancellor's best Budget. The Budget will not address the problems that face us.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) urged me to be generous to the Chancellor, even if he is not here. Let me begin by congratulating the Chancellor, in his absence, on the delivery of his 10th Budget. It is an undoubted achievement. He has beaten a record set by Lloyd George in a week in which the Prime Minister has returned us to the politics of Lloyd George.

We have had a good final day's debate, although I am sorry that Labour ran out of speakers about halfway through. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is not here now either, trotted out the Chancellor's litany of bogus statistics on investment, research and development, and productivity, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) comprehensively demolished each one of them in their robust contributions.

How on earth can the Chancellor claim that research and development is going up when the day after the Budget figures are produced showing that R and D levels are down? How on earth can he claim that business investment is up when his own Red Book revises down the forecasts for business investment and when business investment levels are at a record low? How on earth can the Government claim seriously that productivity growth is up when everyone knows that it has slumped?

There was an argument about which measure we should use for productivity growth. I am happy to use the one that the Chancellor himself used in 1998, based on output per worker, when he said that it was the "fundamental yardstick of economic performance".

On that yardstick, he has fundamentally failed. Productivity growth is one fifth the level that he inherited. That must in part explain the sluggish growth that my right hon. and learned Friend talked about. [Interruption.] I welcome the Chancellor to his place. The 1.8 per cent. growth last year was below the EU average, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average and the G7 average.

We had other good contributions. I enjoyed those from the hon. Members for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) and for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson). My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) has been Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee for years, and I was one of his underlings on that Committee. He described how impossible it is to measure the Government's claims on Gershon, and the National Audit Office report on that is striking. My hon. Friend proposed getting the Comptroller and Auditor General to audit Opposition efficiency plans. I am happy to consider the idea, although I suspect that Sir John has his work cut out trying to get to the bottom of the Government's efficiency plans.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) drew attention, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton and others did, to the decision to abolish the scheme that has given 500,000 people computer laptops. My right hon. Friend described it as the action of an analogue politician—a very good phrase. We will vote against that measure. Perhaps the Minister for Industry and the Regions, who was in the Chamber earlier, will join us, because only a few weeks ago he said that the scheme was a great example of what can be done when the Government and industry work together. If he works with us, we can stop it being abolished.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) gave a spirited defence of his beloved Royal Shrewsbury hospital, and dairy farmers, in the presence of the Chancellor himself. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) pointed out that there was nothing in the Budget speech for carers or manufacturing. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) gave an excellent speech on the Government's failure to address the seriousness of the environmental challenge that we face. Of course, when we look in the Red Book we see that the proportion of taxes raised through environmental taxation will fall as a result of the measures introduced by the Chancellor. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) became almost religious in his enthusiasm for his constituency, but he also drew attention to the serious problem of crime against schools.

I hope that I shall not offend my right hon. and hon. Friends when I say that the most interesting speech was made by the right hon. Member for Darlington. He chose not to talk about the 700 job losses at the County Durham and Darlington Acute Hospitals NHS Trust announced last week. Instead, he focused his fire on the Chancellor's poverty policies.

The right hon. Member for Darlington is a practised assassin. He began by covering his tracks by lavishing praise on the record of the Chancellor, then he stuck the knife in. He called for "direct targeted tax cuts for low-income families"—but he knows that that is exactly the opposite of the strategy pursued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who explicitly rejected tax cuts in the Budget. He knows that his speech will be seen alongside that of his colleague, the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers), who attacked the Chancellor's extension of means-testing in yesterday's Budget debate. He hopes that his speech will be reported in the press tomorrow, because he was circulating it to the press lobby before he delivered it in the House. I am not a Kremlinologist, so I can only guess what those two arch-Blairites are trying to achieve.

All is not well in the state of the Labour party, and the most charitable view is that, like the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, they believe that taxes are so high that "we are probably at the limit of what people are prepared to pay".

Bang goes his job in the next Administration.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): He will lose his seat as well.

Mr. Osborne: Yes, the hon. Gentleman will lose his seat at the election. However, he is right: we have a record tax burden, higher than at any time in our history. It is higher than the last time we had a Labour Government, when half the country was on strike. Instead of following the advice of the right hon. Member for Darlington and reducing taxes, the Budget increases taxes still further. Some £4 billion of taxes on businesses and North sea oil were pre-announced in the pre-Budget report, the zero per cent. corporation tax rate that the Chancellor himself trumpeted in his 2002 Budget has been abolished, and there are iniquitous retrospective changes to inheritance tax. All those tax changes, and 25 others, were absent from the Budget speech, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire pointed out, but they will all add to the complexity of the tax system.

Despite that considerable tightening, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe drew our attention, the Chancellor is still running a budget deficit. It is an extraordinary achievement to have record taxes but still run a budget deficit—and it is getting worse. In the Budget, the Chancellor doubled his estimate for next year's budget deficit from the one that he made just three months ago. He confirmed that he is set to borrow £175 billion over the next six years. He has mortgaged not just today's taxpayers but tomorrow's, too.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab) rose—

Hon. Members: No!

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. It is for the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) to decide whether to accept an intervention.

Mr. Osborne: I am afraid that the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) has not attended today's debate, and he has not given a speech in the Budget debate. I will accept an intervention from the organ grinder, but I will not take one from the monkey.

Hon. Members: Hurrah!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind all hon. Members, before they become overexcited, that good temper and moderation are the hallmarks of parliamentary language?

Mr. Osborne: No one doubts that the Chancellor has spent a great deal of other people's money, but the question is: where has the money gone? The Chancellor may not have wanted to talk about the NHS on Budget day, but the rest of the country was doing so. On the same day as he delivered the Budget, the Royal Free hospital announced 500 job losses; the day after, Darlington hospitals announced another 700 job losses. A total of 4,000 NHS job cuts have been announced in just three weeks. In public the Chancellor blames just a few bad mangers, but everyone knows that in private he and his cabal blame the Health Secretary.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Osborne: If the hon. Gentleman will confirm that point I will happily give way to him.

Ed Balls rose—

Hon. Members: Answer!

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can reply.

Ed Balls: Can the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) confirm that he proposed to undermine the independence of the Bank of England and of the Governor by making Bank of England executives a minority on the Monetary Policy Committee? Why would he undermine the Governor of the Bank of England?

Mr. Osborne: I support Bank of England independence and, like the Chancellor, I am looking at ways to entrench it still further. I enjoyed the New Statesman interview with the hon. Member for Normanton, in which he described himself as a socialist. He said that the finances of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport were baffling, and that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills had not handled the Education and Inspections Bill very well. I suggest that he spend more time trying to win friends among those on the Labour Benches than trying to intervene on us.

The situation in the NHS is not the fault of the Secretary of State for Health. The fault lies at the Treasury. The Chancellor of the Exchequer provided the money, but he blocked the reform that would have made the money count. NHS productivity has fallen year on year. Three quarters of the money has disappeared in cost pressures. Now we have close to £1 billion of deficit and thousands of job losses.

The NHS is not the only thing missing from the Budget. There is not a word on the pensions crisis brought about by the Chancellor's £5 billion pension tax and his extension of means-testing. I hope that he reads the speech made yesterday by the right hon. Member for North Tyneside, who said in the House:

"I do not think that, when we come to consider a new regime for pensions, we can continue as we have since 1997."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 613.]

Does the Chancellor agree with his former Chief Secretary? We do not know.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire pointed out so powerfully, there was no mention in the Budget speech or the Red Book of the decision to cancel the £200 council tax rebate. My right hon. Friend is right. The Chancellor talks about restoring trust in politics and gives speeches on the subject. How much more dishonest can one get than announcing before an election that pensioners will get a £200 cheque, then withdrawing it without a word of explanation after the election? I guess it is just the Chancellor's own special way of helping the Prime Minister with his local election campaign.

The Chancellor should at least tell Labour councillors what he is up to. This weekend, after the Budget speech, the leader of the Labour group on Lambeth council wrote to a Mr. Patrick McLoughlin of Kennington Park road, London. A copy of the letter has mysteriously fallen into my hands. It comes with a glossy leaflet—it is interesting that the Prime Minister's picture does not appear on such leaflets any more. Under the heading "What will Labour do?" it states:

"We will:

Press the Government to provide more help for pensioners to pay their council tax bills."

No doubt the leaflets are being pulped as we speak. Labour says one thing in the Chamber and another thing outside. It makes the Liberal Democrats look like amateurs—which is not very difficult with the new leader of the Liberal Democrats.

Of course, the Chancellor did mention education. It is striking that hardly a single Labour Member who spoke today mentioned the great pledge to raise state school spending to private school levels. That was supposed to be the centrepiece of the Budget, but where is the timetable? How much will it cost? Over what level is spending to be increased? The Chancellor never told us that the Prime Minister made exactly the same pledge five years ago. There we have it—the first great statement of what a Brown premiership would do, and it turns out to be a reheated broken promise from the high days of the Blair premiership. I have a depressing feeling that this is the shape of things to come.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): I noticed that in the interviews that the hon. Gentleman gave, responding to the Budget last week, he refused to say whether he would support our pledge to increase spending on the state education sector. Does he agree with the shadow Chief Secretary, who admitted on Budget day that the Conservative spending plans would "certainly" mean spending less than Labour, and that more spending is not the answer?

Mr. Osborne: If the hon. Gentleman is going to take a hand-out question, he should pick a better one.

The Chancellor does not understand that education is about not only additional money, but reform. [Interruption.] We have matched the additional spending next year, and we have matched the capital spending, which is nothing like the £34 billion figure that the Chancellor has mentioned; according to the Institute for Fiscal Studies, the figure is more like £1 billion. We want to see education reform, and we now know that it can be delivered only with the support of this side of the House.

While we are on the subject of education, why did the Chancellor not tell us more about his youth national community service scheme? For some reason, he did not find time during his one hour at the Dispatch Box to mention the fact that he has just appointed a new chairman of the scheme, so I shall make the announcement for him. The new chairman is a Mr. Rod Aldridge—a well-connected individual. In fact, he is so keen to get on with the job that he resigned from Capita the very next day.

Six years ago, the Chancellor embarked on his great experiment of abandoning prudence. He decided to increase public sector spending hugely, while blocking the reforms that were necessary to make sure that the money got to the front line. Six years later, if you want to see the result of what has happened, Mr. Deputy Speaker, listen to the Prime Minister's own special adviser on public services, who has worked at the heart of No. 10. When he was on "Panorama" two weeks ago, he said this:

"We're pouring money into the health service. We're pouring money into the education system. But we are not getting the quality of services that we expect. I think we're in a pretty disastrous situation".

[Mr. Osborne]

That is the next door neighbours' verdict on the record of No. 11—which is, of course, the subtext to the whole Budget.

This is a battle over who is in charge of Labour's sinking ship. We have a Prime Minister on the other side of the world who admits that he was wrong to say that he was going, and we have a Chancellor who hardly dares leave the country in case he misses his chance again. So the Chancellor sits there reannouncing old promises on education, taxing more and spending more, painfully aware that so much money has been wasted.

We are told that, unlike the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and his cabal are keen on establishing clear dividing lines with their opponents. Well, those dividing lines are emerging. We have a Chancellor who is addicted to taxation, and a growing consensus—which includes the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn)—that higher taxes undermine aspiration and damage Britain's ability to compete. We have a Chancellor whose answer to everything is to spend, and a growing consensus that money alone is not the answer. We have a Chancellor who opposes reform, and an alliance in this House that will vote reform through. We have a Chancellor who describes himself as "a socialist", and a country that knows that a return to tax and spend socialism would bring this country to its knees. This Budget should have prepared Britain for the new global economy. Instead, we have a Chancellor who is stuck in the thinking of the past, when the country needs a modern, compassionate Conservative party, changing to meet the challenges of the future.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): We have had four days of comprehensive and informative debate—at least until the last 20 minutes. It is a pleasure to respond to the debate, and I shall endeavour to deal with as many points raised by hon. Members as I can in the time left to me.

Last Wednesday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor stood here and spoke for an hour or more on the specific policy implications of the Budget. He was responded to by the Leader of the Opposition, who shouted from the Dispatch Box for all of eight minutes. As I sat here—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): This is the punch line.

Mr. Browne: Perhaps I should—[HON. MEMBERS: "More, more!"] It appears that both Chief Whips and shadow Chief Whips sometimes do not know when to keep quiet—[Interruption.] Perhaps the shadow Chief Whip could moderate his tone.

The Budget debate will be remembered by many as the one in which the contributions from Back Benchers, even when limited to 10 or 12 minutes were longer than the total contribution by the Leader of the Opposition. So there was to be no more Punch and Judy politics. As we have learned over the last few days, old Tory traits have not gone away. Disappointingly, we have had more of that today from the shadow Chancellor, the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne). But perhaps I should not have been disappointed by the lack of substance from him. Over the weekend I took the opportunity to read his diary in The Observer. I learned that in the week of the Budget he did several things. He spent considerable time with his children, for which I commend him. He was also reminded that he spent his teenage years watching sumptuous E.M. Forster adaptations, among other things. However, I scanned his contribution in The Observer carefully for the day of the Budget and found nothing, apart from the fact that he sat beside the Leader of the Opposition, who was assailed by a wall of sound.

This has been a revealing debate and I especially welcome the shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) to her place. I feared last week that she had done a Letwin—I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I mean I feared that she had done a right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin)—by exposing Tory cuts and then disappearing into the ether. Despite her absence, she certainly made a contribution to the debate, not least on the matter of our investment in education. As she has been reminded more than once, when asked on "Sky News" last Wednesday whether her reaction to the Government's spending meant that the Tories would be spending less, she replied, "It would, certainly." Later that day, when challenged by my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) to match our Budget commitment on education spending, the shadow Chief Secretary refused and replied, "That's not the answer."

The Opposition were on a roll, because the shadow Chancellor, in interviews, then refused to support her announcements on capital spending and on state school spending. Later that evening, on "Newsnight", he could not mention any measure in the Budget that he supported. The next day, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), the shadow Minister for child care, said:

"Of course we support the goal".—[Official Report, 23 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 508.]

Better yet, the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Skills said yesterday

"we accept the increase in school spending and the capital spending pledge."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 649.]

It is flip-flops all round. First, they want cuts, then they are confused, then they do not want cuts and finally they support our spending plans. What does the shadow Chancellor say now, when offered the opportunity to support our plans? He is unable to answer the question—[Interruption.]

Let us look at climate change. For the past six years the Opposition have refused to support the climate change levy, which has cut carbon emissions by 28 million tonnes—[Interruption.] Today, they announce—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The House must listen to the Minister who is responding to the debate.

Mr. Browne: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Today, they announce that they will not vote against the Budget measures on the climate change levy—they have changed their mind and are flip-flopping again.

However, I wish to be fair. The Opposition have one economic policy that we know of, and that is their third fiscal rule. It is that over the economic cycle, and regardless of the needs of the economy or the country, public spending and investment must, as a matter of principle, always rise slower than growth. Indeed, today the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) described our rejection of the third fiscal rule as the dividing line between us. He is correct about that, because it would mean public spending £17 billion lower in the coming year and £16 billion lower in the year after. It would mean cutting spending in schools, cutting it in hospitals for doctors and nurses, cutting it in our transport system, and cutting our ability to invest in science and innovation. On the day after the Budget, the shadow Chancellor even said—on GMTV, no less:

"When there's a general election we will start reducing the share of national income taken by the state."

We know what that means—cuts.

Daniel Kawczynski: Some of us who actually participated in the debate raised serious issues to do with our constituents, particularly farmers in Shrewsbury and senior citizens. Will the Minister talk about the problems that our constituents are going to face instead of just criticising Tory shadow Ministers?

Mr. Browne: Of course, the hon. Gentleman, like many of his hon. Friends, made a bid for more money. I have to say that those bids for more investment were completely ignored by his Front Benchers. Of course they were, because how can they offer him more investment for his farmers or anybody else when they are planning cuts in public spending? That is the important point. They are planning cuts in public spending while every other Conservative Member, for one reason or another, calls for increases in spending.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Browne: Let the House have no doubt that this Budget sets out how we on the Government Benches will equip Britain for the future. It sets out how, building on a platform of stability and growth, we can invest in the skills and services—

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must not keep standing if the Minister is not going to give way. It is for him to decide whether he is going to do so, and it would be helpful if he would indicate that.

Mr. Browne: I am not going to give way at the moment, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We can invest in the skills and services that we need to face the challenges and to grasp the opportunities of our global economy. This Budget is not about the past—it is about the future and long-term British success. It is about our clear ambition for Britain for success built on economic stability and growth. We have had 54 quarters of consecutive growth. I might remind the House that we have had the longest expansion in British history, with inflation at a 2 per cent. target, interest rates at a sustained low, and stable growth enabling British business to expand, leading to record employment, with some 2.3 million more jobs since 1997.

This Budget equips our country for the future, investing in education, science and enterprise, and facing up to the global challenge of climate change. It is our approach, based on economic stability, with the proper balance between spending and borrowing, that is the right way to go. The Budget takes the right decisions to equip Britain for the future.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con) rose—

Mr. Browne: After I have taken an intervention from the hon. Gentleman, I will come to some of the individual points made during the debate.

Mr. Jenkin: Can the right hon. Gentleman explain why it is possible for countries such as Ireland and Denmark to reduce public spending as a proportion of national income and to continue increasing public spending in gross terms, whereas it is impossible for that to be achieved in this country?

Mr. Browne: We are in this country increasing spending and investment, and both are generating growth in the economy. I have to say that the people of Denmark and Ireland did not have 18 years of Tory Government and a lack of investment in the infrastructure of the country to contend with.

As I said at the outset, we have had a comprehensive, informative and wide-ranging debate. It ranged from the customary prophet-of-doom contribution that Labour Members have come to expect from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who has predicted imminent recession in this country yearly since we came to power, to the enlightened and positive contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), who set a series of challenges for the shadow Chancellor, all of which he signally failed to answer. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) eloquently expressed support for disabled people and the poor of the world. He has supported those issues for many years.

The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) sought the safety of the Back Benches from which to make a significant number of calls for further public spending in his constituency. I am sure that the shadow Chancellor took note of that. However, it was not nearly as damaging a contribution from the Back Benches as that of the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who gave the game away in a sedentary intervention. As the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton sought to set a clear dividing line on tax, the hon. Member for Gainsborough interrupted and suggested that his Front-Bench spokesman meant tax cuts.

In their individual ways, several hon. Members recorded genuine improvements in their constituencies, including my hon. Friends the Members for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright), for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman), for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) and the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson). They acknowledged the opportunities that my right hon. Friend's Budget gave their communities.

[Mr. Browne]

Much has been said in the debate about productivity and competitiveness, not least in the contributions of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable). Business in the UK needs stability above all. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has delivered stability that the International Monetary Fund described as "remarkable". The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has already noted that UK has the lowest barriers to entrepreneurship of any major economy. The Budget does even more to support business, not least the 575,000 more small and medium-sized enterprises that have been founded in the UK since 1997.

UK Trade & Investment will promote the United Kingdom abroad. We will establish a new business advisory council and enshrine in law the Hampton code of deregulatory practice. There will be specific budgets for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs to reduce the burden on business. We will extend the research and development tax credits.

We have half the productivity gap of France. We have closed the gap with Germany, we are ahead of Japan and we are keeping up with the United States. It is remarkable—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Conversations are breaking out throughout the Chamber. We must listen to the Chief Secretary, who is now winding up the debate.

Mr. Browne: We have not only improved productivity but done that while creating 2.3 million new jobs. Labour Members can be rightly proud of that achievement because we have presided over the longest period of sustained employment growth since the 1950s when records began.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): The Chief Secretary says that the Government have improved productivity. Will he explain precisely how he calculates that? According to witnesses to the Treasury Committee yesterday, any attempt to describe productivity as improving is "misleading".

Mr. Browne: The only years when productivity fell in the United Kingdom were Tory years. I do not know if the hon. Gentleman was in his place at the beginning of the debate but, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said when he opened it, over the economic cycle, which is the proper measure of productivity, there has been 2.3 per cent. growth compared with 2 per cent. in the previous cycle.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, joined by the hon. Member for Twickenham, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) and the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) mentioned the home computer initiative. The changes have been made to ensure better targeting of resources to meet the Government's objective of improving access to technology. The home computer initiative was never intended to subsidise those who can already afford computers. Exemptions were being used, contrary to the original intention, for second personal computers and, indeed, for games consoles. There has been a huge fall in computer prices since 1999, and the Government want to focus resources on those who would not otherwise be able to gain access to a computer to increase their IT literacy skills. In addition, computer ownership has risen from 28 per cent. to 60 per cent.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House really must let the Minister make his speech.

Mr. Browne: A number of hon. Members—

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con) rose—

Mr. Browne: I give way to the hon. Lady.

Miss McIntosh: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry prides himself on the number of new jobs that have been created. Of the 3.2 million that have been created in the public sector, how many of the women in the civil service earn exactly the same as the men? Is the right hon. Gentleman concerned that they earn 25 per cent. less than their male equivalents?

Mr. Browne: I am grateful for the opportunity to remind the House that, since 1997, women's wages have increased twice as fast as men's wages. I recognise that there is still a gap between the two, but we are narrowing that gap, and that is a record of which we can rightly be proud.

A number of Conservative Members have alleged that the tax burden is now the highest in history. That is of course dependent on the most spurious of all calculations of the tax burden, and it is completely wrong. The tax burden is actually lower now than it was for the entire period between 1981 and 1988 under Margaret Thatcher, and well below the peak tax burden in 1984. According to the experts at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the net tax burden on the average working family is half what it was when we came to power. As a result of all the tax and benefit changes that we have introduced, the average household will, from next month, be £950 a year better off in real terms than it was in 1997. According to Ernst and Young, the effective rate of corporation tax on British businesses is well below historic highs, down from 14 per cent. in 1997 to below 10 per cent. today.

Of course, the amount of tax collected rises fastest when the economy is doing well—when business, the City, the housing market and retailers are doing well, and when there are more people in work, paying tax and moving up the earnings scale. The lowest tax burden of the past 30 years was in 1993–94, when the economy was barely growing, unemployment was above 3 million, millions of families faced negative equity and wage settlements were at a 25-year low.

This Budget illustrates the gap between the Government's responsible preparation for global change and the instincts of the Conservative party, which would leave us all woefully unprepared for the future.

Greg Clark rose—

Mr. Browne: I will not give way now.

Underneath it all, no matter now compassionate their rhetoric, the Conservatives still have the desire to cut. We could do that too, of course, but it would be the wrong thing to do, and the Conservatives know it. We cannot face global competition with one hand tied behind our back. Instead, we will have spent some £5.4 billion a year on science by 2008. This year alone, we have invested more than £2.6 billion to renew UK university research infrastructure. This Budget adds to that by creating a single £1 billion a year health research fund. It also simplifies research funding arrangements and expands R and D support for medium-sized companies.

Our drive is to improve the UK's position as the best location for inward investment, and that means strengthening our reputation as one of the world's finest locations for higher education. It also means promoting London as the world's leading centre for financial and business services. This is a Budget for the future, and for a strong and strengthening economy. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

Sparkling wine or sparkling made-wine of a strength exceeding 5.5 per cent but less than 8.5 per cent	166.70
Sparkling wine or sparkling made-wine of a strength of 8.5 per cent or of a strength exceeding 8.5 per cent but not exceeding 15 per cent	220.54
Wine or made-wine of a strength exceeding 15 per cent but not exceeding 22 per cent	229.55

(2) This Resolution shall have effect as from midnight on 26th March 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

5. Hydrocarbon oil etc (rates and rebates)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending rates of duty and rebate in the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979.

6. Hydrocarbon oil etc (road vehicles)

Resolved,

That provision may be made enabling amendment of the definition of road vehicle in the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979.

7. Amusement machine licence duty

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending provisions of the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981 relating to amusement machine licence duty.

8. Vehicle excise duty (rates)

Resolved,

That—

(2) In paragraph 1(2), for "£170" there shall be substituted "£175".

(3) For paragraph 1B there shall be substituted—

" 1B The annual rate of vehicle excise duty applicable to a vehicle to which this Part of this Schedule applies shall be determined in accordance with Table A, where the vehicle is first registered before 23rd March 2006, or Table B, where the vehicle is first registered on or after that date, by reference to—

(a) the applicable CO_2 emissions figure, and whether the vehicle qualifies for the reduced rate of duty, or is liable to the standard rate or the premium rate of duty.

Table A: Vehicles first registered before 23rd March 2006

225	—	200	210	215

(4) In paragraph 1C—

(a) for sub-paragraph (2) substitute—

" (2) Condition A is that the vehicle—

(a) is constructed—

(i) so as to be propelled by a relevant type of fuel, or so as to be capable of being propelled by any of a number of relevant types of fuel, or

(b) is constructed or modified—

(i) so as to be propelled by a prescribed type of fuel, or so as to be capable of being propelled by any of a number of prescribed types of fuel, and complies with any other requirements prescribed for the purposes of this condition.", and

(b) after sub-paragraph (5) there shall be inserted—

" (6) In this paragraph—

"bioethanol" has the meaning given in section 2AB of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979,

"relevant type of fuel" means—

(a) bioethanol, or a mixture of bioethanol and unleaded petrol, if the proportion of bioethanol by volume is at least 85%, and

"unleaded petrol" has the meaning given in section 1(3C) of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979.

(7) The Secretary of State may, with the consent of the Treasury, by regulations amend sub-paragraph (6)."

(5) In paragraph 1J(a), for "£165" there shall be substituted "£170".

(6) In paragraph 1K(a), after "1st March 2003" there shall be inserted "and before 1st January 2007".

(7) In paragraph 2(1)—

(a) in paragraph (b), for "£30" there shall be substituted "£31",

(b) in paragraph (c), for "£45" there shall be substituted "£46", and

(c) in paragraph (d), for "£60" there shall be substituted "£62".

(8) In Schedule 2 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994, after paragraph 24 there shall be inserted—

"Light passenger vehicles with low CO_2 emissions

25 A vehicle is an exempt vehicle if—

(a) it is a vehicle to which Part 1A of Schedule 1 applies, and the applicable CO_2 emissions figure (as defined in paragraph 1A(3) and (4) of that Schedule) for the vehicle does not exceed 100 g/km."

(9) Paragraph (8) shall come into force on 23rd March 2006; but nothing in that paragraph shall have the effect that a nil licence is required to be in force in respect of a vehicle while a vehicle licence is in force in respect of it.

(10) The rest of this Resolution shall have effect in relation to licences taken out on or after that date.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

9. VALUE ADDED TAX (GAMING MACHINES)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending section 23 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994.

10. VALUE ADDED TAX (BUILDINGS AND LAND)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for, and in connection with, conferring power on the Treasury—

(a) to substitute Schedule 10 to the Value Added Tax 1994 for the purpose of rewriting that Schedule with amendments, and

(b) to amend Group 1 of Schedule 9 to that Act.

11. VALUE ADDED TAX (WORKS OF ART, ANTIQUES, ETC)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 21 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 in relation to works of art, antiques, collections and collector's pieces.

12. VALUE ADDED TAX (MISSING TRADER INTRA-COMMUNITY FRAUD)

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of value added tax, provision may be made for, and in connection with, securing that—

(a) supplies of goods made to persons carrying on businesses are treated for the purposes of Schedule 1 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 as their taxable supplies made in the course or furtherance of their businesses, and

(b) taxable persons carrying on businesses to whom supplies of goods are made by other taxable persons account for and pay value added tax on those supplies.

13. VALUE ADDED TAX (FACE-VALUE VOUCHERS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending, or making amendments connected with, Schedule 10A to the Value Added Tax Act 1994.

14. INCOME TAX (CHARGE AND RATES FOR 2006–07)

Resolved,

That income tax shall be charged for the year 2006–07, and for that year—

(a) the starting rate shall be 10%;

(b) the basic rate shall be 22%;

(c) the higher rate shall be 40%.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

15. CORPORATION TAX (CHARGE AND RATE FOR 2007)

Resolved,

That corporation tax shall be charged for the financial year 2007 at the rate of 30%.

16. CORPORATION TAX (SMALL COMPANIES' RATE AND FRACTION FOR 2006)

Resolved,

That for the financial year 2006—

(a) the small companies' rate shall be 19%, and

(b) the fraction mentioned in section 13(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall be 11/400ths.

17. CORPORATION TAX (STARTING RATE AND NON-CORPORATE DISTRIBUTION RATE)

Motion made, and Question put,

That provision may be made for, and in connection with, the abolition of—

(a) the corporation tax starting rate,

(b) the relief from corporation tax under section 13AA(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, and

(c) the non-corporate distribution rate.

Question accordingly agreed to.

18. Group relief (corporation tax)

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of corporation tax, provision may be made (including provision having retrospective effect) in relation to group relief.

19. Tax relief for R&D expenditure of small or medium-sized companies

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to relief under Schedule 20 to the Finance Act 2000.

20. Tax relief for R&D expenditure of large companies etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to relief under Schedule 12 to the Finance Act 2002.

21. Tax relief for expenditure on vaccine research etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to relief under Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 2002.

22. Films and sound recordings

Resolved,

That provision may be made about the taxation of activities in connection with films and sound recordings.

23. Charities (relief on income tax and corporation tax)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending and supplementing sections 505 and 506 of and Schedule 20 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

24. Gift aid (payments by companies)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 339 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

25. Income tax (mobile telephones)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 266(2) of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 there shall be inserted at the end "or

(d) section 319 (mobile telephones)."

(2) In section 267(2) of that Act there shall be inserted at the end "and

(g) section 319 (mobile telephones)."

(3) For section 319 of that Act there shall be substituted—

" 319 Mobile telephones

(1) No liability to income tax arises by virtue of section 62 (general definition of earnings) or Chapter 10 of Part 3 (taxable benefits: residual liability to charge) in respect of the provision of one mobile telephone for an employee without any transfer of property in it.

In this section "mobile telephone" means telephone apparatus which—

(a) is not physically connected to a land-line, and is not used only as a wireless extension to a telephone which is physically connected to a land-line, or any thing which may be used in such apparatus for the purpose of gaining access to, or using, a public electronic communications service.

In this section the reference to the provision of a mobile telephone includes a reference to the provision, together with the mobile telephone provided, of access to, or the use of, a public electronic communications service by means of one mobile telephone number.

For the purposes of subsection (2) "telephone apparatus" means wireless telegraphy apparatus designed or adapted for the primary purpose of transmitting and receiving spoken messages and used in connection with a public electronic communications service."

(4) The amendments made by this Resolution shall have effect for the year 2006–07 and subsequent years of assessment.

(5) But the amendment made by paragraph (3) shall not cause any liability to income tax to arise in respect of the provision of a mobile telephone for an employee, or a member of an employee's family or household, if the mobile telephone was first provided to him before 6th April 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

26. Income tax (computer equipment)

Motion made, and Question put,

That—

(1) Section 320 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 shall be omitted.

(2) This Resolution shall have effect for the year 2006–07 and subsequent years of assessment.

(3) But this Resolution shall not cause any liability to income tax to arise in respect of the provision of computer equipment by making it available to an employee, or a member of an employee's family or household, if the computer equipment was first made available to him before 6th April 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

27. CHARGEABLE GAINS

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending, or making amendments connected with, the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.

28. INCOME TAX (INTEREST RELIEF: FILM PARTNERSHIP)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made restricting the relief available under sections 353 and 362 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 in respect of certain loans to buy into partnerships carrying on trade in relation to films or other recordings.

29. TRANSFERS OF INCOME ARISING FROM SECURITIES

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending section 730 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

30. STOCK LENDING

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made for the purposes of income tax and corporation tax—

(a) in relation to stock lending arrangements, and

(b) for and in connection with treating arrangements which are not stock lending arrangements as if they were such arrangements.

31. LOAN RELATIONSHIPS ETC

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of corporation tax in relation to—

(a) loan relationships, and

(b) other relationships where a company stands, or is to be treated as standing, in the position of a creditor or debtor in relation to a debt.

32. DERIVATIVE CONTRACTS

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of corporation tax in relation to derivative contracts.

33. INTANGIBLE FIXED ASSETS

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending Schedule 29 to the Finance Act 2002.

34. CONTROLLED FOREIGN COMPANIES

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 90 of the Finance Act 2002.

35. TRANSFER OF ASSETS ABROAD

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending, or making amendments connected with, Chapter 3 of Part 17 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

36. INCOME TAX (BENEFITS RECEIVED BY FORMER OWNER OF PROPERTY)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 2004.

37. LEASES OF PLANT OR MACHINERY

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of income tax and corporation tax, provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in relation to leases of plant or machinery.

38. CORPORATION TAX (COMPANIES CARRYING ON LEASING BUSINESS)

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of corporation tax, provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made in relation to any company carrying on (whether alone or in partnership) a business which consists of or includes leasing plant or machinery.

40. INCOME TAX (SETTLEMENTS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to settlors, beneficiaries and trustees of settlements.

41. INVESTMENT RELIEFS (LIMITS ON VALUE OF GROSS ASSETS OF ISSUERS OF SHARES ETC)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 293(6A) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 ("ICTA")—

(a) in paragraph (a), for "£15 million" there shall be substituted "£7 million", and

(b) in paragraph (b), for "£16 million" there shall be substituted "£8 million".

(2) In paragraph 8(1) of Schedule 28B to ICTA—

(a) in paragraph (a), for "£15 million" there shall be substituted "£7 million", and

(b) in paragraph (b), for "£16 million" there shall be substituted "£8 million".

(3) In paragraph 22(1) and (2) of Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 2000—

(a) in paragraph (a), for "£15 million" there shall be substituted "£7 million", and

(b) in paragraph (b), for "£16 million" there shall be substituted "£8 million".

(4) Paragraphs (1) and (3) of this Resolution have effect in relation to shares issued on or after 6th April 2006, subject to paragraphs (5) and (6) of this Resolution.

(5) Neither of paragraphs (1) and (3) of this Resolution has effect in relation to shares issued on or after 6th April 2006 to a person who subscribed for them before 22nd March 2006.

(6) Paragraph (1) of this Resolution does not have effect in relation to shares issued on or after 6th April 2006 to the managers of an investment fund approved for the purposes of section 311 of ICTA by the Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs if—

(a) the fund was approved before 22nd March 2006,

(b) investments in the fund have been accepted before 6th April 2006, and

(c) the shares are issued to the managers as nominee for an individual who has (whether or not before 6th April 2006) invested in the fund.

(7) Paragraph (2) of this Resolution has effect in relation to relevant holdings issued on or after 6th April 2006, subject to paragraph (8) of this Resolution.

(8) Paragraph (2) of this Resolution does not have effect for the purpose of determining whether any shares or securities acquired by a company ("the trust company") by means of the investment of protected money are, for the purposes of section 842AA of ICTA, to be regarded as comprised in qualifying holdings of the company at any time.

(9) In paragraph (8) of this Resolution "protected money" means—

(a) money raised by the issue before 6th April 2006 of shares in or securities of the trust company, or

(b) money derived from the investment by the trust company of any such money.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

42. VENTURE CAPITAL TRUSTS (RELIEF FROM INCOME TAX)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Schedule 15B to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

43. VENTURE CAPITAL TRUSTS (MEANING OF "INVESTMENTS")

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending the meaning of "investments" for the purposes of approvals, and withdrawals of approvals, under section 842AA of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

44. SECURITIES AND SECURITIES OPTIONS

Resolved,

That—

(1) Section 420 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)(f), at the beginning there shall be inserted "options and".

(3) In subsection (5)(c), at the beginning there shall be inserted "securities".

(4) In subsection (8), in the definition of "securities option", after "acquire securities" there shall be inserted "other than a right to acquire securities which is acquired pursuant to a right or opportunity made available under arrangements the main purpose (or one of the main purposes) of which is the avoidance of tax or national insurance contributions".

(5) The amendments made by this Resolution shall have effect in relation to options acquired on or after 2nd December 2004; but paragraph (4) shall also have effect in relation to an option acquired before that date where something is done on or after that date as part of the arrangements under which it was made available.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

45. PAYE (RETROSPECTIVE NOTIONAL PAYMENTS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for and in connection with facilitating the operation of pay as you earn in relation to notional payments treated by any Act as made before the date on which the Act is passed.

46. ALTERNATIVE FINANCE

Resolved,

That provision may be made—

(a) amending, and permitting amendment of, Chapter 5 of Part 2 of the Finance Act 2005, and

(b) about the treatment of alternative finance arrangements as loans to employees.

47. CORPORATION TAX (NUCLEAR DECOMMISSIONING)

Motion made, and Question put,

That provision may be made amending Chapter 1 of Part 1 of the Energy Act 2004.

Question accordingly agreed to.

48. SECURITISATION COMPANIES

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made about the taxation of securitisation companies.

49. REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUSTS

Resolved,

That provision may be made enabling companies which carry on property rental business to acquire a status that provides certain exemptions and liabilities (in relation to companies and shareholders).

50. OIL (MARKET VALUE)

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to the market value of oil (within the meaning of Part 1 of the Oil Taxation Act 1975).

51. OIL (NOMINATED CONTRACTS AND BLENDED OIL)

Resolved,

That provision may be made—

(a) for allocating blended oil to different fields for the purposes of section 2 of the Oil Taxation Act 1975, and

(b) amending section 61 of and Schedule 10 to the Finance Act 1987.

52. RING FENCE TRADES (RATE OF SUPPLEMENTARY CHARGE)

Motion made, and Question put,

That—

(1) In section 501A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, in subsection (1), for "10 per cent" there shall be substituted "20 per cent".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall have effect in relation to any accounting period beginning on or after 1st January 2006 (but see also paragraph (3)).

(3) For the purpose of calculating the amount of the supplementary charge on a company for an accounting period (a "straddling period") beginning before 1st January 2006 and ending on or after that date—

(a) so much of the straddling period as falls before 1st January 2006, and so much of the straddling period as falls on or after that date, shall be treated as separate accounting periods, and

(b) the company's adjusted ring fence profits for the straddling period shall be apportioned to the two separate accounting periods in proportion to the number of days in those periods.

(4) The amount of the supplementary charge on the company for the straddling period shall be the sum of the amounts of supplementary charge that would, in accordance with paragraph (3), be chargeable on the company for those separate accounting periods.

(5) In the case of a company's straddling period—

(a) the Instalment Payments Regulations shall apply as if the amendment made by paragraph (1) had not been made, but

(b) those Regulations shall also apply separately, in accordance with the following paragraph, in relation to the increase in the amount of any supplementary charge on the company for that period that arises as a result of that amendment.

(6) In that separate application of those Regulations as mentioned in paragraph (5)(b), those Regulations shall have effect as if, for the purposes of those Regulations,—

(a) the straddling period were an accounting period beginning on 1st January 2006,

(b) supplementary charge were chargeable on the company for that period, and

(c) the amount of that charge were equal to the increase in the amount of the supplementary charge for the straddling period that arises as a result of the amendment made by paragraph (1).

(7) Any reference in the Instalment Payments Regulations to the total liability of a company shall, accordingly, be read—

(a) in their application as a result of paragraph (5)(a), as a reference to the amount that would be the company's total liability for the straddling period if the amendment made by paragraph (1) had not been made, and

(b) in their application as a result of paragraph (5)(b), as a reference to the amount of the supplementary charge on the company for the deemed accounting period under paragraph (6)(a).

(8) For the purposes of the Instalment Payments Regulations—

(a) a company shall be regarded as a large company as respects the deemed accounting period under paragraph (6)(a) if (and only if) it is a large company for those purposes as respects the straddling period, and

(b) any question whether a company is a large company as respects the straddling period shall be determined as it would have been determined if the amendment made by paragraph (1) had not been made.

(9) If the Instalment Payments Regulations—

(a) apply in relation to a company's liability to supplementary charge for the deemed accounting period under paragraph (6)(a), and

(b) would (but for this paragraph) treat any instalment payment in respect of that liability as being due and payable on a date falling on or before 22nd March 2006, those Regulations shall have effect as if the payment were due and payable instead at the end of the period of 14 days beginning with that date.

(10) In this Resolution—

(a) "adjusted ring fence profits" has the meaning given by section 501A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988,

(b) "the Instalment Payments Regulations" means the Corporation Tax (Instalment Payments) Regulations 1998,

(c) "supplementary charge" means any sum chargeable under section 501A(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 as if it were an amount of corporation tax.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

Question accordingly agreed to.

53. Ring fence trades (exploration expenditure supplement)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending Schedule 19B to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

54. Inheritance tax (rates and rate bands for years 2008–09 and 2009–10)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for successive substitutions of the Table in Schedule 1 to the Inheritance Tax Act 1984.

55. Inheritance tax (rules for trusts etc)

Resolved,

That provision may be made—

(a) amending provisions of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 relating to settled property, and

(b) amending, in connection with cases where a person's interest in settled property has come to an end, provisions relating to property that, for purposes of that Act, is property subject to a reservation.

56. Inheritance tax (purchase of interests in foreign trusts)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending section 48 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984.

57. Pension schemes etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to pension schemes and similar schemes under which benefits are provided to or in respect of employees or former employees.

58. Stamp duty land tax (thresholds)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 55 of the Finance Act 2003 in subsection (2), in Table A, for "£120,000", in both places, there shall be substituted "£125,000".

(2) In Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 2003, in paragraph 2(3), in Table A, for "£120,000", in both places, there shall be substituted "£125,000".

(3) The amendments made by this Resolution shall have effect in relation to any transaction of which the effective date (within the meaning of Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003) is after 22nd March 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

59. Stamp duty (thresholds)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning with 23rd March 2006 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) In Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1999, in paragraph 4, for "£120,000", in both places, there shall be substituted "£125,000".

(2) The amendment made by this Resolution shall have effect in relation to instruments executed after 22nd March 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

60. Stamp duty land tax (leases)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Schedules 5 and 17A to the Finance Act 2003.

61. Stamp duty land tax (unit trust schemes)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003 shall be amended as follows.

(3) In section 101—

(a) in subsection (1) for "provisions" there shall be substituted "provision", and

(b) in subsection (7) the words from "section 53" to "companies), or" shall be omitted.

(4) This Resolution shall have effect in relation to any land transaction of which the effective date is, or is after, 22nd March 2006 (but see paragraphs (5) and (6)).

(5) This Resolution shall not have effect in relation to—

(a) any land transaction which is effected in pursuance of a contract entered into and substantially performed before 2 p.m. on 22nd March 2006 ("the relevant time"), or

(b) any other land transaction which is effected in pursuance of a contract entered into before the relevant time and which is not an excluded transaction.

(6) For this purpose, a land transaction effected in pursuance of a contract is an excluded transaction if—

(a) any provision of the contract has effect by reference to a unit trust scheme and the scheme is not established before the relevant time,

(b) at or after the relevant time the contract is varied in a way that significantly affects the land transaction (see paragraph (7)),

(c) the subject-matter of the land transaction is not identified in the contract in a way that would have enabled its acquisition before the relevant time,

(d) rights under the contract are assigned at or after the relevant time,

(e) the land transaction is effected in consequence of the exercise, at or after the relevant time, of any option, right of pre-emption or similar right, or

(f) at or after the relevant time there is an assignment, subsale or other transaction (relating to the whole or part of the contract's subject-matter) as a result of which a person other than the purchaser under the contract becomes entitled to call for a conveyance to him.

(7) For the purposes of paragraph (6)(b) the contract is varied in a way that significantly affects the land transaction if (and only if)—

(a) it is varied so as to substitute a different purchaser in relation to the land transaction,

(b) it is varied so as to alter the subject-matter of the land transaction, or

(c) it is varied so as to alter the consideration for the land transaction.

(8) Expressions which are used in Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003 and in this Resolution have the same meaning in this Resolution as in that Part.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

62. STAMP DUTY LAND TAX (ALTERNATIVE FINANCE)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending and supplementing sections 71A to 73 of the Finance Act 2003.

63. RATE OF LANDFILL TAX

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 42 of the Finance Act 1996, for the amount specified in subsection (1)(a), and the corresponding amount specified in subsection (2), there shall be substituted "£21".

(2) This Resolution shall have effect in relation to taxable disposals made, or treated as made, on or after 1st April 2006.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

64. CLIMATE CHANGE LEVY (RATES)

Resolved,

That provision may be made substituting the Table in paragraph 42(1) of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 2000.

65. CLIMATE CHANGE LEVY (ABOLITION OF HALF-RATE SUPPLIES)

Resolved,

That—

(1) For the purposes of climate change levy, no supply made on or after 1st April 2006 shall be a half-rate supply.

(2) Paragraphs (3) to (6) shall have effect for determining when a supply is to be regarded as made for the purposes of paragraph (1).

(3) A supply—

(a) of electricity, or

(b) of gas that is in a gaseous state and is of a kind supplied by a gas utility, is to be regarded as made at the time when the electricity or gas is actually supplied.

(4) In the case of a supply of a taxable commodity not falling within paragraph (3) by a person who is resident in the United Kingdom—

(a) if the commodity is to be removed, the supply is to be regarded as made at the time of the removal,

(b) if the commodity is not to be removed, the supply is to be regarded as made when the commodity is made available to the person to whom it is supplied.

This paragraph shall not apply if paragraph (6) applies in the case of the supply.

(5) In the case of a supply of a taxable commodity not falling within paragraph (3) by a person who is not resident in the United Kingdom, the supply is to be regarded as made—

(a) when the commodity is delivered to the person to whom it is supplied, or

(b) if earlier, when it is made available in the United Kingdom to that person.

This paragraph shall not apply if paragraph (6) applies in the case of the supply.

(6) In any case where, by virtue of paragraph 23(3) of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 2000, a person is, for the purposes of that Schedule, deemed to make a supply to himself of a quantity of a taxable commodity—

(a) which he has produced, and

(b) which does not fall within paragraph (3),

the supply is to be regarded as made at the time when he produced that particular quantity of the taxable commodity.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

66. RELIEF FROM TAX (INCIDENTAL AND CONSEQUENTIAL CHARGES)

Resolved,

That it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to any duty or tax (including charges having retrospective effect) that may arise from provisions designed in general to afford relief from taxation.

PROCEDURE (EVASION OF TOBACCO PRODUCTS DUTY)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may include provision requiring manufacturers of tobacco products not to facilitate smuggling and enabling the imposition of a penalty for breach of that requirement.

PROCEDURE (FILM TAX CREDITS)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provision for tax credits to be paid to film production companies in respect of expenditure on film making activities.

PROCEDURE (INTERNATIONAL TAX ENFORCEMENT ARRANGEMENTS)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provision about arrangements made in relation to any territory or territories outside the United Kingdom and concerning the exchange of information, the recovery of debts or the service of documents relating to taxes imposed under the domestic law of the United Kingdom or taxes imposed under the law of that territory or any of those territories.

PROCEDURE (FUTURE TAXATION)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain the following provisions taking effect in a future year—

(a) provision for corporation tax to be charged for the financial year 2007;

(b) provision amending, or making amendments connected with, section 139 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003;

(c) provision enabling regulations to be made about taxation in respect of income arising from participation in, or the provision of certain services in relation to, the 2012 London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games;

(d) provision in relation to the residence of trustees of settlements;

(e) provision for substituting the Table in Schedule 1 to the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 in relation to chargeable transfers made on or after 6th April 2008 or made on or after 6th April 2009;

(f) provision amending provisions of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 relating to settled property;

(g) provision about the rates of climate change levy.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Darling, Ms Secretary Hewitt, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Secretary Alan Johnson, Secretary Ruth Kelly, Mr. Des Browne, John Healey, Mr. Ivan Lewis and Dawn Primarolo do prepare and bring it in.

FINANCE BILL

Dawn Primarolo accordingly presented a Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties, to amend the law relating to the national debt and the public revenue, and to make further provision in connection with finance: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 161].

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

FINANCIAL SERVICES POLICY

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 15345/05 and Addendum 1, the European Commission's White Paper: Financial Services Policy 2005–2010; and agrees with the UK's five priorities for the future approach to financial services in the EU.

ACCESS TO EUROPEAN DATABASES ON ASYLUM, IMMIGRATION AND VISAS

That this House takes note of European Union Documents No. 15122/05, Commission Communication on improved effectiveness, enhanced interoperability and synergies among European databases in the area of Justice and Home Affairs, and No. 15142/05, Draft Decision on access for consultation of the Visa Information System (VIS) by the authorities of Member States responsible for internal security and by Europol for the purpose of prevention, detection and investigation of terrorist offences and other serious criminal offences; and supports the Government's view that law enforcement access to the VIS may provide useful information that could assist in the course of investigations into specific cases related to serious criminal or terrorist offences, but that this access must be subject to appropriate standards of data protection and that any future legislative proposals, that could be brought forward as a result of Council Document 15122/05, must first be considered carefully, with full consideration given to the impact that they might have on personal privacy.—[Mr. Watts.]

Question agreed to.

WELSH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That—

(1) the matter of the Budget Statement and its implications for Wales, being a matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration;

(2) the Committee shall meet at Westminster on Wednesday 19th April at Nine o'clock and between Two o'clock and Four o'clock to consider the matter of the Budget Statement and its implications for Wales, under Standing Order No. 107 (Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales)).—[Mr. Watts.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to petitions, and the first one—[Interruption.] Order. May I say to the House that we still have business to deal with, and it is not normal to rush out of the Chamber in a crowd? Will hon. Members please resume their seats or leave quietly so that we can get on with our next business in an orderly fashion?

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May we have clarity on whether—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members heard what I just asked them to do. We have more business to get on with. Please will they now leave quietly and in an orderly fashion?

John McDonnell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May we have clarity on whether the House will be dealing with amendments from the Lords on the Civil Aviation Bill tomorrow? If so, those amendments have not yet been published and are therefore not available to Members to amend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I understand it, those matters are not yet put before the House for tomorrow.

PETITIONS

Telecommunications Mast (North Fambridge)

11.2 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I understand that this is the first of a number of petitions to be presented tonight. Although it is on a different topic from those that follow, it is one that my constituents feel very strongly about. It is signed by 582 residents of the village of North Fambridge, which equates to 86.6 per cent. of the registered voters of that village.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of residents North Fambridge, Chelmsford, Essex

Declares that the appeal by Orange Personal Communications Ltd at White House Farm, Ferry Road, North Fambridge, Essex for the installation of a 22 m Monopole with 6 Antenna and 4 Transmission Dishes within a 6 x 6 metre compound is contrary to locally determined planning rules which includes being in a Special Landscape Area and situated between sites of National and International designated nature conservation areas. The application does not take into account the health issues highlighted by the courts, the residents' human rights, the number of children or sensitive people living nearby this proposed site, nor does the application include any response to the precautionary approach as advocated by the Stewart Report and recent Telecommunication Masts (Planning Control) Bill.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons resolves that Her Majesty's Government, as a matter of urgent public importance, freeze this application until the full implications of a Telecommunications Mast of this magnitude are known.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now have several petitions on the same topic and it would be helpful if hon. Members were brief in their contributions, especially after the first one, and did not repeat what had already been said. When they have said what they want to say, I would be grateful if they moved along the Back Benches to put their petitions in the bag as speedily as politeness allows.

Community Hospitals

11.4 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): The presentation of tonight's 44 petitions follows the national community hospitals rally, which took place in Old Palace Yard this afternoon. People from all over England came to Westminster to present their views and tell Ministers about the commitment that they feel to their community hospitals. They want them to be supported.

I wish to present a petition on behalf of the supporters of Hornsea cottage hospital. It declares:

The Petitioners welcome the support for community hospitals in the recent Health White Paper "Our Health, Our Care, Our Say", which recognises the important role of a renewed community hospital network in delivering enhanced local care.

The Petitioners are concerned by the continuing programme of cuts and closures to viable and valued community hospitals since the White Paper.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons shall urge the Department of Health to conduct a swift review of all decisions to reduce or close services.

And the Petitioners remain etc.

I also wish to present petitions with exactly the same wording on behalf of the supporters of Withernsea hospital and of the Beverley Westwood hospital in my constituency.

To lie upon the Table.

11.5 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I wish to present petitions on behalf of the Felixstowe Bartlet and Felixstowe general hospitals and Aldeburgh cottage hospital, all of which were built by public subscription, said to be perfectly safe immediately before the election and told that they were to be closed or halved in size immediately after the election. It is therefore unsurprising that my constituents feel strongly about that. They have used the same wording as the other petitions presented tonight. I believe that the Government, who have not so far done so, should listen to them.

To lie upon the Table.

11.6 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): This is the second time that I have presented a petition to the House on behalf of local residents who are concerned about the future of Surbiton hospital. On the previous occasion, thanks to the good offices of the Surrey Comet, we were able, over a period of two months, to produce a petition signed by more than 7,000 constituents. Thanks to the current exercise, led excellently by Community Hospitals Acting Nationally Together, we have managed to produce a petition with more than 700 signatures in less than a week. I therefore ask leave to present it petition on behalf of my constituents.

To lie upon the Table.

11.7 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I should like to present a petition that is signed by more than 800 of my constituents, expressing their support for the excellent community hospitals in Sudbury—Walnuttree and St. Leonards—and their dismay at the decision of the West Suffolk primary care trust to close those valuable local services in defiance of stated Government policy, in breach of a commitment given only weeks before the general election with the Department of Health's full support, and regardless of the considerable damage that that will inflict on my constituents. The wording of the petitions is the same as those of the other CHANT petitions that have been presented tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I also wish to present on your behalf a petition signed by a large number of your constituents, expressing their support for Hartismere hospital in your constituency.

To lie upon the Table.

11.8 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): I wish to present three petitions on behalf of the Milford on Sea War Memorial hospital, the Fordingbridge hospital and the Lymington hospital. Earlier this year, my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) and I presented to New Forest primary care trust a petition on behalf of all our hospitals signed by some 45,000 residents.

To lie upon the Table.

11.8 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I wish to present two more petitions on behalf of the Fenwick hospital, Lyndhurst and the Hythe hospital on the waterside, in identical terms to the other CHANT petitions presented tonight. I am pleased to add that, as a result of the large petition that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) described, it has been decreed that the five hospitals in New Forest, West, New Forest, East and Romsey are scheduled for reprieve. We wait to see whether that will occur.

To lie upon the Table.

11.9 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I should like to present the petitions of the friends and supporters of four cottage hospitals in my constituency: Cobham and Oxshott community hospital; Molesey hospital; Thames Ditton hospital at Emberbrook; and Walton community hospital. At present, none of those hospitals is threatened with closure, although there continues to be great uncertainty about Emberbrook, but 3,600 of my constituents have signed the petitions. They have noted the Secretary of State's recent words in the House that community facilities that are needed for the long term must not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures.

I present these petitions, which have identical wording to the other CHANT petitions presented tonight, in the hope that the Secretary of State will listen to the urgent requests for security from those of my constituents who have signed them.

To lie upon the Table.

11.10 pm

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): In the light of your instruction, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and of the state of my voice, I shall very briefly express my pleasure at presenting the petition on behalf of the supporters of the Cossham Memorial hospital, Kingswood. It is expressed in terms identical to the other petitions on community hospitals presented here this evening.

To lie upon the Table.

11.10 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): I wish to present two petitions. I present the first on behalf of the Edenbridge War Memorial hospital in my constituency, where more than one third of the beds have been closed as a result of the Government's financial policies towards the South West Kent primary care trust. I present the second petition on behalf of the Tonbridge cottage hospital, where half the beds have now been closed as a result of the Government's policies. In reflection of the dismay of my constituents, I wish to present these petitions to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I rise to present a petition on behalf of the supporters of Weybridge hospital. The hospital was completely rebuilt in the 1990s at public expense. Since then, it has been generously supported by the friends of Weybridge hospital, who have organised this petition, which is worded in identical terms to the other petitions presented tonight.

To lie upon the Table.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): I rise to present four petitions worded in identical terms to those already enunciated tonight. The first is on behalf of the Penrith and Eden community hospital; the second is on behalf of Wigton community hospital; the third is on behalf of the League of Friends of the Ruth Lancaster James hospital in Alston, in the Pennines; and the fourth is on behalf of the Brampton and District War Memorial cottage hospital. These petitions have been signed by a small representative sample of the 69,381 signatures that we have collected on a petition that covers all the hospitals in Cumbria. We believe that that sets a record for people of Cumbria of all persuasions, from all areas, and of all political parties and of none, being united in asking that our community hospitals be not only saved but put at the heart of the Government's new strategy of care in the community and of a regenerated and enhanced local care network.

To lie upon the Table.

11.13 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I rise to present petitions, in identical form to the others that have been presented this evening, on behalf of Ludlow community hospital and Bishop's Castle community hospital. The petition on Bishop's Castle hospital contains 1,917 names, and I should like to remind the House that, in January, I presented petitions with more than 22,000 names on behalf of Ludlow community hospital and Bridgenorth community hospital, following a march of more than 8,000 people through the streets of Ludlow and Bridgenorth in support of the continuation of their community hospitals.

To lie upon the Table.

11.13 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I rise to present a petition on behalf of the supporters of Romsey hospital in Hampshire, who also raised more than £1 million in 2000 to improve and preserve the hospital. I should also like to pay tribute to the leagues of friends of Romsey hospital and the hospitals in the New Forest, which are working together to ensure that any further threat of closure is robustly challenged.

To lie upon the Table.

11.14 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I wish to present what could be the largest so far of the petitions physically presented tonight, with 4,133 supporters. It concerns the minor injuries unit at Buxton cottage hospital, which is currently unable to provide a 24-hour service as it would wish. The petition is of identical wording to the other CHANT petitions presented tonight. It is presented in the hope and expectation that a full 24-hour service will be resumed, and that the cottage hospital will carry on its role in the future.

To lie upon the Table.

11.14 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I wish to present the petition of the friends and supporters of the Macclesfield district general hospital, the East Cheshire NHS trust and its satellite community hospitals. Those are popular, supported and viable hospitals, and it is important that the Government take heed of the views of people who use them. The wording of the petition is identical to that of the other CHANT petitions presented tonight.

To lie upon the Table.

11.15 pm

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): I wish to present a petition expressed in identical terms to those presented earlier this evening, on behalf of the "save our wards" campaign in Congleton, which was set up to support valuable services at the Macclesfield district general hospital, the East Cheshire NHS trust, and at the Congleton War Memorial hospital, which was built by private subscription following the great war. My constituents value the services at both those hospitals and wish to see no more cuts.

To lie upon the Table.

11.16 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I want to present a petition on behalf of the supporters of Newmarket community hospital. It follows a series of meetings and a march of 1,000 people. The petition has identical wording to other CHANT petitions presented tonight, but is also a recognition of the view of the people of Newmarket that closing down facilities in their much-loved community hospital does not add in any way, but quite the reverse, to patient care.

To lie upon the Table.

11.16 pm

Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): On behalf of Millom community hospital, Mary Hewetson hospital in Keswick, the Maryport Victorian cottage hospital, the Cockermouth cottage hospital and the Workington community hospital, I wish to present petitions in identical terms to those presented earlier. It is a matter of fact that my health area has received an increase in funding of almost 100 per cent. since 1997. Those cottage hospitals are essential to the newly announced £100 million-plus acute hospital in the area. I want to place on record my thanks not only to the leagues of friends of the various hospitals but to Ministers who have helped me with this and other issues relating to the health economy in my area, and to the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority, which has recently invested £18 million in those hospitals.

To lie upon the Table.

11.17 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I wish to present petitions, in similar terms to those already presented, on behalf of Bradford on Avon, Trowbridge, Warminster and Westbury community hospitals in my constituency. I do so in the hope that, having noted the Secretary of State's fine words in the White Paper earlier this year in support of community hospitals, she will see fit to act on those words.

To lie upon the Table.

11.17 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I wish to present petitions on behalf of my constituents and the league of friends of Tetbury hospital trust and Fairford hospital. Those hospitals were built with private subscriptions, they have both been open for well over a century, and my constituents ask that the Government honour their election manifesto by supporting and keeping open community hospitals.

To lie upon the Table.

11.18 pm

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): I wish to present petitions relating to the Townlands hospital in Henley and, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Chipping Norton War Memorial hospital. I hope that if and when any of the hospitals concerned are reprieved, as they ought to be if the Government stick by their earlier pledges in the House, the whole campaign will stick together and fight on regardless until Townlands and others are safe.

To lie upon the Table.

Brain Cancer (Children)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts.]

11.19 pm

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): Thomas Archer died in his father's arms on 30 October 2005. Thomas, who lived a few streets away from me in Rugby, was a little over two years old, and died of a brain tumour.

In July last year, Thomas became ill and displayed several symptoms that caused his parents concern, including substantial loss of balance. Twice during that month they took him to their local general practitioner's surgery, and twice an ear infection was diagnosed. Antibiotics were prescribed, but Thomas did not get better. Just before the family left for a holiday in France, Thomas was taken to an out-of-hours GP's surgery because his parents were still worried. Again, they were told that there was nothing to worry about. By that point three doctors had diagnosed mild illness, and all three were wrong.

A few days after arriving in France, Thomas was taken to see a French doctor who recommended further tests. Scans revealed a life-threatening medullablastoma in his brain, which was removed the following day. Thomas returned home, but although he appeared to be making a good recovery while subject to chemotherapy, his parents were told on 14 October that his cancer had spread throughout his brain and spinal cord. Thomas died just over two weeks later, some three months after the brain tumour had been diagnosed.

Thomas's parents, George and Karen Archer, who are sitting in the Public Gallery, are determined that some good should come of their son's death, and it is due primarily to their courage and determination that I sought this debate. Karen and George have already managed to raise over £15,000 for the children's brain tumour research centre at Nottingham university. I pay tribute to them for that, and for what they have already done to raise awareness of this terrible condition. I also pay tribute to their friends and neighbours who did so much to make Thomas's last weeks special, even bringing forward Christmas when it became clear that he would not live to see it, putting up decorations early and arranging for artificial snow to cover the street where Thomas lived.

Thomas was not, of course, the only child to die of a brain tumour last year. Approximately 100 do so every year, and such cancers are now the cause of more childhood deaths than any other disease. The House has debated this important issue before, to the credit of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who, I am pleased to say, is in his place this evening. He secured an Adjournment debate on the subject on 26 April 2004. I am indebted to him for the speech that he made on that occasion, and also to other hon. Members whose contributions highlighted the many aspects of treatment and support that children with brain tumours, and their parents and carers, so desperately need.

I do not intend to repeat the points made then, but I commend the report of the debate to all with an interest in the subject. As my hon. Friend said,

"the issue of children with brain tumours is under-debated, under-reported and underfunded."

It was, and it remains so.

Replying to the debate, the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), recognised that these matters had been little considered, and said

"I hope that opportunities can be found further to debate them in coming months because they clearly need to be explored."—[Official Report, 26 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 721–25.]

I regret to say that there have been no such opportunities for childhood brain cancers to be debated until tonight.

I do not seek to suggest that no progress has been made in the treatment of cancer generally, or that this debate should be used to condemn the NHS for failing Thomas Archer. I do, however, wish to mention two respects in which I believe that improvements may be made in terms of this highly distressing condition.

First, there is the need to identify childhood brain tumours at an early stage more often. I recognise the great difficulty of diagnosing such conditions, the symptoms of which may be almost indistinguishable from those of other much less serious illnesses, and I cannot judge the general practitioners who failed to do so in the case of Thomas Archer. The fact remains, however, that a French doctor detected brain cancer where three British doctors did not, and, regardless of blame, we should investigate the reasons for that. I hope the Minister will be spurred by this case to think again about what enhancements to the education and awareness of, in particular, family doctors may be necessary.

Secondly, on the importance of effective research, the Minister will know that the NHS spends less on brain cancers than on other cancers, leaving a gap to be filled by the voluntary sector. That, too, is a problem. I understand that national cancer charities spend less than 4 per cent. of their annual research budgets on all forms of childhood cancer. Of course, I understand that the NHS in its current financial state cannot provide limitless resources for the funding of research into childhood brain cancers or, indeed, anything else. We must hope that some of the health research fund that the Chancellor announced in the Budget finds its way to such research. I understand too that, given the relatively small number of childhood cancers compared with adult cancers, there is bound to be a discrepancy in funding, although that compounds the problem, as pharmaceutical companies are also reluctant to invest for the same reason.

There is, however, something practical that the Government can do to help without the need for substantial extra resources. If we look to medical science to provide new treatments for brain cancer in children, the worst thing that we can do is to put obstacles in the path of medical scientists. The strong view of the consultant who treated Thomas Archer is that the implementation of the European clinical trials directive has damaged such medical research.

I readily concede that the serious injuries recently caused to one group of volunteers shows the need for some regulation of clinical trials, but it is vital that regulation does not become counter-productive. A recent editorial in the British Medical Journal by two Finnish researchers, discussing the impact of the directive Europe-wide, said:

"at the outset many investigators were worried that the labour-intensive, bureaucratic and expensive endeavour of running a clinical trial would become worse. In particular, academic researchers funded by grants, who have so far performed most oncology trials, were worried that their resources might no longer suffice to meet the requirements of the new directive. A recent analysis of research since the directive suggests that many of those fears have been realised".

The authors were referring to a report by the European Organisation for Research and Treatment of Cancer, which showed that clinical trial costs increased by 85 per cent. and that insurance costs doubled, following the coming into force of the directive, resulting in a 63 per cent. reduction in the number of new trials between 2004 and 2005.

Those who suffer from childhood brain cancers cannot afford a reduction in research—they need more of it to be done—so I hope that the Minister will look again at the effect in the UK of the clinical trials directive and cut back on the paperwork, which is costing researchers too many precious hours that could be so much better spent. If those researchers can save more time, they can save more lives.

I ask the Minister to meet the doctors at the Children's Brain Tumour Research Centre, so that she can hear directly from them about the problems that they face. So we are having this debate tonight because Thomas Archer died, but we are also having this debate so that others with the same condition may live. We all share that objective, and I ask the Minister to do all that she can to bring it about.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): First, I declare an interest: my son is a neurosurgeon in London.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) both on securing the debate and on the excellent and measured way in which he presented his speech tonight. He has made his case.

We cannot begin to imagine the heartache of those with children taken with a tumour. All hon. Members in the House tonight join my hon. Friend in sending condolences to his constituents who lost their child, Thomas, and we join my hon. Friend in congratulating them on what they are doing to fight to stop others suffering as they did.

My constituents C.A. of Benfleet wrote to me to say that their son died of brain tumour, and they were glad that MPs—certainly all those in the Chamber tonight—were fighting to help to get better research and treatment. They went on to say:

"So many young people seem to get brain tumours and they deserve the chance of life".

They are right. The evidence shows that the number of cases of childhood brain and spinal cancers has doubled in the past 30 years. We need to know why and to solve that problem.

If I may digress for a moment, one thing is for certain: removing, or causing the removal of, excellent cancer centres that are working well, such as that in Southend-on-Sea, is part of the problem and will not be part of the solution.

I want to raise tonight the specific issue of the palliative care of children with life-limiting tumours. I must first praise the children's hospice movement and the work of the Association of Children's Hospices and its wonderful chief executive, Barbara Gelb. Although I acknowledge that many parents want their children to be at home with them during what is a very difficult time, the children's hospice movement provides excellent respite care and support and enables families to go through this terribly difficult process with some dignity.

The Prime Minister said two weeks ago in this House that the Government are looking at ways to improve the funding of palliative care. Children's hospices in particular need help urgently. They get so little, and many get no NHS funding at all. Their lottery money is running out, and beds will be lost and wonderful care and assets wasted unless the Government act now. Will the Minister write to me explaining how the children's hospice movement's loss of lottery funds will be replaced in the short term, and what longer-term funding structures for hospices the Department of Health is considering? I know that she cares deeply about these matters and will want fair play for these very poorly little angels.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): I rise to congratulate the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) on securing this debate this evening, following as it does the debate initiated just under two years ago by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), through which this important issue was brought before the House for the first time.

I want to draw to my hon. Friend the Minister's attention the continuing work of the Ellie Savage memorial trust in my part of the country. Ellie Savage was a young girl, a constituent of mine, who sadly died from a brain tumour. In her memory, her family formed this charity. To date, it has raised more than £150,000 and it is using that money to fund a three-year research project into new ways of treating glioblastoma multiform, a most aggressive form of brain cancer from which Ellie sadly died. The trust is also piloting a rehabilitation programme in partnership with Addenbrooke's hospital. It is the first to recognise that although children who are recovering from brain tumours may have overcome the tumour itself, they can be left with devastating deficits. The trust wants to educate the schools and families of those children, so that they are best able to support them.

The trust exists primarily to give financial support to families who suffer this tragedy. It is a question not only of caring for the suffering child, but of the unpaid leave that is sometimes involved in caring for siblings. The trust supports those families, including with travelling expenses.

What the Ellie Savage memorial trust is asking for from the Government is more support for the research to which the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth referred, and that they also encourage primary care trusts to work in partnership with such voluntary organisations, particularly on rehabilitation. PCTs should be embracing these voluntary bodies and supporting them; that way, together, we can give these families some hope.

John Bercow: I follow colleagues in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) on raising this issue in terms that were measured, responsible and dignified, yet at the same time quietly passionate.

I should like, if I may, briefly to make a number of other points. First, there is now a substantial body of serious research that suggests that a combination of radiotherapy and the use of temozolomide can significantly enhance survival rates for patients newly diagnosed with glioblastoma. Ministers need to take account of that fact, to which they need to respond.

Secondly, Roy Rampling, professor of neuro-oncology at the Western Infirmary in Glasgow is one of 36 consultants and specialists who have written to the Secretary of State for Health to argue that the use of temozolomide and carmustine implants is effective and represents value for money. They are challenging the judgment of the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, which has made a preliminary recommendation against the use of such treatments. They, with their expertise, believe that is wrong.

Thirdly, and finally, we have to take account of the views of those experts. Professor Rampling believes that the treatments to which I referred represent the biggest breakthroughs in the treatment of brain tumours in 30 years. We are entitled to ask the Minister, in the most sincere terms, why between two and three times as many people are being treated with temozolomide in Canada, France, Germany, Italy and Spain. Their doctors obviously think it makes sense.

My appeal to the Minister is that she will consider the possibility that a wrong judgment has been made, keep an open mind, and listen to the evidence. Could there be a better way for her to do so than to come before a meeting of the all-party group on brain tumours, of which I am privileged to be chairman, where she could hear the arguments from those infinitely more expert than I will ever be and be offered the opportunity to respond?

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) on securing the debate, which has highlighted the tragic case of Thomas Archer and the courage and determination of his parents. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to express my deepest sympathy to them. The fact that we have quite a crowded Adjournment debate shows the importance attached to the issue.

Before I turn to the some of the specific points that the hon. Gentleman made, I shall provide some background information about cancers among children. In the difficult circumstances of the debate, this is difficult to say but, thankfully, cancer in children is rare and there have been remarkable improvements in survival rates over the past 30 years. Some of that improvement has been due to technical advances and the centralisation of care in specialist centres, as well as the hard work of clinicians and researchers. Seventy-five per cent. of children with cancer can now be cured, but I recognise that although survival rates for children diagnosed with brain tumours have improved in recent years, they are not, as the hon. Gentleman said, as high as for some other childhood cancers.

The hon. Gentleman gave an extremely moving account of what happened to Thomas Archer. I hope he will understand that it is extremely difficult for me to talk about individual cases, but I can assure him that I certainly recognise the need to ensure that the signs and symptoms of cancer are picked up as soon as possible so that a quick and accurate diagnosis can be made. To put that in context, a GP will see on average only one child under 15 with cancer every 20 years, yet they will see many children each week with a wide variety of symptoms that could be cancer. It is important to recognise that they have a difficult job to do. In April 2000, we tried to support GPs in that respect by issuing "Referral guidelines for suspected cancer", which aimed to help them to identify patients, including children, who were likely to have cancer and so required urgent assessment.

After the debate in 2004—I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) for initiating it—the guidelines were updated by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence and reissued in June 2005. That had been raised during the debate. The guidelines include a section on cancers in children and young people and specifically try to address the signs and symptoms of brain tumours. The Healthcare Commission is currently consulting on how to ensure that those standards are implemented across the country, so that there is consistency. I fully appreciate that that will not be of comfort to Thomas's parents at this point, but I hope that it shows that action is in hand to ensure that GPs are alert to possible symptoms of cancer in children and are able to act accordingly.

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth also raised the issue of research into brain tumours. Again, that issue was raised in the 2004 debate. My Department has established the national cancer research network, which considers specialist research work on paediatric oncology. The network has a dedicated brain tumour group, which is currently running a range of studies on the diagnosis and treatment of brain tumours in children. Separately, my Department funds the childhood cancer research group at Oxford university, which maintains the national registry of childhood tumours. That is the largest population-based childhood cancer registry in the world. The Department also supports a senior clinical research fellow at Birmingham university to study a comparison of magnetic resonance spectroscopy and tumour genetics in childhood brain tumours.

I know that we can always argue for more research into particular cancers, but I hope that I have been able to give some reassurance that particular research into childhood brain tumours is being carried out. Research into other childhood tumours can help our understanding in this area, too. I assure the hon.

Gentleman that I will ensure that the National Cancer Research Institute is aware of the points that hon. Members have made.

In addition, the hon. Gentleman raised some concerns about the clinical trials directive. As he acknowledged, it is important that we have in place proper protection for those participating in clinical trials, because of the risk that the trials may pose to individuals. I can assure him that we will assess the effects of implementing the directive, including a consideration of whether it is over-bureaucratic, as soon as reliable evidence is available. I will certainly take up his offer to meet the doctors he mentioned.

The hon. Member for Buckingham expressed concern about NICE's preliminary recommendations, in December, on the use of carmustine implants and Temodal in the treatment of newly diagnosed high-grade glioma. Those recommendations were subject to a period of consultation, which ended on 1 February, and NICE's final recommendations are, as he said, expected to be published in August 2006. Those final recommendations can be appealed. NICE is an independent body, which we rely on to produce clinical and cost-effective guidance to the NHS—based on the latest available evidence and having considered the comments that it receives during consultation. It is difficult for Ministers to comment on some of these issues, but I will certainly take up his offer to meet the group that he talked about. As I have said, the recommendation is not the final one and, in the meantime, primary care trusts have the discretion to fund the treatments outwith the final recommendations.

Points have been raised in the debate about the way in which services for children with brain cancer are organised and staffed. Again, those points built on some of the issues raised in the 2004 debate. In August 2005, NICE produced service guidance on how the NHS could improve services for children and young people with cancer, including those with brain tumours. The national cancer director has established a group, which he co-chairs with the national children's director, to help to implement the guidance. The group will certainly consider several of the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), especially the need for members of the voluntary and charitable sector, such as the Ellie Savage memorial trust, to work with the NHS. I assure my hon. Friend that I will ensure that the two co-chairs of the group are aware of the ideas that he put forward in the debate so that they can examine them closely.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) raised the issue of children's hospices. I am sure that he is aware that we made a number of commitments in our manifesto on how to increase palliative care, and we will make further announcements on the matter, including on children's hospices. I am well aware of the point that he raised and certainly undertake to write to him about it.

I hope that I have been able to give some reassurance to hon. Members who have spoken in the debate and, indeed, to Thomas's parents, who, as the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth said, have been campaigning, raising money and trying to raise awareness. It is tribute to everyone who has spoken in the debate that they have added to that awareness campaign. There is certainly still more than we need to do to improve services for children with brain tumours, but we have set in train several actions, which have arisen because of points that hon. Members have made in the House previously. I hope that those actions will bring about change in an area that anyone who has heard the debate will realise is extremely important and something that still tragically affects too many children and, of course, their parents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes to Midnight.

DEEPCUT REVIEW

Resolved,

That an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, That she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the Report of a review by Nicholas Blake QC of the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four soldiers at Princess Royal Barracks, Deepcut, between 1995 and 2002.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Asia

1. Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to co-ordinate international aid and development in Asia. [61825]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): The Department remains at the forefront of efforts to improve the effectiveness, quality and co-ordination of aid to Asia. Earlier this month, we successfully hosted a major international conference to chart the development partnerships that are needed with Asian Governments and civil society. Later this year, we will take part in a further, smaller seminar specifically focused on aid effectiveness in the region.

Mr. Khabra: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. What part of the development budget is allocated to primary school education in India?

Mr. Thomas: First, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's continued advocacy of investment in development assistance for India. He is right that more progress is needed in getting every child into primary school, and he may be aware that we, in partnership with the World Bank and the European Commission, have committed some £210 million to India's primary education drive. He will also be pleased to hear that the number of children in India who do not go to school has fallen from some 25 million in 2003 to 9.6 million in November 2005. We have made progress, but there is more that we need to do.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): Inward investment and export-driven growth have lifted 500 million people in Asia out of poverty, yet the area remains home to two thirds of the world's poor, with dramatic wealth disparities. Many people in Asia are concerned that they are ignored in preference to Africa. The UN Development Programme believes that the solution is greater regional co-operation, but a DFID report criticised the Asian Development Bank for being too centralised and poorly co-ordinated. What is the Minister doing to strengthen DFID's support for region-wide initiatives on matters such as water, transport, disease, disaster preparedness, corruption and drug trafficking, which all play a part in exacerbating and perpetuating poverty in Asia?

Mr. Thomas: As I mentioned in my answer to the original question, we hosted a major international conference, attended by more than 150 Asian Ministers, senior officials and representatives of business and civil society, which was opened by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Pakistan's Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz. Its aim was precisely to talk through the challenges that still have to be met if the millennium development goals in Asia are to be achieved. It looked at what has been successful over the past 10 years, and at the further challenges ahead. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that, at that conference, we committed some $50 million to try to catalyse further investment in infrastructure projects in Asia. We continue to work on supporting Pakistan's anti-corruption strategy and further efforts to improve public financial management across the region. We are already doing a lot to support tackling the governance problems to which he rightly alluded, but he will know that the challenges facing us with poverty in Asia mean that all donors have to do more.

Nigeria

2. Mr. Shahid Malik (Dewsbury) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of Nigeria's debt repayment programme on its poverty reduction strategy and economy. [61826]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The October 2005 Paris Club agreement with Nigeria—which the Nigerian Government pushed for—represents the largest debt-relief deal ever in sub-Saharan Africa. The UK alone will cancel £2.8 billion and the Government of Nigeria will use part of its oil windfall to pay off the remaining debt. The savings from the deal will free up at least an additional $1 billion a year for Nigeria to spend on reducing poverty, and will help employ an extra 120,000 teachers and enable 3.5 million children to go to school.

Mr. Malik: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. There is speculation in certain quarters that Britain is a net beneficiary of Nigeria's debt repayment programme. Will he confirm or deny that that is the case, and offer clarification?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend is right: two thirds of Nigeria's debt will be written off, and the remaining third will be paid back at a discount. The UK will receive £1.7 billion as a result, but I emphasise that the Government of Nigeria asked for this deal, and pressed for it. Nigeria will make a one-off payment but will receive a continuing long-term benefit. As a result, it will make the savings of $1 billion in the first year to which I have referred already. That money will go on further investment in health, education, water, power, agriculture and public works. Frankly, it would have been impossible for Nigeria to have secured such a deal two years ago, as the world would not have agreed it. That is a testament to the country's efforts at reform.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that Nigeria ranks close to the bottom of Transparency International's index of corruption. What independent studies has DFID commissioned on the effectiveness of our aid to countries where there is a high level of corruption? How do such assessments affect decisions about where we target our aid resources?

Hilary Benn: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in these matters, as his ten-minute Bill yesterday demonstrated. We base our assessments on the situation in different countries and we adjust the way in which we give our aid according to the outcome of the assessment. Corruption has indeed been a big problem in Nigeria for a long time, but the Government have begun to take action and the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission has launched a number of investigations that have resulted in the prosecution of high-ranking politicians and others. They have also reformed their public expenditure management.

Due to that process of reform Nigeria was able to persuade the Paris Club and the international community to back the debt deal, which is an international acknowledgement of the efforts that Nigeria has begun to make. Furthermore, Nigeria is one of the strongest supporters of the extractive industries transparency initiative and I welcome that enormously.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as well as Nigeria's ability to reform further its Government institutions, which we are seeing, the paramount factor in the country's development will be its ability to grow its own private sector?

Hilary Benn: I agree. One of the ways to encourage private sector investment to Nigeria is to tackle corruption. If investors are faced with the choice between a country where corruption is endemic and a country where it has been tackled, it is not surprising if they choose to invest the money where they will not have to pay bribes.

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): I understand that the Chancellor said that there are technical reasons why the British Government cannot reduce Nigeria's debt. Can the right hon. Gentleman explain what they are and is he committed to overcoming them?

Hilary Benn: I am not sure that I follow the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, because in fact we are contributing to reducing Nigeria's debt by having agreed to the deal as part of the Paris Club. If, as may be the case, the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Export Credits Guarantee Department, he is aware that it has an obligation to break even on its activities and to recover debt owed to it. It might help the hon. Gentleman to know that Dr. Mansur Muhtar, the director general of the debt management office in Nigeria, said:

> "This deal represents a once in a lifetime opportunity to rid ourselves of the shackles of our accumulated debts and, as a country, start anew ... It is our second declaration of independence. It is worthy of celebration."

That is the view in Nigeria and that is why we supported the deal.

Drought (East Africa)

3. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): What steps his Department is taking to assist drought victims in east Africa. [61827]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): This is the worst drought in east Africa for more than a decade, with potentially devastating consequences. We have been responding for several months and the priorities now are water, food and supplementary feeding for malnourished children. Our contribution so far stands at £35.9 million, which makes us the second biggest bilateral donor after the United States of America.

Mr. Love: Sadly, we have been here before. Not only does the horn of Africa suffer from drought, as my right hon. Friend indicated, but even in good times people do not have the level of income that prevents them from going hungry. Will my right hon. Friend say how he sees us dealing with some of the longer-term problems so that we address both the drought and the lack of income for many people living in the horn of Africa?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Our first practical and moral obligation is to make sure that people do not die, which is why we are making those efforts, in particular in Kenya, where we are most worried about the situation, but also in southern Ethiopia and southern Somalia, where access is extremely difficult. Many people live on the margins year in and year out, and it does not take much to tip them over the edge, so as well as providing assistance, we need to look at ways in which we can help people to get established again. That is why we have been pioneering the safety nets programme in southern Ethiopia, which I saw for myself when I was there just under two months ago, whereby we give cash as well as food, because although most of the cash is spent on food, some of it can be saved; for example, to buy back the plough that had to be sold, to buy fertiliser or seeds, or clothes for the children. When I talked to farmers in the region, I realised the difference the programme was making to their lives. The international community needs to do both to enable people to cope.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Could the Secretary of State tell us what money has been released from the central emergency response fund for the crisis in east Africa? Given the extent of that and other crises, what efforts are being made to persuade donor countries other than the UK to build up to the CERF target of $500 million?

Hilary Benn: First, I welcome the hon. Lady to her new position as the Liberal spokesperson. As she will have discovered already, it is a wonderful job and a privilege to speak on these matters, and I wish her well in her post.

CERF has already given $13.5 million in response to the crisis, and we hope that it will provide $30 million in total to start with. I was present in New York for the launch of CERF, and to see 36 countries, including some that had not committed to the fund before, contributing $257 million, which is the total that we have got so far, was very gratifying. The fund has already proven its worth by responding immediately to the crisis, and we are doing all that we can, as well as playing our part by being a generous donor, to encourage other donors around the world to understand the nature of the crisis in the horn of Africa and to contribute accordingly.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is aware of my concern about east Africa, particularly in relation to Kenya, that development assistance ends up going through different organisations either to the Kenyan Government or to be blocked by the Kenyan Government. What is my right hon. Friend's Department doing to ensure that funds that are intended for the poorest people in that country are not blocked by a corrupt Government?

Hilary Benn: In relation to humanitarian assistance in Kenya, we are working through UN agencies and non-governmental organisations. They are tried and trusted partners, and we know that the money will go to the people who are intended to benefit from it. As for our broader development assistance, as my hon. Friend will be aware, we do not give direct budget support in Kenya, precisely because of the risks of corruption. We provide support to the education system, where, because of a change that the Government have made, money goes direct from the central budget to the budget of individual schools and the allocations are written on blackboards outside the schools, so that parents can see where the money has gone. In relation to the global fund, there is still some further work to do, and it is a subject that my hon. Friend and I have discussed before.

Darfur

4. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Darfur. [61828]

5. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Darfur. [61829]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The humanitarian situation in Darfur has stabilised, owing to the massive relief effort, but it is still fragile. Security, especially in west Darfur, has got worse in recent months, which is hampering relief efforts. There is a danger that the improvements made in 2005 will be reversed. The UK remains at the forefront of efforts to provide humanitarian assistance. We are the second biggest donor, and we are providing considerable support to the African Union mission. At the peace talks in Abuja, we are pressing for a political solution that will allow people to return home and rebuild their lives.

Mr. Mackay: As the United Nations describes the western region of Darfur as having the worst humanitarian crisis anywhere in the world at present, should we not all hold our heads in shame because we have not done more to ensure security in that area? Much as I would welcome the African Union playing the principal role in Darfur, was it not unrealistic not to have given it more assistance earlier?

Hilary Benn: If any hon. Member was one of the 1.8 million people living in the refugee camps who tonight, as last night and tomorrow night, must stay there because they cannot go home, he or she may well be inclined to share the view that the right hon. Gentleman expresses. This is a test for the international community, and the fact is that the world has not done enough to protect the people of Darfur. The African Union mission went in to provide support. We were the first country in the world to provide it with help. I committed a further £20 million when I was in Darfur a month ago, and I hope that, as on other issues that we have discussed today, other countries will play their part, but I came to the view some time ago that the only long-term solution was for the United Nations to take over the mission. That is why we have pressed so hard for that to happen, and why I welcome the peace and security council's decision to carry on with planning. I hope that the Government of Sudan will co-operate with that.

Tony Baldry: With ethnic cleansing, upwards of 180,000 people murdered, 1.8 million men, women and children wretchedly displaced in camps, the security situation deteriorating and the Janjaweed still armed and active, the main responsibility for that tragic situation lies with the Government of Sudan. What is the UN sanctions committee doing? What is the UN Security Council doing to make it clear to those in Khartoum that, simply because they have oil, they cannot continue to behave like political pariahs with impunity?

Hilary Benn: I share the hon. Gentleman's frustration. As he will be aware, we pressed very hard as the United Kingdom for the sanctions committee to be established. Not every member of the Security Council was keen to do that, as we and one or two other countries were. It has now been working for a number of months, and a second report has just been produced. I hope that a conclusion will now be found, because where evidence exists that individuals—whether the rebels or representatives of the Government of Sudan, including the military—have done things in breach of commitments that they have entered into, it is essential that the international community demonstrates that we meant to take action when we set up the sanctions committee and that people begin to see that there is a price to pay as individuals if they fail to do the things that they promised to do.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware that in the talks in Abuja significant progress has been made with regard to both power sharing and wealth sharing, but the issue of security is the sticking point. Is there not a strong case for him, with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, to put significant pressure on those Governments who are against the United Nations coming into Sudan? Unless those Governments change their minds, progress will be somewhat slower than we all want.

Hilary Benn: I know that my hon. Friend, as chair of the all-party group on Sudan, takes a close interest in all these matters and I agree with him. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was, of course, in Abuja just over a month ago to do precisely that. We have been working very hard to persuade those in the African Union who have reservations—it is principally the Government of Sudan; frankly, I have to say, because they lack insight into their condition—and who are responsible for what has been going on for the past three years. However, I welcome the fact that the peace and security council agreed to carry on with planning. It is important that that planning takes place so that a transfer to the United Nations can happen as quickly as possible.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): May I draw the House's attention to the fact that the Government's response to the International Development Committee's report "Darfur: the killing continues" is published tomorrow? I welcome that, but will the Secretary of State acknowledge that, if we are to get security and normality back into Darfur—meaning getting people back on the land—we need not just the African Union, but the United Nations and the Government of Sudan to work together to achieve that. In that context, does he not agree that it was perhaps inappropriate to give comfort to Salah Abdullah Gosh, the head of intelligence in Sudan, by granting a visa for medical treatment in this country, and that the Sudanese Government should know that, until they solve this problem, they are not welcome anywhere?

Hilary Benn: The decision was taken for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman refers to. The visa was granted because of a medical condition. I do not see any incompatibility between that decision, on an individual case, for reasons of medical need, and being absolutely clear, as we have been as a Government, about what the Government of Sudan now need to do to bring the crisis to an end.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be a long-term solution in Darfur only when all parties are willing to negotiate seriously? Is he also aware that that has not happened in the past? What is his assessment of the situation at the moment? Are all parties, including the rebels, negotiating seriously?

Hilary Benn: The talks in Abuja have been going on for two years and they have not reached an agreement. The rebels bear part of the responsibility for not having engaged in those talks with the seriousness that the situation demands. I welcome the fact that, following my discussions in Khartoum a month ago, the Government of Sudan said that they would bring forward new proposals for those negotiations. What the world now wants to see and, above all, what people in Darfur want to see, is those talks reaching a conclusion so that a deal can be done.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Following the adoption of United Nations Security Council resolution 1663 last Friday and the deteriorating humanitarian situation building up on the Chad-Sudan border, does the Secretary of State accept that it is critically important that we beef up the logistical capacity of the African Union forces stationed there, if the international community's much-vaunted adoption last year of the responsibility to protect is to have any real meaning at all?

Hilary Benn: I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman. That is why Britain is committing a further £20 million to support the AU mission and why we have already provided logistical assistance—we have provided getting on for 900 vehicles to give the AU mission greater capacity to get around in Darfur—and why I still hope that the African Union will be able to find further troops in the interim, before the United Nations comes in.

Mr. Mitchell: Is the House not right to be restless and angry at the languid approach that the various Sudanese parties are taking towards the peace talks in Abuja, which are now in their seventh round? Will the Secretary of State ensure that the British Government's considerable clout and authority, through their involvement and concern at what is happening in Darfur, are used to put the maximum pressure on all the parties engaged in Abuja to speed up the talks?

Hilary Benn: Once again I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary did precisely that when he went to Abuja to say, in effect, "We're running out of patience." We have since seen a greater intensity in negotiations, but, in the end, it is only the rebels and the Government of Sudan who can reach a deal. It is vital that the whole of the international community—not just the British Government—makes it clear to those who are negotiating in Abuja that they now have to do a deal because it is the only way in which the 1.8 million people who will tonight once again be in those camps can go home, which is what they want.

Afghanistan

6. Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): If he will make a statement on his Department's activities in Afghanistan. [61830]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): At the London conference, the Prime Minister signed with President Karzai a 10-year development partnership agreement to provide some £330 million of development assistance over the next three years. That is part of the overall UK pledge of £500 million—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) to put his question, may I please appeal to the House to keep the level of noise down? Not only is it disrespectful to Members who still have questions and the Ministers who will answer them, but it gives a terrible impression outside this place.

Mr. Stuart: Spending on counter-narcotics in Afghanistan doubled last year to £50 million. What return is the British taxpayer receiving on that investment?

Mr. Thomas: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be encouraged to know that there was a 21 per cent. reduction in cultivation last year. However, we cannot afford to be complacent about last year's positive progress, which is why the deployment of further UK troops to Helmand is important. Further spending by the Department on alternative livelihoods will also be important to continue the process of tackling the narcotics trade, which is well-embedded in Afghanistan.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that the national action plan for women was one of the benchmarks of the compact that was launched at the successful international London conference. Will he congratulate the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the 26 Ministries that took part in preparing the plan? Will he examine carefully whether resources from his Department can be offered to the Ministry of Women's Affairs to implement the plan?

Mr. Thomas: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work of the 26 Afghan Ministries, as supported by UNIFEM, in drawing up the plan. She will know of the substantial assistance that we are giving to the Afghan budget, and the Afghans can decide how they want to spend their guaranteed resources. I have no doubt that they are serious about their action plan for women and that is powerfully demonstrated by the number of women elected to the Afghan Parliament—there are proportionally more than in the UK Parliament. We will continue to work with all Ministries in Afghanistan to promote the empowerment of women further.

Central Asia

7. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): If he will make a statement on his Department's support for the countries of central Asia in the last five years. [61831]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): In the five financial years up to March 2005, we committed a total of £28.3 million to bilateral programmes in the five central Asian countries. We are now focusing on the two poorest countries, Tajikistan and the Kyrgyz Republic.

Mr. Hands: It is now almost a year since the Andijan massacre in Uzbekistan on 12 May 2005. What assistance has the Minister's Department provided to promote good governance in Uzbekistan in the past year?

Mr. Thomas: First, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his appointment as chair of the all-party group on central Asia. I look forward to the opportunity of talking to him about our efforts to tackle poverty across the central Asian states. In the light of what happened last year, we took the decision to end our bilateral programme in Uzbekistan, precisely because of the policies of the Uzbek Government. We continue to work with several multilateral agencies if we think that their substantial funding might exert leverage on the Uzbek Government to encourage a return to better policies and greater respect for human rights in the country.

Africa

8. Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): What key milestones he has set for his Department's work in Africa in 2006. [61832]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The Government's Gleneagles implementation plan sets out milestones for the implementation of the G8's 2005 commitments on Africa. Progress is being made, and targets for the rest of 2006 include the implementation of 100 per cent. debt cancellation by the World Bank and the African Development Bank; agreement on a plan to achieve universal access to AIDS treatment by 2010; an African stand-by force able to deploy 20,000 personnel; and the conclusion of the WTO trade round with real benefits to developing countries.

Jim Sheridan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. The report of the Commission for Africa was published just a year ago for Africa and for Gleneagles and for beyond that. How will the commitments made by the world community be monitored and what mechanisms will be put in place thereafter?

Hilary Benn: The commitment will be monitored first by the Africa Partnership Forum, representing donors and the countries of Africa. Above all, it will be monitored by the people who marched, campaigned, lobbied and wrote letters to ensure that in 2005 it was possible to achieve the real progress that we saw. In the end, it will be the public and those who are passionate about fighting poverty who will determine whether we are making progress.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [61810] David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 29 March.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): I have been asked to reply. As the House will know, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is on an official visit meeting the Heads of Government in Australia,

New Zealand and Indonesia. While away, my right hon. Friend has supported all our athletes competing at the Commonwealth games. I am sure that the House will wish to congratulate all of them on their success. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] My right hon. Friend has addressed the Australian Parliament and today has participated in a climate change conference in New Zealand. In Indonesia, he will meet the President and Islamic leaders.

David Taylor: The Prime Minister's antipodean away-days are surely unconnected with my appearance for Question 1 [Laughter.] In my right hon. Friend's absence, the row about links between private philanthropy and political preference rumbles on. It has been a major problem for all parties since Lloyd George through to Asil Nadir and up to the present day. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell me when we plan to deliver on our manifesto—page 110—with a major reform of the House of Lords and the clean up of party finance, which as his predecessor, Lord Hattersley, said in Monday's edition of The Guardian, appears to be a choice between state funding and millionaires' handouts?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am delighted that my hon. Friend is giving me full support for our manifesto—that is not necessarily always guaranteed. My hon. Friend has raised an issue that many feel strongly about. I should make it clear that our manifesto pledge related to the absurdity in the 21st century that hereditary peers still have a major role in making the laws of our country. Let me be clear to the House about what our manifesto said. It said that we wanted to get rid of the remaining 100 hereditary peers and that we wanted to change the rules that affect the Orders of the House of Lords, which prevent the will of this House being carried out on identity cards, for example. That is what we intend to change. That is the manifesto commitment, and we will carry it out.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): What representations did the Deputy Prime Minister make to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to continue the £200 payment to help pensioners with council tax?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am delighted to see the right hon. Gentleman back on the Opposition Front Bench in a leadership role. It seems that the Tories have been going through leaders so fast that they have started at the beginning again. They are now so green that they are even recycling their leaders. [HON. MEMBERS: "More, more".] Us Rotherham lads must stick together, must we not?

As for the £200 payment, yes, we had discussions with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Yes, we discussed the winter fuel payment of £200. [Interruption.] No, it was a commitment to pay that council tax rebate in one year, as we did. We have given a considerable amount to pensioners. If the right hon. Gentleman considers the record of what we have done for pensioners against what he did in Government, I will be proud to stand against our record. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This shouting must stop.

Mr. Hague: The Deputy Prime Minister should be more sympathetic to elderly council tax payers—he is over 65 and he did not pay council tax for years. This week, figures show that council tax has risen by 84 per cent. since the Government came to office, and that a typical pensioner couple will have to pay £254 more in council tax next year than this year. What was so special about election year, that pensioners needed £200 help with the council tax just for that one year?

The Deputy Prime Minister: It is the Government's overall policy to consider payments to pensioners and other things that we give them in the round. That is what we have done, and that is what we continue to do. As for the argument about the payment of council tax, let me remind the right hon. Gentleman of the comparison between our Government and his Government. We gave in the response a 39 per cent. increase in real terms in council tax, compared with the last five years of his Government, when he had some influence and there was a 7 per cent. reduction in real terms of the contribution to councils for council tax.

Mr. Hague: I think that there was so little English in that answer that President Chirac would have been happy with it. The fact is, Age Concern said that the Chancellor's decision "beggars belief", and Help the Aged described the payment as a "pre-election bribe" that exposed

"a shameful level of political expediency."

As the Government think that pensioners need £200 to help with council tax only when an election is due, does the Deputy Prime Minister understand why people are so cynical about politics?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I think that cynicism about politics has more to do with 18 years of Tory Government. Can I say to the right hon. Gentleman that it is true that I may get the grammar wrong? I have to take the blame for that, as that was my education, and I am responsible for it, but I would sooner get the words wrong than get my judgment wrong. After all, he was the leader who slammed Bank of England independence, who claimed that the minimum wage was the height of irresponsibility and would cause unemployment, and who said that Lord Archer was a man of integrity. If there is a choice between getting my words wrong and getting my judgment wrong, I would sooner have my problem than his. As he mentioned President Chirac, does he still believe those who describe the French as "cheese-eating surrender monkeys"? If he does, it makes me look like a master of diplomacy.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): The tourism season is about to begin with the arrival of spring, and the days are getting longer as the clocks went back this weekend. With that topical thought in mind, will the Deputy Prime Minister join me in welcoming the building of the world's largest clock—the Solar pyramid, which is an enormous, beautiful sundial in North-East Derbyshire? Will he accept my invitation to visit the newest and best tourist attraction in Derbyshire once it is built?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I would always be delighted to visit Derbyshire. This has a great deal to do with the very successful coalfield community policy that we introduced, providing £500 million to try to restore communities that were destroyed by the Thatcher Government when they closed down the mining industry. I am delighted to hear about the structure to which my hon. Friend referred, and I am well aware that it is connected to Skinner's junction. I think that it will be a memorable place to visit, and I look forward to accepting her invitation.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Let us get back to the council tax, because I do not think that we quite received an answer. Since the Deputy Prime Minister took office in 1997 council tax bills have nearly doubled. Whose fault is that?

The Deputy Prime Minister: First, let me welcome the hon. Gentleman to his role as acting deputy leader. We all know that the election will take place after today, and I wish him well. The matter is riveting the nation's attention—in fact, on my visit to Hull last weekend they talked of nothing else in the pubs.

Let me be absolutely clear. The hon. Gentleman well knows that we have given more to councils than any other Government—a 39 per cent. increase, and increases in services. When one compares local authorities and the payment of council tax, again Labour is providing better service at a lower council tax than either Liberal or Tory councils.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's good wishes, though I am not sure that they will help me much. Let us get this right. He is saying that thousands of councillors throughout the country and on all councils, whether they are Conservative, Liberal Democrat or Labour, have taken collective leave of their senses year after year to push up the council tax, and that is nothing to do with the Government. He is also saying that this year council tax has gone up by twice the rate that the pension has gone up, and he is taking away the £200 rebate. Is not the answer to council tax not to cap it, but to scrap it?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that the debate is going on in the Chamber about what the alternative should be to a council tax or what changes we should make. That is why we have appointed the Lyons inquiry to look into it. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is a candidate in the election and whether he is still advocating a change to a local tax. It is clear that with a local tax, many people would pay an awful lot more than the present council tax. Policy is changed fast by the Conservatives, and even faster by the Liberals. I will wait to see what happens in the election and what the Liberals propose as the alternative to the council tax. We will bring forward our proposals and see what their alternatives are.

Post Office Card Account

Q2. [61811] Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): If he will reconsider the Government's decision not to renew the Post Office card account after 2010.

The Deputy Prime Minister: This is where closed questions always catch you. [Laughter.] When you get the briefing, they say, "This one's a closed one," and you say, "Oh, yeah."

Offering people the opportunity to access their benefits through the post office is an important objective to the Government. The Department for Work and Pensions and the Post Office are discussing how this can be achieved when the present contractual arrangements end in 2010.

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. As he is aware, the decision by the Department for Work and Pensions not to renew the Post Office card account after 2010 has caused a great deal of concern, especially among pensioners, particularly as to the future of the sub-post office network. Will my right hon. Friend, together with his colleagues in the DWP, work with the major banks and with the Post Office to find a successor account to the Post Office card account from 2010 and get that agreed as quickly as possible, to stop the scaremongering and the fears about the future of our sub-post offices?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The House would agree that every DWP customer who currently collects their benefit from a post office will still be able to do so if they wish. There will be about 25 banks associated with the Post Office order, which can be accessed at post office branches. We hope that that number will grow in the future. I am told by the Post Office that it is developing new banking products for its customers and some of those will be available to existing Post Office card account holders. The point is sometimes made that transferring to a bank account may offer the individual a higher rate of interest than on the Post Office account, but the Government's objective is that there should be a range of alternatives to choose from.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): But is it not a fact that there are over 4 million pensioners with Post Office card accounts, and millions of those do not have bank accounts at all? Stripping them of that vital lifeline is yet another kick in the teeth for our pensioners and a certain death sentence for thousands more of our post offices. Why are the Government so intent on going ahead with such a callous act against our pensioners?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The concerns expressed by the hon. Gentleman have been expressed on both sides of the House. The contracts go on until 2010. Before then we will have to consider the full effect. Of course, many pensioners now have an awful lot more money to put into bank accounts, and more and more are changing to bank accounts, but it is a problem. If we look at the changes that are taking place and being discussed with the Post Office, perhaps we will come to a better conclusion nearer the end of the consultation. The discussions are still under way.

Engagements

Q3. [61812] Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Given the Deputy Prime Minister's long-standing involvement in the local government pension scheme, and following yesterday's industrial action in local councils, what steps does he intend to take to ensure that meaningful discussions take place to resolve the dispute?

The Deputy Prime Minister: It is an obvious regret to us all that the trade unions took yesterday's industrial action. To be honest, I did not feel that industrial action was necessary, because the negotiations could have continued. The Government's role is to act as a regulator, and the House has given me the authority to act as a regulator and make sure that the funded scheme is a viable scheme. That is my responsibility, and I intend to fulfil it. The negotiations are between employers and employees. As I have said in a statement to the House, we intend to introduce a regulation this week setting out the changes to the pension arrangements from April that will affect local government pensions. In the meantime, I appeal to all involved to return to the negotiating table. I am pleased to tell the House that those involved are meeting again at 12.30, and the Government are encouraging them to reach an agreement. Jaw-jaw is always better than war-war—I am not sure whether I have always thought that throughout my colourful life, but at this stage, I certainly do.

Q4. [61814] Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Last year, my father died of motor neurone disease, as do 100,000 people worldwide every year. The good news is that recent medical breakthroughs mean that a cure is almost in our grasp. Will the Deputy Prime Minister join me in endorsing the Motor Neurone Disease Association's commitment to finding that cure? And will he ask the Prime Minister to meet representatives of the association to hear their thoughts and plans on how together we can end that tragic and heartbreaking illness?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I think that the whole House will want to join me in sending our condolences to the hon. Gentleman on the difficulties that he is going through in his personal circumstances. I am sure that we all know about hon. Members on both sides of the House who have been afflicted by that terrible disease. Not long ago, I visited the former hon. Member for Doncaster, Kevin Hughes, who is suffering from that terrible disease. He is still going out canvassing, which is a remarkable reflection on the man, and I am sure that hon. Members will want to send our best wishes to him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear"] I am also sure that the whole House will want to endorse the work of the Motor Neurone Disease Association. In addition, I welcome the national service framework for long-term conditions, and a £20 million research initiative is now under way to try to speed up the development of new medical treatments for that terrible disease. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will accede to the hon. Gentleman's request to meet the association and discuss the matter. We wish all the best to those who are looking at the experiments and conducting research to try to find an answer to that terrible disease.

Q5. [61815] Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Looking on the bright side, unlike my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) a moment ago, does my right hon. Friend agree that by doing its job, the House of Lords Appointments Commission has brought about the full disclosure of political loans—we have given the names, unlike the other side—a full public debate about party donations, which has been useful, and a further stage of House of Lords reform, which will apparently take place shortly? All that took place in a fortnight—was that not good work?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I do not know whether the whole contribution was supposed to be funny. My hon. Friend has made a serious point, and I am sure that the recent stories about loans to political parties have undoubtedly caused concern on both sides of the House. As he has said, there has also been a wider public debate about how political parties should be funded. On the one hand, people do not like the idea of wealthy people financing parties, but they appear to be equally strongly against state funding of political parties, which has been my position for a long time. I think that we will have to move towards a form of state financing. [HON. MEMBERS: "No, no"] I hear hon. Members saying, "No", but the Short money is state financing, and I have not seen anybody turn it down. We should not forget that the Government have already introduced some of the reforms to make party funding more transparent, and we have asked Sir Hayden Phillips to review the issues and report by December, which is the best course of action that we can take.

Q6. [61816] Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): My constituency is part of the outer-London borough of Merton. Our schools are under severe financial pressure. Part of the reason for that is that we pay our teachers the inner-London weighting, but do not receive from the Government the same grant as inner-London boroughs. Will the Deputy Prime Minister agree to meet me to discuss that anomaly and commit today to sort out that inequity for our borough?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I assume that that was an eloquent plea for more money. The hon. Gentleman's constituency has 50 more teachers, 340 more teaching assistants and 420 more support staff than in 1997, and that costs money. I take his point about the differential between what teachers are paid in London and outside, and that also applies to firefighters and the police. It does cause difficulties and we try to deal with it. However, he is getting £1,320 more funding per pupil and that is a lot of money. It has improved education, along with more than £1 million of capital investment.

When the hon. Gentleman criticises how much money we have put in, he should take into account the principle proposed by the Leader of the Opposition on the relationship between growth and spending. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor pointed out in the Budget, that means £17 billion less in public expenditure, as agreed by the shadow, er—whatever she is. What is her title? [HON. MEMBERS: "Chief Secretary."] Yes, shadow Chief Secretary. I see that she has moved down the Front Bench today, because she went on television and, much to her credit, admitted that the principle would mean a cut in public expenditure. The hon. Gentleman should get his Front Benchers sorted out first.

Q7. [61817] Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Many people, including the shadow Attorney-General have called for complete transparency in party funding. Has my right hon. Friend considered introducing legislation to force political parties to reveal all their sources of funding, say, prior to the last three general elections? That would show us exactly how much of the £1 million donated by the Chinese heroin baron Ma Sik-Chun in 1994 was used to fund the Conservative party printing press in Reading.

The Deputy Prime Minister: It does sound like a Chinese takeaway problem. My hon. Friend makes an interesting point and no doubt he will pursue it with his usual vigour.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): Would the Deputy Prime Minister agree that he was right to warn the Prime Minister that Government instability would result from saying in advance that he would go?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman must know that I did not say that at all. Even though he has difficulty understanding what I say, I clearly did not say that. I said that it might cause uncertainties, but as I said on that day, the Prime Minister will make his decision and name the day when the time is right, and the transfer will happen before the next general election. That is the Prime Minister's commitment and that is what we are saying, and that is an important point. I know of no other leader who has made such a commitment as Prime Minister. I know that that would be difficult for the right hon. Gentleman, because he was the first Tory leader never to become a Prime Minister.

Mr. Hague: Well, that was the 2001 election and at least I got through the campaign without hitting anybody. Let us look at the state of this divided Government. The former Secretary of State for Health is attacking the Budget in the Budget debate; the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning is saying that people are being taxed to the limit; allies of the Chancellor are going around saying, "Gordon is desperately unhappy"; and the Prime Minister has fled the country before the police turn up.

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked at the weekend when the Prime Minister would go and he said:

"I still think the timetable in people's minds is still reasonably the same."

What is the timetable?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That is for me to know and him to guess. [Laughter.] There is constant reference to the incident that occurred during my election campaign, but I thought that we had finished Punch and Judy politics here. I know that I will be called Mr. Punch—what does he think that that leaves him as? [Laughter.] I have to say to him that he did lose that election, and a great deal has changed since he was last on the Front Bench. What has not changed is that I am on this side in government and he is on the side of the losers. That was the result of that election, and we will continue to be successful at introducing the economic prosperity, social justice and economic stability that no other country has been able to match. I am quite proud of that. I might say to the right hon. Gentleman that he is a very good example of the fact that the election of a Labour Government means great personal prosperity—for himself.

Mr. Hague: Can the Deputy Prime Minister honestly tell the House that the Government can seriously deal with the problems facing the country when we have a Prime Minister who says that he will not go until the NHS is fixed and a Chancellor who will not even mention it in his Budget, a Prime Minister who wants an end to pensions means-testing and a Chancellor who is introducing more of it, and a Prime Minister who wants to reform public services and a Chancellor who is a roadblock to reform? Is it not time that the country knew who was running the Government—the man smouldering next to him or the man in the departure lounge on the other side of the world?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. Gentleman must know about divisions in his own party. I am not conceding that what he said is right. His judgment is questionable, as I have already said. I can remember him 30 years ago when he was just 16—a little Rotherham lad speaking at the Tory party conference in 1977. I remember him saying what life would be like if Labour was in government in 30 years' time. He will recall that he said that. Well, to coin a phrase—"Have I got news for you?" We are here with low mortgages, low inflation, 2 million back at work, a national minimum wage, and 800,000 kids lifted out of poverty—that is what happened with a Labour Government in 30 years' time. I will tell him something—he can have that speech for free.

Q8. [61819] Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the 1.3 million people who will receive a pay rise in October and the historically high levels of employment in Falkirk and across the country show that the national minimum wage is fulfilling its function precisely?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The latest increase in the minimum wage will benefit around 1.3 million workers, 66 per cent. of them women. Of course, hon. Members will be aware of the sustained growth, with more than 2 million extra people in employment than in 1997. We continue to support those who get paid the least, despite Opposition spokesmen having told us that the minimum wage would cause mass unemployment. It did not. We got the minimum wage and high levels of employment. The Low Pay Commission shared our aim; that is why we have accepted its recommendations. I am proud that this Labour Government introduced the minimum wage—one of the founding goals of our party and the reason why we can say that economic prosperity and social justice go hand in hand. That is an important part of the policy that has been pursued by this Government.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): When the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister came to Shrewsbury in 2000 during the terrible flooding, they promised that Shrewsbury would be protected from flooding in future. So far, only a tiny area around the council offices has been protected. I have two questions: first, when will the right hon. Gentleman fulfil the pledge to Shrewsbury; and secondly, when will he return the wellington boots that he borrowed from the Environment Agency locally, because he has still got them?

The Deputy Prime Minister: No, I have not got them and I do not know what happened to them. I think that that is a little story that the hon. Gentleman picked up along the way.

I visited Shrewsbury along with many places that had been flooded. We increased the amount of money for flood protection to £500 million. It was far less under the previous Administration. As to where and who built the defences, the Environment Agency determines the most dangerous points, for which greater protection is needed. I do not know whether the council office is one of those points. We have provided the resources and, when flooding last occurred, Shrewsbury was pretty well protected from what had happened previously. I therefore think that we have done well.

Q9. [61820] Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the proposed restructuring of health services in the Pennine acute services area, which will mean the withdrawal of special care baby units, maternity and children's services from the people of Rochdale, Bury, Rossendale and other parts of east Lancashire? Does he agree that that is unacceptable and that the reconfiguration should be reviewed?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I understand that the proposals for the changes in the children's services in the area are part of a wider review, about which my hon. Friend knows. That review is currently in consultation until 1 May. I am sure that his views and those of the local population will be taken into account during that process. I know from my visit to my hon. Friend's constituency how active he is on behalf of his constituents and I am sure that his voice will ring loudly in the ears of those who make the decisions.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): On 15 December 2004, I informed the House that I had commissioned a review into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four young soldiers at Princess Royal barracks, Deepcut, during the period 1995 to 2002. As I told the House then, I was aware that its scope and nature may not satisfy all those, including hon. Members, who have been calling for a formal public inquiry into combat deaths in the armed forces, especially the four deaths at Deepcut. I said that by concentrating on the circumstances of the four deaths, the review would focus on the issue at the heart of current public concern.

The review has been undertaken by the distinguished human rights lawyer, Mr. Nicholas Blake, QC, and is now complete. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. This morning, the families had the benefit of a briefing by Mr. Blake on his conclusions. I know that this will be another difficult day for them; the passage of time, in such sad circumstances, does little to lessen the pain. I hope that they will find at least that Mr. Blake has addressed carefully and sensitively the questions that have troubled them. I acknowledge the dignity with which they have conducted themselves over this long period.

I am grateful to Mr. Blake for the thorough and professional way in which he has approached his task. In conducting his review, he has had the full co-operation of the Ministry of Defence. He has had full and unrestricted access to our records, and all serving and retired soldiers were encouraged to help the review in any way they could. I am satisfied that the report, which runs to 416 pages, plus annexes, represents an independent, objective and comprehensive analysis of all matters that have a bearing on the four deaths, and that Mr Blake has not been constrained by his terms of reference. Importantly, he has been able to tackle the wider issues.

There were three issues about which much comment had been made on events at Deepcut: the alleged suspicious circumstances of the deaths, a claimed culture of bullying and the need for a formal public inquiry. I am pleased to note that Mr. Blake makes substantial findings on all three points. First, he has concluded that, on the balance of probabilities, the deaths of Sean Benton, Cheryl James and Geoff Gray at Deepcut were self-inflicted. Given the recent coroner's inquest into the death of James Collinson, he understandably refrains from reaching any conclusion on that particular death. However, he comments that the opportunity for self-infliction was afforded by the policy of frequently assigning trainees at Deepcut to guard duty, unsupervised by experienced soldiers.

The review found a number of factors that may have contributed to the trainees' unhappiness and may have made them more susceptible to self-harm. The review considers that, there were institutional failures to identify potential sources of risk and subsequently to address them. On the question of bullying, Mr. Blake states that there is no evidence that any of the trainees were bullied to death. However, he accepts that some trainees at Deepcut—probably only a small minority—experienced harassment, discrimination and oppressive behaviour. Those who did not complain appear to have had little confidence that the system could or would address their grievances. These are important criticisms, which will be addressed.

Finally, on the question of a public inquiry, as I indicated in my response to the earlier House of Commons Defence Committee on this matter, I did not consider that a formal public inquiry was required. The Defence Committee was of a similar view. In a carefully reasoned examination of the arguments for such an approach, Mr. Blake has concluded that a public inquiry into the immediate or broader circumstances surrounding these deaths is not necessary. I reaffirm my earlier position and concur with his conclusion.

This review, taken alongside the other inquiries and inquests into the deaths at Deepcut, has set out with great clarity the circumstances of the four deaths and the context in which they occurred. We now need to move on and take forward the changes that are required. We accept Mr. Blake's conclusions and welcome the opportunity to address his recommendations. We accept that there have been shortcomings, and we will do all that we can to address them.

Although the purpose of the review was not to attribute blame, Mr. Blake has described a disturbing catalogue of allegations of misconduct at the relevant times. The Army authorities will carefully examine the report to see whether there is any indication of professional misconduct or negligence that might make administrative action appropriate. In addition, any matters that suggest that a disciplinary offence may have been committed will be referred to the Royal Military Police for further investigation. We will also have to take into account the overall training environment in which our personnel were working and the constraints faced by those in the command chain.

Mr. Blake understands the importance, particularly for the Army, of recruiting under-18s, but he has highlighted weaknesses with regard to their appropriate care. We are alive to that issue and we are improving the standard of care and support afforded to young recruits. For example, trainees' surveys have been established and a note of guidance for all commanding officers covering all aspects of working with under-18s has been produced. Furthermore, Mr. Blake particularly commends the specialist training regimes for 16-year-olds established at the Army Training Regiment, Bassingbourn, and the Army foundation college, Harrogate. However, there is clearly still more to do, especially in extending best practices such as those at these establishments, and we are committed to implementing such changes as far and as quickly as we can.

The quality of our armed forces and the professional way in which they were, and are, meeting their operational commitments is evidence of the quality of military training, and I pay tribute to that without hesitation. The report describes the British Army as a unique and extraordinary institution. For the past decade or more, it has been sent on a wide variety of operational deployments in many parts of the world, involving great personal danger and regular personal sacrifice.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

The report notes that many of the young people who are, or were, accepted as recruits into the Army have had very challenging lives as children. A high proportion were from single-parent homes, some had left school with no qualifications, and many had deficits in basic skills. The report comments that it is a remarkable challenge to turn these young people into effective soldiers forming part of a disciplined and interdependent team. It is worth noting that Deepcut alone sent approximately 10,000 trainees into the field Army during the period covered by the review.

However, the number of young people, particularly those under 18, that the services employ places particular responsibilities on us to recognise their potential vulnerability. We are committed to improving the way in which all our recruits are trained, developed and looked after. In view of that, and in light of the recommendations made in previous recent reports by the Defence Committee and the adult learning inspectorate, work has already been done, and continues to be done, to make changes for the better.

As in society as a whole, bullying, harassment and other inappropriate behaviour can never be totally eliminated in the armed forces. However, it is essential that we establish an environment in which bullying is wholly unacceptable. At every stage of their training and careers, it is made very clear to personnel that bullying and harassment, in any form, is not tolerated, and that it is part of their duty, and a function of leadership, to eliminate it.

It is a sad and unfortunate fact—again, just as in wider society—that the armed forces will never be able to eradicate the tragic incidence of suicide or self-harm. However, the risks can be reduced to a minimum by careful management, pragmatic policies and better understanding, knowledge and education. As the Blake review makes clear:

> "Every Officer, NCO, civilian instructor and trainee should be alert to any sign of abuse and be required to report it through the chain of Command, so prompt and effective action can be taken".

The Armed Forces Bill, currently being scrutinised by a Select Committee of this House, contains proposals to streamline the complaints redress system, including provision for an independent element. Also, the Bill will consider aspects of the procedures applying to boards of inquiry. The review makes recommendations in those two important areas. We will give full consideration to those recommendations, and the Bill gives us the opportunity to implement any changes deemed appropriate.

The report has identified areas in the training environment, especially between 1995 and 2002, that required improvement. It cites examples of inappropriate behaviour that should not have taken place. It also identifies areas where we can, and should, improve the way in which we manage the young people for whom we are responsible, and we accept those observations. We now need to look at every one of Mr. Blake's 34 detailed recommendations to see how they should best be taken forward to address the weaknesses identified as quickly and as effectively as possible. I also urge right hon. and hon. Members to take time to analyse Mr. Blake's report in full prior to forming their own opinions.

Mr. Blake has given us a detailed and painstaking report of considerable substance. I am confident that it will provide further impetus for improvement. I can assure the House of my determination to deal with the issues that he has raised, and I undertake to provide a detailed formal written response to the House on all the recommendations. I am determined to ensure that everything possible is done to prevent similar tragedies occurring in the future.

I have enormous confidence in the dedicated men and women working as instructors in our training organisation. I want to make sure that they have the support, the resources and the facilities that they need to pursue excellence. The trained young men and women they produce lie at the very core of how we deliver on the defence interests of this country. Their efforts have to be matched by commitment from the very top of the MOD.

Mr. Blake concluded his report with his profound condolences to each of the families concerned. On behalf of the Ministry of Defence, I again add my condolences.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for his statement and for allowing us advance sight of it.

This is a statement that all of us in the House wish had never been made necessary by events. It deals with complex and difficult issues. Above all, it deals with the very human tragedy of the death of four young people, whose pride in their endeavours is all too obvious from their photographs in the first four pages of the report. I reiterate my sympathy and that of my colleagues for the families, whose grief and sadness few of us will be able to understand.

The issues are complex, because they require a difficult and sophisticated balance. On the one hand, the British Army needs individuals who will put themselves in the line of fire to protect us. That inevitably requires a robust and tough training programme, and a culture unlike that of civilian life. On the other hand, the Army has a duty of care to each individual under its command.

As the Minister makes clear, social trends in this country have increased the number of recruits from broken family backgrounds, with poor academic achievement and, often, deficits in basic skills. That the Army is able to turn so many of them into world-class soldiers is something of which we should all be proud. Equally, however, we should be alarmed that the suicide rate of those under 20 in the Army is well above that in the comparable civilian population, and significantly worse than in either the Air Force or the Navy. That requires further academic research, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that it is undertaken.

The key questions are whether any of the deaths could have been foreseen, whether there was any cover-up or failure of investigation, and whether anything would be usefully served by a public inquiry. Let me deal with those questions in order.

The factors that might contribute to individual deaths include the make-up and suitability of the recruits, their disciplinary and supervisory framework, and the physical environment in which their training took place. Let us remember that of the four recruits, Geoff Gray and James Collinson were under 18, Cheryl James was just 18, and Sean Benton had been described in his records as having an immature personality. Additionally, both Sean Benton and Cheryl James had medical records of self-harm prior to recruitment. My questions to the Minister are whether or not there is sufficient profiling of potential recruits, how parents can be better involved in the recruitment interviews, and whether there should be automatic availability of NHS medical records prior to a recruitment decision.

Next, there are major questions about the disciplinary and supervisory regimes affecting the four recruits. In all cases, the regime for unsupervised armed guard duty for inexperienced soldiers gave the opportunity to obtain a weapon, and to provide an isolated spot in which to use it. That breaks two rules in the duty of care to vulnerable individuals. In addition, cuts in the number of non-commissioned officers make the environment less secure and diminish the relationship with recruits. As a consequence, the trust in the chain of command to deal with grievances, including bullying and abuse, will diminish.

There is one very specific issue. Can the Minister tell us how much he believes the indeterminate length of phase 2 training contributes to recruit dissatisfaction, and what the Government intend to do about it? The fact that all those failures occurred does not just represent a clear institutional failure on the Army's part—worse, they had been highlighted for many years by individual commanding officers whose internal and external recommendations were often ignored or implemented too late. As the report produced by Colonel Haes back in 2001 states,

"the Army Training and Recruitment Agency does not have a coherent policy that can be costed and measured. The ATRA is failing in certain aspects as a result of reduction in the military workforce and increased obligations . . . the current situation is tenable only as long as there is no major incident or complaint".

The physical environment at Deepcut also attracts considerable criticism. There was poor quality accommodation, especially in the case of sanitary and washing facilities. There were poor recreational facilities, leading to a restricted personal life, and a configuration of the camp that led to more frequent guard duties. The Minister must deal with those issues as a matter of urgency.

While the report makes clear that there is no evidence of collusion or cover-up, or failure of investigation, it is essential that the Royal Military Police ensure that their investigative procedures are equal to the best practice in civilian policing. Although the report suggests that that is best done by its being brought within the regime of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, I think that we would be wise to consider whether a further incursion of civilian institutions into the Army would be more beneficial than an internal mechanism.

Finally, there is the issue of a potential public inquiry. The conclusion reached in the report that, is a powerful one. There are those who believe that a public inquiry is essential to restoring public confidence in the Army. First, I do not believe that the British public have a general lack of confidence in the British Army. Secondly, I believe that rather than dealing with any specific anxieties, such an inquiry would be likely to provide further scope for ill-informed speculation with the potential to damage both morale and recruitment. The Government must consider that extremely carefully.

"no new reliable evidence as to how the four trainees met their deaths is likely to be available"

So what have we learned, and what do the Government need to do? We need better recruitment selection as a matter of urgency. We need training for NCOs so that they can understand and deal with specific vulnerable individuals. We need trainees to understand what is acceptable and unacceptable behaviour from their superiors, and a grievance procedure whereby they are taken seriously. We must end the practice of guard duty being used as a punishment for trainees. To encourage future recruits and, therefore, future soldiers, both recruits and their families need to be confident that the British Army can deliver a culture of nurture and training, free from bullying and harassment. For this, proper supervisory ratios are crucial.

Ultimately, the British Army must learn from the mistakes that it made in these terrible tragedies, and ensure that the self-sacrifice referred to in the military covenant is met by an equal duty of care from the institutions of the Army itself.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his opening comments, and it seems that we are more or less on the same territory regarding our analysis of what needs to be done. He will appreciate that this issue goes back to 1995, when substantial changes were made that undoubtedly impacted adversely on the training pipelines' capacity to deliver. As ever, it takes time to turn such a situation around. We have been under constant examination and there has been a constant process of renewal and investment. Each time, we must ensure that what we do has an effect. The hon. Gentleman will agree that it would be wrong to rush to a judgment or a solution; we have to make sure that our efforts deliver.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of specific points, but I take issue with his analysis of the suicide rate. I do not want to debate statistics, other than to make two points. First, one death is one death too many, but he was right to point to the increase in the number aged under 20 who committed suicide, or for whom an open verdict was recorded following an inquest. Secondly, for those aged 19 and under, the standard mortality ratio was significantly high during 1989 to 1993 and 1994 to 1998. However, for the period 1999 to 2003, the ratio, although still high, was not statistically significant. As I said, I do not want to trade statistics, and one death is one death too many, but let us not over-extend the analysis.

The hon. Gentleman made a very good point about the need for medical profiling and the involvement of parents. Mr. Blake's report is very clear on these issues and we already engage very closely with parents. Anyone who cares to visit a training establishment will see the joy on the parents' faces. As the hon. Gentleman said, even at those locations other than Deepcut that have been criticised, parents are delighted to see how the Army has turned their sons and daughters into members of society of whom they can be proud. However, more needs to be done and we need to make use of medical profiling. We need the best analysis of those who are coming into our care.

On phase 2 and soldiers awaiting training, the statistics show that improvements have been made. The number of soldiers awaiting training for more than 14 days each month has reduced by 59 per cent. across the Army, and by 45 per cent. at Deepcut. We are alert to the gap between phases 1 and 2—to what could happen in between if such soldiers are not given attention and gainful employment—and we are seeking to make improvements.

[Mr. Ingram]

On the Haes report, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, if Colonel Haes visited the training establishments today—as the adult learning inspectorate does, both announced and unannounced—he would find an entirely different regime. It is not perfect and it does need improving, but some substantial issues have been addressed.

I take note of what the hon. Gentleman said about the Royal Military Police, and we are alive to this issue. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary will run a slide rule over the RMP's special investigations branch, which is at the critical end of the investigative capacity, to make sure that the RMP meets the very high standards that have been set. That is not to say that it does not already do so; the RMP is already audited and examined frequently through case review. It has high standards, and it meets the high standards expected of the civilian police, but there are lessons to be learned, as ever. Even in respect of the civilian police, we must constantly examine what is being done in our name.

The hon. Gentleman referred to guard duty being used as a punishment—a critical issue with which the report deals. Mr. Blake makes a very powerful and potent point about guard duty, which is under review. Indeed, we have made considerable progress. No under-17s are involved in guard duty and we are increasingly employing civilians to carry it out. It is proving difficult to recruit people to take on this job in the areas where establishments are located, but we have invested considerable resources and we are trying to build capacity. Over time, that type of guard duty will no longer apply. Its use as a form of punishment is under review, and my guess is that it will not continue.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I thank the Minister for advance notice of his statement and for the opportunity to go into the Ministry of Defence this morning to read the report on these tragic events. I echo the condolences expressed to the families concerned.

The Minister made only an oblique reference to the review's recommendation 26, which I consider the key recommendation. It states:

"There should be established a Commissioner of Military Complaints (the Armed Forces Ombudsman) independent of the 3 services".

The Minister said that he will give further thought to that proposal, which is of course supported by the Defence Committee. Does the Ministry of Defence's own Army survey not show that a staggering 85 per cent. of soldiers say that there is bullying in the Army, and that in the past 12 months more than a quarter of soldiers had lodged complaints and were not satisfied with the way in which they were handled? The review notes that independent commissioners work well in the Australian and Canadian armed forces, and that commanding officers here said that they could see no difficulty with the idea. I therefore urge the Minister, even at this stage, to use the Armed Forces Bill to introduce that sensible recommendation.

The UK is the only European Union country to recruit 16-year-olds into its armed forces. Does the Minister agree with recommendation 12.48, which states that the expense of improving the regime for young people in the Army is the "necessary price to pay to be permitted to recruit"

them? What action will he take on the review's recommendation that young recruits should be in an environment dedicated to their needs, and that, in the case of 16-year-olds, such an environment should be exclusive to that age group? Is it not clear that, as the review and the Armed Forces Pay Review Body's report have found, accommodation and facilities for single people in the Army are profoundly unsatisfactory, and that they certainly were at Deepcut?

Will the Minister act on the review's recommendation 12, which states

"that instructors should be vetted for suitability to work with young people, in a way no less vigorous than in civilian establishments"?

Given the allegations of abuse in the report, is that not vital?

Finally, is it not vital that Surrey police implement recommendation 33, which says that they should disclose all the papers from their investigation to the families of the deceased so that they can decide whether to press for fresh inquests or, indeed, to renew their call for a public inquiry? Will Ministers implement the proposal that the Royal Military Police be brought within the regime of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, so that it can apply best practice and determine whether the RMP is sufficiently well resourced? That did not appear to be the case at the initial Deepcut inquiry.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the general tenor of his remarks. He has touched on some key issues, and he should be aware that the establishment of an ombudsman is a subject for the Armed Forces Bill. In the light of the Defence Committee's comments and of our own conclusions on what is desirable, we have come up with a set of measures that we think will tackle this issue. However, Mr. Blake has examined it in detail and made a recommendation, so it is only proper that we consider it. I must point out that the Liberal Democrats have a representative on the Armed Forces Bill Committee—

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): They have two.

Mr. Ingram: Yes, two, but they did not attend when the matter was discussed this morning. However, I do not want to dwell on that.

On complaints, Mr. Blake found that the culture was that people were not prepared to make complaints, because they went nowhere. We have sought to address that problem in the Armed Forces Bill, and edicts on the problem have gone out to everyone involved. We have taken the matter on board, and I accept Mr. Blake's conclusion that everyone—from the most senior officer right through to recruits—must take responsibility. That concerns not only those who feel that they have been harassed or bullied; anyone of any rank who witnesses such incidents should report them. That is the sort of culture that we want to instil in people. It is an important matter, we are alert to it, and Mr. Blake places great emphasis on it.

The question of young recruits cannot be avoided. I do not know whether the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) agrees with the conclusions that the Government have reached on the matter, but the main Opposition party does. We consider it proper to continue to recruit people younger than 18, although there is no time today to go into all the reasons, and it is clear that we have a duty of care for those young people. Significant success has been achieved at Bassingbourn and Harrogate. We must take account of best practice, but implementation has resource implications and cannot happen overnight.

That leads to me to the question of single-living accommodation. We are aware of the need to give young recruits more freedom to lead their own lives in the training establishments. I can therefore tell the hon. Gentleman that we are re-profiling our resource allocation to try to lift the spend on single-living accommodation.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the vetting of instructors. We are constrained by the law in that regard, but with the Department for Education and Skills and the Home Office, we are looking urgently for ways to ensure better assessment of instructors. The matter has implications across the whole education sector, and beyond. We need better ways to capture information about those who may put young people, and others, at risk.

The hon. Member for North Devon asked about the recommendation relating to the Surrey police. That is a matter for that force, but I hope that the recommendation is taken on board, as I think that it will be a substantial help. The coroner's inquest into the death of James Collinson was conducted before a jury, and all the relevant issues were ventilated. That is the key and, although it was not the case with the three earlier inquests, that is not a matter for the MOD. It is for the families to decide whether to take legal action to reopen the inquests, and I agree with Mr. Blake's recommendations in that regard.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The House has a great deal of business today. I appreciate that this is an extremely sensitive subject, but I still hope that questions can be brief. I can then try to call every hon. Member who is seeking to catch my eye.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that many families who lost children at Deepcut and elsewhere are very disappointed that the Government have again rejected a public inquiry. However, I chair the all-party group on non-combat deaths, and I welcome many of the proposals that have been made. Will he elaborate a little further on the proposals in Nicholas Blake's report for independent oversight of such matters? Will the ombudsman have retrospective powers, and be able to set up inquiries on his own initiative? Is there any indication of the scale of the problem beyond the Deepcut perimeter fence?

Mr. Ingram: The last time I looked, more than 1,700 families were involved in the "Deepcut and Beyond" campaign, and I agree with Mr. Blake when he says in his report that no public inquiry into all the non-combat deaths could ever be concluded, because every such death would extend the process. That is why, as I have made clear many times, we do not favour a public inquiry into these matters. It is not that we have no respect or feelings for the families but, for the reasons that I have given and more, we do not believe that it would be appropriate to go down that route.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) should not conclude that there will be an ombudsman and then ask questions about what that person would do. We have said that we will consider Mr. Blake's recommendations, and that we are looking at how we can introduce an independent non-military presence into the complaints procedure at the higher level. That would give people a guarantee that they could seek redress from someone who was not in the chain of command. The Armed Forces Bill Committee is debating that at present, but we will balance that approach against what Mr. Blake has said. I shall also deal with the matter in my written response to the report.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): We have discussed already the catalogue of misconduct in relation to Deepcut, but one member of the armed forces said:

> "Sex was a passport for getting off all sorts of things, getting off duties, getting a long weekend at home."

Does the Minister accept that such quotations show how serious the situation had become? Mr. Blake's report was created only as a result of pressure from me and from other parliamentarians, and from Des and Doreen James and other parents of the deceased? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that they are understandably suspicious when he says that there is no need to make any further investigations? Finally, does he agree that, in the interests of respect, it is right to postpone the final judgment about a full public inquiry until the parents have had the chance to review all the materials that Nicholas Blake QC says that they should have the opportunity to review? Then we can wait and see what they feel. The Minister would be giving nothing away by agreeing to wait for the parents to see that information, and to share their point of view, and he certainly would not be compromising his position by so doing.

Mr. Ingram: I take that point, but one of the key issues was the demand for a public inquiry. The Defence Committee said that it would wait for the Blake review, but did not consider that a public inquiry was justified, given the known circumstances. I have given more than once the reasons why I do not support a public inquiry. Mr. Blake's review weighs all the legal considerations and all the aspects, and comes to the same conclusion.

Mr. Blake says that the Army and Ministers have to make a judgment about whether more information would lay the issue to rest. My judgment is that a public inquiry would prolong the matter, and would not lead to a different conclusion. That is Mr. Blake's conclusion, and I am more than satisfied that he has looked at all the available evidence. We cannot allow individual families to have a veto. They have been spoken to and have expressed their views, but they may never be satisfied with the decision. Their point of view will differ from the judgment that a Minister will reach.

I recognise the role that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has played in this matter. Mr. Blake's report is highly critical of the media's sensational exploitation of the events. Stories have been run that have had no substance, with no subsequent apology for the fact that they were wrong. None the less, I accept Mr. Blake's recognition that the pressure that the media exerts forces further ventilation and examination.

I wanted this report to be completed earlier, and Mr. Blake lists the many external factors that made that impossible. In the intervening period of 15 months, substantial changes in the training environment have been introduced or are now planned. The training regime has not stood still, and it will change measurably for the better in the months and years ahead.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my right hon. Friend for allowing me and other Members who represent the families of the young men and women who died to have sight of the report.

When I met the Grays at their home last week, they were keen for a public inquiry, but one of their main concerns was that in their desire to reopen their son's inquest they did not have full access to the facts. Will my right hon. Friend, who has personally pledged to liaise with our right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, make sure that all necessary evidence is disclosed to the family of Geoff Gray and the other candidates? Has he completely ruled out a public inquiry into the way that Deepcut was run? I support the recommendation for an ombudsman. Does the Ministry of Defence have a timetable for looking into that issue?

Mr. Ingram: The key issue is the recommendation relating to the Surrey police. I cannot instruct the Surrey police to do what has been recommended but, as I have indicated, I strongly support the view taken by Mr. Blake and we shall do all we can to ensure that it is imparted both to those who make the decisions at ministerial level and, most important, to the Surrey police. Of course, where there is confidential information, as may be the view of the Surrey police because of the nature of the witness statements they have taken, some matters may have to be deleted for legal reasons. Things have to be looked at in the round, but if there were access to that information it would help families who seek a reopening of the inquest into the deaths of their sons, in two cases, and their daughter, in the case of Mr. and Mrs. James. If that attempt was successful, which is not for me to determine—there would have to be judicial review or some other mechanism—the coroner would have to comply. If the inquests were reopened, there would be an opportunity to raise all those matters, because there is no restriction on where such an inquest could go. That would deal with my hon. Friend's point about the need for a public inquiry to explore what happened at the time of death. A coroner's inquest can do just that, so we are encouraging families to take that route, and they may now have better argumentation for doing so.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): I thank the Minister for an early look at the report this morning. Although I acknowledge that Nicholas Blake stops short of asking for a public inquiry, he says that the one constituency that might have an interest in a public inquiry would be the Army itself. That comes on top of the words of the coroner at the Collinson inquest, Michael Burgess, who said that "the MOD should take whatever steps are necessary to restore public confidence in the recruitment and training of young soldiers . . . including an inquiry held in public".

If the only way to restore that confidence is to hold a public inquiry, and it is in the interests of the MOD to do so, will the Minister think again about a public inquiry?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman has had a benefit that other Members have not: he has read the report, albeit in a restricted time—but he has misunderstood what Mr. Blake said. He does not "stop short" of calling for a public inquiry; he says that it is not necessary. He goes beyond that point.

The hon. Gentleman should take time to understand the report—read it, analyse it and absorb the weight of its analysis. That is what I will do. I shall consider my response, but I have nothing to add to what I said earlier about having clarity in respect of a public inquiry. A judgment had to be made by Mr. Blake, and he has made it. A judgment had to be made by the Select Committee, which made it. A judgment had to be made by me and I made it. The Army took a similar point of view, which it expressed to me. It is not a question of a cover-up, but that there is a weight of argument in favour of not proceeding down that road. We know what went wrong and there may still be things that need to be addressed, but let us do so to ensure, I hope, that we can stop the recurrence of such tragic incidents in the future.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for the opportunity to see the report this morning, as did other MPs, on behalf of Sean's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Benton. The report was comprehensive in terms of the evidence it reviewed, but it was a review and not an inquiry. May I bring to my right hon. Friend's attention paragraph 2.71? It states:

"If Human Rights law required a public inquiry then this review cannot itself satisfy that obligation given the limitations placed upon it—nor could an Army review."

Paragraph 2.73 states:

"If material comes to light to suggest collusion in a killing or a cover up"— which has been suggested—

"public confidence would demand a public inquiry."

Although Mr. Blake comes to the view that no inquiry is required, he notes that it is up to the Secretary of State to make that decision if "public confidence" demands it. I believe it does. Does my right hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Ingram: Again, I thank my hon. Friend for acknowledging that he has been given access to the report, but I suggest that he consider a longer time scale rather than alighting on one part of it and deciding that it leads to a certain conclusion. There is other argumentation in the report and the conclusion is that such a course was not necessary. Mr. Blake is a considerable and eminent human rights lawyer, who has weighed up all the information—from his perspective, not that of the Army—and come to that conclusion.

My hon. Friend referred to suggestions that there was collusion or a cover-up, but there is no evidence of that. People may have such perceptions or feelings, but they have no proof. The report involved more than turning over pages of evidence. There was thorough examination of all the documentation. There were talks with witnesses who commented on the conduct of individuals and on the running of the training establishments as well as pointing out ongoing issues. Let us not diminish the review. It is a considerable report. Would more come from a public inquiry? I judge that it would not, and everyone else who has looked at the arguments in the round has come to the same conclusion.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): As the constituency Member for Deepcut, I thank the Minister and Nicholas Blake. I, too, extend my sympathy to the families, who have borne their suffering with such dignity. Does the Minister agree that since the period covered by the report, the Army in general and the leadership at Deepcut in particular have taken significant steps to improve training? Will he tell us the steps being taken to ensure that we train and retain experienced NCOs who can both prepare our young men and women for the rigours of the battlefield and extend to them a proper duty of care?

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for those comments. Our plans to lift quality are well under way—it is a question of getting the infrastructure in place. We plan to establish a leadership course, designed specifically to ensure that those entering the instruction regime and environment realise that it is an important part of their career development, which has not been the case hitherto. We are setting up another scheme for the Army, "Train the trainers", which will roll out for the Air Force and the Royal Navy. Without question, we are homing in on that important ingredient. Those who carry out instruction duties are key to everything we do in delivering people capability and capacity for our armed forces. During the period of the review—from 1985 to the present day—just under 100,000 trainees have gone through that training environment at Deepcut alone. That is a mark of success, not failure, but there were weaknesses in the system and we are addressing them.

The hon. Gentleman asked how we can ensure that there is continuous improvement at Deepcut and elsewhere. The adult learning inspectorate is a fully independent organisation, which can make both unannounced and announced visits to the establishment, and it says that Deepcut has been transformed for the better. Mr. Blake's report includes a good quotation from a young trainee, who says that now people are mollycoddled, and cannot move without someone talking to them to try to find out what is in their mind and what they are up to. A balance needs to be struck, however, because we are trying to create independent people whom we ask to take on a unique task on behalf of our country. It is difficult for our military people to strike that balance, but they have achieved great success in the past and continue to be successful, as the hon. Gentleman is aware from his knowledge of Deepcut.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): At the consideration of the Armed Forces Bill this morning, I introduced new clause 24, which would have established an independent complaints commissioner for the armed forces—I was not, I hasten to add, supported by the Liberal Democrat members of the Committee, who were absent. After considering an interesting debate, and, obviously, waiting for Nicholas Blake's report at lunchtime, I agreed to withdraw the motion on the new clause. Can the Minister assure me that the independent oversight of complaints in the armed forces will be seriously considered as part of the Armed Forces Bill? Can he give us a timetable for such consideration, although I realise that doing so is difficult?

Mr. Ingram: Again, my hon. Friend is close to that issue and has been raising it as a member of the Defence Committee. I am grateful to him for initiating that debate this morning. The issue must be ventilated and examined. I cannot dictate the pace of what happens with the Bill, but I guess that it must be addressed on Report, and if not, by the other place. We could then consider it back here again if necessary. It is for both Houses to decide what should be included in the Bill. We will give a very clear indication of what we believe to be right. Without question, what we propose goes a considerable way to address the issue; we have not fully debated it, obviously, but there is an independent presence within it. I will also make a written response on the basis of Mr. Blake's view, but that will be consistent with our view of the way in which the Bill should develop. Making that point is a substantial part of what we are doing at present. Let that debate now ensue.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Although I believe that the Minister's judgment is right in continuing to resist calls for a public inquiry, however painful and difficult that may be for the relatives of the men concerned, may I tell the Secretary of State for Defence that I cannot help but feel that there is still a gap in the procedures of the Ministry of Defence for dealing with very difficult and large questions of this nature, as I pointed out in a letter that I sent to the then Secretary of State some four years ago. Will the Minister consider establishing a more permanent procedure as a clear alternative to public inquiry—perhaps, as I suggested then, a tribunal, chaired by a senior military officer from a different service, with a retired judge and a senior retired police officer, to conduct investigations and inquiries of this nature?

Mr. Ingram: That is but one idea, and I know that the hon. Gentleman has argued for it in the past. I can consider anything in my response, and I will deal with the specifics of what Mr. Blake has said. I do not want to look at a range of other aspects, unless that is consistent with what we seek to do in the Armed Forces Bill. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity when that Bill returns on Report to table such amendments as he feels necessary, but I ask him to listen to the arguments that take place in the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill and consider them in a balanced and non-partisan way to try to find the best answers. There are very good arguments about why those in the chain of command should be respected in all this. They have the ultimate responsibility for the duty of care for those men and women—young and less young—in their care, because they are the ones who have to take them into those dangerous environments into which we send them. So let us not diminish what they do and their responsibility for the people whom they have under their care.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): I will not take too much of the House's precious time today to dwell on disagreement about a public inquiry. However, the Minister has enjoined Members to take time to analyse the report in full before forming our own opinions. Will he assure us that if we do so, and if we approach him on a cross-party basis—he is aware of the nature of the cross-party campaign to date—he will be receptive to those reflections, particularly where they are informed by the views of the families?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend knows me from my time in Northern Ireland, and we are always prepared to look at cross-party and individual party submissions to find the best solution. So the answer is yes, but I simply cannot undo the past; I can only try to make the present and the future better. I have compassion and deep feeling for those families, and I regret that aspects of what we were doing—Mr. Blake makes this clear—may have created a climate that resulted in those four tragic deaths. I have also said that, as has come out in the report, if individuals were in the wrong, we must examine that as well. There is no question in my mind about the depth and breadth of the report, and I only hope that those who campaign do so objectively and on the basis of what is deliverable and achievable, rather than trying to paint us into the position of creating the perfect world. I do not have it within my gift to create perfection.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Given the worryingly high number of deaths in non-combatant activities in the past 25 years, does the Minister feel confident enough to tell the House today that in future, there should be no significant difference between the frequency of non-combatant deaths in the armed services and accidental deaths in the community at large? If he could give us that assurance about non-combatant deaths, or at least set out the measures that the armed services are taking to move in that direction, it would be a great reassurance.

Mr. Ingram: Again, I do not think that I have that within my gift, but I ask the hon. Gentleman to examine a lot of those non-combat deaths. They can involve road traffic accidents, or people who are on duty in difficult circumstances that are not combat-related who have been killed in accidents, or because of mistakes by other people. Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that he does not accept that the armed forces are unique and work in different circumstances—and, without question, in extremely dangerous environments? He is not comparing like with like, so I do not think that I can answer that question in the way in which he asked it.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): Having visited one of the training establishments, I am aware of the improvements that are being made. I welcome the Minister's commitment to consider what further action can be taken in the light of the review, but does Mr. Blake deliberate on any case other than those of the four that have been mentioned, such as that of my former constituent Alfie Manship, who died in Germany some weeks after leaving Deepcut barracks?

Mr. Ingram: Yes he does, at length. I know that my hon. Friend will look at all the conclusions. Indeed, that is one of the issues that I referred to earlier in which the sensational press reporting of certain aspects was not found to be accurate. I know that my hon. Friend will closely examine the report and that the family, whom she represents, will also look at it, and it will help them and my hon. Friend to understand the totality of that circumstance.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): The Defence Committee report found that the real failure was that of the Army chain of command to respond either creatively or purposefully to the various reports over the past seven years. That failure of command, which was not recognised by anyone in the Army, led to the ongoing situation. It is still amazing to me that the two commanding officers have still yet to give any public account of what they did in response to the circumstances that they found. I would be interested to know whether the Minister feels that Mr. Blake has ruled out a public inquiry—I do not think that he has—and surely the Secretary of State for Defence should have an opportunity to review his decision on a public inquiry once the parents have had the advantage of having had the report for some time, and all the information available from the Surrey police.

Mr. Ingram: I repeat—I do not know how many times I have done so—that Mr. Blake has ruled out the need for a public inquiry. He says that it is not necessary. I do not think it appropriate for the hon. Gentleman to try to particularise his comments against two commanding officers. It is almost as if he is saying that they are guilty before any other examination. I understand that both of them met the families involved at the time. There has been a very close public examination by the people who were critical; in itself that may not be sufficient, but Mr. Blake and others have done everything that they can. I have met the families in different circumstances, either individually or collectively, to try to talk through some of the issues, and I will continue to do so. Everyone should know that there is a need for clarity. Fudge and uncertainty are not the way to deal with this matter. I make this plea to the hon. Gentleman: he should use his own faculties to consider how best we should address the present and the future. We are trying to address the past, but we must also address the present and the future, because of the tens of thousands of young men and women who are still going through those establishments.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): I join other Members in thanking the Minister for his statement. As he will be aware, 19 non-combatant deaths took place at Catterick garrison between 1995 and 2001 in the infantry training section alone. Many parents, including my constituent, Lynne Farr, whose 18-year-old son Daniel died at Catterick in 1997, feel that those deaths cry out for some form of inquiry, but the Minister has been quite clear about that today and we all welcome the depth of thought that he has obviously given to the issue. Will he take a personal interest in ensuring that grieving parents whose children have died are kept informed of the steps that will follow the Blake report as issues develop?

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those comments. We recognise that there are non-combat deaths in other areas. I gave the figure of the more than 1,700 families that would come into the ambit of this particular campaign. Lynne Farr is a formidable woman and she argued her case very well. We are considering ways in which she can use her experience as a mother who has had to deal with such tragic circumstances to assist us, and how best to deal with other parents who find themselves in those circumstances. That will be difficult for her, but she is capable and willing to help.

The other element is to make sure that our relationship with parents who have young people at those training establishments is such that they are fully aware of everything that is happening through that process. There should not be any barriers to their understanding. We recognise that having parents on side is critical. Much of our welfare support—and the way in which we are seeking to address things—envelops the parents if they want to be engaged in the process. We must remember, of course, that once the young person is over 18, they are an adult and so there is a balance concerning who has ownership of that person's future. These are very difficult issues, not just in military training establishments, but in life generally, as well. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments.

BILL PRESENTED

Housing (Council Tenants and Leaseholders)

Simon Hughes, supported by Lynne Featherstone, Tom Brake, Mr. Edward Davey, Susan Kramer, Paul Holmes, Mr. Mike Hancock, Dr. Evan Harris, Mr. Dan Rogerson, Mr. John Leech, Mark Hunter and Lorely Burt, presented a Bill to make provision with regard to the rights and obligations of council tenants and leaseholders; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed. [Bill 163].

Point of Order

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In his reply to my question on his statement, the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, the right hon. Member for East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow (Mr. Ingram) alleged that I was making some sort of allegation against the two former commanding officers. My point was quite clear: it was that both those officers have yet to give a public explanation of their actions following the deaths that occurred while those young people were in their charge.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I think that the hon. Gentleman knows that he is not raising a point of order; he is simply trying to continue the argument. There are other ways in which he can pursue matters of that kind.

Prevention of Scalding Injuries (Bathing in the Home)

1.32 pm

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision about the installation in homes of thermostatic mixing valves to set bath tap water temperature to a maximum of 46 degrees centigrade; and for connected purposes.

I would like to tell the House a story about a little girl called Holly Devonport from Wakefield. Holly was five years old when she suffered scalds to more than half her body. Her mother, Julie, was running a bath and went to get a fresh towel. Holly was perched on the edge of the bath, playing with her Gameboy, and in the split second when her mother left the room, she slipped and fell in. Her mother said that when she pulled Holly from the bath her legs looked like they had been dipped in acid. Holly's agonising injuries meant that she endured a seven-hour operation to graft skin from her stomach on to her legs. She spent six weeks in Pinderfields hospital in Wakefield and six months in a wheelchair. She missed four months of school. She will be scarred for life. I know that many hon. Members in the Chamber met Holly and her mother yesterday and I am grateful to them for their support.

Holly is now 10 years old and yesterday she and her mother came to this place to launch the "Hot Water Burns Like Fire" campaign. The campaign is backed by Age Concern, the British Burns Association, the Child Accident Prevention Trust, the Children's Fire and Burn Trust, Help the Aged and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. They, and I, want to make sure that what happened to Holly does not happen to another child.

Unfortunately, what happened to Holly is happening to another child every single day of the year. Some 600 people a year suffer severe injuries from scalding hot bath water and three quarters of them are children under five. Fifteen pensioners a year die from burns that they receive from bath water. Why are pensioners and children the most vulnerable to scald injuries? The answer is because their skin is thinner and burns more quickly. Also, as any parent of a toddler will know, children have less perception of risk. Pensioners have less physical ability to deal with dangerous situations.

I have heard stories of children dropping toys into the bath and going in to get them and of pensioners getting cramp in their legs while topping up their baths with hot water. Someone e-mailed me this morning to share the story of her mother, who was due to go to a wedding and who was staying in a hotel. She turned on the hot bath tap and was scalded to death by the hot water. She went into burns-related shock. A person might have an epileptic fit, a heart attack or a stroke. They might drink too much or be on drugs and pass out in the bath. Those are everyday accidents, but they have extraordinary and catastrophic consequences for the individual.

My Bill would change the law so that thermostatic mixing valves, or TMVs, are fitted in all new and refurbished homes. Those valves would set the bath tap water temperature to a maximum of 48° C and it would emerge at about 46 ° C, depending on the water pressure elsewhere in the home. Let me put those temperatures in context. At 66° C, hot water burns through skin in two seconds. At 56° C, it takes 15 seconds. At 46° C, the temperature at which the valves would be set, it takes five minutes. If Members measure their own scalding hot baths they will find that the temperature is about 40° C. Nobody can sit in a bath at 46° C, but that temperature would allow people to buy time. I pay tribute to the district council in Wakefield, which, as far as I can establish, is the only council in the country to install the valves as standard across all its housing stock.

Legislation requiring homes to have TMVs comes into force in Scotland in May. Similar legislation has been passed in Canada, New Zealand and Australia. Why can we not do the same in England, Wales and Northern Ireland? We have an opportunity approaching. I understand that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs are about to launch a joint public consultation on building regulation G, to look at water-saving devices in bathrooms and water fittings in bathrooms. I plead with the Minister to widen the scope of that consultation to include the installation of TMVs. I thank him for taking the time to meet me earlier this week and I would be grateful if he would meet me later to talk with the representatives of the campaign leaders and the organisations involved about the nature of the injuries that they see.

There may be shouts from the tabloids about the nanny state. There were shouts when we banned hairdryers from bathrooms, put fuse boards on electrical circuits, and passed laws to protect people from carbon monoxide poisoning from gas boilers. Dr. Keith Judkins, a consultant anaesthetist from Wakefield, told me yesterday that a scald over more than one fifth of one's body has the metabolic impact of being hit by a bus. It causes huge changes in the body's chemistry, which can be life threatening. People can go into burns shock.

If the human consequences do not convince people, let us consider the economic and environmental costs. It costs £80—once—to buy a TMV. The lifetime cost to treat one scalding injury is £250,000. In one year, with TMVs, we could save £150 million for the NHS, and a lot of toddlers and pensioners a huge amount of suffering. In these days of rising gas prices, it simply does not make sense to superheat bath water and then mix it with cold water.

I am sure that all Members had a thermostat fitted to the showers that they used this morning. Nobody even thinks about thermostats on showers, but, for some reason, there is an incredible resistance to fitting them on bath taps. I doubt whether there is a person in the House who can say that they have not fallen asleep in the bath. Bath time should be about bubbles, ducks and fun—even at our age.

Baths should still be hot—baths will still be hot—but, most importantly, baths should be safe. Hot water burns like fire. Hot water burned Holly Devonport, to use her mother's words, "like acid". This year, 400 children will suffer what Holly endured. Are we really saying that that is the best that we can do for our children? We live in the 21st century. Thermostatic mixing valves were invented 80 years ago, so what are we waiting for? Let us act now to amend the building regulations and save lives so that we can all enjoy safe, hot baths.

1.40 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I will be brief because the House has a busy day. I pay tribute to the sincerity with which the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) spoke to her Bill. I should say, for the record, that I have never to my knowledge fallen asleep in the bath. The shower that I had this morning did not have a thermostatic valve, and nor do any of the showers in either my flat in London, or my house in Worcestershire. While I respect the hon. Lady's sincerity, I simply ask her to reflect on whether the Bill might be a step too far. Ten-minute Bills are useful to raise awareness of important issues. I introduced such a Bill for that purpose some 10 years ago with great success. However, I hope that the hon. Lady might be persuaded to leave it there.

Let us get the matter in some perspective before deciding which of us is right. I am told that of some 100,000 burns injuries, scalding accounts in total for some 2,500, and about 2,000 of those cases are minor. I accept that it is a problem if there are 500 serious scalding injuries. We often talk in the House about the nanny state. Such phrases in the political lexicon are perhaps used too often and their overuse can lead to their devaluation. However, when the House considers such matters, it must reflect carefully on the point at which individuals must take personal responsibility for their actions and when politicians should tell people how to behave.

I accept that the hon. Lady has made a powerful case for vulnerable people using thermostatic valves for their baths. I would prefer a scheme to assist vulnerable people to access such valves so that risks were minimised. There are many wrongs and problems in the world, but they cannot all be answered by political intervention, and my suspicion remains that we are considering such a problem. An intervention made by the House must be proportionate to the problem that it is trying to address and must genuinely protect the freedom of others. The Bill, well meaning though it is, fails both tests.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Peter Luff: I do not think that I am procedurally allowed to give way during a speech on a ten-minute Bill. I apologise to my hon. Friend.

I listened, as many hon. Members would have done, to this morning's "Today" programme and heard the gloriously flippant responses received from many listeners. I heard the voice of John Humphreys rising with incredulity as he presented the piece. However, there are serious issues to consider. After a long day out in the countryside in the winter, it is my preference to relax in a long bath. I let a bit of cold water out and put a lot more hot water in so that I can have a half-hour bath, rather than a five-minute bath. Baths are not just for cleansing, they are also for therapy, and I suspect that the Bill would get in the way of the liberty that I enjoy.

The issue is important, and I pay tribute to the way in which the hon. Lady has raised it. It is often said that the state should keep out of the bedroom, but it is my view that the state should keep out of the bathroom, too. Frankly, the idea deserves a cold bath, although I give a warm welcome to the spirit in which the hon. Lady raised it.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mary Creagh, Sandra Gidley, Mr. David Blunkett, Mrs. Siân C. James, Dr. Alasdair McDonnell, Dr. Ian Gibson, Alan Simpson, Mr. Stewart Jackson, Mr. Sadiq Khan, Mr. Robert Walter and John Bercow.

PREVENTION OF SCALDING INJURIES (BATHING IN THE HOME)

Mary Creagh accordingly presented a Bill to make provision about the installation in homes of thermostatic mixing valves to set bath tap water temperature to a maximum of 46 degrees centigrade; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 160].

Orders of the Day

Identity Cards Bill

Consideration of Lords message.

Lords reasons: 22J and 22K.

1.45 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have written a note to Mr. Deputy Speaker about the Bill as it stands and how it might be amended. It might be strange to raise this matter at such a late time, but it is in the nature of the exchanges between the Houses that it is possible that the amendments being applied could make the Bill a hybrid Bill. I say that with reference to the definition of the Speaker that a hybrid Bill is "a public bill which affects a particular private interest in a manner different from the private interest of other"—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I have the reference from "Erskine May", so we can save a little time because the hon. Gentleman need not read out the whole passage.

Mr. Cash: I merely say, Madam Deputy Speaker, that however improbable it might seem at this late stage, differences could be created in the "same category or class" by virtue of the amendments that are being proposed and those that have been considered. On the general principle, it seems to me that hybridity could apply in this instance, but I would be grateful for a ruling.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman says, the matter has been brought to the attention of the Chair at a late stage. I am thus seeking advice and guidance and we will return to that point of order later.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That this House disagrees with the Lords in their amendments 22J and 22K.

This is the fourth time that amendments to remove the automatic linkage between designated documents and identity cards have come back to us from the other place and I very much hope that it will be the last time. The amendments were tabled by Lord Armstrong of Ilminster, who sits on the Cross Benches. I have high regard for Lord Armstrong, his commitment to the constitution of this country and his knowledge of history relating to it. I know that he was trying to help to reach a constructive conclusion by tabling the amendments. However, as I have said before, the moment has passed for discussing the principle of linking designated documents and ID cards, and it simply would not be possible for the Government to accept a complete opt-out for people who apply for documents designated under the Bill from the requirement to be entered on the national identity register and issued with an identity card.

I understand the reasoning behind Lord Armstrong's amendments. As I have said before, I am grateful to him for trying to help to resolve the impasse that exists. However, while in theory an opt-out might well make more sense than an opt-in, the reality would be the same. We would still be introducing an unacceptably large degree of uncertainty into the plans for rolling out identity cards linked to passports.

When the Bill returned to the House on 21 March, the debate was essentially about the timing for implementing the requirement for people applying for a designated document, such as a passport, to register and obtain an identity card, rather than the principle of so doing. That was certainly the line taken by the Liberal Democrat Home Affairs spokesman, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg), although I have to say that he was more coherent than Lord Phillips of Sudbury in yesterday's debate in the other place when he made a mistake about a name. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) for reminding me of a particular factor behind that, so I will not read the relevant part of Hansard, although I refer hon. Members to column 655.

The line taken by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam was very clear. He said that the amendments to be proposed by Lord Armstrong would

"blow a hole in the Bill"—[Official Report, 21 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 192.]

The position of the Liberal Democrats throughout has been to use any device, however constitutionally doubtful, to destroy the scheme decided by this elected Chamber. I have no intention of accepting any changes that would have the effect of blowing a hole in the Bill, or damaging the delivery of the identity cards scheme as a whole.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will the Home Secretary confirm that people are right in thinking that this is all part of an EU requirement to prepare for a common system across Europe, and that that is why he is in such a hurry to get rid of our liberties in this respect?

Mr. Clarke: I am happy to confirm that that is total nonsense. There is no proposal either for an EU identity card or for an EU-wide card of any sort. As far as I am aware, there is no proposal on the table. What has been discussed in the EU is biometrics for passports and biometrics for residents' documents. That has been discussed not only in the EU but in countries throughout the world—especially the United States—as a means of helping people to travel more effectively. There is no requirement, and the canard, if I might use a Frenchism, that this is all an EU plot—something that the right hon. Gentleman sometimes suggests—is not true in this instance.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): I agree with my right hon. Friend about the lack of an EU conspiracy. However, will he comment on why the UK alone is going down the route of having a centralised data base and an audit trail, which is not in line with recommendations that are coming from Europe?

Mr. Clarke: There are no recommendations coming from Europe on this matter so that the issue of being in line does not arise. The arguments for the Bill stand in their own terms. I remind my hon. Friend that they have been debated during the consideration of two Bills in this place and in the other place. They have also been considered on many occasions during debates on Lords amendments. However, the issue that my hon. Friend has raised is not the substance of the debate that is before us. My hon. Friend has been clear about her position throughout the debates and I have no criticism of that. I hope that she will now acknowledge, as an elected Member of Parliament, that it is time for the elected House to have its will and for unelected peers not to proceed as they are seeking to do.

I have no intention of accepting any changes that would have the effect of blowing a hole in the Bill or damage the delivery of the identity cards scheme. Of course, I have read carefully what was said yesterday in the other place. I recognise that some of their Lordships realise that they cannot continue to delay the passage of the Bill, and that there has to come a time when the unelected House should bow to the will of this House.

I was particularly struck that Lord Armstrong said that he would have no objection to obtaining an identity card when his passport came up for renewal. He said also that he thought that his amendment might form the basis for an acceptable compromise, possibly with the insertion of a time limit after which any opt-out would no longer apply. He went on to ask directly whether the Government would consider such a compromise. The answer that I have to give is that the Government are not being intransigent. If a different compromise were to be proposed—one that was workable—I would consider it carefully, as I have carefully examined a series of changes that we have made when considering how best to introduce this legislation.

I realise that there are many in the other place who feel uncomfortable about the length of time during which they have defied the will of the elected House. They know that it is wrong that they are in that position. I realise also that some of their Lordships are trying to end the impasse. I will watch carefully what happens next.

As I have made clear previously, the Bill will affect not only holders of British passports once these documents are designated. By about 2008 or 2009 we intend to start issuing biometric residents' permits to those foreign nationals who are temporarily resident in the UK. Without the requirement for designation and registration on a national identity register, foreign nationals will be able to opt out of the scheme completely. I believe that it would be entirely unacceptable if foreign nationals with those documents could opt out of registration, which would be the effect of the amendment that is before the House.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not.

There is little more that I can say other than to suggest that at this time the other place should listen and recognise that the elected House, again today, will insist on retaining the requirement in the Bill for anyone obtaining a designated document such as a passport to be entered on the national identity register. I believe that the scope for further compromise is small, but I and my right hon. Friend Baroness Scotland of Asthal will be prepared to listen constructively to what is said when the Bill returns to the other place today, in the hope that it can at last pass on to the statute book.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): In the spirit of that compromise—the Home Secretary knows that I am always prone to compromise—I would like the right hon. Gentleman to elaborate on the problem that he sees with respect to foreign residents being cut out by the proposal made by Lord Armstrong. If we can resolve the issue, we might come to some conclusion on the matter.

Mr. Clarke: As always, I am amazed, encouraged and even excited by the right hon. Gentleman's positive tone. The concern that I have, on the particular narrow point of foreign nationals, is that we are establishing the identity documents—in my opinion, rightly—and bringing them on to the national identity register. I understand the quasi constitutional objections of some in the other place to the idea that a British citizen should have an identity card whether they want it or not—that is the essence of their concern—but I do not believe that that concern should extend to foreign nationals under the schemes that operate. I am thinking about the protection of our borders. Occasionally, I see the comments of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden in the public media on such matters, to which he is deeply committed. That is one of the reasons why I think that the amendment from the other place is inappropriate. However, I hear what the right hon. Gentleman has to say.

As I have said before, it would be inappropriate and a waste of parliamentary time, in my opinion, for the Opposition in the other place to force the Government into using the Parliament Act to enact the proposed legislation. I hope that we shall reach a conclusion today. I have made it clear that the Government will listen and reflect on what is said both here and in the other place. I have to repeat that the Government cannot accept amendments Nos. 22J and 22K.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I hope that I can begin on an uncontroversial note in a debate on what has been a controversial Bill, and that is that the House must surely wish Lord Phillips of Sudbury the most speedy recovery from what I hope is a temporary illness.

The arguments for the Bill, as the Home Secretary said, stand in their own terms. It seems that the arguments in favour of the Bill stand in an interesting substance, but I am not sure that its own terms recommend it.

The Home Secretary would like us to believe that there is a huge constitutional wrangle between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, over which House of this Parliament should have supremacy—us, the elected House, or the other House as the unelected and largely appointed House. I say in parenthesis that a large proportion of its Members have been appointed by the present Prime Minister.

[Mr. Edward Garnier]

I would describe the dispute that we have in other terms: that it is a dispute between the citizen and the state. It is a dispute between truth and freedom of the individual and the power of the Executive. I would describe it—

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Garnier: Even in mid-sentence, I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cash: I do not want to cut my hon. and learned Friend short. Having said what he has just said, does he agree that it is not merely a question of battling with the Lords? The issue is fundamentally the constitutional point that he is making, which is the key to the answers to the questions that we are raising in these debates between the two Houses.

Mr. Garnier: I agree. We are debating, both in this Chamber and in the other place, the fundamental relationship between the citizen and the state. If we upset that balance, which has evolved over centuries, we shall do ourselves and our electorates a disservice.

I would not want to go over the arguments that we have had about the terms of the Labour party's manifesto at the last election. Those arguments are well known and they are clear. As I have said during previous debates, repetition never made a good point better. The point is there and it is one that the House can consider.

I gently remind the Government that their earlier reliance on the need to have biometric passports was irrelevant to the earlier debates on the Bill and the setting up of the national identity register, and is even more irrelevant today, especially in the context of Lord Armstrong's amendments.

Today, the Government can do two things. They can either stubbornly turn their face to the wall and ignore the helping hand that is proffered by Lord Armstrong or they can be sensible and realistic and accept it. I had an inkling from the Home Secretary—I was slightly put off by his over-excitement at the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), which I found a disturbing prospect—but I cast that aside. [Interruption.] The Home Secretary says from a sedentary position that he was dreaming about having a bath with my right hon. Friend. I will leave them to have those private discussions elsewhere.

A door may have opened in the Home Secretary's mind, because he uttered the word "compromise". That is a helpful step forward, because I did not think that that word could be extracted from his mouth. However, I would like more details—I am happy to accept an intervention from him—about the terms of any compromise that he would find acceptable. In the past, he has set his face against proposals from the other place and the Opposition. If he is in the mood to mention the word "compromise", perhaps he could tell us more about the nature of an acceptable compromise. In the meantime, as he queues with his towel outside the bathroom of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden—

Mr. Redwood: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Garnier: That queue appears to be growing.

2 pm

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, while compromise may be a good thing, there can be no compromise over the principle of compulsion? We cannot accept a compulsory identity card in this Parliament, given the Government's position at the election and the strong sense among our constituents that we want freedom in this country.

Mr. Garnier: I entirely agree, but I am trying to extract from the Government precisely how close to us they are prepared to move. The closer they move, the more likely they are to have their Bill not just before Easter but even tonight. We look forward to hearing their response either in the House or in the other place.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): My hon. and learned Friend said that he did not want to rehearse previous arguments but, further to the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), may I put it to him that each of these debates must be self-contained and intelligible to the widest possible audience? In seeking negotiation, it is highly pertinent to draw attention to the difference between what the Government have said today and what they said last May.

Mr. Garnier: I accept that but, as my hon. Friend will know, Dickens wrote some of his greatest novels as part works. They were serialised before being brought together to form a whole. I hope that his interventions in our debates will form part of a great encyclopaedia of parliamentary occasions, so that at the flick of an internet switch anyone will be able to search his great works.

I want to move on from our earlier debates, because last week, Mr. Deputy Speaker chided me for rehearsing that argument. Everyone knows my views on the Labour manifesto, and everyone knows what that manifesto says, so we can reach our own conclusions about the meaning of those English words. Lord Armstrong has sensibly endeavoured to find a way through that does not wreck the Bill and preserves a decent and proper balance between the citizen's rights and freedoms and the Government's necessary demands to realise their policy. His amendments are clearly not all that my party and I would want, but that is the nature of compromise. If the Government are prepared to accept our good will in supporting his amendments and if they are prepared to accept our genuine concerns about the rights of the individual as against the power of the state, I hope that they will conclude that Lord Armstrong's attempt to broker a deal between the two warring sides is certainly worth supporting this evening.

Lord Armstrong's amendments provide a clear and simple solution that achieves fairness and justice, and which ought to commend itself to hon. Members on both sides of the House, whether or not we support the general principle behind the Bill and the establishment of the national identity register. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) is in the Chamber, and he will know Government policy often appears to be made up on the hoof from day to day. Different announcements appear in the newspapers as the Bill is manoeuvred through the highways and byways of Government policy making. However, if the Government are confident that their policy is right, they should allow the public to prove their case by giving them the choice to opt out of registration on the back of designated documents.

Both the Home Secretary and Baroness Scotland have accepted the thrust of Lord Armstrong's amendments by arguing that people can avoid compulsion by stealth if they renew their passports before the Bill in its unamended form becomes law. If they are prepared to advise the public to "cheat" to avoid the Bill's requirements, it is not logical for them to resist Lord Armstrong's attempt to bring light to this overheated debate. I urge the House to be adult about the matter so that at least we can put a Bill that is clear on the statute book. If we accede to Lord Armstrong's amendments we will, I accept, dissatisfy both sides of the argument but, presumably, we will achieve consensus, which gives the Government time to think and digest the quality of the arguments for and against opting out. Lord Armstrong's intervention in this affair is timely and constructive and it is certainly worth queuing outside the bathroom of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden for it. I look forward to the Home Secretary moving quietly towards that upstairs room with his bath towel in hand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. Members that we have a little over 40 minutes left for this debate? Several Members wish to contribute, so I urge them to be concise.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): May I say straight away that I am in favour of the Lords amendment, which is a sensible proposal? I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will accept it, as Lord Armstrong has tried his best to find a solution. However, I must be frank and express some disquiet, as I am one of the few Members who is in a genuine dilemma about the issue. The Opposition parties have made it clear that they would be willing to accept the Lords amendments at the end of the day, and some of my hon. Friends take the same view. The large majority of my right hon. and hon. Friends support the Government regardless.

While I accept the need for the Lords amendment, I reiterate what I have said on many occasions as a Member of Parliament: it is the elected Chamber that should decide. It would therefore be wrong, irresponsible and contradictory to say that, just because I share the view of the majority in the House of Lords, their view should prevail. Like the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), I am encouraged by the Home Secretary's suggestion that there is room for compromise. The last thing that I want to do is use the Parliament Acts, but if the Lords absolutely refuse to agree, it is likely that they will be used. I accept that it is right to use them for certain issues, but it would be inappropriate to do so on this occasion. I very much hope that, even at this late stage, the Home Secretary is willing to enter negotiations—if that is the right description—to achieve a satisfactory outcome and to ensure that the view of the House of Commons prevails, whatever amendment or compromise is agreed. I do not think that we should be worried about compromise, as it is part of political life.

John Bercow rose—

Mr. Winnick: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not give way, as I wish to heed Madam Deputy Speaker's advice about brevity. I shall cross my fingers and hope that compromise can be reached to prevent ping-pong throughout the day and night. Most of all, I do not want the Parliament Acts to be used. If my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary used the word, and if he means what he said, I can only hope, like everyone else with doubts and reservations, that compromise will be reached today.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Last week I suggested to the Home Secretary that, if he rejected the amendments that were before us then, he would, as turned out to be the case, be facing the amendments before us today, which are arguably just as problematic from his point of view, because they would, as he explained, allow a wholesale opt-out from the need to register for an ID card. It remains my view that he would have been well advised to settle for the amendments that were before us last week. Even so, I hope that, even at this late stage, the Home Secretary will put himself and us out of our misery and accept the amendments from Lord Armstrong of Ilminster.

As the noble Lord said in the debate in the other place yesterday:

> "My amendments would restore an element of voluntariness—of personal freedom—which is absent from the Government's proposals", but that voluntarism, or voluntariness, as he put it, was entirely in keeping with the Government's oft-quoted election manifesto, where there was a clear emphasis on voluntarism in the introduction of identity cards, an emphasis which the Government have been so quick and keen to forget. As the noble Lord rightly said:

> "There are a good many people out there who genuinely thought that the Government were proposing a voluntary scheme, and they were prepared to go along with it on that understanding".—[Official Report, House of Lords; 28 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. 651.]

The Government have already conceded the principle—it was a welcome concession—that compulsion will occur only on the back of separate primary legislation, which makes it all the more inexplicable that they seek to reject amendments that would allow them to do precisely that and take a voluntarist approach in the early stages of the introduction of identity cards, to be replaced by legislation enforcing compulsion at a later stage. That is the Government's intention. That is what they have explained to us. The amendments do not disturb that plan at all; indeed, they are perfectly consistent with it.

The other compelling reason why the Government would be well advised to support the amendments is that they would allow time to deal with the accumulating list of uncertainties about how the draconian ID database would work in practice. We still do not know how much it would cost, who would run it or how they would run it. We have heard conflicting messages about chip and pin features and biometric features, but we do not know what would be on the card.

On Monday, we heard that yet another uncertainty had come to light. In a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) explained that some British citizens would have two identity cards—one listing their nationality, which could be confiscated if the Government wished to prevent them from travelling, and another not listing their nationality, which they would retain while the other one was confiscated, to access domestic services.

The written answer stated:

"However, to ensure that anyone subject to restrictions for an extended period of time can demonstrate their identity for domestic purposes, they will be able to obtain an identity card which will be issued to the same standards as other cards but which will not be valid for travel. This will be achieved by not specifying the nationality of the card holder on the face of the card.—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 758W.]

We now know that we might have not one, but two identity cards, on top of all the other uncertainties that I have enumerated. This is a model of bad Government policy and bad legislation. It raises the question why the country is expected to accept the imposition of a scheme that we know is illiberal in principle and flawed and open-ended in practice. For that reason and many others, I hope that the House will support the amendments tabled by Lord Armstrong.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): I feel that we are making very slow progress, but progress none the less, and I welcome that. I was delighted when the Home Secretary said this afternoon that he welcomed the positive tone being adopted.

The Lords amendments are a huge compromise. Some of us have had enormous reservations and have battled on the issue for weeks and weeks. It is almost difficult to accept but, in the interests of compromise, we must accept the Lords amendments, which are well intentioned and seem to be the only way forward that has a chance of reaching compromise with the Government. The Home Secretary said this afternoon that he will listen. That, too, is a welcome development, but only if he listens to the debate and is prepared to accept some compromise, whether the one now on offer or, later in the day, some other. Otherwise, listening and adopting a positive tone will mean nothing.

2.15 pm

We have made some progress already this afternoon. For the first time, we have heard from the Government what the debate is not about. We had been led to believe that it was about us coming in line with an international network of information that would allow us to tackle international terrorism and international crime. It was interesting that the Home Secretary said today that Britain was not acting as part of an international network, nor in relation to any requirement from the EU. We are doing it for our Government's national reasons. There is no doubt that they have sincere reasons, which we have heard from the Home Secretary in previous debates. We have established today that the scheme will not help us internationally. It may help us inside Britain to deal with those matters, but it will not be our contribution to an international effort to tackle terrorism and crime. It is important that the Home Secretary has said that.

The debate is also not about the so-called battle between the two Houses. I do not agree that this is a constitutional matter, and it should not be. That is a bad reason. Our Whips are undoubtedly putting pressure on Labour Members on exactly that basis—"Surely you cannot want to side with the Lords and obstruct the Commons". That is crude and represents a misunderstanding of our constitution.

We are a Parliament made up of two Houses and both of them have the same job: to scrutinise and hold the Government of the day to account. We should be doing that in co-operation with each other, which is not to say that the House of the Executive, which is this House, should not have supremacy. I believe that it should, but supremacy through co-operation, argument and compromise, not supremacy because we are elected. That is a very good reason, but in my view both Houses ought to be elected. As soon as they are, and I would hasten that day, that argument will fall. Even after both Houses are elected, this Chamber should be the supreme Chamber because the Executive is located here. The House of scrutiny should be along the other end of the corridor.

We are working on the same matters and, given that the job of both Houses is to scrutinise the Government, it is right and proper that, if the other House has doubts, it should express them and refer us to reconsider what we are doing and saying. There is nothing improper or unconstitutional about it. It is wholly constructive. The Lords are demonstrating the good faith of that constructive parliamentary attitude by coming up again and again with attempts to find a compromise. In this case, they have gone very far with amendments 22J and 22K. Those are worthy of the Government's consideration.

I hope that the Government will not seek to drive the proposition through now or later today. If they do, that would demonstrate that they were uncertain about their own case. They have good cause not to be confident. The Government do not trust the public to support an Identity Cards Bill that is truly voluntary. They have cited opinion polls showing that 70 per cent. of the public support identity cards, but the public do not know what will be in the register and do not understand it. When the public scrutinise the measure, I doubt whether they will accept a voluntary scheme. If the Government were really confident of their case, they would put it to the electorate and allow them to sign up or not sign up through a voluntary scheme. If they were persuasive and articulate, perhaps they would persuade the people of this country to sign up to a voluntary scheme.

Everybody is against terrorism and everybody is against international crime. If the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister were to make a sufficiently passionate and articulate case, we would get what we should have, which is a voluntary scheme that the people of this country want to sign up to because they see it as a co-operative effort against crime and terrorism. However, the Government do not have that confidence in their case and do not think that the public will sign up.

The Government are not confident that the country would support a compulsory scheme. If the scheme were compulsory, they would not be able to compel the public to sign up and charge them £90 or £100, in which case they would have to pick up the cost themselves. I do not think that the Home Secretary is confident that he can persuade the Chancellor to provide the £13 billion that the scheme will cost—the figure is possibly greater than that. If the Chancellor had had to consider in his Budget whether to make cuts or to put up taxes to find that £13 billion, the Home Secretary would have received a very dusty answer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should relate his comments not to the Budget, but to the amendments on the Order Paper.

Mark Fisher: I do not think that the Government are as confident about the view of either the public or the Chancellor as they have suggested. If they are not confident, and if the arguments that I have suggested carry any weight or merit, I beg the Home Secretary to find a compromise. Several compromises are possible, but the compromise that has come from the Lords today is very reasonable and represents a big step towards the Government. It certainly commends itself to me, so I shall support it, and I hope that it commends itself to the Government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Earlier, the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) raised a point of order, and I said that I would have the matter investigated, which I have done. I am satisfied that private interests, as defined for the purposes of hybridity, are not affected in a differential way.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): If reasoned argument were to prevail, the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) would see us through this day.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) has said from the Front Bench, this Bill is profoundly important. It challenges the very assumptions that many of us had about what being a British citizen is, namely the freedom to move around one's country not at the behest or let of the Government. The Government want to introduce a central data register, which seeks to look into the very depth and nature of the privacy of the citizen. That is territory that Britain has never faced before, not even through the wartime identity cards of the first world war or the second world war.

The Government are seeking profoundly to change the nature of our relationship with our state. Who is the servant and who is the master? The Government assert that the state must be the master, and they are therefore challenging our very understanding of what is personal liberty and freedom. I have always argued that the essential character of the British constitution and of how we have developed through the long march of everyman is about freedom. This scheme contradicts that central, basic principle and understanding of who we are.

The Government have called the ID card a voluntary card, and they have propelled that proposition on the basis that when one applies for a passport, it is, of course, a voluntary act. This is a trading nation, and the wealth and creativity of our people has been developed by engagement in the wider world—we have sought markets, and we have seen prosperity arise from that. The Government are now saying that one cannot engage in the very basis of the livelihood of this nation without applying for a passport and having an identity card linked to a central register. I do not suppose that many of us have the luxury of being able to say that we will desist from international trade or engagement with the outside world, so the compulsion lies in the necessity of having a passport.

The last time that we debated this matter, many of my hon. Friends asserted that we have a right to a passport, but we have no such thing. There is no common law that grants us the right to a passport, and there is no statute that defines the nature of citizenship. An article of the Canadian constitution firmly states the freedom of Canadian citizens to leave and enter Canada, but we have no such right, because it is a matter of the royal prerogative. That is what disturbs me, because it is almost a dictum of our modern constitution that we are all equal before the law.

I shall pose this question, because I want to see the Government explore the nature of our state: is the Queen to have an identity card? She is, after all, a citizen of Europe, so why should she not? Must she now have a passport—it is her prerogative, after all? Will the Prince of Wales be required to produce an identity card? I think that the Home Secretary should tell us straight whether we are all equal before the law. And why is the identity card linked to prerogative power?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think carefully. It is inappropriate for members of the royal family to be brought into this debate.

Mr. Shepherd: Of course, I accept your view, Madam Deputy Speaker, but this is an enormously important constitutional debate, and we are talking about the relationships between the citizen and the state.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are actually discussing Lords amendments rather than the wider context of this Bill.

Mr. Shepherd: I do not mean to argue, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the whole point of the debate and the Lords amendments is whether to introduce compulsion or discretion, and I was inquiring as to the extent of the compulsion or the extent of the discretion. I see that the Clerk looks agitated, so I shall leave the matter there. Nevertheless, I would be grateful if the Home Secretary were to address that narrow point. The wider point still remains—the issue is effectively about compulsion. I do not find the Lords amendments especially attractive, but I shall vote for them. These two equal Chambers of Parliament—[Interruption.] The two Chambers are indeed equal in our constitutional terms.

[Mr. Shepherd]

We are debating the amendments, because they have been sent here from another place. The Government are threatening that if they do not get their way, they will invoke, if necessary, the Parliament Act. I will stand by the Lords amendments for the purpose of asserting the freedom of the individual.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): I rise to speak as an unashamed supporter of compulsion in ID cards. I was the first to suggest the idea of an entitlement card and it was always conceived not as a compulsory to carry scheme, but a compulsory to have scheme. I regret the fact that the Government have resiled from that position. However, I now hear the words "voluntary" and "compulsory" used in slightly different ways and there may be room for, if not a compromise, at least a meeting of minds.

Lord Phillips, in the other place, and some hon. Members have described the Swedish ID card as voluntary. Indeed, the LSE document, which has been used as background by many hon. Members, also describes it as voluntary. Indeed, it is voluntary in an important sense, but it is not voluntary whether someone is on the identity register. People are placed on that at birth, and their national identity numbers include date of birth. However, if people have passports or driving licences, they do not also need to have an identity card, for the simple reason that the passport or driving licence can be used for exactly the same purposes as they might need a national identity card. It is voluntary in that sense—

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

2.30 pm

Martin Linton: I am sorry, but we must all heed Madam Deputy Speaker's words of warning and we need to make our points in the short time that is available.

Lord Armstrong of Ilminster is moving towards that sort of voluntary scheme, and I could happily live with that. Even Lord Phillips said that his amendment

"would have meant that the citizen had an option—effectively, for five years—on whether he or she wished to have an ID card."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 28 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. 645.]

If he means by that that one would be on the ID register but could choose whether to have an ID card, he should support the solution that is beginning to emerge. It is the ID register that is important, not the actual possession of a card.

When my passport runs out and I have to renew it, I cannot see that it will make much difference if an ID card is thrown in as well. I shall be happy because it provides an additional form of identity. The point was made in the last debate—it is central to the issue of voluntary and compulsory—that the information one gives to the Passport and Records Agency to renew one's passport is exactly the same as that required to go on the ID register. It consists of name, address, date and place of birth and nationality or immigration status—

Mr. Garnier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Martin Linton: No, I am sorry but we are all under a time pressure—[Interruption.] If hon. Members look at the relevant schedule, they will see that it is those four pieces of information that are required—

Mr. Garnier: You do not understand.

Martin Linton: With respect, it is other hon. Members who have failed to understand the basic point that the information is the same, and it is the registers that are different. Indeed, the No to ID website requests people's forename, last name, house number, road, town, postcode and e-mail address. Even the organisation campaigning against ID cards requests very similar information from the people who log on to its website as that required for a passport or driving licence or by the ID register.

My central point—I think that Lord Armstrong is moving towards it—is that no compulsion should be attached to having the ID card, but people who renew their passports should have the same basic information duplicated on the ID register. I see no reason why we should therefore prolong the argument—

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Martin Linton: I am sorry, but this is a one-hour debate. I consider myself lucky to have caught your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I want to make my points.

The argument put by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that the passport is not really compulsory has been widely mocked by people on the other side of the argument, but they must address the argument that if passports are compulsory, they are surely just as objectionable as ID cards. The ID card is no more than a passport to public services. It is a different form of passport, to be used in a different context. When someone wishes to obtain a benefit or open a bank account, they will not need to take their passport, which is a bulky document, because they will be able to use their ID card. It will work exactly the same as a passport does when crossing international borders. It will be a domestic passport and I do not understand why people object to one, but not the other.

At the heart of this debate lies deep confusion about the words voluntary and compulsory. If people are prepared to go along with Lord Armstrong's approach and accept that the important aspect is not the card but the register, we can all find common ground on which to agree.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I continue to be deeply concerned about the question of compulsion. It is still inherent in the principle of the Bill and I will not change my position on that. It concerns the relationship between the individual and the state, as the Information Commissioner said. The information that will be accumulated will not be changed by a compromise along the lines that are being discussed, although I understand the motivation for the compromise.

Mr. Garnier: Is my hon. Friend also concerned that the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), who made the last speech that we endured, failed completely to understand the difference between the requirement for a biometric passport, so that the biometrics can be read by a passport officer at the port of entry, and an ID card, which provides the gateway into the national identity register?

Mr. Cash: I could not agree more. The gateway is also the entry point for a form of compulsion that one would normally associate with countries that do not enjoy the freedoms of democracies such as the one in which we live—

John Bercow: Common law countries.

Mr. Cash: Indeed. The fact remains that this is an extremely important Bill. It is a very dangerous Bill, and much sophistry has been used by the Government in claiming the advantages of it. They have failed to understand how pervasive the state surveillance arrangement will be in practice and I am also deeply concerned by how it will differentiate between citizens. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) mentioned members of the royal family, but I am concerned about the ordinary man in the street and the differences in the timing of application. I have received a new driving licence and passport in the last week, because mine were stolen. Therefore, my exemption will extend until 2016.

I accept your ruling on my point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I understand it, but the principle that lies behind the issue of hybridity is not just a technical question. It is about treating people equally. The common law of this country should not contain one law for one section of the community and a different law for other sections. We apply the same principle in taxation. The constitutional question at the heart of this issue is not the difference between the two Houses, but the infringement on the freedom of individuals of this country and the differentiation between individuals who should be treated equally. I am utterly opposed to the principle of the Bill and will continue to be so.

Angela Watkinson: Does my hon. Friend share the confidence of the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) that the new identity cards will contain only the basic information of the four items that he listed? Might they not also, without our knowledge, contain a lot of additional information about health records, bank details, whom we know and where we go? Who would have access to that information?

Mr. Cash: I remain deeply worried about the ambit of the Bill and the powers that are being taken, which have recently been rather overlaid by much of the argument. There are powers in the Bill to make changes to the manner in which all these different requirements can be achieved.

The plain fact is that for all the reasons that I have given, I remain resolutely opposed to the Bill. I am astonished, although I should not be that surprised, by the authoritarian attitudes that are characteristic of this Government and, regrettably, of some Labour Back Benchers. That authoritarianism is reminiscent of another socialist—George Orwell.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): We have only five minutes left, so I will be brief.

Members who are interested in this debate will acknowledge that I have a long-standing involvement in it. I put forward the proposal before the Government did, and I believe that it is a good one. I accept that we need to try to reach a compromise with the Lords, because it is an important issue and it is much better if we can take it forward in some degree of harmony. I should like to propose a compromise that would be acceptable to me and, I hope, to the Government and the Lords.

Let me first explain what Lord Armstrong is trying to do, as I see it. He is saying that as long as the electorate have not explicitly voted for compulsory ID cards, it should be possible for people to get a passport without having to accept an ID card. We understand the logic of that. However, the amendment has some specific problems. First, it would result in the creation of parallel registers for the passport and the ID card, which would be very similar, if not identical—we would need to debate that.

Secondly, not everyone whom we would wish to accept an ID card would do so. With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher), it is not true that everybody is against terrorism—terrorists are not against terrorism. Nor is it true that everybody is against crime—criminals are not against crime. If we have a voluntary scheme whereby people can say, "No, I don't want to be on it," we know that in practice people of goodwill may or may not sign up, but those who are not of goodwill will say, very politely, "No, thank you—I choose to opt out." The law enforcement objectives of the Bill would be completely undermined.

Finally, the electorate voted for us without scrutinising every line and comma of our various manifestos. I appreciate the role of Opposition Members as guardians of the Labour manifesto: perhaps they would like to stand for the party's national executive committee. The majority of our voters who took a view on identity cards simply want us to get on with it, and will be baffled if we wait until 2012 to involve a significant proportion of the population.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Palmer: I cannot, because of the time available.

My compromise suggestion, which echoes that of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), is that we say that we accept—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will Members who have just arrived in the House please keep their conversations lower?

Dr. Palmer: We should say that we accept that if people register for a passport, their entry goes on to the national identity register, but that we also accept that people can refuse to take an ID card for as long as it is voluntary. If the electorate later agree that the scheme should become compulsory, at that stage their entries will be on the register and all that we need do is to let them know that their ID card is now ready. We would not be compelling them to take the card, but merely moving forward on the register, which is essentially the same as that for the passport. It seems to me that that is a key objective of Lord Armstrong in trying to avoid the compulsory issuing of identity cards, and that it also achieves the objectives of the scheme in moving forward and giving us the chance to do what the electorate understood that we wanted to do—to move forward with an identity card scheme.

I hope that this has been a helpful contribution to the debate. I also hope that we are able to reject the amendment, because I honestly do not think that it would work, and that when it goes back to the Lords, they will accept the change.

It being one hour after commencement of proceedings, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [13 February].

Question accordingly agreed to.

Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I must draw the House's attention to the fact that privilege is involved in Lords amendments Nos. 18 and 19. If the House agrees to either of those Lords amendments, I shall ensure that the appropriate entry is made in the Journal.

Clause 1

VARIATION OF LEAVE TO ENTER OR REMAIN

Lords amendment: No. 1

3.15 pm

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 5, 7 to 10, 20, 32 to 37, 39 and 40.

Mr. McNulty: This group of amendments is a package that will allow all decisions to be considered in a single set of appeal proceedings. I am glad that we have been able to make those changes in response to sensible concerns and suggestions, while achieving the effective one-stop appeal system that we sought. All the amendments are Government amendments reacting to sensible points made during the debate. That has characterised proceedings on the Bill in both this and the other place. Some good discussion and debate has taken place around a range of serious matters, which have been dealt with clearly by Front-Benchers on the Floor of the House and upstairs.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. McNulty: If I may, I shall progress beyond the first paragraph before giving way.

The amendments will restore an in-country right of appeal against a decision to curtail or to refuse to vary leave where the effect of such a decision is that the person in question has no leave to enter or remain. That is the case under existing legislation. That point was discussed at length in Committee and in another place.

Keith Vaz: I am sorry to have interrupted my hon. Friend before he gave us the good news. I welcome the fact that he has listened to those who have expressed worries about the proposals. Does he share my view that it is also important that the backlog of cases at the immigration appeal tribunal is dealt with as quickly as possible, so that people who appeal get quick decisions rather than having to wait a long time, thereby prolonging the delay?

Mr. McNulty: My hon. Friend will know that that point bears no relation to this set of amendments, but I am more than happy to concur with the thrust of his remarks. We are making the system far more effective, through a range of measures, than it is currently.

On the import of the amendments and the clauses to which they apply, we maintain that changes are needed to create an effective one-stop appeal system, with the caveat to which my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) referred about the original system. To facilitate that, we have created a power to make a removal decision while a person's leave is extended by statute. That will put the onus on the Government to make variation and removal decisions simultaneously in order to gain the benefits of that provision. Appellants will be able to contest a decision to curtail or to refuse to vary leave at the same time as they can contest a decision to remove them from the UK. That right of appeal can be exercised while in the UK and the appellant will continue to enjoy leave, on the same terms as before, during the appeal process. For example, a student will be able to continue studying throughout his appeal proceedings. Again, the position is the same under existing legislation.

We have also introduced a new order-making power, which will potentially place a limit on the power to certify asylum and human rights claims as clearly unfounded. The intention is that that will allow the Secretary of State to designate certain categories of applicants as being beyond the scope of the section 94 certification powers in the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. That will enable us to ensure that where people have been granted leave on a particular basis, they will always be entitled to an in-country right of appeal.

Those changes fit into the wider strategy of implementing an end-to-end migration process. That will incorporate other elements of the five-year strategy, such as the introduction of e-borders, which will help us to know when people fail to comply with the terms of their leave. Specific concerns were expressed, however, about clauses 1, 3 and 11, and the interplay between them, in terms of those variations, which I think we have rectified through the amendments.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The Minister referred to the assumption of a new order-making power and to a category of persons to whom it would apply. For the elucidation of those of us who did not serve on the Standing Committee and who have not been privy all along to the details of the Government's thinking, can he say exactly who will be in that category and therefore to whom the new order-making power will apply?

Mr. McNulty: That is an entirely fair point. We do not intend to use that power with any repetition or regularity, but at one end of the process it will include children, and in other cases it will include those who, through the Special Immigration Appeals Commission or other processes, have been earmarked as necessarily being excluded. It is not—I am grateful that this did not characterise our deliberations too much—a universal power that affects everyone but is used in limited circumstances. In many other debates on the subject, the House has taken a universalistic approach to measures that were intended to deal with very limited circumstances. That certainly applies in this instance.

I said in Committee that when we were in a position to elaborate before embarking on the process of making the order, if it proved possible to consult and give the

[Mr. McNulty]

House further details of the nature and shape of the order before it was put to the House I would do so, in keeping with the approach that I had tried to adopt in Committee.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): By how much will the appeal process be shortened if the Government amendments are passed?

Mr. McNulty: The main purpose is to establish a one-stop appeal process and for all matters to be considered on that one-stop basis. At worst, there are currently any number of lengthy delays leading up to an appeal on variation of leave, and further delay after the appeal has been resolved and as a prelude to an appeal on removal. By definition, the amendments must truncate the appeal process while, crucially, maintaining all the human-rights considerations such as fair play and natural justice that should prevail during it.

The strict answer to the hon. Gentleman's question really depends on his definition of how long the combined process lasts now, and on how we can reduce it to one stop. However, there is a backstop to all the options in the shape of natural justice and all the other elements of given rights, and a full deliberation on all aspects of an individual's case at the one-stop appeal.

I have not counted them, but there is a range of amendments which, although consequential, are consequential to substantive amendments that go to the heart of many of the genuine anxieties expressed by Members of both Houses about a crucial matter, which some Members may wish to follow up. I refer to the interplay between clauses 1, 3 and 11, and the way in which they relate to all aspects of appeals on variation of leave. We think that the Bill is now in much better shape—

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con) rose—

Mr. McNulty: I shall return to the stereo in a moment. First, if I may, I shall finish my sentence.

We think that the Bill is now in much better shape because of the scrutiny here, in Committee and in the other place, and that the House can feel more than satisfied that the current proposals are appropriate.

Mr. Gerrard: May I return to the point raised by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow)? I believe that it related to Lords amendment No. 10, which deals with the order-making power in regard to certification. If I understand the amendment correctly, it provides for the Government to introduce orders under the power to protect people from certification. I trust that that would apply to a number of groups, as well as unaccompanied children. The amendment seems to imply that certification will, or may, happen unless an order is introduced.

Mr. McNulty: In relation specifically to the amendment, my hon. Friend is right. In the wider context of certification, the provision goes beyond that. When we discussed the issue in Committee, my hon. Friend expressed particular concerns about unaccompanied children. I said then, and repeated a moment ago, that when we knew the final shape and direction of not just the order but the substance, I would be more than happy to present it to the House before the order-making process went ahead in the normal fashion.

Mr. Bone: As the Minister knows, I write to him frequently because of the immigration issues that arise in my surgery. Three or four will probably arise this week. Although it is claimed that the process will be completed within 13 weeks, it is generally more like 13 months, which causes a great deal of anxiety. I hope that the amendments will improve the position.

Mr. McNulty: I cannot claim that the amendments will deal with the much-vexed issue of the 13-week clause in letters, but I take the hon. Gentleman's wider point about the immigration and nationality directorate—rather like other Government bodies—saying what it means and meaning what it says. As the hon. Gentleman will know, I have engaged in extensive meetings, six or seven of them, with a range of Members. Some, but not all, have focused on new Members. I had a meeting only the other day—happily, I did not spend too much time at it—with the Liberal Democrats. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) has received this information yet, but I have said that if a meeting with new Conservative Members proves necessary, I shall be more than happy to arrange it. However, I hope, and am assured, that the stock of "It will take only 13 weeks" letters is diminishing as we speak.

I want the IND to be very clear about relisted time limits, however embarrassing that may be. I envy the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) if he receives only three or four letters a week; my office, in a London constituency, receives about that number in an hour, and far more cases arise in my surgery. We should bear it in mind that the people involved are often in the most vulnerable circumstances. To them, 13 weeks means 13 weeks, and after 13 weeks, to the day, they are on the telephone to Members of Parliament and others wanting something to be done. The time limits should reflect reality. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that the position is improving, but scope remains for things always to get better, as someone said.

John Bercow: As the Minister will know, the demography of my constituency is such that I do not receive a large number of such cases, but those that I do receive are of great importance to the people who come to me, and of great importance to me.

May I ask the Minister two things about the order-making power? First, it is not clear to me—I am not suspicious, but I want to know—whether it is subject to the negative procedure of the House, as I suspect, or to its affirmative counterpart. Secondly, may we have sight of further details of the power before the legislation is given Royal Assent?

Mr. McNulty: In answer to the second question, I can say—without tempting presumption in relation to this House or the other place—that I hope for a rather swift Royal Assent. I therefore cannot promise sight of those details between now and Royal Assent, assuming that matters proceed as I expect—although they may not, of course. I repeat, however, that I will ensure that the House has sight of the details before the order is laid, so that Members know what is coming rather than seeing it for the first time on the Order Paper. Although I am loth to encourage the hon. Gentleman, because I concentrated on his second question the first now completely escapes me. If he will repeat it, I will respond to it.

John Bercow: Negative versus affirmative.

Mr. McNulty: I shall need to check. The Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee asked us to adopt the affirmative procedure in regard to a range of order-making powers, and in the main we have done that. I hope that I shall receive some sort of inspiration and will be able to let the hon. Gentleman know the answer to his question, but as these are serious matters I have tried more often than not to ensure a positive rather than a negative. Having said that, I must say that in this case it is a negative. However, we shall deal later with other cases that are overwhelmingly positive because we have followed the deliberations of the DPRRC, wherein lies the source of many of the other amendments.

With those caveats, and with the assurance that I shall ensure that the order is available before it is tabled and we engage in the rather limited negative process, I commend the amendments. I think that they put the relationship between clauses 1, 3 and 11 into far better shape, and for that I thank this House and the Standing Committee.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): I am sure that the whole House was delighted to see the Minister rise to move this group of amendments, given his slightly strange failure to reach the starting gate a couple of weeks ago, when we were meant to be discussing them. I am also very conscious that some in this Chamber, including him, have been toiling for months in the vineyard that is this Bill. I have been added to the toilers at the back-end of the eleventh hour of our proceedings; indeed, I feel like a substitute sent on in injury time, trying to find the pace of the game.

As the Minister said, essentially this group of amendments deals with the vexed subject of appeals, which has been debated passionately throughout the various proceedings in both Houses. I welcome his agreement that they are a tribute to the debates in another place. I pay specific tribute to Baroness Ashton, who has shown that she is a Minister capable of listening and of engaging in constructive debate with Opposition parties. That welcome ministerial attribute is not always a universal one; however, it is a universal attribute of the better Ministers.

There are a number of important issues to discuss when we come to the other groups of amendments, so I shall be brief, particularly given that, in essence, we support the changes that their Lordships have made to this part of the Bill. We share the aim of a shorter appeal process. Over-long legal proceedings bedevil the whole immigration process and, as has already been demonstrated in interventions, they are one reason why so many of those involved in the immigration process regard it as a failing policy area.

We have just discussed the standard 13-week letter that all of us have received from the immigration and nationality directorate. The Minister says that he still has a stock of them that he needs to get through. To be candid, for many of us, the easiest way to get through them would be simply to cross out "week" and insert "month", because these days, 13 months is much more likely to be the time within which people expect to get a response. The Minister probably knows better than anyone that that is simply unacceptable. It is a symbol of the delays that have occurred throughout the process, so we welcome the attempt, through these amendments, to balance the desire to shorten the appeal process with the essential safeguarding of the legal right of those going through the process to feel that they are not being put at a particular and important disadvantage by the Government's proposed changes, which do, of course, in some ways reduce the right of appeal.

The key point is that these amendments meet the concern—expressed by Members of all parties—that an appeal against refusal to vary leave should be in-country, and that people's leave should be preserved on the same terms and conditions until that appeal is finally determined. We therefore welcome them, and we also welcome the fact that appellants with humanitarian protection and unaccompanied minors—a key and sensitive area that, to judge by other groups of amendments, we will consider again later—will benefit from the changes. We welcome the fact that if an asylum appeal is certified as being clearly unfounded, it can still be heard out of country; however, the possibility remains of challenging the certificate by judicial review. That is a sensible step.

Finally, the Immigration Law Practitioners Association seeks two valid assurances. First, can the Minister offer an assurance that the amendments do not create any new powers to subject people to restrictions, over and above the powers that already exist in respect of those with an in-country appeal against a decision to refuse to vary leave? Secondly, can he assure us that the Government are considering using their new powers to protect certain groups from certification of their asylum claims as "clearly unfounded"? I believe that the answer to both questions is yes, but it would be helpful all round if the Minister could say so formally here today.

Mr. Gerrard: I will be brief. The amendments go a long way towards answering many of the concerns that were raised in Committee about the changes to appeal rights. Indeed, I welcome many of the changes that have been made.

I have referred already to Lords amendment No. 10, but No. 8 is also important as it deals with a matter that I discussed at some length with the Minister in Committee. It clarifies the position of people whose application for variation of leave is refused and who are waiting for their appeal to be heard, by providing that the terms and conditions of leave will be preserved until that appeal is determined. I hope that I am right in believing that that provision reads over to the clauses dealing with employment, so that people with leave to be here and permission to work would retain that permission until their appeal had been heard.

[Mr. Gerrard]

In Committee, I said that many hon. Members would be familiar with the problem that people given exceptional leave to remain for a number of years might apply for indefinite leave, but that consideration of the application can take so long that their exceptional leave expires. The amendments provide that the terms and conditions of that exceptional leave will still apply, so that people will retain their permission to work. Unfortunately, the problem is that, because such people will be able to show on paper only that their exceptional leave to remain has expired, potential employers do not believe that they retain their permission to work. Similar problems arise with the Benefits Agency—because people's exceptional leave to remain has expired and their valid application for indefinite leave has still to be determined, the agency asks for proof that they are entitled to benefits.

I hope that the Minister will confirm that when the new systems are introduced, people who are notified that their application for variation of leave has been refused and that they have a right of appeal are also told that their existing permission to remain is valid until the appeal is determined. That would help everyone. The people involved would be able to convince employers or the Benefits Agency, if necessary, that their previous entitlements still applied.

Mr. Bone: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that confusion about the matter is a big problem? People bring various bits of paper to advice surgeries, but are not sure what they can and cannot do, so what he suggests would be most helpful.

Mr. Gerrard: It is very common to see people who are not clear about such matters, but most of the people whom I see believe that they should remain entitled to work or to claim benefit. Their problem is that potential employers do not accept that, as it is not possible to produce a piece of paper that says so. All they have is a piece of paper showing that their exceptional leave to remain has expired.

It would help everyone—the individuals concerned, employers, the Benefits Agency and MPs who hold advice surgeries—if the Home Office were to make it clear, when issuing notices of revocation, that people have a right to appeal and that existing permissions continue until that appeal is heard.

Having said that, I welcome the changes that have been made. They pick up many of the points made in Committee, and the structure of the relevant clauses is much better and more acceptable as a result.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): With the use of several metaphors, the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) told us how late he had come to the Bill. I come to it even later, but I make no excuses for that because every year there is an immigration and asylum Bill to catch. I have worked on many of them in previous years.

I do not want to extend the debate on this group of amendments, which I welcome. I acknowledge the Minister's comments about the care that has been taken on both sides—in Committee and on Report in this and another place—to make the measure a workable piece of legislation. I endorse what the hon. Member for Ashford said about Baroness Ashton of Upholland, who is an outstanding Minister. She is characterised by her preparedness always to listen to what is said and to react politely and transparently. She is an object lesson to all Ministers in either House—[Interruption.] Of course, that applies to all Home Office Ministers.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) probably knows more about immigration and asylum than any other Member. He made some apposite comments about documentation, which I support.

The amendments make it clear that there will be in-country appeal and that leave will be preserved according to the same terms and conditions until the appeal is determined. I hope that that will be welcomed on both sides of the House, so that we can move on to groups that contain slightly more contentious issues, which will need longer debate.

Mr. McNulty: I was asked to respond to a couple of points. I shall happily take back to Baroness Ashton people's kind words, which I heartily endorse all round. Once or twice, she invoked me as her Big Brother, nastier version in the Commons, but it got the job done, which is what matters.

The hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) made a fair point when he asked for an assurance that the new powers would not subject people to restrictions over and above existing powers that apply to a person with an in-country appeal against a decision to refuse, vary or curtail leave. I happily give that commitment. The amendments create a new power to make a removal decision while a person has continuing leave, but they do not create new powers to restrict a person's activities, so because people will have continuing leave during an appeal they cannot be detained, or required to report, during the currency of their appeal.

I concur with the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) knows far more than anybody else about these matters. Happily for me, this is my first immigration Bill; my hon. Friend has worked on all of them since 1997. We do not always agree about them, but I certainly agree about his integrity and the informed manner with which he puts his case.

My hon. Friend made two points. One was about practicality and goes beyond the Bill. The second was specific to the Bill and I can tell him that, yes, people will have continuing leave on the same terms; for example, if they were able to work before the original decision, they can continue to do so before the appeal. We discussed that at length in Committee.

My hon. Friend's second point, which related more to the practicalities, was how we could reach clarity about a person's continuing status during the appeal. We need to consider that in some detail, but I hope that he agrees that it is a question of practicalities—how we get the message across and raise awareness—rather than substantial to the amendments. We accept the amendment and I commend it to the House.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 5 agreed to.

Clause 4

ENTRY CLEARANCE

Lords amendment: No. 6.

3.45 pm

Mr. McNulty: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

If the interplay between clauses 1, 3 and 11 dealt with in-country appeals, clause 4 is just about entry clearance officer appeals. I say that because there was some confusion about whether all those matters came broadly under one heading. The other complication is that clause 4 relates not only to much of what is in the five-year strategy, but equally to what is in the points-based system document that was launched just the other week. Again, I can say, at my emollient best—we all have the training; some of us retain it better than others, and I am clearly not one of them—that I am happy to accept the Lords amendment because there were concerns about how things would operate once appeal rights were removed.

As I have said before, as and when we introduce various parts of the points-based system, only then will the appeal rights fall away. So there is not a big bang approach or a notion that, pending Royal Assent and subsequent commencement, appeals disappear, creating a gap before the points-based system and the new arrangements are introduced. We have made it clear that we will take away the appeal rights, as afforded by clause 4, only as and when the equivalent element of the points-based system is in place.

Clause 4 will remove appeal rights simultaneously with the introduction of the tiers of the new system. We need not dwell on the new system, but I accept the concerns expressed in the Lords amendment: if we are making such a move, which is radical in introducing the points-based system and perhaps in removing the appeal process, it is incumbent on us to make substantive reports to the House about the efficacy or otherwise of the system once the appeal process has been removed. That is essentially what the Lords amendment is about, and we are happy to accept it.

The report will include an assessment of the effect of removing appeals and look at the administrative review process that we will create and other aspects, including—this may be some of concern to hon. Members, but it is not meant to be—the notion that opinions may be recorded, under subsection (3)(g). We want the report to be as full as possible. We want it to include concerns and opinions about how effective or otherwise the system has been from what we are now told—in the training school for Ministers—to call stakeholders. The various groups that have some interest in the efficacy of the points-based system and the removal of appeals should be included in a report presented to the House.

In conclusion, the Lords amendment meets some of those concerns, including the broad concern that British public policy is terribly good at making legislation but not terribly good at taking account of, evaluating and feeding back the success or otherwise of that legislation. That is what the report seeks to address, so we are happy to accept the Lords amendment in the spirit in which it was intended.

Damian Green: This will be the apogee of cross-party agreement on the Bill in some ways, since I am inevitably happy to support the Lords amendment, which was tabled by my noble Friend Baroness Anelay. Once the Government had rejected the arguments of a wide coalition, including the CBI and Universities UK, that their original ideas about the implementation of clause 4 would be disastrous, my noble Friends in another place had to find the best available option, given the pressures of the Salisbury convention, which they always observe, and Lords amendment No. 6 is precisely the best available option.

The Minister should be aware, however, that in supporting the Lords amendment we do not resile from the deep sense of unease that caused us to vote against the underlying clause, clause 4, in Committee. There are a number of reasons why the reporting back procedure that the Lords amendment proposes is the bare minimum necessary to allow Parliament to take a proper considered view of the Government's very radical reductions in the rights of those who apply for entry into this country.

The key to whether the new system will work is the quality of initial decision making. At the moment, almost no one has much confidence that that is up to the task. I dare say that even the Minister, in his more honest private moments, wonders whether it is.

The assurance given by the Government throughout the debates, and again this afternoon, has been that the new points-based system, which they have now published, makes everything so transparent and easy for applicants and their sponsors that the world will change and difficulties will melt away. Again, privately, in his honest moments, the Minister will understand why those who have regular contact with the immigration system in this country will be profoundly sceptical about the optimism shown by the Government on that issue.

In this debate we will wish to confine ourselves to the issues that make reporting back vital. The Minister will be aware that many people still find huge flaws in the operation of the system. As I said, the quality of decisions is the key to this matter. Last year, 53 per cent. of appeals against refusals of entry clearance were allowed. It is worth dwelling on that figure. It is more likely than not that if someone appeals against a refusal, they will be successful. The initial decisions are slightly more likely to be wrong than right. I cannot imagine many areas of public policy where we would regard that as an acceptable initial performance—[Interruption.] As ever, the Minister has gone back into chuntering mode. If he wishes to challenge the figures, I am sure that he can do so.

Throughout the debates in both Houses, it has been clear that there is profound dissatisfaction with the entry clearance system. The Minister is trying to assure us that the new points-based system will resolve all that. At best, the verdict will have to be "not proven", because he has not got the new system in place yet. The degree of scepticism shown by everyone involved in the process is entirely right.

Mr. Bone: Sitting in my surgery and listening to the people who come in and say that their applications have been refused, I wonder about the standard of consistency between decisions. I hope that this system will make things slightly better.

Damian Green: My hon. Friend makes one of the many good points that are made by those who suffer under the current system: the quality of decision making seems to be hugely variable, depending on from which entry post the applications are originally made. That is shown in the statistics as well. Some of them have much higher rates of successful appeals than others. One can only assume that that reflects a variable quality of initial decision making. It is impossible to imagine that it reflects anything else.

The Government's point is that the new system is better because it will be much more objective and transparent. Good—let us hope that that happens. However, as the Minister himself said in Committee:

"100 per cent. objectivity is a fool's errand . . . It is not about simply ticking boxes and adding points up, although that is a large part of the measure."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 20 October 2005; c. 116.]

He is absolutely right about that. The system will not be 100 per cent. objective. Subjectivity will still come in, so if the new system is to inspire more confidence and perform better than the existing system, it is essential that everyone can be confident that the people making the decisions, which will still be subjective in part, are up to the job. That is one of the key reasons why it is vital that we review the system after a few years.

The other key point was made at length by the outgoing independent monitor, Fiona Lindsley, who has been extensively quoted in the debates on the issue. Talking about the system and referring to the fact that 37 per cent. of appellants were successful in paper-based appeals, she said, "That is pretty damning." The Minister is famously contemptuous of everyone who disagrees with him, but I hope that he will take an independent monitor seriously, especially as she pointed out that the National Audit Office broadly agreed with her assessment of the system. If she thinks that the system is inadequate and the National Audit Office thinks that it is inadequate, it is not unreasonable for other people to think the same.

One could have many serious reservations about what the Government are doing, and I congratulate their lordships on producing a way in which the House, the other place—and, indeed, anyone involved in the system—can come back in a few years to find out whether the Minister's optimism was justified. I hope that it will be justified, but I fear that it will not.

Mr. Heath: Again, I do not need to take long. I entirely welcome the fact that the amendment was moved and accepted in the other place and that the Minister is accepting it today. The amendment represents a small move towards effective post-legislative scrutiny. It is hardly a revolutionary step in that direction, but at least it gives us a yardstick by which we can measure the performance of the system in future years. I do not think that that measure will be enough to let us make a proper assessment, so I hope that the relevant Select Committees will examine the performance of the system carefully, using the report as their basis. I agree with the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) that the success rate of appeals is a crude indicator, but it certainly suggests that there is a limit to the accuracy of the present assessment procedures. That, at the very least, gives us an indicator of where we should be looking.

Proposed new subsection (3)(g), in Lords amendment No. 6, which reads "may record opinions", is especially valid because it will allow not just the accumulation of numerical data, but impressions to be sought and given about the way in which the system is working. When the Minister talks about stakeholders—many of us have difficulties with that term as a concept—I hope that he is not referring simply to the usual suspects and the obvious organisations that might have a prepared opinion, whether that is on immigration, legal matters or business. I hope that the group will also include those who are directly affected, either as users, or perhaps as individuals in the small business sector. The Minister will know that there are specific concerns about the recruitment of staff in ethnic restaurants.

Keith Vaz: As the hon. Gentleman has covered the point, I do not need to go on about all the ethnic restaurants in the United Kingdom. However, I put it to him that when we examine the overall spread of immigration decisions, it is important that we consider the robustness and effectiveness of entry clearance decisions. It is not just a question of the Home Office getting things right. If the review process shows that changes have to be made regarding decisions on posts abroad, they should be implemented.

Mr. Heath: I could not agree more. When I was a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, we examined closely consular activities and procedures in the sub-continent of India and Pakistan. I hope that we made constructive comments about the arrangements that were in place. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point, welcome the amendment and hope that we will examine carefully how the system works in the future.

Mr. McNulty: There is little to come back on. I thank hon. Members for their comments. The Bill will be improved by the amendment, which we are happy to accept. I shall not dwell on the undue provocation of casual empiricism at length from the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green). I forgive him that, given that he is new in his post, but much of what he said was complete nonsense and factually inaccurate, and it would not stand up in the gentlest of winds. However, in the spirit of emollition and scrutiny—

Damian Green: Be specific.

Mr. McNulty: I will be specific at length afterwards, but I do not want to waste people's time now, as the hon. Gentleman did. In the broader spirit, rather than in my normal spirit, I commend the amendment to the House.

Clause 15

PENALTY

Lords amendment: No. 11.

4 pm

Mr McNulty: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 12 to 16.

Mr. McNulty: These amendments are all, in the main, fairly minor and technical. Some go to points made by the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee; here, rather than elsewhere, we move from negative to affirmative procedure with some of the order-making powers, especially in amendments Nos. 12 and 13. Some dwell on—legalistic purists might demur at this—the issue of effluxion of time, which might be better put into English in the Bill, so it duly is, in amendment No. 15. Many of the other provisions simply repeat these technicalities or go to some of the consequences that should be reflected from the Equality Bill. I know that people always bristle and become deeply suspicious when a Minister contends that a series of amendments is minor and technical. They scurry off and read them in great detail, because they having the feeling that the Minister is trying to hide something. I can assure the House that in this instance all the amendments before us, which were agreed to by the other place, are entirely acceptable to the Government. In that spirit, I ask the House to accept the amendments.

Damian Green: I will not bombard the Minister with any more facts, because I know that under the bluster he is a sensitive flower who dislikes facts that he finds uncomfortable being put forward. However, I shall ask him a question. Unusually, I am happy to accept his assurance that the amendments before us are largely technical. Despite all the evidence, I wish to believe him on this matter.

The amendments are clearly designed to remove some of the ambiguities in the Bill. Perhaps the Minister could comment on whether he thinks that the amendments are sufficient to cope with public sector employers who fall foul of the Bill. For example, what penalty would fall on an NHS hospital trust that employed a chef who did not have leave to remain? Clearly that will be one of the practical effects of the legislation. We know that the NHS—it is probably the best example—is the biggest employer of immigrant labour in this country. The amendments seem to be designed, and rightly so, to catch private sector employers who are breaking the law. However, there is ambiguity about how the provisions affect the public sector, particularly that part of it which is undifferentiated. Will this be at trust level or at general NHS level? [Interruption.] I am grateful to the Minister for his desire to intervene.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Minister intervenes, I must say that none of the amendments relates to the public sector.

Mr. McNulty: I am not sure whether to continue with my intervention or to begin it again.

The law in this instance, in this set of amendments and in this area generally relates to employers, period. There is no differentiation or distinction under the law.

Damian Green: I believe that to be the case. I apologise if I was misinterpreting the amendments. My understanding was the same as the Minister's, which is that they apply to employers whether in the public or the private sector. I assume that the Minister is saying that the effect on private and public sector employers will be the same.

I shall ask the Minister a specific question about the NHS. It seems that people can be employees of a hospital trust or of a primary care trust, but within that there is some genuine ambiguity about what will be the relevant authority.

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point about the number of changes to immigration law that have affected employers over the past few years. Does he agree that it is incumbent upon the Government to make employers aware of these changes? I know that the Minister has talked about the various seminars that he has attended on the changes being proposed to managed migration. It is important that employers, particularly small businesses, are made aware of what is happening. The penalties are extremely severe.

Damian Green: The hon. Gentleman is right. Like him, I have had meetings with trade groups, particularly from the restaurant trade, who make the point that many of their members feel remote from legislation and find it difficult to access information. They are therefore vulnerable when legislation is changed and the changes have a serious effect on their business. If the Minister is saying that there is no possible ambiguity I welcome his reassurance. However, perhaps we should deal with the matter privately in correspondence, as I believe that ambiguities remain in the Lords amendments.

John Bercow: The fact that the Lords amendments are silent about sectors does not in itself make them unclear or unintelligible, but does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) made a good point about the need to provide clarity for businesses, particularly small and medium-sized enterprises? The onus is on Ministers, not to ask companies to come to a seminar—frankly a small business does not have the time to attend seminars—but to ensure that a pithy and distilled summary is sent at Government expense to employers who want to comply but may not know how to.

Damian Green: That is right. Clearly, there are problems that affect small businesses in the private sector, especially those run by members of ethnic minority populations, so the Government have a significant duty to act. I am concerned that there is a dichotomy between the way in which the private and public sectors are affected by the Lords amendments. I hope that the Minister will try to reassure me that there is absolutely no difference and that there is no ambiguity in the Bill's provision as they affect parts of the public sector.

Keith Vaz: Briefly, may I reinforce the point made by the hon. Members for Buckingham (John Bercow) and for Ashford (Damian Green)? I appreciate the enormous amount of time and effort that the Minister devotes to these matters. He works assiduously on behalf of his constituency, and he is known throughout the wider Asian community as a champion of the ethnic minorities community, so that record makes it easier for him to introduce tough legislation on immigration.

I urge the Government, however, to take enormous care with the Bill's provisions, as there have been huge changes in immigration law in the nine years in which they have been in office. The House understands why they have decided to introduce those changes. The problem is partly inherited, but it is also caused by the huge number of people who have come to the country in the past 10 years or so seeking asylum, and by the large number of cases that have been turned down.

Enforcement is an issue, too. I have many ethnic minority businesses in my constituency, as do the Minister and other hon. Members, and genuine employers are under enormous pressure. As the hon. Member for Buckingham said, although we welcome the seminars and discussions offered by the Minister, employers find it difficult to find the time to attend those meetings. I fully support the proposal to issue a clear document to those businesses precisely to explain the changes in the law, so that there is no concern on their part that they may be acting unlawfully. They do not have time to attend seminars, or the resources to employ solicitors. I declare an interest, because my wife is an immigration solicitor—although I am not touting for business on her behalf. It is an expensive business, and it is the duty of the Government to ensure that the information is provided to such employers. I hope very much that that can be done.

I remember that when he was Minister for Europe, the present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said that he could reduce the whole of the European constitution to, I think, 50 words. I do not know how, but if he could do that with the European constitution, the Government could make a real effort so that employers understand the enormous changes that will occur as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was anxious not to cut off the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) in mid-speech, but this is not intended to be a general debate on clauses 15 to 26. It is about six specific Lords amendments. Also, when we have a timed motion before us, as we have now, there is a temptation and a tendency to stroll through the early amendments, and then we find the House galloping frantically towards the end. I hope that that will not happen to us today.

Mr. Heath: I particularly welcome your comments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as there is a risk of our not reaching some important business. We had a useful diversion into the dissemination of information to businesses, which is extremely important but is not the matter before us. If businesses are not sure of the law, that will act as a deterrent to the employment of people whose immigration status is unclear in the mind of an employer.

The Minister invited us to accept his assurance that the amendments were technical. I have not the slightest intention of accepting an assurance from the Minister that amendments are ever technical. What I am prepared to do is look at the amendments and take a view. My view is that the amendments are technical, and welcome.

Mr. McNulty rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been calling the Minister routinely, but as we are dealing with Lords amendments, he will need the leave of the House if he wishes to respond. There is no automatic need for him to respond.

Mr. McNulty: With the leave of the House, and at the risk of challenging the Deputy Speaker's exhortation, I shall respond to a couple of points. First, there is no ambiguity. I want to make that clear. The provision is about the legal contract between employer and employee. There is no distinction between public and private employers. Secondly, I take the points that hon. Members have made and plans will be put in place. When changing the law, it is incumbent on Government to make sure that information is disseminated throughout the sectors affected, even those that are hard to get at, such as small businesses generally and those in the ethnic community specifically.

I am firmly convinced that at some stage in the very near future, there will be time for a consolidated asylum and immigration miscellaneous provisions Bill, but now is not the time. I commend the Lords amendments.

Clause 34

OFFENCE

Lords amendment: No. 17.

Mr. McNulty: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

The House will be happy to know that again, the Government accept the Lords amendment. Again—although I advise Members to check for themselves—it is a minor and technical amendment, which clarifies the nature of an offence when a person in Scotland refuses to comply with English or Welsh police information requested under e-borders. That is entirely routine and simply tidies up the provisions and takes account of the Scottish dimension. I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if that was a stroll.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Clause 43

ACCOMMODATION

Lords amendment: No. 18.

Mr. Gerrard: I beg to move amendment (a) to the Lords amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment (b) to the Lords amendment.

Mr. Gerrard: There has been a misunderstanding about Lords amendment No. 18 and section 4 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. To make it clear what we are talking about, I remind hon. Members that section 4 of the 1999 Act applies to people who have had their asylum claims refused, who have lost their appeals, who have reached the end of the process and who have agreed that they will leave the UK when it is possible for them to do so, which is a condition of receiving support under section 4. In some cases, people have signed up to say that they will leave the UK when it is possible for them to do so, not because they really want to leave, but because that is the only way in which they can get any support. Nevertheless, the vast majority of people covered by section 4 are receiving support because the Home Office accepts that it is not possible to return them to their countries of origin at this time.

4.15 pm

Last year, the number of people covered by section 4 rose to 7,000. Many of them were failed asylum seekers from northern Iraq, but there were also significant numbers of people who were originally from Zimbabwe and whom it was impossible to remove for obvious reasons—other countries that were heavily represented include Democratic Republic of the Congo and Somalia. Although the Home Office would say that people covered by section 4 are about to leave the United Kingdom, the reality is that people are and will be on section 4 for significant periods of time, so the provision is not necessarily just for a week or two.

The Lords amendment and my amendment to it address the issue of vouchers. Some of the discussion has not been clear, and some people outside this House have not realised that people who are covered by section 4 now are getting support in vouchers. Section 4 allows for accommodation and food, and if people are getting food that is not provided in their living accommodation, then they are getting it through vouchers. The Home Office accepts that that system has not been working satisfactorily—we debated that point in Committee—because it does not cover people's other essential needs.

I have seen people who were on section 4 and who could not get on the bus to see their solicitor, because they did not have any money or a voucher to allow them to travel on the bus. Other people have been issued with vouchers that can be used only at a particular supermarket that is two or three miles away from where they live, and they have no way to get there other than walking. The Lords amendment seeks to address some of those points, and there is no doubt that it would improve the current situation, because it provides vouchers that can be exchanged for goods and services as well as for accommodation and food. Will the Minister clarify whether, for example, bus passes will be included among those goods and services to allow people to travel?

We know that there are fundamental problems with voucher systems from our experience when all asylum seekers were expected to use vouchers. Expense is one such issue, because it is more expensive to distribute vouchers than money. Furthermore, vouchers ended up being sold for cash under the old system, and they often cannot be used in the most convenient places and cannot necessarily be used in the cheapest places. If I were looking to buy cheap food in the area of London that I represent, I would not go to the supermarket. I would go to Walthamstow market, especially towards the end of the day when the traders are trying to get rid of stuff cheap before the market closes. That would be much cheaper than going to the supermarket, but people who live on vouchers do not have that option.

The fundamental objection to vouchers is simple. The people involved may be failed asylum seekers, who are being supported until such time as they are expected to leave the country, but they are still human beings. We should therefore think about the simple issue of human dignity. Having to survive on vouchers is stigmatising and humiliating. I suppose that none of us has ever had that experience, but we should try to imagine what it would be like to try to exist for even a day or two without any cash—without a penny to buy a drink or newspaper. It must be humiliating to live like that for weeks and months on end.

I welcome the fact that the Government have responded positively to some of the problems that were identified in section 4 when it meant that people could get only accommodation and food. Amendment No. 18 includes the power for the Secretary of State to make regulations to allow vouchers to be exchanged for goods and services, and I hope that that will include travel. The amendment specifically forbids a regulation to be made that allows people to be supplied with money. The effect of amendment (a) would be to remove the word "not" in that provision. It is a modest amendment. I would prefer it if vouchers were removed entirely, but my amendment would not force the Government to give out cash, but allow them the option to do so.

I do not understand why the Government will resist my amendment. What will happen if amendment No. 18 is not amended and it then turns out that it is not possible to meet all people's needs through vouchers? The National Asylum Support Service says—as it did about section 4—that it will not work. If the Government wished to make a change to the system because it was not working, they would need more primary legislation. However, if the Government accept amendment (a) they would have the option. It would provide the flexibility to make changes through secondary legislation without having to resort to more primary legislation. The amendment would not do away with vouchers or force the Government to give out cash.

In a later amendment, the Government have accepted a similar argument in relation to section 9 of the 2004 Act. That amendment will give the power to introduce secondary legislation to repeal section 9. That is obviously intended to be used if it becomes apparent that section 9 is not working. I would therefore argue that my amendment's impact on section 4 would be exactly the same.

When we discussed this in Committee, the Minister said:

> "I do not know if we can address the matter in the Bill, as it is more about practicalities than any point of statutory substance or import, but I am happy to consider it further."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 26 October 2005; c. 234.]

I would suggest that my amendment is very practical and straightforward, and I do not understand why it should be resisted. It would not remove from the Government the option of doing what they intend, but would make it possible to move away from vouchers, which is what some of us would ideally like.

[Mr. Gerrard]

An early-day motion on this issue has been signed by 55 hon. Members, including 27 Labour Members. I suspect that there is no chance of the parliamentary arithmetic being with us on this amendment. However, I hope that the Government will give my proposal serious consideration, because it offers a way of dealing with some of the criticisms of section 4 and of the Lords amendment, but leaves them with the flexibility to change in future if necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. David Heath.

Mr. Heath: Do you mean me, Sir?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: You are Mr. David Heath?

Mr. Heath: I am sorry, but I did not hear whether you said my name or Mr. Green's.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is a bit difficult for the Chair to decide who to call if everybody who wants to address the House does not stand quickly. I call Mr. Damian Green.

Damian Green: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to speak principally to amendment (b), which stands in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), but I also wish to comment on the arguments of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard).

As our amendment is carefully modelled on amendment No. 6, which has been agreed between the two Front Benches in another place, I have high hopes that the Minister will accept it. He will agree that the argument over vouchers is a delicate one. I have been following his correspondence in various newspapers with those who are flatly against his scheme and his argument that it will not make much difference and will not be a voucher scheme. He has clearly failed to convince the hon. Member for Walthamstow, among others. I am sure that the House will be waiting to hear how he deals with that issue.

Although I do not agree with all the arguments of the hon. Member for Walthamstow, he raises valid points, particularly as regards people from Zimbabwe, who are in a very difficult situation. The Government, rightly, do not wish to return them to Zimbabwe even if they have failed in their application for asylum. That gives rise to practical problems as to how they are to continue living in a decent and civilised way in this country.

One of the questions that the Government have not answered adequately concerns the cost of such a voucher scheme. They have tried voucher schemes before and scrapped them before. A previous Home Secretary conceded that the voucher scheme that operated previously, was unworkable and unfair. Having come to that conclusion once, it is incumbent on the Minister to explain why the current scheme is going to be workable and fair and, while he does so, what, in broad terms, he thinks that the costs will be.

That question may be impossible to answer because the Government have no idea of how long many people will be forced to wait until they can be returned to their own country. As the hon. Member for Walthamstow pointed out, the phrase, "about to leave", is a term of art that appears to cover not just days or weeks but in some cases months and years. Clearly, a system designed to cope with the needs of those who may be here for a few weeks will not serve those who might be here for years. The hon. Member for Walthamstow and the Refugee Council have made that point, which is central to the argument.

Nevertheless, I should make it clear that Conservative Members have no objection in principle to vouchers, provided that the system is workable and fair. However, we recognise the possibility of inefficiency and waste, which may lead to hardship for some vulnerable people. We have tabled amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 18 in the hope that it gives the Government a decent escape route, not least from the criticism that the Minister is receiving from Labour Members. I am sure that he sincerely believes that the voucher system will not cause the unfairness and hardship that some Labour Members claim, so the Government should, at the very least, enable Parliament to receive a full report on its working in three years.

If the Minister will listen, I am about to praise him. A few moments ago, he made a sensible comment about parliamentary scrutiny and using the Bill to enhance Parliament's ability to revisit legislation that it has passed. He was right to say that the lack of that ability is a common failing of our legislation. That is why amendment (b) tries to give hon. Members the opportunity to debate whether the new system causes genuine hardship and to have the Government justify their actions if they need justification. The terms of the amendment allow that to happen earlier if there is an immediate crisis or if the Government want a convenient vehicle to enable them to change the policy.

Even if the scheme proves perfectly practical and the Government want to continue with it, the requirement to report back on its day-to-day workings will act as a spur to Ministers to check what is happening. The Minister knows that many bodies that object to that sort of scheme concentrate precisely on which shops can take the vouchers and the range of goods to which they apply. The nitty-gritty, day-to-day details will make the difference in some cases between fairness and unfairness and hardship and lack of hardship.

I agree with the Minister that reporting back on the scheme is important. I hope, therefore, that he will accept the amendment in the constructive spirit in which it is offered. The long-term solution is not to have a system that keeps thousands of people in limbo for years. Since that happy prospect is many years away, I commend amendment (b) to the House, as a modest improvement to managing the current failing system, and I hope that it will satisfy hon. Members from all sides of the debate.

Keith Vaz: I commend the passionate and articulate speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), who has spent many years considering the relevant issues. Few of us have as much experience as he. The way in which he presented the argument was correct.

The amendment is about the practical implications of the scheme. I am against the voucher scheme and I commend the trade unions who fought so hard to get the Government to reverse their decision to reintroduce vouchers. We did not need to reintroduce them, but they are there. The Government will not be pilloried in the Daily Mail, The Mail on Sunday or The Sun if they give in on the point. That is sometimes a consideration for those in government, though happily not the Minister.

Amendment (a) will cover the practical complaints that have been made to me in my surgery by many hundreds of people who provide anecdotal evidence of what they face when they use the vouchers. I have never been in a supermarket queue when someone has had to produce those vouchers—indeed, I have never seen one. However, like other hon. Members, I hear every Friday about the practical difficulties that people face. Treating people as human beings, with dignity, is important, especially given the current climate.

I appear on a website that states that I am a Member of Parliament who hardly ever rebels and that I am a serial loyalist. However, I shall support my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow if he presses amendment (a) to a Division and, if he does not, any party that wishes to do that. In all conscience, it is the right thing to do.

Mr. Heath: I, too, welcome the speech made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), which he pitched exactly right. Lords amendment No. 18, which forms the basis for this group of amendments, is a welcome move. It extends the provision of support and, in normal circumstances, we would be hanging out the flags for that reason. Unfortunately, however, the provision is flawed by the decision to offer that support only through the voucher system. We know what vouchers do; we have gone through all that already.

The Government have made it clear that the voucher system, when used for a large number of people, was ineffective and uneconomic and, more importantly, that it had a serious effect on the recipients in terms not only of the range of opportunities that it offered for buying goods and services but of the stigmatising effect that it had on the individuals presenting the vouchers in a local shop or business. That presents considerable dangers for community relations, because it clearly labels people—

Mr. McNulty: It exists now.

Mr. Heath: Yes, and we are against it existing now, but it does. I have not said, as some have done, that this provision would be a reintroduction of the system. We know that it is not a reintroduction but an extension. However, we now have the opportunity to provide a better route for the growing number of people who are in this position. I accept the contention that they will be leaving the country after a short period, but the practical fact is that sometimes they do not. We have to accept that they are often stuck here for a considerable amount of time, for reasons beyond their or the Government's control.

I am struck by the modesty of the proposal of the hon. Member for Walthamstow, to which my hon. Friends and I are happy to put our names. It would not require the Minister to move to a cash system; it would simply give him the opportunity to do so. The alternative amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) would provide some benefit in that it would allow the situation to be monitored and reported on, but it would not provide a vehicle for the Government to change their mind in the face of the evidence that had been collected. There would be no primary legislative ability in the Act to enable the provision of cash rather than vouchers—indeed, that is specifically prohibited by the Bill. If the hon. Member for Ashford feels that his amendment is sensible, in that it gives the Government the ability to reflect on the performance of the scheme, he should logically also support amendment (a), which would give the Minister the capacity in primary legislation to correct any error in order to meet the requirements.

I hope that the hon. Member for Walthamstow will press his amendment to a Division, because this is an important issue of principle on which the House should have a voice. If he does not wish to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I make it clear that we do? We shall object to any proposal to withdraw the amendment and we shall seek the opinion of the House on this matter, because it is a matter of principle. It relates to how we should deal effectively and humanely with people who are in our care in this country, and this is not an argument that we should run away from.

John Bercow: The speech of the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) was inspired by compassion and delivered with eloquence. I do not want to embarrass him unduly, but this is one of those occasions on which people can come together, because we are agreed on the principle at stake. I, too, in common with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), hope that the hon. Member for Walthamstow will press his amendment to a Division, and if he or others do, I am strongly minded to support it.

Let us be clear. As the Minister who is engaged in the public debate well knows and has already acknowledged, vouchers are not new. They are not only not new in the sense that they have applied to a certain category, section 4 recipients—failed asylum seekers—since April 2005—they are not new in another sense, in that, as he will acknowledge, they have applied before. I believe and, in fairness, the Minister believes—I raise these issues in a positive spirit—that the Government were right to remove vouchers across the piece in 2002. It is relevant to the public debate to recall what was said at that time, by the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett). Announcing the intention to remove vouchers for asylum seekers more generally, he said that those vouchers were "too slow, vulnerable to fraud, and felt to be unfair".—[Official Report, 29 October 2001; Vol. 373, c. 627.]

He was right.

Yes, the debate has moved on since then, and the Government have decided, for reasons that I think are scarcely intelligible let alone defensible, that voucher provisions should apply to a very limited category of persons—the section 4 cases, people whose applications for asylum have failed and who are destined eventually to go back to the countries from which they have come.

[John Bercow]

They are not going back at this stage, because there is an impediment to them doing so—it would not be safe for them to travel. That might be because the country to which they would have to return is unsafe and they would be at risk of imprisonment, torture, death or a grisly combination of all three, or it might be that they cannot travel for the more prosaic but equally important reason that they are unwell or, in the case of a woman, pregnant.

In those circumstances, it is true that for virtually a year now those people have received voucher support to the tune of £35 a week. We all know the cases of people who have been affected. My anxiety about what the Government are doing is that it seems to me that Ministers are unnecessarily closing down the options. I am always ready to joust with the Minister of State, as he knows, and to listen to the points that he makes, but I have not yet heard a persuasive argument. I found the case made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow and the Refugee Council compelling.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I welcome the hon. Gentleman's speech. He is becoming increasing liberal on these issues, which is good. May I urge him to have a word with his right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), because surely this is the sort of issue on which all the Opposition parties should be encouraging the Government to change their position if we are really to have a Conservative party that has changed and to put the maximum pressure on the Government?

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman is being unduly cheeky at this hour of the day. Rome was not built in a day. I yield to none in my admiration for the scale of the transformation of the Conservative and Unionist party that has already been brought about, in a very short time, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). If the hon. Gentleman seeks to egg me on, he must be mindful that he will be tempting me to stray from the disciplines of order. I would incur your wrath, or at any rate your furrowed brow, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am not minded to do so, even when tempted so sedulously by the hon. Gentleman.

I have three simple concerns. First, to cut to the chase, the hon. Member for Walthamstow is right that the use of vouchers has a stigmatising effect. To try to decide whether we think that that argument is correct, let us for a moment imagine ourselves, as the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) did, in the position of someone using the voucher, standing in a queue in Tesco. If hon. Members ask me whether I have seen that myself in Tesco in Buckingham, I admit that I have not. I am conscious, however, that there will be right hon. and hon. Members throughout the House who have witnessed it.

I do not want to be discourteous, but, with great respect to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Mahmood), it is a very serious point. For those people in those queues, experiencing stigmatisation, feeling embarrassed and anxious and finding themselves on the receiving end of hostility, it is not a laughing matter. They are waiting to pay for goods. Use of the voucher can lead to delay and, not surprisingly, that causes irritation among other people who are waiting. What could send a more obvious signal that someone is different than the fact that, unlike everyone else who is paying by cash or card, the failed asylum seeker is having to use a voucher?

4.45 pm

That is very unfortunate and undesirable. Whether it actually constitutes a breach of human rights is, I accept, arguable. What I would say to the Minister is that it is a very notable and unnecessary unkindness and it reflects a meanness of spirit that is unworthy of the Government. Although the Minister of State has long been determined to prove himself the Labour party's answer to my noble Friend Lord Tebbit of Chingford, the truth is that on these issues he is a humanitarian. I do not want to embarrass him—I know that he is always embarrassed when he is complimented by a Conservative Member—but at heart he is a humanitarian on these issues. He has championed the cause of fairness in immigration and asylum policy over a long period. Although I think that there are serious weaknesses in aspects of government policy, he is not fundamentally a bad guy on these issues, and I ask him to think about those individuals in that queue.

There is a related point affecting someone with a voucher in the queue. In the operation of the vouchers to date, there has been ambiguity over what the voucher can purchase. If the Minister can assure me that that will not be so in the future, I shall be delighted, but I shall want firm guarantees and explicit details. In many cases, in given stores it has fallen to the check-out assistant to judge whether the voucher can be used to purchase, for example, nappies. My view—and I hope that I command assent for this proposition in all parts of the House—is that it is unfair on both the failed asylum seeker and the check-out assistant for that situation to arise.

In so far as the Government have said that they want to introduce greater flexibility, recognise the need for additional support and can see that the operation of the system over the past 11 months has contained flaws, I welcome that, but I want to know what particular commitments they will make. It is wrong that someone using vouchers who is on section 4 support should have to make the invidious choice whether to use a voucher for travel—if that opportunity will exist—or for purchasing food. We need to be sure that the vouchers will be sufficiently flexible and adequately generous to allow for all the necessities of life on which those people, no less than ourselves, depend.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): The hon. Gentleman says that, if the vouchers are the only method of obtaining goods or services, they should be required to be sufficiently flexible. However, they cannot be sufficiently flexible to be used, for instance, in a coin-operated machine in a launderette. The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), which simply allows cash to be given in certain circumstances, would deal with that purely practical problem.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman is right. I was trying to be as fair to the Government as possible, but I agree with the purport of the amendment, as I said at the outset. Cash should be an option. As he will know and others can testify, a further weakness of the system is that it is not possible—consistent with the principle of not allowing failed asylum seekers to have cash—to obtain change for them. That means, to be blunt, that the failed asylum seeker, who is often poor to the point of destitution, is literally and calculatedly short-changed by the existing system. Moreover, although I am happy to champion the cause of legitimate capitalist enterprise, I see no reason whatsoever why a big or store—or even, for that matter, a small one—should effectively profiteer at the expense of a failed asylum seeker who has scarcely two brass farthings, to employ the old-fashioned expression, to rub together.

I want to conclude on the very practical point that the Government have often raised. Ministers have said, "Well, we've got to be clear about this. Yes, people need to be supported, but on the other hand we cannot allow scope for a pull factor that will draw people to this country." The suggestion from Ministers—not, in my view, evidence-based—has been that the ability to use cash in this context would constitute a pull factor. My response is as follows. First, in 2000 and 2001, when the Government used the previous vouchers, applications actually went up, so the notion that the use of vouchers is itself a deterrent factor likely to conduce to a reduction in applications is not supported by the empirical evidence acquired to date.

Secondly, by virtue of the section 4 criteria themselves, it simply cannot be true that possessing cash constitutes a pull factor bringing people here. It has already been decided of people in receipt of section 4 support that they are unsuccessful applicants, and they have accepted the reality that they will have to return to their country of origin in due course. The notion that having cash can cause them to stay, and that the absence of cash would prevent that eventuality, seems logically flawed.

I say to Ministers and colleagues in a constructive spirit that we have a view from another quarter on this subject in the 2000 report by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. On the pull factor, the high commissioner has declared, on the record, that in deciding whether to come here as asylum applicants, people are more likely to be swayed by the presence of their own communities than by reception conditions or benefits. The Minister said earlier from a sedentary position—I am being very fair, because by mentioning his sedentary I am making it more audible than it would otherwise have been—that the high commissioner was talking about the old vouchers. If, when the Minister winds up, he can provide a compelling thesis in support of his policy, I will be happy to be influenced by it. I have not seen anything so far from the Government to suggest that that is very likely. He knows that I agree with other aspects of Government immigration policy, a good deal of which is thoroughly sensible and measured and in the national interest. So far, this measure has not been well crafted. I much prefer retaining flexibility and I applaud the noble spirit behind the amendment of the hon. Member for Walthamstow and the very welcome remarks of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), although I hope to be much briefer than he was to allow the Minister time to conclude this part of the debate.

Members made important comments on the stigma that can attach to asylum seekers in the operation of a voucher scheme. My hon. Friend said that vouchers are vulnerable to fraud. That comment struck me, because if vouchers are vulnerable to fraud, cash is even more vulnerable. Indeed, asylum seekers dealt with under section 4 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, if they are in possession of cash, could become even more vulnerable. They could be preyed on by those who are aware that they have cash and who might seek to exploit that situation. In addition, this is an emotive and sensitive matter, as cash payments could be exploited by those wanting to stir up and magnify racist feelings in this country.

A balance has to be struck in respect of the scheme's operational practicalities. I think that it is right to keep cash out of the scheme, but the review of its operation should determine whether the anomalies pointed out by hon. Members of all parties arise. That is why I support amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 18, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green), and not amendment (a).

Mr. McNulty: Whether or not I agree with them, there have been some excellent contributions to the debate. With due respect to the last speaker, I shall deal with the comments made by the grown-ups. What he said was not helpful and without substance one way or the other.

I shall begin by clearing up a couple of canards. It is not true that some people covered by section 4 would be tortured if they were returned home. By definition, they are failed asylum seekers and, whatever the reasons for their removal, there is no reason to fear that they would suffer torture or any other mistreatment specified by the refugee convention. The hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) mentioned that there might be difficulties with the safety of the removal process, among other things, and I accept that. In addition, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) that problems may arise in connection with people who suffer under section 4 for a long period of time. Initially, section 4 was designed to cover people pending removal and to apply for a day, a month or some other period, but the details of that provision are not germane to this debate.

There has been a good deal of background noise to this discussion. It is fundamentally wrong to conduct a disingenuous debate about the reintroduction of vouchers, and bodies such as Oxfam, the T and G union and the Refugee Council should know better, as that is not what the Government propose. I concur 100 per cent. with the reasons behind the decision some years ago by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) to get rid of the universal use of vouchers by all asylum seekers. That matter belongs to an entirely different debate. The Government believe that the cash-based regime applicable to all people going through the asylum process should be distinct from the process endured by those receiving section 4 support, as such people have exhausted all the legal processes, including appeals, and have no right to remain in this country.

[Mr. McNulty]

The starting point is that vouchers have always been a feature of the support for people covered by section 4, but we should go back to first principles. Where possible, section 4 support consists of the provision of full board and accommodation. It is not true that the people involved get a mere pittance in vouchers, and no more. The hon. Member for Buckingham suggested that destitution awaited them otherwise, but that is not the reality. The fact is that, when people covered by section 4 cannot get full board and accommodation where they are located, the difference is made up by means of vouchers.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow said, the law provides for vouchers to be given in lieu of full support and accommodation only when that entitlement cannot be provided. The vouchers also cover the bare essentials when it comes to toiletries, but that is not enough. I come bearing gifts, albeit perhaps only in one hand rather than both, recognising those points and extending the system in response to the serious concerns expressed. We are broadening the system to provide things in kind, which are not currently allowed under the regulation, such as the bus pass to get to an urgent medical appointment, to which my hon. Friend referred, and broader goods and services.

Concern has been expressed that the narrow definition of food and essential toiletries could be extended to cover everything possible. The definition will be made clearer in regulations, but it will certainly cover nappies and other essential goods for new mothers, where there has been confusion, about which a fair point was made. However, apart from that specific context, it is wrong to apply the worst elements of the previous universal voucher system to these proposals. That is absolutely wrong. Those who provide section 4 support give vouchers as part of their contract when they cannot provide full board and accommodation, so there is no further cost—to answer the point made by the hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green). To ask for regular reports on costs and on what constitute wider goods and services is entirely redundant. The asylum statistics already include quarterly reports on costs and numbers, so all the elements under amendment (b) that he set out so eloquently are utterly unnecessary; they are already being done or are about to be done. Amendment (b) is unnecessary.

We think that the current position under section 4 is about right in terms of expanding and broadening support. By the way, it is not the case that thousands of people are languishing under section 4 support. Many of those who have returned voluntarily—principally, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow suggested, to northern Iraq—were on section 4. About 700 northern Iraqis have already left the UK under the voluntary return scheme. I could not swear for every one of them, but the core of them were under section 4, so it is wrong to say that section 4 support locks people in limbo and that they cannot go anywhere, in any way, shape or form, and that they live in penury and destitution. I do not pretend that the regime under which they live is terribly pleasant—it is meant to be temporary, although I take the point about longevity. Although we accept the Lords amendments, we understand the limitations due to the narrow focus of the current regulations.

I do not take my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow's point, as suggested in his amendment, that we may have the option to take the cash route under section 4. We do not think that is appropriate, because we want the narrow, narrow cohort of failed asylum seekers to be controlled and managed under the existing regime. Yes, we want to broaden the scheme, not least to take into account his comments about the need for proper support, but amendment (a) goes too far.

Due to the limitations of the regime that has been in place since April, I commend to the House the broadening of support to cover things in kind and goods and services, as defined in regulation. I assure the House, and certainly my hon. Friends, that that will cover things such as bus passes for serious and necessary appointments and all the points made about lack of definition such as where essential toiletries finish and other elements begin. However, for the robustness and integrity of the system, it is right and proper that people on section 4 support, who have exhausted all avenues and have no substantive legal right to remain in the country, should, as a prelude to their departure, be on a different regime to those who are still going through the system. The new targeted contracts, under the National Asylum Support Service, will afford people support and dignity while the section 4 regime prevails and we concentrate more on their removal.

John Bercow: I welcome the broadening of support, but still feel that the rather arbitrary prohibition—for that is what it is—on the use of cash is unnecessarily restrictive. Will the Minister explain precisely how the use of such a small sum of cash could constitute a pull factor?

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman will know that I have been very careful in my words and I have not discussed pull factors in the context of the Lords amendment. I would turn things around to say that it is desirable for our asylum system to have a distinct regime of support for those who have exhausted all the elements—appeal, legal process and everything else—and are ready to go at whatever stage of readiness, as hon. Members have suggested. We do not demur from the fact that there must be such support—in a past life, not the hon. Gentleman, but the Conservative party would have demurred even from that—but it must be right that the preparation for departure and removal involves a different regime from that used for those who are still going through the system. That was the substance of the objection to vouchers for everyone that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary so rightly got rid of in the terms that were suggested. We think that the regimes should be different.

I am not convinced that adding cash beyond the extension of support that we are already offering goes any further to provide the support that section 4 applicants need while they are waiting between the exhaustion of all their appeals and their departure. I repeat that the starting premise is that, where possible under the NASS contracts, they get full board and accommodation. Some hon. Members—not the hon.

Member for Buckingham or my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow—have suggested that those people somehow start in penury and destitution and that, as a sign of good will, we should give them a few bob and a voucher. That is not the case. A proper, comprehensive support mechanism is in place, as there should be, for those individuals. It is not their fault that, for whatever reason, they have exhausted the application process and no longer have legal rights to remain, but they must go and they should not be in penury just because of that. We suggest that such support, added to by vouchers where full board and accommodation cannot be provided, is far too narrow.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I want to place on record the fact that many hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned. We understand the Government's argument. We understand the way that the Minister has handled the issue and the concessions that have been made and we are grateful to the Government for them. The Minister has taken a thoughtful approach, but we are concerned about why the Government are closing down the option at this stage. To be honest, most of us have found from our surgeries that the minor things display dignity or the lack of dignity and humanity or the lack of humanity: the child who cannot take in 50p for the school trip, or the parent who cannot buy their child a cup of tea when they are out shopping, because they have not got the cash. Such things will not be covered by vouchers and the other means of support. I realise that the system may apply for a limited period before people leave the country, but we cannot understand the Government's attempt to end that expression of humanity to those people and not to offer them that opportunity.

Mr. McNulty: Again, I would reverse the argument. Under the NASS contracts, a substantive package of support is provided to those who find that they require section 4 support. Such support is supposed to be all-embracing—and to the extent that it can be, it is—for the duration of the time before people depart. The fact that that cannot always be so led to vouchers and some additional support for food or essential toiletries. Given not least the remarks made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow, a range of issues have been raised about such support being far too narrow, even in the context of the broad package of support under section 4. That is why we have moved to providing support in kind, as well as by vouchers, with goods and services, rather than using the narrow definition of food and accommodation. That basket of support is available. That is right and proper. Equally, underlying that—

Dr. Evan Harris: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: I will give way in a moment. It would be useful to let me finish the sentence.

Equally, underlying that, we are trying—again, this is outwith the Lords amendment—with the new targeted contracts to get far more direct contact with individuals on section 4 support and to get them involved in the NASS contracts. It is no longer simply the case that someone can be sent a letter in the hope that they will receive it so that they will know exactly what they need to do and in what circumstances. The whole contact management operation is getting far more sophisticated within NASS, but all those support mechanisms and contact processes relate to the departure and removal of people who have exhausted all their claims and no longer have a right or any legal locus to remain in this country. I will now give way to the hon. Gentleman—and do not make me regret it, please.

Dr. Harris: I fear that I cannot guarantee the Minister that. We all appreciate the concession that has been made, but the hon. Members for Buckingham (John Bercow) and for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) were asking what the justification was for the Government to rule out cash. The Minister said that it was not about a pull factor, but in his letter to The Guardian and The Times, he said:

"Support for failed asylum seekers is limited and temporary to ensure that it does not act as an incentive to remain."

If he is not saying that that is his view, why is he ruling out cash full stop?

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman has half made me regret giving way, but his intervention gives me a chance to look at the letter again. The letter goes to exactly what I was saying. It is perfectly right and proper that there should be distinct support mechanisms for those applying for asylum in the normal fashion and for those who have exhausted every element of the processes, legal and otherwise, and have absolutely no legitimate right to be in this country. They will not be people who fear torture following removal, otherwise they would not have section 4 support. The regime can and should be—taking into account the points that I made about its temporary nature to my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow—distinct from the process that everyone else is going through in the normal fashion.

That goes to the heart of the criticism and dispute about everybody being on vouchers in the first place. That was seen as penalising people who were applying for asylum in the normal way, because of the ineffectiveness and impracticalities of vouchers. We accept that point and I do not demur one ounce or jot from the reason that my right hon. Friend the then Home Secretary suggested for moving away from vouchers in the first place. However, it is not enough to pick up one little bit of an overall package for those on section 4 support. That is the point. There is an overall package—it is not just the vouchers. That package is temporary and it is about a prelude to a removal. With the extensions to the support mechanisms, for the critical reasons that hon. Members have suggested, it is right and proper to expand that provision to support in kind in goods and services. That gives us a broader sweep in relation to the gaps where a full support package of full board and accommodation cannot be provided. In that context, we will be in a far happier position in relation to the support mechanisms put in place under section 4 if we accept the Lords amendment. I offer that to the House and commend it.

For the reasons that I have suggested, we will resist amendment (a), which extends the support to cash, and we will certainly dismiss, or resist—I have dismissed it already—amendment (b) from the Conservatives about the report and so on. In substance, all those elements are being carried out in various ways by accepting the Lords amendment and by our regular reporting on the asylum statistics.

The matter is very sensitive. I concur with what people said about the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow. I was going to make a nice joke about Walthamstow market, but I will pass on that because we are too serious. I commend most of the other contributions, save that of the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), who really should not have bothered, in what is a very serious debate. I commend the Lords amendment to the House and ask it to resist amendments (a) and (b).

Mr. Gerrard: I listened carefully to the Minister's reply, but I have to say that I do not understand his reasoning. I will withdraw the amendment purely on the grounds that I do not believe that parliamentary arithmetic suggests that it will be carried. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Members: No.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 6th June 2005 (Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill (Programme)):

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion two hours after their commencement at this day's sitting.

Subsequent stages

2. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any Question being put.

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.—[Joan Ryan]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I draw the House's attention to the fact that privilege is involved in Lords amendment No. 19. If the House agrees to the Lords amendment, I shall ensure that the appropriate entry is made in the Journal.

Clause 2

GENERAL PURPOSE

Lords amendment: No 1.

5.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2, 3, 6, 19, 34 and 64.

Jim Knight: Before I speak to the first group of amendments, I would like to thank peers in the other place, particularly Baronesses Byford and Miller and my colleague, Lord Bach, for their hard work on the Bill since it left the House. They have continued to take a constructive and collaborative approach during the Bill's passage and it has been significantly improved through their scrutiny and hard work.

I am happy to accept all the Lords amendments today, as they were all Government amendments, and I look forward to Royal Assent shortly. That will pave the way for establishing Natural England later this year, with the benefits that that will bring, ending a period of uncertainty for the staff in the affected organisations.

Amendment No. 1 responds to issues raised in the other place and makes it clear that Natural England may work with local communities, both urban and rural, to secure social and economic benefits through management of the natural environment. Amendments Nos. 2 and 34 remove the powers of the Secretary of State to enable Natural England to use compulsory purchase powers to acquire land for experimental schemes as currently available to the Countryside Agency. We are convinced that this power and the similar power in clause 94 are not needed. Amendment No. 3 clarifies the circumstances in which it would be permissible for Natural England, with the consent of the Secretary of State, to charge for providing advice.

The other place debated at length the role that the Commission for Rural Communities should play in rural proofing, ending up with amendment No. 6 to clause 19(c). This makes explicit the CRC's role in monitoring progress against the Government's rural proofing commitment.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The Minister mentioned that the compulsory purchase powers did not need to be included in the Bill. Is that because he can access those powers through other legislation, or because he does not envisage compulsory purchase by the agency involved?

Jim Knight: The powers have never been used by the Countryside Agency. We have been convinced that it is not necessary for Natural England to take them forward.

Amendment No. 19 and the consequential amendments Nos. 34 and 64 add national park authorities to the list of authorities eligible for financial support under the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's so-called Bellwin scheme for emergency assistance. Amendments No. 34 and 64, which is a minor consequential repeal of a word in the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, will remove this anomaly, in effect restoring the pre-1997 position in respect of the Bellwin scheme.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I endorse the Minister's remarks about the work done in the other place. That is a first class example of the value of the other House, and the knowledge and diligence that peers apply to our legislative process. The Bill is considerably improved since it left this place, largely through the power of persuasion, rather than votes in the other place. That is good.

I am delighted that, as the Minister said, virtually every amendment that we are considering is a Government amendment. I am also delighted that almost all of them were tabled in response to arguments advanced by my noble Friends, and in many cases by my colleagues and me when the Bill was before this House. Perhaps with slightly less power of persuasion, or dare I say less power behind us, we were less successful here than in the other place, but I am grateful that the Minister and his noble Friend have agreed with them.

Amendment No. 1 is an example of the point that I made a moment ago. I argued strongly in Committee for Natural England to work closely with local businesses and communities. I am grateful to the Minister for conceding the point. Amendment No. 1 is a sensible step forward. On compulsory purchase, my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson), whom I am pleased to see in his place, argued that it was not necessary. The Minister resisted, but I am delighted that he has conceded the point.

I will not go through all the amendments. Suffice to say that we believe that they are sensible changes to the legislation. Some of them are extremely minor and need not detain the House.

We remain of the view that Natural England, which is a very large new organisation, has a lot to do to prove its merit, and many concerns have been expressed in this House and the other place about different aspects of it. An amendment has not been tabled on the issue of conflict. The Sandford principle was widely debated in both Houses, and we have discussed it with the Minister. I wish that such an amendment had been tabled, but I recognise reality when I face it and understand that such an amendment would not have been successful. Nevertheless Natural England has a vital role to play, and I think it fair to say that we will all watch it closely, because, bar a nod and a wink from Buckingham palace, the provision will become law once this group of amendments is agreed, which will allow Natural England to go ahead according to its original timetable. We are taking a major step forward by agreeing this group of amendments.

On the Commission for Rural Communities, to which the Minister also referred in his opening remarks, our concern is whether that organisation really will have the ability to rural proof. Again, we will watch with interest to see how it develops over the first year or two and whether it has the authority to hold the Government to account and to challenge any Department on whether it is really delivering a service that is powerful enough and important enough for our rural communities. The role of the Commission for Rural Communities will be central, and we shall watch it carefully.

I am happy to agree with the Minister on the importance of the amendments. I am also happy to agree with the Lords on those amendments, not least because most of them include proposals that we introduced in this place.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): Liberal Democrat Members also support the amendments—consensus is clearly breaking out—and I join the Minister and the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) in stating that the Lords have done an excellent job.

Lords amendment No. 1 is particularly welcome, because it brings consultation with local communities into the general purpose of the Bill. We would have liked climate change to have been included, too, but we understand that the commitment to consultation is worthwhile. Similarly, we agree on the issue of the elimination of compulsory purchase.

As we said on Second Reading and on Report, the provision on cross-departmental rural proofing is a welcome addition. I echo the view expressed on those occasions and by my noble Friends in the Lords that the abolition of Post Office card accounts by the Department for Work and Pensions is a classic example of a failure to rural proof policy, and the provision may help to rectify such errors. We certainly want the commission for rural communities to perform that role across the spectrum of legislation that may affect rural communities. The licensing laws provide another obvious such example, because they may require small shops that trade the occasional bottle of sherry as a convenience for elderly villagers to acquire a department to fill in new paperwork, so that is another example in which a little bit of rural proofing might have come in handy.

In general, we feel comfortable about the amendments, and we propose to support them.

GUIDANCE

Lords amendment: No. 4.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 5, 7 to 10, 28, 32, 38, 39 and 56 to 63.

Jim Knight: During the Lords Committee, we were asked to consider whether any guidance that is published by the Secretary of State should be published "contemporaneously" with the issuing of it. We could not accept that wording, but could not argue with the principle. We believe that there should be a degree of consistency in the Bill and once we decided that it was right to publish such decisions as soon as practicable, we thought it sensible to apply it to any decisions made by the Secretary of State under this Bill. Therefore, this group of Government amendments adds various requirements that the Secretary of State should publish directions, guidance and lists that she may issue under this Bill as soon as reasonably practical after their issue.

Amendment No. 38 to paragraph 16(1) of schedule 1 and the identical amendment No. 39 to paragraph 16(1) of schedule 2 are purely grammatical. They have no effect on the Bill's text other than to improve the grammar, and I am sure that all hon. Members will approve of that. Amendments Nos. 56 to 63 are minor amendments to schedule 11 and address two technical issues. The first three amendments of that group are small clarifications to three paragraphs in schedule 11 of minor and consequential amendments. They will ensure that there is consistency of application within the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, clarifying whether particular provisions apply to the 12-mile territorial waters around England and Wales.

The remaining five amendments contain small consequential amendments in the schedule 11 paragraphs that make minor amendments to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 in relation to the protection of limestone pavements. The National Assembly for Wales has relatively recently confirmed that it wishes to benefit from the existing alteration to subsection (1) of section 34 of the 1981 Act so that Wales will benefit equally from the enhanced protection for limestone pavements. The substituted subsection (1) will enable pavements to be more easily protected both in England and Wales.

Amendment No. 28 is designed to reflect the fact that the new Inland Waterways Advisory Council will be an advisory rather than an executive non-departmental public body and ensure that it can be appropriately supported. The amendment substitutes wording customarily used to authorise Ministers to support advisory NDPBs.

I commend this group of amendments to the House.

ENFORCEMENT POWERS IN CONNECTION WITH PESTICIDES

Lords amendment: No. 11.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 12 to 14, 40 and 41.

Jim Knight: Clause 44 contains the powers available to inspectors authorised by the Secretary of State in England, and the National Assembly in Wales, to investigate an offence under section 43 of the possession of a prescribed pesticide. During the Committee stage in the other place, suites of amendments were introduced in response to concerns raised about the apparent wide-ranging nature of these powers. A further two amendments were introduced on Report, to require inspectors to have regard to the codes of practice under which they will be operating. I will deal briefly with each of the amendments in turn.

Amendment No. 11 rules out on the face of the Bill the possibility of speculative visits, an issue about which the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) was especially concerned in Committee. Much effort was expended in finding a form of words that achieved the right balance between protecting the rights of the individual while not constraining inspectors to such a degree that they could not enter unless they believed that a prescribed pesticide would be found on a particular premises. For example, we do not wish to prevent inspectors from entering where a poisoned bait has been found at or near several properties where pesticides are likely to be used and where it is not certain on which of these properties the pesticide would be found. The form of words adopted will allow entry in those circumstances while allowing inspectors to be challenged to justify what the grounds for suspicion are. We also looked closely at all the powers that are available to an inspector once he or she is on the premises to see whether any should be disapplied in respect of the pesticide offence in clause 43.

5.45 pm

Amendment No. 12 removes the ability to require a statement of truth when questioning people about substances found on their premises. That power was considered unnecessary in view of the power to require information already contained in clause 44(1)(b).

Amendment No. 13 introduces three new subsections that clarify the rights of the person in the event that the substance is seized from their premises as evidence of an offence under clause 43 by setting out the procedure relating to its retention. That will ensure that property rights are not eroded by the investigation process. A person may make a claim to have the seized substance returned, for example by providing evidence that they have a defence under clause 43(3).

During the course of the Bill's passage, we have made it clear that my Department intends to issue codes of practice to inspectors exercising their powers in relation to the possession of prescribed pesticides and to wildlife inspectors exercising their powers as set out in schedule 5. It is appropriate that inspectors must have regard to such codes. Amendments Nos. 14 and 40 therefore not only provide the mechanism by which the Secretary of State can issue codes of practice relevant to the duties of inspectors, but place an obligation on inspectors to have regard to any provision of such codes when discharging their functions.

Amendment No. 41 extends current powers of constables to obtain warrants under section 19(3) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to four other Acts where police currently have only very limited powers of entry: the Destructive Imported Animals Act 1932, the Conservation of Seals Act 1970, the Deer Act 1991 and the Protection of Badgers Act 1992. The powers would allow constables, under a warrant issued by a justice of the peace, to enter and search premises for evidence where there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence has been committed and that evidence may be found on those premises. Those extended powers would ensure that wildlife protection legislation is complied with and that wildlife crime can be more effectively investigated. They also provide greater consistency across the main wildlife legislation.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Minister for explaining the issues behind the amendments, which I welcome. As he kindly said, the lead amendment concerns an issue that we debated at considerable length in Committee: the possibility of what the Minister described in Committee as a fishing expedition—he just used the word "speculative"—by inspectors. I am grateful to him for accepting that and tabling, as he undertook to do, amendment No. 11.

As he said, we also debated in Committee several other aspects of the powers that are being given to inspectors. On Report, we again debated the possibility that they were being given more powers than the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) has given them in the Animal Welfare Bill. I remain of the view that there is a distinction between the two pieces of legislation that I do not fully understand. I should have thought that it would be easier for the public to understand the legislation if it gave inspectors the same powers.

Jim Knight: Just to assist the hon. Gentleman and others, we have put some guidance on this in the Library to help people to interpret what is, I agree, extremely complicated legislation.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Minister for saying that he has put the guidance in the Library. I hope that he will put it elsewhere as well; otherwise it will not be much use to most people. I understand and appreciate his point, but it does not detract from my question: why is it necessary to have two pieces of legislation, bearing in mind that, in its widest context, it is all to do with animal welfare issues? We are concerned about the matter.

Amendment No. 14 about the codes of practice is welcome. It is sensible that the code could be admissible in court proceedings. Obviously we shall observe carefully to ascertain whether the powers are used and whether the fact that the inspector "must have regard" to the code is sufficient in practice.

Amendment No. 41 deals with extending the search warrant to "certain other Acts". That is a new idea, which we did not consider here, from the other place. I shall not claim that it was our idea—it was Government inspired and I can understand its logic. It underlines my point about having separate legislation. Most people would argue that the protection of badgers or the conservation of seals, although perhaps not the Deer Act 1991, are to do with animal welfare, and that to have a Bill on that subject with one set of powers for inspectors and another measure with similar provisions can only add to the confusion. I do not argue that inspectors do not need the powers but we have added to confusion through the Government's approach.

Nevertheless, overall, the group of amendments is welcome and I am happy to support it.

Chris Huhne: I am also happy to support the amendments, with which we broadly agree. There is a contrast between the provisions for the inspectors' powers and the Government's previous stubbornness on what is now the Animal Welfare Act. They resisted the cause of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) to allow witnesses to intervene in the case of cruelty when it is clearly visible, for example, in a garden or an open yard.

Mr. Paice: The Animal Welfare Bill is not yet an Act because it has not been before the other place, which will consider it after Easter. Perhaps the power of my argument and that of the hon. Gentleman will persuade the Government to amend that measure to match this one.

Chris Huhne: The hon. Gentleman is right to correct me. I hope that we can prevail on Ministers to do as he suggests.

The amendments show clear proportionality in examining the code of practice, which we greatly welcome, and limiting the ground for entry to property to search for proscribed pesticides in situations of reasonable suspicion. We are therefore happy to support them.

New Clause

DENOTIFICATION

Lords amendment: No. 15.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendment No. 16.

Jim Knight: The amendments do two important things. The first is a small facilitating measure that will benefit landowners and occupiers, especially by removing the implication that the power to denotify SSSI land should be available only if it was previously of special interest. In essence, and without detracting from the main purpose of the provision, it provides for a simple remedy for any landowner or occupier who discovers that a part of his land has been mistakenly included in the boundary of an SSSI, for example, because of a cartographical discrepancy between paper and digitised maps.

The second amendment benefits the public interest. By the strong will of Parliament, shown in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the conservation bodies have been required to serve SSSI notifications on every owner or occupier of the land in question. Despite their best efforts, that can be a tall order, given the paucity of comprehensive sources of land tenure information. The amendment introduces a saving to ensure that, provided that all reasonable steps have been taken to discharge the notification duty, SSSIs, present or future, will not be rendered invalid by reason of it later being discovered that some relevant party's interests were not identified when the notification was served.

Importantly, the provision protects any such missed party from any liability for things that happened before commencement, and they become fully liable as a notified owner or occupier only after they have come to light and the notification papers have been served on them by the relevant conservation body.

Mr. Paice: When the Minister talks about cartographical discrepancies, I hope to God that he is not talking about the Rural Payments Agency; otherwise there would be so many denotifications and renotifications that we would be here for ever. That organisation seems to be completely incapable of getting its digital mapping correct. Nevertheless, I understand the point of Lords amendment No. 15, and I support it.

On Lords amendment No. 16, I understand completely what the Minister is trying to achieve. The inability to serve a notice because an owner cannot be traced should not result in an SSSI being rendered invalid. However, I want to challenge the Minister on a couple of aspects of the provision. The first involves the use of the word "failure" in the phrase

"failure to serve certain notices in connection with SSSIs".

It seems an odd word to use when we are really talking about an inability to serve the notices because a particular owner or occupier cannot be traced. I wonder why the word "failure" has been used.

[Mr. Paice]

The second, more important, aspect relates to the use of the term "reasonable steps". Who is to make a judgment on that? Am I right to assume from what the Minister has said, and from the way in which this provision is drafted, that the only form of appeal would be by judicial review? If an owner came forward and said. "Well, this is all very well, but I wasn't notified, and I've been at home for the last six months", who would decide whether the conservation body had taken all reasonable steps to ensure that every owner and occupier had been notified? I do not want to suggest that anyone would intentionally set out to fail in that task, but the practicalities might dictate that the notice could not be served. I can well understand that, in some parts of the country, a small parcel of land could be overlooked. An organisation might think that it has covered all the owners involved, when along comes an owner who has a bit of land in the middle of an area. He might then say, "There is no reason why they should not have been able to serve the notification on me. I haven't been anywhere. I haven't disappeared."

I am worried that the provision is too open-ended and that the conservation body could still serve the notice, and do whatever it wanted to do under the provisions in subsection (2), without necessarily having been as diligent as we might wish in ensuring that every owner or occupier had been notified. While I accept that nothing will happen until after the commencement of this section, that is a relatively minor point. What is important is what will happen in future. Before we concede to this amendment, I would be grateful if the Minister could explain how he envisages it operating in practice. What grounds for appeal will be open to an individual who feels that he should have, and could have, been served a copy of the notification but did not get one?

Chris Huhne: I, too, would be interested to hear the Minister's reply to the points raised by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). Generally, we support these amendments, which we find helpful, but I wonder whether they will cover the thousands of sites and notices already in existence before the Bill is enacted. That would certainly be welcomed by Natural England, as it would ensure proper protection of all the sites that, as we have heard in the House, the Government have been struggling to bring up to scratch.

Jim Knight: With the leave of the House, I should like to respond as best I can to the points that hon. Members have raised.

In response to the question from the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), the use of the word "failure" is technically right. If a conservation body has not managed to notify the owner or occupier, technically it has failed to fulfil its duty under the law as it is written. We are therefore dealing with failure, and we might as well call it what it is.

On the second question about who will determine ultimately whether reasonable steps have been taken, the hon. Gentleman is right. If representations to the conservation bodies are not successful, it will ultimately be for the courts to determine. As an independent body, English Nature—or, later, Natural England—will need to make its own judgments and decisions. A range of inquiries and searches are possible, however, in order to discover ownership or occupancy information. Clearly, it is reasonable that all those possible routes should be pursued. If representations made to those conservation bodies—which, one hopes, would identify whether something in the public domain had been missed—fail, the courts would decide the matter.

The final question from the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) was whether existing triple SIs would be covered. The short answer is yes.

New Clause

CRITERIA FOR DESIGNATION NATIONAL PARKS

Lords amendment: No. 17

Mr. Paice: I beg to move amendment (a) to the Lords amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker): With this we can consider amendment (b) to the Lords amendment and Lords amendments Nos. 18, 33 and 35 to 37.

Mr. Paice: I presume that it is in order for me to address the whole group, as all the amendments in it relate to national parks.

One of the reasons that I wanted to table an amendment, apart from on its own merits—to which I will return in a moment—was that most of this section is completely new to the House. The reason for that, as I am sure that the Minister would tell us, is that the Meyrick judgment handed down by the courts came after we dealt with the Bill in the House. The Government took the decision that the Bill was a suitable vehicle to revert, as they intend, the law to what it was prior to the Meyrick judgment.

I understand that the noble Lord Bach told the other place on Monday night that the Government have been granted leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal in the Meyrick case. Lord Justice Keene was quoted at column 50 in House of Lords Hansard on 20 March:

"The grounds are properly arguable and, in any event, raise issues of importance which ought to be considered by the Court of Appeal".

We are considering these amendments in the absence of knowing the final outcome of the Meyrick judgment.

Nevertheless, I agree with the Government that the Meyrick judgment, as it stands at the moment, is anomalous. It goes way beyond what any of us has previously understood as being the criteria for national parks, and refers to this high degree of "naturalness". The judge in the case, again quoted at column 50, said that,

"well-maintained historic parkland providing the setting for a grade 1 listed building, and well-ordered dairy fields of dairy farms would seem to be the antithesis of naturalness".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. 50.]

Arguably he is right, but if we accept that as the criteria for national parks, there probably would not be any. We all know that the British landscape has been affected by mankind since time immemorial. Certainly, all the evidence suggests that since 12000 BC, when mesolithic man first invaded the wild woods and started cutting them down, the British landscape has been in a state of change and affected by mankind. To refer to naturalness seems a bit odd in that context.

Having said that I entirely agree that Meyrick goes too far, I also believe that the amendments go too far in the other direction. I accept that the Government's intention is simply to return the law to where it was before the Meyrick judgment—although if they won the appeal such action would not be necessary, because that would emphasise that the pre-Meyrick legislation stood, or that the interpretation of it stood. In many ways, I hope that the Government do win the appeal, but they tabled the amendments using the Bill as a vehicle, so it is therefore right for this House to have an opportunity to debate them.

Lords amendment No. 17, which would insert a new clause on criteria for designating national parks, suggests measures that I believe would extend the criteria for designation beyond where they were before Meyrick. Indeed, I think they could almost be seen to be opening the whole of rural England to such designation, which goes too far in the opposite direction. I believe passionately in national parks, but they need to have specific attributes—to which I shall return—that identify them as being areas of particular importance. If we allow the criteria to be too lax and end up being able to designate much larger swathes of rural England in the coming years, the designation of national parks as a whole will be brought into disrepute, and will not be treated with the respect to which it is entitled. That would be a great sadness, which is why I tabled amendments (a) and (b).

Lords amendment No. 17 proposes that Natural England may,

"when applying subsection (2)(a) in relation to an area, take into account its wildlife and cultural heritage".

I think that most of us would accept that it is sensible to include wildlife in a provision relating to national parks, for obvious reasons. It is the term "cultural heritage" that I find more difficult to understand. I am sure that the Minister, who has briefing papers, will point out that it was the last Conservative Government who first introduced the phrase to national parks legislation. He nods—he was going to throw that at me, so I am glad that I got in first. That is perfectly true, but anyone who reads Lord Bach's speeches and the briefing that we have all received from the Council for National Parks will observe that the terms "cultural heritage" and "landscape" appear to be interchangeable. It seems to me that the Government mean "landscape", and I would therefore prefer that word to be used in the Bill.

We all understand what "landscape" means. It deals with the issue of naturalness, because we all know that the landscape of England is affected, has been affected and will be maintained by mankind. There can thus be no dispute about the interpretation of the word, whereas I believe that the phrase "cultural heritage" is open to much more question.

New subsection 2A(b) provides that Natural England may "take into account the extent to which it is possible to promote opportunities for the understanding and enjoyment of its special qualities by the public."

Of course, we want the public to be able to enjoy the special qualities of a national park, but that ability has always been there. I do not understand why the Government want to open it up to that extent. The issue of enjoyment of those special qualities was clearly included in the criteria specified in the Countryside Act 1949. There have been various reports on national parks: the Addison, Dower and Hobhouse reports, and more recently the Sandford and Edwards reports. There seems to be a common theme in all that work, namely, the importance of special areas with an element of wildness, beautiful and suitable for public access at the time of designation.

That is very important point and a constant theme, so we are forced to ask what it is that the Government are changing, given that such a provision already exists in legislation. It seems that, in using the phrase

"take into account the extent to which it is possible to promote opportunities", the Government are implying that in future the public enjoyment of such special qualities could be opened up considerably. That, in turn, raises the possibility of damaging the special qualities that caused an area's designation in the first place.

Amendment No. 17 widens the criteria too far the other way, although I readily except that Meyrick needs to be redressed if the appeal is lost. Of course, if the Government win the appeal, this whole debate could become irrelevant. Indeed, the Minister may wish to tell the House this afternoon how he sees the legislation working. If we pass all this and the Government then win the Meyrick appeal, what impact will that have? In a sense, two different pieces of legislation would apply to national parks.

Amendment No. 33 would insert a new clause defining:

"Natural beauty in the countryside."

As I understand it—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—this, too, is part of the Government's desire to rebalance the Meyrick judgment, with which I wholly agree. Indeed, I do not disagree with any aspect of the new clause's definition of natural beauty. That is fine, but why, having included that new clause, is amendment No. 17 still necessary? I appreciate that I have spoken first and that the Minister has not had a chance to respond, but I hope that he will indeed explain why amendment No. 17 is necessary, given that amendment No. 33 defines natural beauty, and that such a definition is fundamental to the criteria for designating national parks.

We do not oppose the idea of correcting Meyrick or of national parks, but if national parks are to retain the value and esteem that people attach to them, they should remain areas with special qualities. My concern is that the Government, in their desire to rebalance the legislation following Meyrick, have gone too far the other way. In future years, attempts could be made to designate areas that perhaps do not have the special quality that we attribute to existing national parks. I look forward to hearing the Minister explain why it is necessary for the Government to go as far as they are going with their amendments.

Chris Huhne: I shall, if I may, address some of the issues arising from other provisions that have already been approved by the Lords.

The new clauses relating to the criteria for designating national parks have allowed for a satisfactory definition that gives us back the standard that had been established in this country for almost 60 years. The Liberal Democrats' only disappointment is that we are not discussing an amendment enabling local people to be elected to the boards of national parks, as an alternative to the Secretary of State making appointments. It is regrettable that neither the Government nor, it appears, the Conservatives could support such an amendment. However, in essence, as the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has rightly said, the new clauses re-establish the status quo before the Meyrick High Court judgment, which ruled that the Hinton estate in the New Forest need not form part of the South Downs national park on the ground that it was not sufficiently natural.

Amendment (a) would not allow a return to the status quo before Meyrick. Substituting "landscape" for "cultural heritage" would mean that national parks would be designated on the same basis as in the past. English Heritage estimates that the historical designation includes 11,000 listed buildings, 4,000 scheduled monuments and 30 registered parks and gardens. Although the parks and gardens might reasonably be regarded as landscape, I do not see how the monuments and listed buildings could be. Therefore, the amendment would be unduly restrictive, and inconsistent with the criteria used for the designation of national parks in the past. It would be regrettable to introduce that inconsistency now.

Amendment (b) is also unnecessary, as it would remove Natural England's ability to take account of the extent to which it is possible to promote opportunities for people to understand and enjoy a national park's special qualities. National parks are not wildernesses. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire made an interesting and perhaps Freudian slip when he suggested that wildness was involved. For example, the landscape around Chatsworth is outstanding and beautiful, but it could not be called wild.

National parks are designed to be resources for the enjoyment of all, and it seems odd for the Conservatives to attempt to deny it. That is why we support the Lords amendments.

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I rise to support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). I shall not get involved in the somewhat arcane discussion about what is natural and what is wild, as that has been discussed enough already. However, I want to explore the practical implications of changing how we designate national parks.

First, I emphasise that the amendments made in the other place do not affect existing national parks or areas of outstanding natural beauty. The Council for National Parks sent us a briefing that was helpful—although I disagree with much of it—in which it said that the amendments were "common sense" and designed to "protect our existing network" of national parks and areas of outstanding national beauty. However, that is not so: the amendments would change the rules of the game after the inquiry into the proposed South Downs national park has ended, but they do not affect existing national parks at all.

The retrospective nature of the provision, and the way in which it has been introduced, is to be deplored. It is the result of a court case, and although we may agree or disagree with the decision, the Government have determined, rapidly, to amend the application of the law. They have done that in the other place, without much debate. I was a member of the Standing Committee considering this Bill, and the issue did not arise, yet it has profound implications for the future designation of national parks.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government seem to be rushing? An appeal has been lodged, so would it not be better to see what the outcome is?

Nick Herbert: I agree precisely with my hon. Friend. An appeal is under way, and my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire made the point very well that the amendment sits oddly with that fact. We should wait for the result of the appeal, and the amendment would throw the designation of the proposed South Downs national park into chaos and confusion.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) in his interpretation of what the Government are trying to do. The amendment does not restore the previous designation of national parks; it introduces a new form of designation. Areas of outstanding natural beauty and national parks have always been seen as distinct. National parks were wilder and more remote areas, while areas of outstanding natural beauty were equally attractive, but more managed, landscapes.

This matter is of great importance to my constituency, as more than half of it lies within the South Downs area of natural beauty and well over half will lie within the proposed national park. The practical effect of the amendments is that a redesignation of the national park boundaries will be possible, after a long inquiry—91 sitting days and 23 visits—has already completed its business. If, as a consequence of the amendments, the national park boundary is moved south of Arundel, it may prevent the completion of the long-awaited Arundel bypass, with a profound impact on downland villages, which will continue to suffer a large amount of displaced traffic that cannot bypass Arundel on a proper coastal highway. The point is that local residents had the opportunity to make representations to the inquiry, based on their understanding of the law at the time, but that is now being changed, after the fact, with little debate in this place. That is wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire is right: the problem is that cultural heritage is not defined in the Bill. The concept is vague and we do not know what it means. Although his amendment would not remove wildlife from the new criteria that Natural England will have to take into account, it would nevertheless introduce a new confusion. Traditionally, wildlife has been dealt with by different instruments—through sites of special scientific interest—and not according to national park designations. Inclusion of the proposed criteria would further muddy the water.

There are good reasons, to which the Minister will not be able to respond, why a South Downs national park is not the appropriate status for the area. It was already well managed by a joint conservation board and there have been three attempts to designate it as a national park. All failed due to the special nature of the downs, which are different from some other national parks. There is only limited open access; slightly less than 3 per cent. of the downs is open, compared with between 30 and 60 per cent. in other national parks. I fear that an attempt is being made to allow a designation of national park status that would not have been permitted under previous legislation, because the downs have always been regarded as unsuitable for that.

I yield to no one in my desire to ensure that the south downs landscape is protected. It is important and superb, described by Arthur Mee in his famous "The King's England" series of inter-war county books as "the natural glory of our island".

Everybody would agree with that. The problem is the basis for the protection of the downs, and there are long-standing arguments about the democratic deficit that will be caused by designating it as a national park. For instance, it will involve a large number of planning decisions—far more than in any other national park. Despite my commitment to the downs landscape, it is not appropriate to designate the area as a national park.

Local opinion is divided, but people are entitled to certainty. If they make representations to an inquiry they should know what the law is, and the House should not attempt to change the law retrospectively after the inquiry has been completed. That is important. If the amendment is accepted, the Minister should do the right thing and reopen the inquiry, especially if the area's status is changed as proposed. If there are new criteria, local authorities and local people should be able to make representations based on them. The Minister should then make his decision. It is wrong to make such changes so late, on the back of this Bill, simply because the Government disagree with the result of a court case that will sit uncomfortably with the decision that they want to make about national park status.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister is supposed to be speaking to amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 17.

Jim Knight: Thank you for that helpful guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I oppose amendment (a). The effect of amendments (a) and (b)—if I make take them together, Madam Deputy Speaker—would be to exclude ""cultural heritage" and promoting from the considerations that can inform the designation criteria for national parks.

"opportunities for the understanding and enjoyment of its special qualities by the public"

To turn first to amendment (a), I hope to persuade the House that cultural heritage has been at the core of our concept of national parks in England since the 1940s. It was recognised by the founding fathers of the national parks movement that England and Wales have nothing that approaches the wilderness areas that were being designated in the United States at the time. In England and Wales, it was always recognised that the most exceptional landscapes demonstrate a harmony between man and nature. That encompasses cultural heritage, which, as was rightly pointed out by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), includes the built heritage produced by working the land.

For example, hon. Members would agree that the Yorkshire Dales national park is outstanding. I would invite members to pause and reflect for a moment, as I speak, and imagine the quintessential Yorkshire dales landscape. I am sure that their thoughts would include a pattern of stone walls, field barns and farm houses—all part of the cultural heritage of the Yorkshire dales, which we should include as part of our purpose in designating national parks.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the designation of the Yorkshire Dales national park also ought to include a good youth hostel? Will he consider giving some assistance to the youth hostels in the Yorkshire dales that are about to close?

Jim Knight: As ever, my hon. Friend is ingenious in finding ways to make representations on important causes, and the future of youth hostels is certainly one of them. I will bear his comments in mind.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): The Minister was unable to help the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), but he recently visited my constituency and Backdale quarry, and he was incredibly helpful in assisting the Peak district by issuing a stop notice. So I was very disappointed yesterday to receive a press statement that said:

"A public inquiry into quarrying at Backdale on Longstone Edge—due to resume next week—has been cancelled after"

the Deputy Prime Minister

"declared the Peak District National Park Authority's enforcement action to be null and void."

How can anyone take any reassurance from the Government's word on the national parks, when a junior Minister gives the go-ahead and approval for an action that is then cancelled and overridden by the Deputy Prime Minister? If the Minister cannot give me an answer today, will he ensure that he makes a statement before the House rises tomorrow?

Jim Knight: I will certainly look into the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes and find a suitable opportunity to respond fully; I am certainly unable to do so now.

[Jim Knight]

These Lords amendments are intended to clarify the interpretation of the statutory criteria for the designation of national parks under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, in line with how they have been generally understood and applied for the past 56 years. As we have heard, they are being introduced in response to a judgment on a High Court challenge to the New Forest national park designation order of 2005. The amendments return the situation to one in which we have what were generally understood, prior to the judgment, to be the relevant criteria, but with greater clarity.

6.30 pm

Mr. Bone rose—

Jim Knight: Let me just make a little more progress, and then I will give way.

The Court found that the interpretation of the designation criteria should not be informed by national park purposes and appeared to favour a more restrictive interpretation of what could be considered to be "natural" in the context of "natural beauty". During the past 56 years, the criteria for designation have been understood and read in the light of the purposes of national parks. In 1991 a report by the national parks review panel, "Fit for the Future", reviewed the criteria and the purposes and recommended that there should be more explicit references to the wildlife and cultural heritage of the parks in the first purpose.

The Government accepted that recommendation, as the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) pointed out, and used the Environment Act 1995 to amend the preservation and conservation purpose in section 5(1) of the 1949 Act. No changes were made to the designation criteria because it was thought to be generally understood at the time that the criteria were informed by the purposes. However, that assumed link was broken by the Meyrick judgment handed down last November. Therefore, the Government believe that we should now take explicit steps to make sure, in statute, that the 1995 Act changes do indeed apply to the designation criteria as well as to the purposes.

Mr. Bone: Will the Minister deal with the point about the appeal that has been lodged? Why do we need to have legislation now, before the appeal has been dealt with?

Jim Knight: I was going to deal with that question when I responded to some of the points made by the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert). There are a number of reasons why we need to act now. A degree of uncertainty would otherwise be created in respect of other issues relating to national parks and areas of outstanding natural beauty. I am not referring specifically to the south downs. The Countryside Agency is considering other issues in relation to extensions to some national parks, for example. We need to be able to offer certainty for that work to be continued. The opportunity to revise the 1949 Act in the future would be very uncertain. It could be many years before Parliament has another opportunity to restore what we believe is the status quo. That is why we would like to act now. If the Bill achieves Royal Assent, as I hope it will in the next day or so, I will have to consider what our position should be on the appeal, in the light of having made those changes.

The main amendment, Lords amendment No. 17, adapts the criteria by incorporating the terminology of the purposes to make it clear that national park purposes are behind the criteria. As I have explained, we believe that that approach is what was intended by the original legislation. I have already talked about amendment (a). I think from what has been said that amendment (b) is an objection to the forward-looking nature of promoting "opportunities for . . . understanding and enjoyment".

By that I mean that in deciding whether a piece of land should be designated, one can consider whether, through the actions of the national park authority, or someone else, its values for understanding and enjoyment could be increased. I must point out that that was fully explored in the New Forest inquiry and the Meyrick judgment.

The second criterion for designation in the 1949 Act, which amendment (b) does not alter, refers to opportunities for open air recreation. It is inherent in the word "opportunities" that an appropriate degree of looking to the future was intended; that point was even accepted by both the claimants and the judge in the Meyrick judgment. In response to the point about potential damage to the very environment and landscape that we are seeking to protect through national park status, the Sandford principle applies to national park authorities, so in the last resort their decisions would have to come down in favour of the environment. I could go on, but I suspect that some of my hon. Friends would not find that to their taste.

Mr. Paice: Lords amendment No. 33 reaches the heart of the Meyrick judgment on what natural beauty is by defining it in a way that I—and the whole House, I am sure—am more than happy with. Perhaps the Minister will explain why that is not sufficient, and why Lords amendment No. 17 is necessary on top of it.

Jim Knight: Lords amendment No. 17 specifically and only deals with national parks. Lords amendment No. 33 addresses the degree of naturalness that is needed to meet the natural beauty criteria for areas of outstanding natural beauty and thus clarifies matters for all definitions of natural beauty in statute. It is important to make that distinction. Lords amendment No. 17 deals with purpose, and we have a balance between purpose and criteria.

Lords amendments Nos. 35 to 37 provide for the commencement of the provisions two months after the Act has passed. I commend the Lords amendments to the House.

Mr. Paice: May I first pick up a point—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Technically, the hon. Gentleman needs the leave of the House.

Mr. Paice: My sincere apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker. With the leave of the House—I was told to say that, but I usually forget what I am told.

May I first pick up on the point made by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) when he suggested that I made a Freudian slip by using the word "wild"? I did not. My use of the word was intentional, not Freudian, and the word was taken directly from the very Hobhouse report that set the criteria for the 1949 Act, which referred to wild areas and wild moorland. I did not use the word "wilderness", as he suggested.

The principal issue is obviously a matter of interpretation. There is a question of whether Lords amendments Nos. 17 and 33 take the criteria further than simply reverting back to those in the 1949 Act, as subsequently amended—in other words, before the Meyrick judgment. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) rightly referred to the south downs, and it is widely believed that the purpose of the Government amendments is to reopen the south downs issue. That is a matter for my hon. Friend and others who represent the area to debate another time, but as my hon. Friends have said, it is worrying that the Government are acting in a bit of a rush.

I do not know whether the Minister can shed any light on when the appeal will be heard, but it would be perfectly sensible to wait for its outcome. I am worried to hear the Minister say that if the Lords amendments are passed and the Bill gets Royal Assent in the next few days, he will have to think again about the appeal. He implies—I am putting words in his mouth, but I think that most people understood this—that the appeal may then be dropped. That would be a serious judgment to make. The matter should go to appeal because I do not think that the conclusions of Lord Justice Keene in the Meyrick case should be allowed to stand, regardless of what we might do to the Bill tonight, for the reasons that we have described.

The Government are going a little further than they need to. I want the criteria for national park designation to be as they were prior to the Meyrick judgment. I am worried that the Lords amendments, especially Lords amendment No. 17, could open the criteria wider than that and give scope for applications for the designation of areas that most of us would not describe as having the special qualities that a national park should have. For those reasons, I will press amendment (a) to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

Clause 62

ENDING OF CERTAIN EXISTING UNRECORDED PUBLIC RIGHTS OF WAY

Lords amendment: No. 20.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 21 to 26, Lords amendment No. 27 and amendments (a) and (b) thereto.

Jim Knight: Amendment No. 20 removes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Conversations are breaking out in the House. Hon. Members should listen to the Minister.

Jim Knight: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Amendment No. 20 removes clause 62(1)(b), the aim of which is to ensure that public motor vehicular rights are only extinguished over routes that, immediately before commencement, are used less by motor vehicles than by other users, which relates to the burden of proof on those who want to prove their vehicular rights.

Amendment No. 21 replaces clause 62(1)(b) with a similar provision under clause 62(2), which will exempt from extinguishment any route where it can be shown that, for five years before commencement, the public use had been mainly by motor vehicles. That will ensure that, in such cases, the burden of proof is placed on those using a motor vehicle to show that, because the route had been used mainly by motor vehicles for a significant period, the rights have not been extinguished. The effect of the two amendments is to reverse where the burden of proof will lie.

Amendment No. 22 clarifies that those routes recorded on the list of streets and not recorded on the definitive map and statement are exempted from extinguishment only where they are recorded on the list of streets immediately before commencement.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Minister clarify the issue of easements, particularly where it involves a public body such as the National Trust, which could be part of the problem? The problem is that when the National Trust attempts to clarify the ownership of common land, it causes individuals who require access over that common land considerable problems, which is the case in my area at least.

Jim Knight: Some of the amendments that we are making will enable people who need to access their property to continue to do so. The right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) raised that anomaly on Report. I shall discuss that issue again later, but if I do not resolve my hon. Friend's point, perhaps he will write to me or even raise the matter on the Second Reading of the Commons Bill, which will take place shortly after the Easter recess.

Amendment No. 23 introduces arrangements to deal with existing, outstanding claims for rights of way that carry rights for mechanically propelled vehicles—byways open to all traffic or BOATs. It provides that what is now clause 67 does not apply to any claims for BOATs made before the Government made clear, on 20 January 2005, their intention to legislate following public consultation. The Welsh Assembly Government have chosen to make that date 19 May 2005, the date on which the Bill was published.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): May I take this opportunity to thank my hon. Friend for all the listening that he has done on this point during consideration of the Bill? Tremendous movement has been achieved and he has come to a good and sensible decision in choosing the date of 20 January 2005. I thank him and his officials for all the work that they have done.

Jim Knight: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments, especially those relating to my officials who have done an excellent job in dealing with what is a complicated issue and with much correspondence from many hon. Members and others.

The effect is that BOAT claims made before those two dates will be processed under the terms of the existing legislation, and therefore any rights for mechanically propelled vehicles that they seek to establish will not be extinguished, provided the claim proves successful. However, any BOAT claims made after those dates will be dealt with under the terms of the new legislation, subject to two limited exemptions. The first is when local authorities have already reached the stage of determining the claim and the other is when they are made by property owners, as raised on Report by the right hon. Member for Bracknell.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): If a claim was made for a BOAT before 20 January 2005 and it fails, can the Minister confirm that any future claims for the same right of way will be caught by the cut-off?

Jim Knight: That is certainly my understanding. If the situation is any different, I will write to the hon. Gentleman and copy the letter to Opposition Front Benchers and place a copy in the Library.

The transitional arrangements have been drafted in such a way as to ensure that only those definitive map modification order applications for BOATs made before 20 January 2005, or 19 May 2005 in Wales, that are made correctly and in accordance with the statutory requirements, will be preserved by the transitional arrangements in clause 62(3).

Amendment No. 23 also amends the provisions that provide for private rights of access for property owners. That is necessary to ensure that there are no human rights issues created by commencement of the rights of way provisions shortly after Royal Assent without a period of statutory notice. Amendment No. 24 is a procedural amendment that refers to certain transitional provisions set out in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. The provisions provide that, where a local authority has made a definitive map modification order under section 53 or 54 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 reclassifying a road used as a public path, or RUPP, as a footpath, bridleway or byway open to all traffic, that order must be processed to its conclusion. However, the amendment will ensure that those transitional arrangements are subject to part 6 of this Bill in the normal way, so that unless they fulfil the criteria for any of the exemptions set out in the Bill's transitional arrangements, any vehicular rights in such claims will be extinguished.

Amendment No. 25 addresses cyclists' concerns about whether a qualifying period of past, or future, cycle use may give rise to a restricted byway. The view of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is that a normal pedal-powered cycle is a non-mechanically propelled vehicle and therefore may give rise to restricted byway rights. This amendment introduces a clause that will make that clear on the face of the Bill.

Amendment No. 26 clarifies that a definitive map modification order or DMMO application is, of itself, capable of bringing a route into question for the purposes of section 31 of the 1980 Act.

Amendment No. 27 is in two parts. The first amends an existing provision, which provides that a restricted byway may be created through an application for a definitive map modification order. This amendment clarifies that a restricted byway can be created on the basis of both user and historic evidence. The second part will ensure that anyone driving on a restricted byway, which was a road used as a public path prior to reclassification, to access their property would not be committing a criminal offence under section 34 of the Road Traffic Act 1988.

Amendments (a) and (b), tabled by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), would amend Lords amendment No. 27. They concern subsection (7) of what is now clause 70. This subsection closes a possible loophole, which may have enabled those driving illegally over former RUPPs, to visit land that is designated for public access, to claim immunity from prosecution under section 34 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. Subsection (7) specifically excludes such people from the exemption from prosecution, so that it is only available to those accessing their own property over former RUPPs, and their lawful visitors. The amendments seek to further close the possible loophole, by extending the categories of land specified in subsection (7) to include so that it would include any rights of way and town or village greens.

"any land which is treated as being accessible to the public"

We considered similar amendments very carefully when they were tabled in the other place. We have concluded that the exemption from prosecution works properly without the amendments. We are satisfied that the Government amendment that has been incorporated into clause 70 closed any potential loophole and that no further amendments to the clause are necessary. Amendments (a) and (b) as drafted cannot be accepted because they would introduce uncertainties into the definition of visitor. For example, if they were accepted, they would not mention section 15(1) of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. We recognise that there is some concern that people using a right of way could be regarded as a "visitor to the land". However, we do not share that concern. We have considered this issue very carefully and have concluded that those using a right of way could not be regarded as a visitor to one of the parts of land which the right of way may cross. The right of way may cross several fields in the ownership of several different landowners. The user of the right of way is not visiting those fields, he is using the right of way. I appreciate that this is a complex area of the law. We intend to issue guidance to the police, local authorities and others about the rights of way provisions in this Bill. That will include guidance to assist with the understanding and enforcement of this new legislation on rights of way. I hope that in light of that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendments and that the House will accept the Lords amendments.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments and we mostly welcome this group of amendments. The Minister, and other hon. Members who have taken an interest in this part of the Bill, will know that it has probably caused the most angst, especially the issue of the date of commencement. I am the first to admit to an element of confusion earlier in the proceedings. Having read and reread the Committee and Report proceedings, my confusion appears to have been shared by everybody else, including the Minister. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) would probably agree. We were all saying the same thing based on what appears to have been a misunderstanding of the import of the Bill and the impact that it would have on what we believed to be some 2,000 outstanding applications for the creation of BOATs.

Subsequently, I tabled a written question and I am grateful to the Minister for taking a great deal of care in answering it. He has surveyed all the highways authorities to find out how many applications were outstanding on three dates—the date on which the Government published their consultation in December 2003, the date on which they announced the conclusions of their consultation in January 2005 and the date on which the Bill was presented in May 2005. That elicited the fact that the number of applications outstanding was not 2,000, as we had been led to believe, but fractionally fewer than 1,000, of which almost exactly half predated the original consultation. Some 288 were lodged in the consultation period between December 2003 and January 2005, and another 200 or so were lodged between January and May. That demonstrates an increasing rate of applications, but the situation was not as bad as we thought it would be.

The concern shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House was that the Bill would allow a long period in which those 2,000 applications could proceed. If that happened, the intention of closing off the loophole of previous use of byways by vehicles in BOAT applications would have been defeated. I am glad to say, for reasons that I will come to in a moment, that that possibility has been significantly diminished.

John Mann: Do the hon. Gentleman's figures relate to applications or to the number of routes? For example, in my area one application might cover six or 12 different routes. For the various people affected, a route is a route, whether it is dealt with as a separate application or as part of a group put in as one application. May we have a clarification of his clarification so that we are clear about the scale of the problem?

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right and I am happy to agree with him. We can both blame the Minister, because his figures were not sufficiently explanatory. We do not know how many of those applications were multiple, but it is probable that more than 997 routes were requested.

John Mann: I can only give detailed illustrations from my own constituency, where the scale of the problem is related to the number of routes rather than the number of applications. For example, residents, farmers, dog-walkers, horse riders and so on might be affected by any one component of a circuit rather than by the entire circuit, which is an additional problem.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman is right. It may well be that the number of applications for individual routes is nearer to 2,000—we simply do not know. I said in jest that it is all the Minister's fault, but I suppose that it is partly mine. I did not ask him the right question, so he did not ask the Highways Authority the right question. I am happy to share the responsibility, but I will not go further than that.

The other interesting piece of information that came out of the Minister's survey—this is directly relevant to the point made by the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann)—is that there are tremendous variations around the country. The problem is concentrated on certain counties, including the Minister's own county, where there is a particular issue with a large number of applications. Several highway authorities reported few or no applications, so the situation is very patchy. When we debated this before, I was not aware—the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) may have been—that trail riders were offering a "byway bonus" for applications. The Trail Riders Fellowship said:

"For every Byway claimed by YOU the TRF will give the applicant £10.00

If that application is successful then the TRF will give the applicant £250."

That partly explains the surge in numbers.

The question is what was done about the large number of applications. The Government's original intention, clearly based on the expectation that they would all have to be resolved, was that commencement would be in a year or so. I remember that the Minister was concerned to give time for all that to take place. We persuaded him, following advice that we received, that it could be brought back to the date on which the legislation was enacted. The debate in the other House has concerned making the date even earlier.

I was never persuaded by the arguments that we should seek to eliminate all the outstanding applications. I took the view that those made prior to the Government's consultation in December 2003 were made in good faith and that they should be allowed to proceed under the rules that then pertained. I felt that December 2003 was the right date to go for, and that was the subject of amendments in the other place. I am happy to endorse the comments made by the hon. Member for Sherwood about the Minister's willingness to discuss the issue. It became clear in those discussions that the Government were advised that they could not accept such an early date. I am sorry that they could not do that, and we might continue to wish to dispute it, but nevertheless I face the reality. What we have achieved through the mutual pressure from both sides of the House is the bringing back of the date from a year or so hence to January 2005.

That makes a great deal of difference to the number of applications that will be dealt with under the existing rules. All bar 700 or so applications—those going up to January—will be dealt with under the old rules. The rest will be dealt with under the new criteria, which means that use of a byway by a vehicle, whether it is a Roman chariot or anything else from some distant point in history, would not be a basis for a claim for a byway open to all traffic.

Mr. Atkinson: I want to express my thanks to the Minister for listening to the representations from my constituents, who are badly affected by this.

On the legacy of the 300 or 400 outstanding claims that are not caught by the new rules, does my hon. Friend agree that it is most important that the Government give advice to the police and the Crown Prosecution Service? We have discovered that if these claims are undetermined, there is virtually no chance of the CPS agreeing to prosecute those arrested for trespassing on these byways.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think that the Minister said that he is going to issue guidance. That is terribly important. As we have all found in dealing with this legislation, it is a minefield—some of us might wish that some of these tracks were a minefield, because it might stop their being used—and it causes immense difficulty and confusion among users, as well as prosecutors. I look forward to seeing the guidance to local authorities and to the police.

I would add to that an exhortation to highway authorities, notwithstanding other pressures, to act quickly to resolve the outstanding applications. The sooner they are resolved and the map is definitive, the better for everybody.

Mr. Drew: In Gloucestershire, we have not had this problem because there is a degree of amicable arrangement between the different parties. It is therefore somewhat strange to find out what is happening in other parts of the country. The biggest source of complaint is that there is no resolution because those tasked with trying to come up with one delay it because they say that they do not have enough resources. That is not acceptable, is it?

Mr. Paice: Far be it from me perennially to refer to the fact that local authorities are deprived of resources by the present Government, but that seems to be what the hon. Gentleman is saying. So be it—I am happy to accept his point. Yes, of course proceeding more quickly will take up more local authority resources, but in the long term it is in everybody's interests.

I wish finally to refer to the amendments that stand in my name. They refer to the amendments that the Government have tabled in response to the concerns expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay). The Minister has listened and acted, and we are grateful for that. As he said, there is some concern that the term, "visitor to the land", creates a loophole, and it was put to us that that could be closed by these amendments. I heard the Minister explain why he feels that they are inappropriate. I think that he could probably add to that the fact that he is anxious that the Bill becomes law as soon as possible. We all agree, but that does not negate the need to get it right. He asked me to withdraw them, but I cannot withdraw what I have not moved. Nevertheless, I was interested in what he said. He clearly put on the record, for everybody to see, the Government's belief that the loophole does not exist and that the phrase that they have employed does not give people a means of using a byway for other purposes. Concerns were expressed that it would be used as a means of accessing another byway, on the basis that all byways connect one highway to another highway. If the Under-Secretary is convinced that the amendment would be unnecessary, I am prepared to take his word for it, especially as he is prepared to make relevant provision in the Bill.

Paddy Tipping: The Under-Secretary has also promised to issue guidance. It is clear that we need to have a firm view about the point.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman is right that we need clear guidance. I shall not pursue my amendment but we have raised the matter and the Under-Secretary has put his position on it on record.

We welcome the group of amendments, which has taken us a long way from where we started. It means that we can look forward to the protection of many of our byways that were under threat of being torn up by motorised vehicles. That will be widely accepted, perhaps with the exception of those who wish to use them. Some of them are reasonable and law-abiding and do not want to chew up the byways—we should not tar everybody with the same brush. However, we should be aware that some people abuse byways. With proper guidance, the Government can ensure that the law is enforced and that those who continue to abuse our byways can be properly prosecuted.

I welcome the amendments and thank the Under-Secretary for the way in which he has handled the matter.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I am especially pleased to follow the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) because I would like to pursue some of the issues that he raised.

Rights of way affect many of my constituents. North-East Derbyshire sits at the foot of the Peak district and boasts some of the most beautiful rural villages in the country, for example Ashover. People have moved from far and wide to live in a peaceful rural idyll. Tourists travel hundreds of miles to visit, but their quality of life is being ruined and their nerves are shattered.

As the Under-Secretary knows, the proposed legislation led to a flood of applications for modification orders to the definitive map to upgrade bridleways to byways to allow the sort of motorised vehicles that we have discussed today—trial bikes, quad bikes and four-wheel-drive vehicles—on to the bridleways. Many of those paths existed in the same state for centuries until motorised vehicles started to use them relatively recently.

Visitors to the countryside who want to enjoy peaceful surroundings, wild flowers and birds or get some safe outdoor exercise in a beautiful historic environment have all that ruined by noisy trial bikes. They have caused great damage to land and paths, making them unuseable for those, such as walkers and horse riders, who want to use them legitimately. Horse riders can no longer use the paths, and it cannot be right that legitimate users are effectively prevented from using them so that trial bikers can ride around at high speed, not even looking at scenery or seeing what they drive over and often destroy.

What does the Under-Secretary propose to do about applications for modification orders that have already been made but have not been determined? Is there a timetable for determining them?

Chris Huhne: I am mindful of the hour and I shall therefore be brief. We were minded to support the Conservative amendments and I am therefore delighted with the Under-Secretary's assurances, especially about guidance. We are pleased that a sensible compromise was reached. That means that green lanes can be protected and the integrity of the countryside maintained. It was essential, in a Bill aimed at safeguarding the natural environment, to reach such an outcome to allow local authorities to deal with the backlog of claims and to prosecute the minority, who wilfully flout the laws and ride or drive where they should not, while allowing those who have established rights to continue to exercise them. We are therefore happy to support the compromise.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): I thank the Under-Secretary sincerely for the Lords amendments, which were similar to those that I withdrew on Report but are doubtless better drafted. They will make a huge difference to many of my constituents who would have been unable to sell their properties without them. In one or two cases, significant distress has been caused. I hope that Royal Assent happens quickly because, in at least one case, people are desperately waiting to proceed. Again, I place on record my thanks to the Under-Secretary and his officials, who were so helpful when I went to see him at the Department.

Lords amendments Nos. 21 to 28 agreed to.

Clause 74

RESERVED FUNCTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 29.

Jim Knight: I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 30 to 31, and 42 to 55.

Jim Knight: Amendment No. 29 responds to a small but important point picked up by the Delegated Powers and Deregulation Committee in its helpful report. It noticed that, in clause 74, which deals with reserved functions, we had excluded from delegation various legislative or quasi-legislative functions but had not mentioned codes of practice. We agree that that should be done because codes of practice are often indistinguishable from guidance. We are happy, therefore, to make that small change.

Amendments Nos. 30 and 31 have the sole purpose of improving the clarity of the wording of the Bill.

Amendment No. 42 adds to the list of designated bodies in schedule 7 the joint committees of local authorities that discharge functions in relation to areas of outstanding natural beauty.

Amendments Nos. 43 to 55 relate to schedules 9 and 10. Those schedules list detailed provisions for part 8, chapter 2, which relates to agricultural levy bodies. The purpose is to put in place an explicit means of implementing the recommendations of the November 2005 Radcliffe report, which reviewed the position of the main agricultural and horticultural levy bodies. A public consultation on the report's findings was completed on 3 February and we expect to announce our decisions on the future levy board structure around Easter. The amendments set up a structure that would allow us to proceed after that consultation.

I ask hon. Members to accept the Lords amendments.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the consideration of any Lords Amendments and Messages that may be received may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

Consumer Credit Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme Motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Consumer Credit Bill for the purpose of supplementing the Order of 9th June 2005 (Consumer Credit Bill (Programme)):

Consideration of Lords Amendments

1. Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion two hours after their commencement at this day's sitting.

Subsequent stages

2. Any further Message from the Lords may be considered forthwith without any Question being put.

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Consumer Credit Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 7

FURTHER PROVISION RELATING TO STATEMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 1

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 5.

Mr. Sutcliffe: On Lords amendment No. 1, we believed that it was necessary to modify the wording of the proposed new subsection (2) in clause 7(3), to ensure no ambiguity in its meaning. It is a technical amendment that simply makes the wording clear and removes any potential for confusion by changing the word "his" to "the debtor's". I hope that hon. Members will support it.

On Lords amendment No. 2, the Government amended clause 20 in another place to remove subsection (4). Again, the amendment is technical. Clause 20(4), as it was, was intended to prevent the court from setting aside judgments previously made to give effect to the rule that a statutory jurisdiction to reopen a transaction does not enable the court to reopen one that has been subject to a previous judgment made by the court. It replicated a provision in the Consumer Credit Act 1974.

The Government reconsidered the impact of that provision in the light of current court rules operating in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland and concluded that subsection (4) would in practice serve as an impediment to the Government's policy intention—to enable consumers to access effective redress from the court under those provisions—and that the court rules should be allowed to apply to those provisions in the normal way. If we left the provision as it stood, before the Lords amendment, it would serve to lessen the benefits of the Government's policy on unfair relationships. Therefore, the provision is best left out of the Bill.

7.45 pm

Lords amendment No. 3 was tabled to clause 29, prior to Third Reading in the other place. Members of this House and noble Lords expressed their concerns about "irresponsible lending practices" during debates on this Bill. The Minister in the other place, the noble Lord Sainsbury of Turville, and I considered carefully the contributions of hon. Members and noble Lords on this issue. We thought hard about how the Government should respond. The Government believed that the wording of clause 29, as previously drafted, would allow the Office of Fair Trading to take account of "irresponsible lending practices". However, in response to the concerns expressed on both sides of both Houses, we concluded that there was merit in making explicit in the Bill the ability of the OFT to do that.

Given the interest expressed by hon. Members in the issue of "irresponsible lending practices", I should explain the amendment further. The Government believe that the most appropriate means of addressing "irresponsible lending practices" is in the context of the OFT's powers to monitor and enforce the fitness of licence holders. With this amendment, the OFT, which is best placed to monitor changing practices in a dynamic market, will be able to provide guidance to licence holders on lending practices which, on the basis of the OFT's knowledge and experience of the market—

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): As the Minister is well aware, one of the big problems, is the policing of all these provisions. Whatever this place decides, and whatever legislation we send out to Britain, we still cannot control it. Does he agree that we must somehow tighten the Bill even further?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am satisfied that the amendments, which were discussed in the Lords at great length, along with the debate that we had in the Commons on the Bill, have produced a tightened position. There was considerable discussion about irresponsible lending and we believe that the amendment, with the role of the OFT, is the appropriate way forward.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Further to the excellent question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger), the key point is not the quality of the legislation but the effectiveness of its implementation. Does the Minister understand that, because I suspect hon. Members are looking for an assurance on implementation?

Mr. Sutcliffe: As I move on, I hope that I will be allowed the opportunity to talk about the implementation plan, which may allay some of the fears that hon. Gentlemen have. Throughout consideration of the Bill, we have said that we are keen to ensure transparency in terms of policy objectives. We need to work with the organisations involved, whether the industry, consumer groups or the OFT, to make sure that the implementation is what we intend.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): The phrase "irresponsible lending" is included but not defined in the Bill. Is it to be left to the OFT to define the powers that it will exercise? Can the Minister assure us about how the definition will be drawn up?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman raises a fair question and if he lets me progress in my speech, I hope that I can answer that.

The OFT would perform this role through its fitness guidance. That approach will allow the OFT to provide business with an indication of what types of conduct are considered "irresponsible lending practices". Businesses would therefore have some guidance on what they ought to avoid, while not being discouraged from seeking out new ways of addressing customer demand. That will be backed by a sanction available to the OFT of reviewing a lender's fitness to hold a licence if the lender engages in such practices.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The clause refers to "deceitful" practices. Would a practical example be the sending out of statements by credit card companies during public holidays so that the recipient has no chance of paying the bill before the specified date and therefore incurs a penalty charge?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I have made great strides in ensuring that I do not determine the qualifications from the Dispatch Box. I feel that it is better to leave the OFT to decide what constitutes irresponsible practices. The hon. Gentleman knows that the three spokespeople on the issue have been dealing with APACS—the Association for Payment Clearing Services—and studying the banking code to establish the position in regard to consumer credit card cheques. We will keep the House informed about the progress of those deliberations.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): The Minister's answer on how irresponsible practices would be defined seems to contradict what he said on 14 July last year. Then, he said, "The amendment"—a different amendment—

"seems to assume that the test is somehow dependent on the OFT's guidance. It is not. The OFT's guidance is simply that: guidance."—[Official Report, 14 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 1021.]

He went on to say that, ultimately, the courts would decide the definition of such tests and whether it was a question of irresponsible lending or of unfairness. Can he confirm that the definition will be decided by the courts, not the OFT, and that the OFT's guidance will ultimately have no legally binding effect on rulings?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The hon. Gentleman is right in the context of why I did not go into the definition of unfair lending and the unfairness test. As for the issue of guidance and support from the OFT, the response to points raised in both Houses was that it was thought best to give business some certainty about some of the practices that could be considered irresponsible lending practices, on the basis of the OFT's ability to develop a process in the light of its experiences and its responsibility for determining whether people are fit to hold licences.

I hope that Members in all parts of the House accept that the Government have listened and that we will discuss the issues with all the bodies that have helped to make this the Bill that it is—a Bill that is well respected and that has been subject to much consultation. I know that, given good will from Members, we shall achieve what we want to achieve.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): I welcome the introduction of the concept of irresponsible lending, which was debated in detail in Committee, but I have a question for the Minister. This provision relates to the granting of new licences on the basis of the "fit and proper purpose" test. Will he tell us more about ongoing monitoring? A new applicant may not have a track record, in which case it will be necessary to see what happens after a licence has been granted.

Mr. Sutcliffe: That will depend on how we implement the provisions following discussions with the industry. We have outlined the OFT's role on the basis of its experience. As the hon. Gentleman knows, because we discussed it in Committee, the OFT already grants licences.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con) rose—

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am happy to give way, but I want to make some progress, because most of the amendments are technical. We have spent some time on this amendment because of the introduction of the new concept of irresponsible lending.

Mr. Hollobone: It is right for us to spend some time on that important issue, but I commend to the Minister the work of the citizens advice bureaux. Most of the complaints received by Kettering CAB concern the indebtedness of local people and it has built up a substantial body of evidence that would help him to define irresponsible lending.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I acknowledge the work done by citizens advice bureaux and other advice agencies. The hon. Gentleman will know of the Government's intention to allow the financial inclusion fund to give advice face to face and of our wish to find ways of helping people early to deal with the debts that they incur. He also knows of the regulations following our consumer White Paper, which offer help and support.

I am grateful to the industry for its work in offering mechanisms of support for people who find themselves in debt. I believe that we are all trying to achieve the same thing: transparent legislation that makes clear the responsibilities for both lender and borrower. However, we also want to do what we can to support the agencies that offer help. The hon. Gentleman will know of the "loan shark hunter" pilot schemes in Birmingham and Glasgow that offer advice to people who find themselves in debt to, and exploited to the limit by, the most horrendous members of society.

We have listened to what has been said to us about irresponsible lending. I hope and expect that we shall gain the support of the Opposition parties, given that, during the variety of debates in which we engaged, it was clear that they wanted us to take this step.

Lords amendment No. 4 is technical and would alter new section 36F(3) in clause 50 to ensure that the clause does what was originally intended. Clause 50 deals with officers of enforcement agencies other than the OFT. New section 36F(2) makes the OFT responsible for the actions of those officers while they are fulfilling their duties under section 36C of the 1974 Act, which deals with access to premises, and section 36D, which deals with access to premises under warrant. However, section 36F(3) disapplies section 36F(2) in the case of criminal proceedings against an officer of the enforcement authority. It does not currently mention the OFT and we believe that, for the sake of clarity, it should be specifically mentioned. The amendment clarifies the position as originally intended.

Lords amendment No. 5 addresses a key recommendation of the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee, which reported on the Bill in October last year. The amendment makes an order under clause 68 subject to affirmative resolution in both Houses of Parliament, as opposed to negative resolution in either House. An order made under clause 68 can make changes to any other Act or piece of subordinate legislation that is necessary as a consequence of the Consumer Credit Act.

Mr. Davey: Can the Minister confirm that, if the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill is passed, the powers that it gives Ministers would mean that the amendment was superseded?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The amendment restricts the powers to affirmative resolution, because the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee felt that they were too wide-ranging. We had a long debate in Committee about the need for affirmative or negative resolution in the case of various clauses, based on tradition and on what had applied in earlier legislation. However, we listened to what was said by the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee and were happy to accept its recommendations in this case.

Mr. Davey: It is not that we disagree with the amendment. I think that the Government were right in another place to listen—eventually—to the recommendations of the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee. My point is that a Bill that is being dealt with in the other place, having been scrutinised in this place—the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill—gives Ministers powers to change regulations willy-nilly, without coming back to Parliament. If we pass the amendment, will we merely give ourselves a breathing space of a few months because in due course Ministers will be able to disregard it?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am sorry to have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman's point. He is right: the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill is going through its stages in both Houses. We do not expect the clause to be superseded by anything that appears in that Bill, but we shall have to see what happens during its passage.

Lords amendment No. 5 is technical, as are many of the earlier amendments apart from the one that deals with irresponsible lending, which we have spent some time debating.

I should like to say a little about implementation, because that has been raised with me. The Bill will be implemented as soon as is practical, with account taken of all stakeholder views. Some provisions may be implemented earlier than others; it will depend on lead times for preparation and interdependencies between clauses. The timetable for implementation will be refined after Royal Assent, in consultation with stakeholders. We have had a number of meetings with other Departments, the industry and consumer representatives, which will continue. We are also establishing two stakeholder working groups to inform the implementation process, one to look specifically at the implications of the Bill on IT system changes and one to examine the technical detail of the statutory instruments. We intend to publicise the final timetable towards the end of May. The Department will adhere to all relevant guidelines and best practice on implementation, such as the 12-week minimum for formal consultation periods.

I hope that, in the light of those explanations, the House will accept the Lords amendments.

8 pm

Mr. Prisk: I begin by thanking the Minister for his opening remarks and for organising the recent joint meetings of the various political parties with the Association for Payment Clearing Services. In these meetings, we have been looking at the key issues arising out of the Bill and, indeed, at matters that lie at the heart of amendment No. 3, to which the Minister alluded.

The Minister and I have debated on a number of occasions, but this, I believe, is the first time that we have debated a Bill across the Dispatch Box. Indeed, I must confess that I have not debated this Bill before. Although it was introduced twice last year—before the election and after—it was sent to the other place before I assumed my current role, so I am not as well versed in its detail as other Members, including a number of my colleagues, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), who has made a valuable contribution to the debate.

This is an important Bill and some of the amendments before us may improve its meaning and clarity. Sadly, it is not very difficult to make the Bill clearer. Indeed, the need for amendments Nos. 1 and 2 draws our attention to the considerable obfuscation that exists throughout the rest of the Bill. Here, I want to place on the record my genuine concern that, as with so much of this Government's legislation, the quality of the Bill's drafting leaves much to be desired. I hasten to add that that is the fault not of parliamentary counsel, but of those who instruct them. That is a particularly important point to bear in mind when we consider the central tenet of amendment No. 3: what the Minister and the Bill describe as the "unfairness test". After all, it was the Minister himself who told this House last June on Second Reading that the Bill has to be judged on the principles of "transparency, protection and fairness". If that is so for the Bill's substance, it should also apply to its language.

That is why we need to consider these amendments with great care. Several of them, particularly amendments Nos. 1 and 2, make predominantly technical changes, so I hope that the Minister will be prepared to put on the record his explanation for tabling them. He has made a welcome initial stab but there were a number of omissions, which I hope to address later. A willingness and ability on his part to respond to my points will help us with the implementation to which he referred. After all, transparency can be achieved not only through better legislation, but through well-chosen words from a Minister during a debate. It is such transparency that I seek this evening.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 would alter clauses 7 and 20 respectively. Although they are technical, I have some concerns about their effects, to which I will come in a moment. Amendment No. 3, which, as the Minister said, inserts new wording into clause 29, is directly concerned with what we have described as "irresponsible lending". [Interruption.] Here, the Minister's response will be particularly vital, and I hope that he is listening closely to every single word.

Mr. Sutcliffe: As always.

Mr. Prisk: Indeed, and I am sure that he will do so throughout this debate.

Mr. Bone: What worries me is that no practical examples have been given of what the wording means, which is no good for the industry or the consumer. I hope that the Minister will give such practical examples.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention and he is right: one key issue with all such legislation is ensuring that we think through its implementation. Sadly, that skill seems to be lacking on the Government Benches, but I have every confidence in the Minister and, hopefully, he will be able to shine in the darkness of his colleagues' abilities. However, we shall see. I am a generous soul and I am always happy to give the benefit of the doubt on these matters.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): What does the hon. Gentleman regard as irresponsible lending? I am slightly concerned that some Conservative Members are trying to include in the Bill a prescriptive list. That would be very dangerous, because it is the nature of irresponsible lending that it can mutate, depending on when such a lender is found out and another appears.

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that if we become too prescriptive, the danger is that we will tie the hands of the authorities involved. But I hope that during this debate, we can clarify the parameters within which those authorities will operate; indeed, that is perhaps the essence of our consideration this evening.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I do not want to interrupt the flow of the hon. Gentleman's argument—I appreciate that it might take him some time to get to the detail—but I should point out that amendment No. 3 would establish a licensing responsibility on the part of the OFT in examining the concept of irresponsible lending. He and his colleagues are widening the debate to include the unfairness test, but the amendment is concerned with the OFT's powers in relation to the licensing function.

Mr. Prisk: I would be very unwise were I to try to widen the tenor of this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I know that you would be the first person to bring me back in order. So although I understand the Minister's natural concern, I shall certainly do my best to ensure that we do not fall into that trap.

I have received a significant number of representations on amendment No. 3 that merit what I am sure will be a proper response from the Minister. Amendment No. 4 would amend clause 50, which deals with an issue to which I shall return in a moment. Amendment No. 5 seeks to ensure that the powers in clause 68 to modify certain legislation should be allowed only by means of the affirmative resolution procedure of the House, and not by the unsatisfactory negative procedure, a problem to which Members have referred before. So as I suspect Members can see, these amendments are of significance and will have important ramifications for those affected—lenders and borrowers, creditors and debtors alike.

"Officers of enforcement authorities other than OFT",

Amendment No. 1 would amend clause 7(3) by removing the word "his" in proposed new subsection (2) and inserting the phrase "the debtor's". So once amended, it would state that "the creditor need not give statements to any debtor who has signed and given to him a notice (a 'dispensing notice') authorising him not to comply in the debtor's case with section 77A or (as the case may be) 78(4)."

As Members will doubtless appreciate, although this is a technical matter it is also one of some substance. As I said earlier, transparency is indeed key to the whole Bill, and to that end, we welcome the use of the phrase "the debtor's" instead of the word "his", in order to clarify earlier references to creditors and debtors. However, if Members consider the context of new subsection (2), they will immediately notice the confusing aspects of the remaining drafting. The beginning of new subsection (2) states:

"Notwithstanding subsection (l)(a), where credit is provided under an agreement to two or more debtors jointly, in performing his duties—

(a) in the case of fixed-sum credit, under section 77A, or

(b) in the case of running-account credit, under section 78(4)".

That is followed by the part that I read out a moment ago, in which the phrase "the debtor's" is inserted for the word "his".

The Bill remains confusing and difficult, especially as what is proposed is to be inserted into the original 1974 Act. Does the Minister consider the language to be transparent?

Clarification of the Bill at this late stage is welcome, but we have consistently said that the fundamental problem is that it is vague and lacking in detail. Those problems persist, to the detriment of consumers and lenders alike.

Amendment No. 2 to clause 20 is small but equally significant. It would remove subsection (4), which at present states:

"An order under this section shall not alter the effect of any judgment."

As I was not clear what that meant, I looked at the background. Clauses 19 to 22 introduce a new unfair relationship test, as the Minister mentioned earlier. The new test will expand the number of factors that the court must take account of when considering the fairness of agreements between creditors and debtors. It will enable the court to decide whether a relationship between a creditor and debtor was unfair to the debtor due to the terms of the agreement, or the way that the creditor operated the agreement, or "any other thing done (or not done) by . . . the creditor" before or after the agreement was made.

Clause 20(4) was originally put in the Bill to prevent the courts from setting aside other judgments previously made, in line with the rule that a court cannot reopen a transaction previously subject to a judgment by the court. The comparison is not direct, but people will recognise that as resembling the double jeopardy principle. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) will clarify matters if I stray too far in respect of judicial consideration in other types of court, so I shall not pursue the matter.

However, the Government subsequently reconsidered the provision's impact, and the Minister said earlier that it was decided that clause 20(4) would be an obstacle to enabling customers gaining effective redress from creditors via the court.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman may be doing a disservice to the Opposition Front Bench in the other place. Did not the Conservative Lord De Mauley first propose the amendment in the Grand Committee?

Mr. Prisk: I am not condemning the amendment. I want to ensure that it is implemented effectively. I have every confidence in Lord De Mauley, who is an excellent representative of my party in the other place.

The Minister will know that a very similar amendment was tabled in Grand Committee, as has just been noted. We welcome the Government's intention to remove an obstacle to consumers gaining effective redress through the courts. The Minister likes candour and a cross-party approach, so it is fair to say that the amendment is insignificant, in the overall scheme of things, when compared with the much bigger difficulties that the new unfair relationship rules present.

I shall not rehearse in detail all the points raised repeatedly in this House and the other place. However, the Minister will be fully aware of the concerns that have been expressed, and that various implementation issues remain unresolved. We support the general principle of a new unfairness test, but are concerned about the lack of clarity in respect of what that will constitute in practice. I want to use the debate to tease the details out in a positive way, so that they can be put on record.

8.15 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing out that it was the Opposition who proposed a similar amendment in the Grand Committee. That was withdrawn, and the Government put forward the amendment under consideration now. However, I assure him that he can say nothing to tempt me to change my view of the unfair relationship test. I hope that that will prevent him from going on too long. The hon. Gentleman can be eloquent, but he will not change my mind.

Mr. Prisk: The Minister is protective of my larynx, and I am grateful, but I want to ensure that the House as a whole is aware of the issues involved. My argument is not for his benefit alone, but is for consideration by all hon. Members. However, I appreciate what he says.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): My hon. Friend joins a long line of hon. Members who have tried to tease a definition of unfairness out of the Minister. Indeed, I made a speech in Standing Committee that cited extensive case law and judgments in a detailed definition of unfairness. The Minister said that the new definition in the Bill reflected the Government's desire to tackle "all types" of unfair relationships. I made the point that the lack of further guidance leaves dissatisfied debtors in a very difficult position.

Mr. Prisk: I did not participate in the Committee debates, so I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) for clarifying the background.

As I said, we are concerned about the lack of clarity with the unfairness test. Constituents are worried that, if the industry is not clear about the lending practices that are acceptable, it inevitably will be more cautious in its lending practices, to the detriment of the borrower.

[Mr. Prisk]

Without a thorough understanding of their chances of success in the courts, some consumers may be deterred from pursuing cases that, if unsuccessful, would only add to their financial difficulties, stress and problems. I am sure that hon. Members from all parties will have had that difficulty brought to their attention by constituents who have experienced it.

It is not a sensible approach for either lenders or consumers to have to wait for case law to develop before they can be clear about the law's parameters. Moreover, the vast majority of cases are likely to be of relatively low value, so will be litigated predominantly in the lower courts. They are likely to go largely unreported as a result.

Even with the amendment under discussion, there remains the risk of inconsistency. When the Minister replies to the debate as a whole, I hope that he will tell us what assurances he can give the industry and consumers that the new test will not prove unfair in implementation.

What safeguards will be put in place to ensure that courts give consistent rulings? That goes beyond ensuring that previous judgments are not set aside, and touches on the more important question of what the unfairness test comprises. Most pertinently, where will the burden of proof fall?

Concern has been expressed by a wide range of interest groups—including lenders such as Barclays bank and the Association for Payment Clearing Services, and consumer representatives such as the Consumer Credit Association—about the reversal of what some perceive as the normal burden of proof and the introduction of the premise that all relationships might be deemed unfair unless proved otherwise.

We are concerned that that might prompt many consumers to try their luck with a claim. Ironically, the consumers most likely to do that could well be those least able to afford to do so. That could be detrimental to them in the future.

Mr. Vaizey: My hon. Friend echoes the point that I made in Committee, which was that the absence of a definition of unfair is a lose-lose situation. Not only would lack of clarity harm the debtor, but it could also harm the creditor, because ambulance-chasing lawyers will try their luck.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I was about to say that sometimes great minds think alike, but I am aware of how that phrase concludes.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Fools seldom do.

Mr. Prisk: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ealing, Comedy—I am sorry, Ealing, North for reminding us.

On Report, we moved an amendment to provide that the Office of Fair Trading issue periodic guidance on what constitutes an unfair relationship. If definitions are not included in the Bill, will the Minister undertake at least to reconsider the scope for issuing guidance to clarify the situation for consumers, lenders and the courts alike? The key to an effective consumer credit regime lies in shared responsibility. Lenders have a duty to make responsible lending decisions, and data sharing, which the Minister and I have discussed both in the House and in his Department, is critical. Consumers also have to take responsibility for their borrowing and spending decisions but, sadly, many people do not have the financial literacy to enable them to do so. The Government thus have a responsibility to get the legislative framework right so that both lenders and consumers know where they stand.

Mr. Davey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prisk: I am just about to move on to amendment No. 3, but as there is a little time left, I will give way.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman is so generous.

Is not data sharing the key to greater transparency, as it would mean that irresponsible lending would be actionable and the provisions would actually work?

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Gentleman is right. Data sharing is crucial. His predecessor as Liberal Democrat spokesman had discussions about it with the Minister and me. The matter is proceeding, so perhaps cross-party consensus could be developed.

Moving from that consensual tone, I turn to amendment No. 3, which would amend clause 29 by inserting an additional subsection at the end of line 6, page 24. I shall not read it out as I am sure that Members have studied it. The amendment makes explicit the power of the OFT to take account of irresponsible lending when monitoring and enforcing the fitness of licence holders. As originally drafted, the Bill required the OFT to have regard to the "skills, knowledge and relevant experience" of any person applying for a licence in relation to consumer credit, consumer hire or ancillary credit services. It also required the OFT to bear in mind whether an applicant had contravened any relevant law relating to consumer credit, engaged in discriminatory practices or business practices that the OFT judged deceitful—a point to which my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) referred earlier—oppressive, unfair or improper.

"committed any offence involving fraud, dishonesty or violence",

In Committee, several Members on both sides of the House supported amendments to include a requirement that creditors lend responsibly. The Government originally resisted those proposals. However, as the Minister told us, considerable concern has been expressed throughout the passage of the Bill about the fact that debt in itself is not the problem, but that irresponsible lending and, therefore, borrowing can be. Lending to someone who is already up to their neck in debt is neither sensible nor responsible. It is good neither for the customer nor, in the end, the lender. In previous debates, here and in the other place, the Government steadfastly refused our calls for a specific power on irresponsible lending in the Bill, on the grounds that it would be difficult to define irresponsible and that including such a specific duty would require guidance as to what did and did not constitute irresponsible lending.

The Minister in the other place, Lord Sainsbury, stated:

"A positive duty to lend responsibly may, considered in isolation, appear attractive. However, by imposing such a positive duty, the consequence is that the guidance will need to provide lenders with sufficient information to comply with that positive duty. That would involve the compilation of a list of rules of what is and is not responsible lending."

He concluded:

"We want to encourage responsible lending. But we do not believe that the way to do this would be to include an unhelpful duty in the legislation or in guidance. We are convinced that it will lead to the development of a multiplicity of procedural rules, which we want to avoid."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 January 2006; Vol. 677, c. 742–43.]

We welcome the Government's willingness to recognise that that would not be the case in their U-turn on the matter. Does the Minister now believe that guidance on what constitutes irresponsible lending will not after all reflect on the concerns to which the Minister in the House of Lords referred and which were described as an inflexible tick-box approach? What particular aspects persuaded the hon. Gentleman of the change? He made some brief allusions in his opening remarks but he did not give us the full explanation. It would be helpful for us to understand the reasoning behind the decision.

As the Minister is aware, the Opposition expressed continuing concern in the other place that amendments may still not cover the irresponsible granting of credit; for example, where customers are offered further credit facilities for the purchase of furniture, kitchens or other big-ticket items, despite already being able to borrow thousands of pounds on credit cards. The Government's view is that the amendment will cover that issue as well as irresponsible lending. We hope that will prove to be the case.

The Minister is no doubt aware of the latest concerns expressed by industry representatives about the lack of definition. Members from various parties touched on that earlier. Only yesterday, I received representations from APACS—an organisation that will be at the heart of the Bill's implementation—that the lack of definition will give the OFT inappropriate power. Rosalind Sellers from APACS stated:

"This amendment gives the OFT powers to refuse credit licences based on an undefined concept of 'irresponsible lending'. We strongly support the principle of making what has been implicit throughout discussion of the Bill—i.e. the need to curb irresponsible as well as unfair lending—explicit at this stage. However, we are concerned that, in practice, the lack of definition will enable the OFT to define its own powers and then enforce them without consultation."

In previous debates, one of the Minister's arguments for excluding the provision was that it would be difficult to reach a definition. It would not be surprising if the Minister said that part of the problem is as much of our making as his, given that we pressed for inclusion of the provision. However, as he has conceded to our request, it is his duty as a Minister of the Crown to ensure that the Bill is workable. That, in essence, is my concern. So will he tell us his plans for issuing guidance to the OFT and creditors on the definition of irresponsible lending?

Mr. Bone: Are not we being asked to pass into law something that is not transparent, on which guidance will be issued only afterwards and which gives a lot of power to the OFT? That is not good for consumers or the industry.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend's trilogy of concern sadly reminds me of so many Bills that the Government generate. They are not transparent and they are not workable in practice. Unfortunately, that is a regular feature. My hon. Friend is right; the amendments take positive steps, but there are concerns that they do not go far enough. I am concerned about the workability of the legislation.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I can fully understand why the hon. Gentleman—he was not with us in Committee—is going over some of the arguments that have been well rehearsed and, I hope, explained. Do I get the impression that he will not disagree with any of the Lords amendments? Will the Opposition vote against any of them?

8.30 pm

Mr. Prisk: I have always believed that, in a debate, one should listen to the argument first. I stick to that principle, and I hope that the Minister will understand why.

Lords amendment No. 4 relates to clause 50. I am sure that hon. Members realise that the Government are seeking to leave out from the word "against" to the word "in" in page 42, line 21, and insert the words

"the officer, the enforcement authority of which he is an officer or the OFT".

I suspect that hon. Members who, like myself, have not been familiar with the Bill for long would wonder what that meant. Lords amendment No. 4 is a clarifying amendment, designed to ensure that clause 50 will achieve what is intended. One would assume that the Government would have done that in the first place, but that is not always the case, as I am sure my hon. Friend will recognise.

Clause 50 deals with officers of enforcement authorities other than the OFT. Proposed new section 36F(2) of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 will make the OFT responsible for the actions of those officers, while they are fulfilling their duties under proposed new sections 36C and 36D, as the Minister said at the beginning of the debate. However, proposed new section 36F(3) disapplies that provision in the case of criminal proceedings against an officer or the enforcement authority—that is, the OFT will not be responsible in those instances. As originally drafted, proposed new section 36F(3) did not specifically refer to an instance where proceedings are brought against the OFT itself as a result of the actions of such an officer. Lords amendment No. 4 includes that situation for the purposes of clarification.

Again, the principle that underlies the Bill is welcome—it will introduce some clarity—but can the Minister give an assurance that, in his opinion, it contains no other instance of a similar lack of clarity about the respective roles of the OFT or any other agency? I look forward to hearing his reply, and I certainly want to ensure that it is on the record.

In Committee, the Minister suggested that the other enforcing authorities likely to carry out such activities on behalf of the OFT were most likely to be local authority trading standards officers. He went on to give an assurance that that work could not, and would not, be subcontracted out to other organisations or, for that matter, to the private sector. Can he repeat that reassurance? It was only a suggestion, as far as I can see from the record. Can he advise us about what statutory restrictions are in place to prevent the contracting out of those duties to inappropriate organisations or authorities?

Mr. Vaizey: The Minister in saying that there would be no subcontracting also said that no police checks would therefore be undertaken on any organisation carrying out such work. Therefore, my hon. Friend is making an extremely important and pertinent point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House has probably heard enough recapitulations of what was said in Committee. Such information is already available in printed form to all hon. Members, and I am sure that it has been studied ahead of the debate.

Mr. Prisk: I am sure that you are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is important that we study these matters thoroughly, because they are of great concern.

We welcome the fact that the Government have accepted Lords amendment No 5, which was tabled by my colleagues in another place. As the Minister will recall, that amendment addresses a key recommendation of the House of Lords Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee, which specifically expressed the view that the powers in clause 68 should be subject to the affirmative rather than the negative procedure. We welcome the Government's rather belated acceptance both of that Committee's advice and of our amendment.

Clause 68 will allow the Secretary of State, by statutory instrument, to modify any Act or subordinate legislation as he thinks fit in consequence of any provision in the Bill. Those are sweeping powers, as hon. Members will realise. Can the Minister give us an indication of the kind of legislation that is likely to be amended as a result of that clause? Of course, as with most legislation that this Government generates, we would have liked less secondary legislation in the first place.

A lack of clarity in the Bill will simply lead to confusion both for those who will implement it and those who will be subject to it. What assurances can the Minister give us that orders and guidance published under the Bill will be produced in a timely manner, giving lenders, enforcement agencies and others a proper opportunity to prepare for implementation?

The debate has given us the opportunity to seek further clarification, which hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish to pursue. It is fair to say that I have raised a number of important points about the Bill's implementation, and I look forward to the Minister response. However, as I am aware that other hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate, I want to make some final points. One of our main concerns has been the lack of detail in the Bill. That concern has been recorded throughout the discussions that have taken place in the House. The Lords amendments under consideration today are relevant to two of our particular concerns.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am a fool to myself, but I want to help the hon. Gentleman. He is arguing that lots more should be included in the Bill to provide certainty, but the other side of that argument relates to the implementation of the regulations that flow from the Bill and the industry's ability to deal with those issues. If all that is included in the Bill, it becomes too restrictive—it does not allow the opportunity to discuss the changes in systems—so he cannot have it both ways. That issue was raised throughout the debates in Committee.

Mr. Prisk: There is much merit in what the Minister says, except for the fact that we are always concerned that too many Bills are essentially shells. We are asked to take it on trust that the elements that fill them out will be as described. Although the Minister is an honourable man, it is always our concern to ensure that we understand that issue, which is the essence of my concern in this case.

As the Minister will know, widespread concern has been expressed throughout the industry about the timetable for the implementation of the Bill. Indeed, the Minister made that point at the end of his opening remarks. We recognise the fact that the Department of Trade and Industry has recently published an indicative timetable—not a final one—for the secondary legislation, guidance and consultation and that the industry welcomes that clarification.

Detail is essential not least to allow lenders to reconfigure IT systems, so that they can fully comply with the new legislation. For example, APACS has noted that, in its experience, the design, building and testing of IT systems can take 18 months from regulatory certainty to full implementation. Given the Government's record on botched IT projects, I hope that the Minister will have sympathy with the industry's concerns during the implementation programme and that he will be able to respond accordingly.

Finally, good progress was made on the Bill in another place. It is fair to say that we welcome the careful consideration that the Lords have given to the Bill. I trust that we will indeed have a useful debate today, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's detailed responses to the questions that I have had the opportunity to touch on today.

Mr. Davey: The House will be pleased to know that I will not take 39 minutes to make my remarks. I generally support the Lords amendments. My colleague the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), who was in charge of the Bill for the Liberal Democrats when it was considered on Second Reading and in Committee, generally supported the Government's proposals, although he made some useful points of detail. In the spirit of his approach to the Bill, I, too, will support the Lords amendments tonight.

Lords amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 4 are very technical. They are basically drafting amendments and I have nothing to add to what has been said by the Minister and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk).

On Lords amendment No. 5, I am still slightly worried by the Minister's reply to my intervention, in which I made the point that the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, if passed, will make that amendment redundant. Liberal Democrat and other Members are very worried about that Bill and hope that it will not receive Royal Assent—obviously, that is for another time—but it is bizarre that we are debating Lords amendment No. 5 when its force may last for only a few weeks before that other Bill is passed. I hope that the Minister will correct the record, because I think that he was wrong earlier in his response to my intervention.

I want to focus my remarks on Lords amendment No. 3. The Government have listened to the debates in this House and the other place and have brought in the provision with respect to irresponsible lending to ensure that when the Office of Fair Trading grants a licence to a credit organisation, it can ensure that that organisation does not engage in irresponsible lending. That is a welcome development, but there are points that need to be probed.

Mr. Bone: Is the hon. Gentleman concerned that a licence may be granted and then, later on, unfair practices may come in? What are the powers to revoke the licence?

Mr. Davey: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He makes an interesting point. I hope that the Minister was listening because he needs to provide the House with clarification on that point.

The concerns regarding the new provision—although it is widely welcomed—are about definition. We have heard that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford wants more prescription in the Bill. At least, he did at times, but in his reply to the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) he seemed to agree with the concern about being over-prescriptive. There is always a balance to be struck in legislation. The Government have sought to strike it by allowing the OFT to issue guidance. That is a settled view and I am not sure whether it will change as a result of tonight's debate. It is critical, in terms of the implementation of the Bill, that the guidance is timely and follows full and thorough consultation with the industry.

If the Minister says one thing in reply to my remarks, I hope that it will be that he will use every power that is open to him—I know that he does not have any strict legislative powers to command the OFT, given that it is an independent body under the Enterprise Act 2002—to ensure that the OFT hears loud and clear that this House wants to ensure that the consultation is comprehensive, thorough and engages with all the different players in the industry. It is important that the OFT is clear, as it plans ahead, in its consultation and in publishing the final guidance, because the industry needs to invest in IT systems. It needs to design, build, test and implement them. Although the Department of Trade and Industry has given an indicative timetable, as the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said, the industry wants greater clarity on that. The quicker the Minister and the OFT can provide that, the better. I hope that the Minister can say something on that tonight.

I would also like the Minister to be clearer about the role of future court judgments. Clearly, the definitions of irresponsible lending are ultimately testable in the courts. Although the OFT guidance will be the basis on which IT systems are implemented and new practices are developed, there could be a case in the courts in 12 to 18 months, or in two years, that overrides the OFT's guidance and changes the whole system.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: If a subsidiary company of a main body did the lending, the OFT would have to follow that through the main company, the subsidiary company and all the way down. We have seen that with Barclays and many of the other big banks. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the problems that the OFT will have will be enforcing the measure through subsidiaries? Who will it deal with?

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I hope that the Minister was listening. The question will be whether the licence is issued to the principal company or has to be applied for and then issued to all the different layers. I hope that the Minister can clarify that.

My point—the hon. Gentleman intervened to make a separate point—was about the role of future court decisions in defining what counts as irresponsible lending. I know that the Minister cannot pre-judge what the courts may say in a future case, but for the industry to make sure that it has some certainty and stability to invest, we need to make sure that the OFT's guidance and what the Minister says, tonight and at other times, assists that process.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We are running the risk of confusing the unfairness test and irresponsible lending. We want to be very clear that the courts will consider the concept of unfairness. The test of unfairness already exists within the framework of the financial services and affects many parts of the financial services regulations. The hon. Gentleman is talking about irresponsible lending, but we are not talking about a duty in relation to irresponsible lending. We are talking about the OFT considering irresponsible lending in relation to the fitness of purpose of a licence holder. There is a difference.

8.45 pm

Mr. Davey: I accept that, but let us imagine a situation in which the OFT has decided that it will not issue a licence to a particular credit institution because it believes that its previous lending was irresponsible. Presumably, the Minister is not saying that judicial review does not apply. I am sure that he would accept that if that credit institution was rather annoyed that the OFT had made that ruling and thought that it was unfair, it would surely be able to ask for a judicial review of the OFT. Perhaps I have misunderstood the 2002 Act. I hope that the Minister will reply to that point, because it is important.

I want to come back to the point that I made when I intervened on the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford, because the issue of data sharing is particularly relevant to the point about irresponsible lending. If a credit institution were accused by the OFT of irresponsible lending, no doubt it would want to defend that to ensure that it got the licence. However, given that it will not have any powers—particularly in relation to people who had credit cards prior to the Data Protection Act 1998 coming into force—how will the OFT be able to say that it has been lending in an irresponsible manner? The credit institution will not have been able to have access to the other debts and borrowings of the applicant.

[Mr. Davey]

To make sure that the new factor—irresponsible lending—works, can be implemented and makes sense, I hope that the Minister will move forward, with the Department for Constitutional Affairs, on the issues relating to data sharing. My hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk led that debate when we considered the Bill previously. He wanted to make sure that the Minister would push ahead on the matter, with his departmental colleagues. Lords amendment No. 3, which we will hopefully pass tonight, cries out for some real effort to go into that aspect because it is the missing piece of the jigsaw. If we pass legislation without that piece, there will be a concern that, although the provision is clearly a major improvement on what has gone before, it is still not quite there. Will the Minister give the House some detail about the future timetable for dealing with that issue?

Mr. Weir: I shall be brief. I simply want to make a couple of points. Obviously, we welcome the amendments, which are sensible. The Minister said that Lords amendment No. 2 was a technical amendment, but I am not sure that I agree. It is an important amendment. Prior to being elected to this House, I earned my crust as a solicitor and I often had people come to me who had got themselves into financial difficulties. One of the problems was that many people did not come forward to seek help until they were very well into those financial difficulties. In many cases, they had court judgments against them. It was well nigh impossible to do very much about the situation by that stage. The amendment will allow the courts to reopen some of the cases where there has been unfair lending. That is important and I congratulate the Minister on the amendment.

My other point relates to Lords amendment No. 3. As I mentioned in an intervention, I was concerned about some of the things that were coming from Conservative Members on this matter. I recognise the basic point being made: that both lenders and borrowers want some certainty. I accept that, but my problem with being too prescriptive is that those who indulge in irresponsible lending can be very inventive in how they do so. The danger with being prescriptive is that we will not hit many of those practices. The Minister has approached things sensibly by laying down a definition and leaving the matter to the OFT, so that there can be some flexibility. I note that it is more than 30 years since the last such Act was passed. The Bill is a piece of major legislation and if we find that we have to amend it, it could be a long time before we can do so.

Mr. Bone: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Does he agree that we have not been given a single practical example of what the Bill would catch? I would like some of those before the legislation passes into law, if it is to do so.

Mr. Weir: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am sure that examples could be given, but I would not want them written into the Bill because it is important that the OFT is given the flexibility to deal with dynamic situations that can move quickly. People who indulge in such practices find inventive ways of dragging people into such schemes. The Minister's approach is sensible and I strongly support it.

James Brokenshire: It is a pleasure to be locking horns with the Minister again on the Bill. I made my maiden speech on its Second Reading and have followed its progress through the House ever since. As a non-practising solicitor with some background in consumer credit, I have maintained a general interest in its passage.

We have heard that many of the Lords amendments are technical, and I would agree with that analysis. Lords amendment No. 1 obviously just changes around the wording of clause 7, and I have no issue whatsoever with that legal drafting point.

It was interesting to hear the discussions on Lords amendment No. 2, which will delete wording to ensure that previous judgments cannot act as a bar. The intention behind the Bill has been to try to ensure that there was a retrospective effect regarding the unfairness test. I remain disappointed that we have not gained the clarity that we wanted on the meaning of "unfairness", even at this late stage. It is interesting that previous judgments will no longer be a bar on the redress that a creditor may seek due to an unfair relationship.

The most interesting amendment is that to clause 29, which returns us to the debate on irresponsible lending. The Minister's analysis that the provision essentially relates to licensing, and is thus distinct to provisions on the ombudsman or the court, was correct. The unfairness test deals with redress, rather than licensing. However, I wish to follow up a point that I raised with him about the continuing nature of the provision. The clause relates to the determination of whether an applicant is a fit person for a licence. The word "applicant" suggests that we are talking about new applicants who want a consumer credit licence from the OFT. My question remains of what will happen when a person has been granted a licence by the OFT, given that clause 29 relates to the issues that the OFT will consider when determining whether to grant a licence.

I am aware that other aspects of the Bill, such as clause 38, which will insert proposed new section 33A into the Consumer Credit Act 1974, give the OFT the power to give notice to a licensee for purposes connected with

"addressing the matter with which the OFT is dissatisfied . . . or . . . securing that matters of the same or a similar kind do not arise."

I want an assurance that the interpretation of clause 38 will mean that the OFT will have the power to address matters in not just the context of new applications that it receives. Clearly, new applicants might not have much of a track record to show whether they satisfy the evidence test on engaging

"in business practices appearing to the OFT to be deceitful or oppressive or otherwise unfair or improper".

Lords amendment No. 3 is effectively further clarification on what those words mean, so irresponsible lending is, in essence, deemed to be a practice that is deceitful, oppressive, or otherwise unfair.

Mr. Bone: I am beginning to become very concerned as I listen to my hon. Friend. If the measure applies only to new licences, it drives a coach and horses through the legislation. We are worried about existing licences, so that point needs to be clarified.

James Brokenshire: My hon. Friend makes the point to which I was trying to allude. I hope that the Minister will give us clarification on ongoing enforcement and monitoring and the ways of ensuring that someone remains a fit and proper person.

Mr. Sutcliffe rose—

James Brokenshire: I see that the Minister wishes to intervene, so I hope that we will get clarification straight away.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I intervene on the basis that I might not get the opportunity to give answers in full, given the time constraints. The measure will apply to existing licences as well.

James Brokenshire: It is important that we have that clarification on the record. Given that the legislation is not a consolidating Bill, but merely inserts new measures into existing legislation, such clarification on what the follow-through will be is extremely helpful.

We come back to the definition of "irresponsible lending". There is some similarity between our consideration of that and our previous lengthy debates on the unfairness test. I have even asked the Minister a question about the unfairness test, and he kindly responded by promising to monitor closely the impact and effect of the test to ensure that it does not have unintended consequences. One needs to read both provisions together, although they are separate. The unfairness test relates to a creditor who wants redress trying to assert that the relationship that was entered into was unfair. However, when considering irresponsible lending, the OFT can examine both matters. It can consider whether someone has been unfair, even though it has said that it will not try to define that. I presume that it says that that is a matter for the courts because of the context in which the provision arose.

I hope that the OFT will be prepared to give more clarification on the meaning of irresponsible lending. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) talked about certainty. The industry needs certainty so that it can prepare properly and effectively for the implementation of the Bill. We will hopefully then not get into enforcement problems due to challenges on whether the provision has been infringed.

The question of clarity and certainty is germane. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) highlighted the fact that a balance must be struck. On the one hand, we need to provide protections, but on the other we do not want something that is too prescriptive. We debated in Committee why a prescriptive list that is an attempt to give certainty might lead to a box-ticking exercise, rather than providing the protection to creditors that we all want as a consequence of a Bill. If the system is too vague and uncertain, there is a risk that certain sectors of our community, especially people from socially disadvantaged backgrounds, will be denied credit—full stop. There is a risk that if the system is very vague and uncertain, lenders will say, "We don't know what this means, so we are not going to take any risks at all" and thus withdraw from a specific sector of the market.

Some providers lend small sums of money, but the annual percentage rate that they levy suggests that they are engaging in irresponsible lending. However, the monitoring process shows that they provide a service to the market that would otherwise be sucked up by loan sharks and unsavoury characters whose practices we hope the Bill will end. If there is uncertainty, credit could be denied to a sector of the market. Lenders already have to factor in the cost of risk, but because of the small sums involved that may appear disproportionate. I am deeply concerned that failure to provide clarity would have the unintended consequence of playing into the hands of loan sharks and illegal lenders who prey on the disadvantaged.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman suggests that if borrowers were denied access to those lending organisations they would be driven into the hands of loan sharks and unsavoury organisations. However, there are alternatives, such as credit unions, that are certainly not unsavoury, in many parts of the country. Does he acknowledge that they are properly regulated and do not offer unfair or excessive lending terms? I should declare that I am a member of a credit union board.

James Brokenshire: I would certainly like to put on the record my appreciation of the work of credit unions. However, they are not accessible to everyone in those circumstances. We need to promote a diverse and varied credit industry. I hope that the Minister and the Department will continue to work with the industry to do so once the Bill is enacted. However, I fear that the industry may withdraw its services from certain parts of society if the law is not certain or if it is over-prescriptive. A balance needs to be struck.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford referred to the briefing note circulated by APACS, which highlighted concerns about withdrawal from the market:

> "In practice we are concerned that the OFT will set an unnecessarily wide definition and that this will in turn have an impact on whom lenders choose to lend to."

Lenders should be more cognisant of the people to whom they are lending. That is the concept of responsible lending that Members on both sides of the House have sought to promote throughout the progress of the Bill. There should be greater responsibility, but not if that means that services are withdrawn wholesale from certain parts of the market. It is self-evident that the socially disadvantaged are in a difficult situation, so an extortionate credit bargain under the existing legislation could put them in a much worse position. People would not have access to direct or regulated credit, so they would fall prey to the unregulated sector.

There has been reference to the involvement of the courts. In exercising its powers, the OFT must be certain about its remit and the provisions that it seeks to interpret. We have missed an opportunity by failing to spell out the concept of irresponsible lending in the Bill. In Committee, the Minister said:

"If we are very specific about an issue we could undo what we are trying to achieve."

I agree. He continued:

"For many, responsible lending imposes a requirement that lenders do certain things before extending credit. However, the things that a lender may take into account in the case of one debtor may be very different to those of another. It will depend on a debtor's circumstances.

Any duty to lend responsibly would mean defining what is, and what is not, responsible lending."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 28 June 2005; c. 93.]

Several months down the line, we have included the concept of responsible lending in the Bill, but we have not included a definition. I therefore hope that the Minister can explain where we can find such a definition, given his comments on the issue in Committee.

In summary, there is not certainty in the Bill about the meaning of responsible lending. I accept that a balance needs to be struck, but clause 29 deals explicitly with fraudulent, deceitful or oppressive practices. As a lawyer, I interpret things according to their context, and such practices suggest that a high standard would have to be breached before the responsible lending test were applied. Someone would therefore have to be guilty of an outrageous practice to breach that standard.

Mr. Bone: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government appear to be against irresponsible lending, but they do not have the foggiest idea what responsible lending is?

James Brokenshire: The Bill does not provide any indication of what constitutes responsible or irresponsible lending, so my hon. Friend is quite right.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Is irresponsible lending based on giving a loan, but failing to reveal who provided that loan?

James Brokenshire: I shall wait to see whether the Bill applies to us all in relation to any loans that may or may not have been made. It remains to be seen whether another Committee will decide to investigate its relevance to such matters.

The time allowed for industry to prepare for the Bill is of critical concern. We have already heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford that the proper implementation of the measure could take 18 months. I appreciate that the Minister can probably only take limited action in providing guidance and greater clarity, so such things may be left to secondary legislation and guidance from the OFT. I hope that that is sufficient to ensure a smooth transition for the industry. Throughout the Bill's progress, there has been a great deal of cross-party consensus about the need for a measure to update the Consumer Credit Act 1974, which is not fit for purpose, so I hope that we will use this final opportunity to do so.

Lords amendment No. 4 is a technical amendment. As a lawyer and a purist, however, I believe that it should refer not to "the officer" but to the "relevant officer", given that that term is used throughout clause 50. I would therefore be grateful if the Minister would confirm that "the officer" is indeed the relevant officer cited in that provision.

David Taylor: As life president of outsourcing watch and privatisation watch, could the hon. Gentleman comment on the suggestion made by his Front-Bench colleague, the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk), that amendment No. 4, which seeks to insert section 36F into the 1974 Act, would in some way catalyse outsourcing, privatisation or contestability, all of which are concepts dear to the hearts of people close to the power centres in the Government?

James Brokenshire: I do not disagree with what my hon. Friend said in the context of clause 50 and amendment No. 4, although if he wishes to clarify his comments I am sure he will use the opportunity afforded to him this evening.

Amendment No. 4 is largely technical. It also clarifies the role of the OFT. Without it, there would have been a problem if a criminal action had been launched against the OFT as to the responsibility and actions of persons to whom powers had been subcontracted or delegated. I welcome the clarification that the amendment provides.

Finally, I welcome amendment No. 5, which ensures that the affirmative procedure applies to the Bill. I echo the sentiments of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) with reference to the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. Hon. Members are concerned about the meaning of legislation, and the Bill seems to drive a coach and horses through large amounts of legislation by means of statutory instruments. Although I welcome the more positive way of making regulations under the Consumer Credit Bill, I remained concerned about other aspects, but that is not a matter for the Minister in the present context.

I hope that when the Bill is enacted, it brings about a regulated market that offers diversity, flexibility and a range of credit facilities to everyone in a more responsible way, so that there will be fewer of the cases that many of us continue to see in our constituency caseload, where there has been an unfair relationship test or irresponsible lending. I remain somewhat sceptical, but I note that the Minister has undertaken to review the legislation in due course. During that review, I hope that we will have a further opportunity to see whether it has achieved the ends that it is intended to achieve.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I wish to respond to the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) and the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) about credit unions. Credit unions were set up to bridge the gap between loan sharks and genuine lenders. The growth of credit unions reflects the failure to regulate the industry properly in this country.

I put two questions to the Minister about credit unions. If a new credit union is set up, will a new licence be needed? All credit unions, as the Minister knows, are individual credit unions. They are not part of one group. They are set up by local people and therefore use local resources. If each has to apply to the Office of Fair

Trading for a licence and the applicant, under amendment No. 3, is deemed not to be worthy, how would the credit union continue to survive? One of the problems that credit unions face is that people can give 50p a week. No doubt the Minister will correct me if that is wrong. They therefore receive and give out tiny amounts, but they stop people falling into the hands of loan sharks.

I am sure that all hon. Members have had a chance to visit credit unions. If they have not, they should. Credit unions give people an opportunity. I would hate to see enforcement, regulation or any form of licensing that could affect them. The OFT is being given sweeping powers to carry out the functions set out in the Bill. It is a statutory body dealing with an organisation run by local people, who have neither the ability nor the expertise, unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch, who is a solicitor—

9.15 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I should point out that credit unions will not be regulated under the Consumer Credit Bill. They are regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, so they will not be subject to the tests that the OFT will apply.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I am grateful to the Minister. I am sure that credit unions throughout the United Kingdom and all the people who depend on them will be grateful too.

Mr. Devine: The hon. Gentleman clearly knows a great deal about credit unions, as I do. Does he agree not only that individuals and their partners should join credit unions, but that organisations such as local bowling clubs, cricket clubs and so on should be allowed to do so?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The hon. Gentleman's proposal has great merit. Perhaps the Minister will consider it and in due course table an amendment to that effect. He will have to revisit the subject when the OFT wants more powers.

My next point is about citizens advice bureaux, to which people turn when they have problems. In their surgeries many hon. Members will have dealt with cases of people desperate to get out of debt as a result of irresponsible lending.

Mr. Bone: Is my hon. Friend aware that the CABs are dealing with so many cases of debt that they can hardly cope? In my constituency, the Rushden branch is desperate for extra funding just to deal with debt work.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend, and neither, no doubt, could the House. Most people who approach the CAB are struggling with debt upon debt, not one set of debt. They have taken out too many credit cards—too many lines of credit. The Minister will be interested to know that that is the major part of the CAB's job, and the problem is getting worse. I hope that the Bill will address it, otherwise I suspect that the Minister will be back before the House making sweeping amendments to the Bill. He shakes his head. I hope he is right.

There is another aspect of licences that may require further attention. I refer to the ability of international companies to trade. They can be based in any country and their subsidiaries can legitimately be based in the United Kingdom, as with many banks and other organisations. One of the problems is their ability to lend money in the United Kingdom. Regulation has been difficult enough through the Financial Services Authority and other organisations, let alone the OFT. The Minister will understand that international law enforcement to bring to book companies that have lent in the UK from an international base is almost impossible. The OFT has no power to do that.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I do not doubt that international situations are difficult, as the hon. Gentleman says, but surely that is no reason not to proceed with the measures tonight.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I entirely agree. That is not what I am seeking to do. I am trying to clarify the position. I can see nothing in the Bill that addresses that. My concern is that people will take out loans, thinking that they are dealing with a British company that is administered in Britain, pays its taxes in Britain and comes under British company law. When something goes wrong and a company goes into insolvency or has its licence revoked, one has no recourse if it turns out that it is based in another country, which will probably not be in the European Union.

Mr. Bone: I hope that I am not about to steal my hon. Friend's thunder, but he has mentioned the European Union. Is there a European Union perspective to the matter, and should we take it into account?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I always hesitate to mention Europe in this place—but luckily, certain hon. Members are not in their places. I do not have a problem with people trading out of Europe—most of our companies have European subsidiaries—but I am thinking about a situation in which a European company has a subsidiary in this country.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I think that I shall have some sport: there is going to be a European consumer credit directive, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support it.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: I was just about to come to that. Never mind my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone); the Minister has stolen my thunder—it is nice to have one's thunder stolen by the Minister, I suppose.

If we are to have responsible lending throughout the nations of Europe—in other words, through the European Union—and if the OFT is to give out licences, will we have to return to this place to invoke a European directive on a European credit Bill to police those licences? And will the subsidiaries be policed or licensed? My concern is that one cannot control subsidiaries. Consider how many credit cards the big five clearing banks issue through subsidiary companies—how many companies does a bank such as the Halifax own?

I defy anyone to know which company has actually issued a credit card. If one looks on the back of the piece of paper, there is a spiel, and right at the bottom it will say, for example, National Westminster bank or bank of Scotland. Let us consider the case of Barings bank—a disaster of epic proportions. If there had been lines of credit cards and lines of loans, what would have happened? How could the legislation have been enforced in this country, because Barings bank was taken over by the Dutch post office, ING? I do not know whether that is still the case, and whether an overseas company could now be pursued in similar circumstances.

Company law is unclear on enforcement. If a licence is given, what checks will the OFT make on whether that company is solvent? The matter rests outside company law. If a new bank were to come in, credit checks would have to be conducted, which could be difficult. What powers does the OFT have to enable it to do that? I am not sure whether such cases are provided for in the Bill. As the Minister knows, the worst legislation leads to the Minister having to come back to this House to amend it. The Bill contains sweeping powers, but this matter is complicated. If there is a European consumer Bill, and if we face the complication of overseas lending, it will be difficult for this place to regulate it.

The success or failure of the Bill may lie not in what the OFT can do, but in its manpower, which is not enormous. I hope that we do not see Capita or some other organisation creeping in to control such matters, because: first, it is not regulated; secondly, it is not part of government; thirdly, it will be appointed to do a job on a contract; and fourthly, we will have no say whatsoever in the long term as to its actual operations. Will the Minister tell us whether there is a safeguard to stop the OFT subcontracting such work? Lords amendment No. 4 mentions:

"the officer, the enforcement authority of which he is an officer or the OFT".

An officer could be anybody, presumably, providing that they are given the power to do the job. There is no reason why such work could not be given to one of those very large companies that do an enormous amount of work within government. Will the Minister confirm that that is not the case? If it is the case, what are the safeguards? If there are safeguards, will they be included in an amendment, so the OFT cannot use them as an excuse to stop people lending, to make people worried about lending or to make companies that might want to lend think that they will not touch such things, because they involve outside influences?

Mr. Bone: My hon. Friend is making a powerful speech, and he has touched on the resources of the OFT. Does he envisage that the OFT will have to review all the licences when the law comes into force? What effect will that have on the manpower of that organisation?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. As he has said, the rate of company acquisitions in this country is enormous. Credit lenders, both large and small, are taken over daily. If one buys a fridge from, for example, Comet, one enters into some form of credit agreement, which can be sold by that company to another credit company. Will the OFT check each such company from the start?

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Is my hon. Friend concerned about the efficacy of evidence taking in respect of the OFT, given the example of supermarkets, where there have been concerns about—for the want of a better word—reprisals against people who have given evidence to the OFT?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. I was interested to hear my Front-Bench colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) discuss Lord Sainsbury, who issues quite a lot of credit lines to people who subscribe to his supermarket chain. There is nothing wrong with that—but how on earth would it be policed if the OFT did not have a database or background information? As I have said, I defy anyone to work out who is doing what. Will the OFT have the power to force those companies to let it know about such changes on a set date? Will such companies have 28 days or 14 days for compliance, and how will someone know whether their account has been moved?

I am sure that most hon. Members have mortgages—one or two of us have more than one—and one must know from whom one is borrowing money. There is no guarantee that the OFT will be able to police such matters in the long term. I am not convinced that the resources will be available for the individual companies to be put into their slots for the long term and controlled by the OFT.

Governments are very good at cutting resources, and we have seen too many examples of such organisations being slimmed down, in terms of manpower and resources. The Rural Payments Agency is a good example. If it goes wrong, who is responsible?

The Bill is delightful and will provide protection, but the underlying problem is that when big companies start to play, they do not care who they hurt. If they start to hurt the most vulnerable people in society, the credit unions and others are left to pick up the pieces. If we then do not let the OFT do its job, or we do not give it the powers, or it does not have the resources, the Bill will be worthless. I ask the Minister to ensure that that is built in.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I said to colleagues that I expected this debate to be over quickly, on the basis that the Lords amendments were all agreed and there had only ever been one Division on this Bill both this time and before, when its predecessor was lost for lack of parliamentary time. I therefore had reasonable expectations that we would not go into the detail that we have tonight.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): So did we.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Well, perhaps other issues have had an effect. We have had a good debate, which was conducted in the right spirit. We had some robust contributions, which did not necessarily hone in on the Lords amendments before us this evening.

I apologise to the hon. Members for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) for not welcoming them to their new responsibilities. We have had discussions in Committee recently and I am beginning to see those hon. Gentlemen far too often for my liking. We continue to have good natured debates.

There was reasonable support for Lords amendment No. 1, so I hope that everybody is happy with the distinction between "his" and "the debtor's". The wording is transparent and will provide the opportunities that we need. On Lords amendment No. 2, I am grateful to the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir), who has raised many issues about legal certainty and judgment. I take on board his comments and thank him for his congratulations on the amendment.

The main amendment for discussion was Lords amendment No. 3, on the OFT's responsibilities in relation to irresponsible lending. There was confusion in some minds about the distinction between the unfairness test and the responsible lending function that the OFT will be able to take into consideration when performing its licensing function. I refer hon. Members to the debates on previous stages of the Bill, in which we tried to clarify why we were supporting that function for the OFT. I do not think that the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) meant to attack the OFT, and it is true that the Bill will have resource implications for it and bodies such as the trading standards authorities, which act as enforcement authorities on behalf of the OFT when requested.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton raised the point on data sharing made previously by the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb). It is important, and the three Front Benchers have been talking to APACS and others about it. I have also talked to colleagues in the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and we will consult shortly on the issue.

Mr. Prisk: What I did not hear from the Minister on amendment No. 3 was whether there was a particular reason why he changed his mind and accepted it. What was the one thing that led the Government to accept the amendment, when they were so reluctant to do so previously?

Mr. Sutcliffe: It is easy to answer that. It was the power of the argument, especially from some of the noble Lords, from their experience on various boards. Lord Borrie had also been involved with the OFT. It was the weight of discussion and the opportunity for the OFT to have that power in the licensing function. I make the distinction between the licensing function and the duty to lend responsibly.

The Lords amendments are important to our discussion. We have gone through all the aspects thoroughly, both this evening and previously. The Bill has been well consulted upon. It became part of the process following the consumer credit White Paper, which again was fully consulted upon. The Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill stands alone in that it has not completed its passage through the House. In amendment No. 5, we rightly acknowledge and respond to the concerns of the Regulatory Reform Committee in relation to clause 68. I have dealt with the point about data sharing.

Implementation is a key issue. A timetable will be produced. We are cognisant of the fact that there need to be IT systems changes, and experts from the industry will be seconded to the Department to offer advice and assistance when we draw up the various regulations.

This has been a thoughtful debate, and I hope that the House will support the Lords amendments.

Identity Cards Bill

Further consideration of Lords messages

Lords amendment: No. 22M.

9.36 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this we may discuss Lords amendments Nos. 22N and 22O.

These amendments were tabled in the other place by Lord Armstrong of Ilminster. They were accepted by my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Scotland on behalf of the Government and passed by an overwhelming majority of 227. They were also supported by Conservative Front Benchers, although I am not sure that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) agreed with their decision. In fact, there are many rumours about his chagrin, which are no doubt exaggerated, but I am sure that with his characteristic statesmanship he will be able to put the House straight on any of his personal concerns.

I note that Lord Armstrong's proposals were not supported by the Liberal Democrats in the other place, who sought to take yet another opportunity to do whatever they could to destroy them. I sometimes think that it is a little sad that the greatest achievement in the Liberal Democrats' history—the Parliament Act 1911—is being so betrayed by the Liberal Democrats who are currently in Parliament.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall not

Earlier today, the Commons re-affirmed its view, for the fifth time, that those who apply for a designated document should have their details entered on the national identity register and be issued with an identity card. As hon. Members know, that was fundamental to the Government's approach in implementing the ID cards scheme, from our first consultation exercise in 2002. That was followed by a policy announcement in 2003, the draft Bill that the Home Affairs Committee scrutinised in 2004, the Bill that was debated before the 2005 election and the Government's manifesto commitment.

We have now agreed, as a concession-seeking compromise, that anyone who applies for a British passport could say that they did not want an ID card to be issued. However, that applies only to applications made up to 1 January 2010. As I have said during our debates, we have been constructive in seeking compromise on many points and I am grateful that Lord Armstrong, to whom hon. Members should give credit, has persevered in his honourable attempts to secure an agreement.

There are three critical points of difference between the amendment that he tabled in the other place, which was overwhelmingly agreed to, and his resolution, which we considered earlier. First, Lord Armstrong's amendment preserves the integrity of the national identity register. It ensures that the details of all applicants for designated documents will still be entered on it. That will mean that they will be afforded the protection that that will provide from identity theft. It will also provide the wider benefits to society by ensuring that attempts by people to establish multiple identities are more easily detected.

Lord Armstrong's acceptance of the importance and integrity of the national identity register was an essential point of his amendment in the other place at this stage. It was not covered in previous amendments and it is the key point that has enabled us to accept it. I observed the debate in the other place and Lord Armstrong made it clear that that first point was essential.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, I introduced the original identity cards measure. Earlier today, I proposed the way forward that the Lords have now taken. Does he share my pleasure that the Lords have agreed that all applicants for a passport will go on the identity register so that we can make genuine progress, as our manifesto commitment outlines? In a non-partisan spirit, will he congratulate the Conservative party on reversing its position again?

Mr. Clarke: To be candid, I find non-partisanship on the issue difficult. However, in its spirit, I pay genuine tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer), who has campaigned for identity cards for many years since his election in 1997. It has not been an easy pitch on which to bat but he has done it exceptionally well and made his case powerfully. I am glad that, today, Parliament has paid tribute to his work. Earlier, he drew attention to the critical importance of the national identity register. Lord Armstrong's acknowledgement of that has enabled us to support the amendment from the other place. The integrity of the national identity register has been the central point that enables us to accept Lord Armstrong's amendment.

Secondly, the amendment removes from the scope of any opt-out, designated documents other than the passport. The new amendment removes any opt-out from the residence permit, which specifies the right of third country nationals to reside in this country and the terms and conditions that they must honour. I noted from the earlier response of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) that he accepted the logic of that change

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The Home Secretary is right. That is why I asked him to clarify the point earlier. The change improves and reinforces the relevant aspect of the Bill.

Mr. Clarke: I detected from the right hon. Gentleman's earlier response that he understood that point and I am grateful—in a non-partisan way—that he has.

Simon Hughes: In a non-partisan way, will the Home Secretary accept two points? First, Liberal Democrats, with whom he may disagree, have at least been consistent in opposing identity cards on principle and in practice. Secondly, for those of us who continue to resist the ridiculous incursion of the state on the individual, if we all renew our passports now, we will not be subject to the ludicrous new system for probably 10 years.

Mr. Clarke: The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) dealt with the second point earlier. Consistency and idiocy are characteristics of the Liberal Democrats and I look forward to the response of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg).

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer), I have never been enthusiastic about identity cards and I have not changed my mind. However, I believe that, ultimately, the will of the elected Chamber must prevail. Among the critics, I am pleased—perhaps others are not—that the Home Secretary was willing to make some movement towards a compromise. I congratulate him on not being as dogmatic as he could have been. The compromise is acceptable, however much I dislike the scheme.

Mr. Clarke: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. As I said earlier today, his position has always been clear. It is true to say that we have been flexible, but so too have Lord Armstrong and those in the other place in making important and significant changes. The first relates to preserving the integrity of the national identity register; the second to removing from the scope of any opt-out designated documents other than the passport—

9.45 pm

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way.

The third concession that Lord Armstrong has made is that, once the passport becomes a designated document, his amendment will provide for a time-limited opt-out for people applying for passports also to be issued with an ID card. I share Lord Armstrong's view, which he expressed again in the debate, that it will be a small number of people who choose to opt out. However, while those who opt out will not be able to prove their identity securely in a range of transactions with public and private sector organisations—that is the choice that they would make in opting out—they would also not be required to inform the authorities of changes in prescribed details such as their address. That obligation applies only to those to whom an ID card has been issued. If we agree to the amendments from the other place, as I hope we will, the opt-out will extend until 1 January 2010.

Lynne Jones: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way.

On those three key points, Lord Armstrong's amendment preserves the integrity of the national identity register, deals with the question of residence permits and documents other than passports, and proposes a time limit of 1 January 2010. These are important changes, and I repeat my appreciation for the approach that he has taken in seeking to secure agreement.

Lynne Jones rose—

Mr. Clarke: Before I give way to my hon. Friend—which I will because I am a generous, non-partisan type of chap—I need to point out that, in the other place, Lady Anelay suggested that these proposals meant that the audit log would not apply to those registered when applying for a passport in this initial phase. For the avoidance of doubt, I need to make it clear that that is not strictly correct. Once registered, any provision of information from the register will be logged, which provides a safeguard to the individual.

Lynne Jones: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way. Will he tell the House something about the charges for the passport and the identity document? In particular, will those people who decline to receive an identity card be exempt from paying the charge of £30 or thereabouts?

Mr. Clarke: No, they will not—[Interruption.] Let me make two points. The overall pricing strategy for these documents will be determined after the Bill has received Royal Assent, as we have made clear all the way through. We have given a variety of indications about unit costs, and we have made various commitments in the House that will be honoured, but the actual pricing strategy will be determined on that basis. Secondly, concern was expressed in the other place—I cannot speak for this place—about the principle of whether a person should be required to have an ID card, as opposed to being on the national identity register. We are accepting the proposal from the other place for an opt-out on the principle of accepting an ID card, though not on the issue of the national identity register. In respect to the other place, its Members were very clear that the cost issues were not a matter of concern for them.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way.

The date of 1 January 2010 adds a little bit of uncertainty to the Government's plans for implementing the scheme, but we believe that that uncertainty will be manageable. That is a judgment that we have made in discussions with Members of the other place on these matters. Lord Armstrong's proposal has the support of the Government as one which, in our opinion, strikes a sensible and acceptable compromise. It is important that that is the case, and I again pay tribute to his work.

In drawing the ping-pong of this Bill to a close, I would like to express my appreciation to the people who have worked so hard on this piece of legislation: first, to my ministerial colleagues, and even to the Opposition spokespeople—and, indeed, Back Benchers—of all parties in both Houses who have worked so hard in this process. I know that it has been a difficult Bill, but people have sought to address it in a constructive and positive way, even when we have disagreed—except the Lib Dems.

[Mr. Clarke]

Secondly, I want to pay tribute to the staff of Parliament. They have dealt with what has been one of the longest ping-pongs with integrity and professionalism. On behalf of the whole House, I express appreciation for their work.

Thirdly, I want to express appreciation for the officials in the Home Office and elsewhere who have worked on the Bill. They are dedicated and they sought to give professional advice, without any partisanship, to everybody involved in the debate. I pay tribute to their work in developing and taking forward this scheme.

David Davis: Let me start by associating my party with the Home Secretary's final comments about the staff involved—his civil servants, the staff of the House and the support staff for all the parties. I include the Liberal Democrats in that, even though, despite the generous and non-partisan nature of which he made so much in his speech, he does not.

The Home Secretary started by attempting to tease me about my view on this amendment. The amendment reminds me of an old story told to me by a regimental sergeant-major some 25 years ago, which I shall repeat solely for the purpose of amusing the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), who is in his place. The officers' mess had given the sergeants' mess a barrel of beer and the commanding officer asked the sergeant-major what they made of it and whether they liked it. He said, "It was just right, sir." The CO said, "Just right?" He said, "Yes, sir. If it had been any worse we couldn't have drunk it, and if it had been any better, you wouldn't have given it to us." That about sums up this amendment—just acceptable.

The amendment is a major concession by the Government in one respect—nobody who does not want an ID card need have one before the next election. That, of itself, is worth having. If the election comes at its latest possible date, there will be a small gap from January 2010 until May 2010, but people can avoid that, I guess, by buying their passport a few months early.

The Home Secretary referred to two unpalatable aspects of the compromise that he struck with Lord Armstrong, in which the Government drove Lord Armstrong away from his original intent. First, there is the maintenance of the requirement for entry on the identity register. Despite what he says, that is mitigated without the ID cards, because the information that goes with the ID card is limited—most perniciously, the so-called audit trail. The Home Secretary said what is legally correct—the audit trail will still exist. But, of course, the origin of the data for the audit trail is the ID card, so that will not be there.

Secondly, and more interestingly, the Government desperately resisted having the sunset date, on which full compulsion takes effect, after July 2010. They insisted that it should move forward to January 2010. Why was there such agony over those six months? The answer is obvious—they are desperate to avoid compulsion becoming an issue in the next general election. In that, they will fail.

The amendment mitigates and defers the worst aspects of a very bad scheme. It does not, however, cure the scheme.

Simon Hughes: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in one moment.

The Government have not met any of the tests that we set at the beginning of the ID cards process: on cost, there is a massive £19 billion bill; on effectiveness, it will fail to stop terrorism, immigration fraud, crime, fraud and ID theft; on privacy, all our fears have been confirmed.

Simon Hughes: The Liberal Democrats are not surprised about the position of the right hon. Gentleman's party now, as it has changed so often, but we are confused in one respect. If he shared, as he said in the House previously, the view that the iniquity was not just the card but the information being held on the national register, how is it now acceptable to his party that one need not have the card until 2010, but one has no opt-out from the blessed national register?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman cannot have listened to the last paragraph of my speech, that paragraph being my reason for not giving way to him immediately. The simple truth is that this is not a perfect amendment. It is the best that we are going to get out of this Government. We have a poor scheme. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has debated the issue with me throughout the Bill's passage so far, and he should treat it seriously, as he well understands.

In my view, the mitigation will defer some of the worst aspects of the scheme, but it will not solve the problems. I should have liked to have no national identity register even after the next election, but we had no prospect of delivering that, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. His party's spokesman had a part in it.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

David Davis: I will not, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

I will accept the Government's limited stay of execution, but I do not accept the Bill as a whole. It is still an unwarranted intrusion on the privacy of the individual. It is still ineffective, costly and potentially dangerous. It is still a massive reversal of the relationship between the citizen and the state. While I recommend that my party support the amendment, let there be no doubt that my first act when I take over as Home Secretary after the next election will be to do away with the Bill.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): It is worth my placing our objections to the amendments in the context of the Bill as a whole. The Bill has raised some of the most fundamental issues of principle imaginable. The introduction of identity cards will usher in one of the most far-reaching changes in British public life in recent times. It will change, unalterably, the relationship between the individual and the state by massively increasing the quantity and scope of information held centrally by the Government on each and every British citizen. It will revolutionise the capacity of the state to monitor the movements and behaviour of each and every one of us. It erodes privacy, and in extremis it will curtail freedom—and, to boot, it comes at a cost.

Even after all the debates that we have had, we still do not know the true financial cost of the Bill. The latest independent financial assessment from the London School of Economics estimates that the Government will run up a whopping deficit of £1.8 billion in the first 10 years of its operation. We still do not know who will run it. We still do not know how the database will be organised, and the Government's lamentable record in running large IT projects raises serious questions over whether it will ever be run successfully at all. It is a monstrous expression of big, big government.

Mr. Cash: As an unrequited opponent of the Bill in principle, let me ask the hon. Gentleman a question about the disposition of the votes in the House of Lords. Is it the case that the Cross Benchers somehow or other pulled out in such a way as to guarantee that, if the measure returned to the Lords, there could not be the same result as on the previous occasion? In other words, has Lord Armstrong become rather economical with the votes?

Mr. Clegg: It is certainly true that the amendments before us now are very different, in two important respects. First, as has already been pointed out, they would provide an opt-out only from having the card: a person's details would still be entered in the register. Lord Armstrong's first set of amendments refer to the register rather than the holding of the card. Secondly, they introduce the sunset clause referring to 1 January 2010, which simply does not pass the acid test of falling on the other side of the latest conceivable date for a general election.

The Bill is also based, as we know, on a form of covert compulsion by the back door, despite the Government's own election manifesto commitment to the voluntary introduction of identity cards. That makes the Government's agreement to introduce separate primary legislation to usher in full-blown compulsion at a later date a largely redundant concession.

Mr. Charles Clarke: Does the hon. Gentleman concede that his own general election manifesto made specific reference to the proposals in the terms that we are now discussing? Admittedly his party was in opposition, but he was clear about the fact that this was the meaning of the proposals. The suggestion that this was "covert" is quite wrong.

Mr. Clegg: I am glad that the Home Secretary scrutinised our manifesto with the care and attention that we have devoted to that of his party. Our manifesto stated, dare I say, the flamingly obvious, which is that it was always the Government's intention to ram the Bill through as a compulsory measure—and that is exactly what they propose to do now, if on the slightly later date of 1 January 2010. We were right back then, we have been right throughout all these debates and we are right this evening.

That is why we have consistently argued that the British people should be given another opportunity at the next general election to judge for themselves this illiberal, expensive and possibly unworkable scheme. That is why we agreed with Lord Armstrong when he said yesterday:

> "There are a good many people out there who genuinely thought that the Government were proposing a voluntary scheme, and they were prepared to go along with it on that understanding".—[Official Report, House of Lords; 28 March 2006; Vol. 680, c. 651.]

And on that understanding alone. Incidentally, that is also why I found myself in unusual agreement with the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)—he is not here now—when he said this afternoon, "We cannot accept a compulsory identity card in this Parliament, given the Government's position at the election and the strong sense among our constituents that we want freedom in this country."

Simon Hughes: Does my hon. Friend accept that tens of thousands of people—possibly millions—share exactly the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)? The fact that the Government have gone back on their election undertaking and pushed this provision through Parliament does not mean that there will not be widespread resistance to it in the country. Many people simply will not accept that this Parliament has decided this issue on that manifesto.

Mr. Clegg: My hon. Friend makes a compelling point and I suspect that many people will renew their passports in the weeks leading up to the new compulsory deadline of 1 January 2010.

Of course we recognise the extent to which the Government have been forced to climb down and to defer the imposition of covert compulsion in these amendments, but this climbdown does not pass the key test: that any move to compulsion must, under all circumstances, occur after the latest possible date of the next general election. As has been said, it is also significantly less important as a concession than Lord Armstrong's original amendment, since it only allows people to opt out of having the cards; their details will still appear on the ID register.

I have admired and agreed with almost everything that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) has said about this Bill, but here we part company. He is prepared to go along with the Government's victory in ramming through compulsion during this Parliament on the basis that, in practice, things somehow will not be so straightforward. For us, second-guessing the precise timing of the next general election or predicting exactly what may or may or not occur between January and May 2010 can never be a substitute for an objection of principle. The imposition of compulsory ID cards must not under any circumstances occur before the electorate make their own views known where it counts—at the ballot box. That is why, once again, we will vote tonight—alone, if necessary—against the Government.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I want to make a very brief contribution. I was a member of the Committee that considered the original Bill and it seems to me that few Bills have been subject to as much debate and scrutiny as this one. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) tell us that millions of people are against this measure. In my constituency, it seems that thousands are in favour of it, so I do not know where he takes the temperature.

I welcome the compromise on offer tonight. I thought for one horrible moment that we were going to witness the spectacle that the Tory party membership witnessed during their recent leadership election: the remarkable facility of the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory, or, in this case, from the jaws of a respectable draw. What we actually witnessed tonight was the alternative: him marching his troops to the top of the hill, screaming from the top of his voice that he is against every single measure in the Bill, and yet, at the end of the process, telling them to march back down and vote for it. If that is his principle, I am glad that I am on the Government side of the Chamber and not on his.

Lynne Jones: On what basis did my hon. Friend conclude that thousands of people in his constituency supported the measures in the Bill?

Steve McCabe: That is very simple: I regularly speak to thousands of my voters, and I listen to what they say. It is a simple process, and I commend it to my hon. Friend.

The provision will be tested in the future, but tonight's result means that we will be able to get on with introducing it. If people think that it is wrong, they can test it at an election and cause it to be undone. However, the goal has always been to protect people from dangers such as identity theft, fraud, and major, organised crime. Our constituents tell us that they care about such matters. the Bill gives us a chance to address them.

We have had too much delay. I am glad that we are at the end of the process, and that we can get on with implementing the scheme. We will then be able to tell who is right, and who is wrong.

Mr. Cash: I end this argument as I began it. I am not certain that there will be a vote—[Interruption.] It sounds as though the Liberal Democrats will press this matter to a vote, and it is with great regret that I must tell the House that I shall enter the Lobby with them, as a matter of principle.

I have fought this proposal from Second Reading onwards, and I have been joined by people such as my hon. Friends the Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for Buckingham (John Bercow), among others. Not all of them will know what has happened this evening, and some may therefore not join the Liberal Democrats in the Lobby.

It was astonishing to hear the Home Secretary argue, in the most spurious fashion, that he had three bases for accepting these amendments. The amendments were tabled by Lord Armstrong, who I said earlier was being economical with the votes—an adaptation of the expression "economical with the actualité", with which the House may be familiar. By the sound of it, the amendments represent a stitch-up with the Cross-Benchers in the House of Lords.

What are the three bases for the Home Secretary's acceptance of the amendments? He mentioned the integrity of the register. Could any word be less well chosen, in this context, than "integrity"? This is not a matter of integrity.

The Home Secretary went on to say that all information would be on the register, but I am glad to inform him that I shall be excluded from the provisions until 2016. That is simply because, by an accident, I happened to receive a passport and a driving licence only this week. All the other people in this country affected by this authoritarian and totalitarian provision will simply be overridden by what has been described as an "elective dictatorship". As a matter of principle, I find it impossible to support the proposals.

In conclusion, I have never before voted with the Liberal Democrats on a matter of constitutional importance, but that party's tradition goes back to the great Liberal party. It has departed from that old Liberal legacy, which remains a bastion and a beacon of independence and integrity when it comes to the country's constitution and our people's right to make their own choices.

The Bill should be excoriated and put in the dustbin. I shall not support it under any circumstances whatsoever.

Simon Hughes: I was warming to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) until his last couple of phrases. However, I assure him that those of us who oppose the proposal are not saying that people should join us because it is a Liberal Democrat vote. The vote is against the principle so I hope that not only the hon. Gentleman realises what is going on, but that colleagues from all parties who have stayed true to their principles will continue to maintain their position.

The argument of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Steve McCabe) is flawed in one obvious respect. He says that we will be able to see how people respond when the Bill is passed. It is exactly because the Bill has been amended in this form by the Lords that we shall not be able to see people's responses so clearly. Until today, we were fighting the argument that there could be a choice. He and his Government are trying to ensure that there will be no choice.

I want to deal with the Home Secretary's repeated constitutional point. Today, he again lamented the fact that the House of Lords had stood so firm for so long. If there had been a clear Government manifesto commitment, the arguments about how the second non-elected Chamber should respond might have been different. But the Government manifesto was at least ambiguous, and many of us believe that their subsequent arguments were the opposite of their manifesto commitment. The other part of Parliament is thus absolutely within its rights to stand up to a Government who claim an unjustified authority.

The Home Secretary cannot deploy the argument against the Lords because they are hereditary, bishops or appointed. The current House of Lords was created by the Labour Government. It has been made up in its current form because of the policies of the Prime Minister and the Labour Government. It is no good their complaining that the Lords are not doing what they are meant to do; the Government put them there, some possibly, as we have heard recently, in unacceptable ways.

Colleagues in our party argued the case consistently in the other place. It is a great regret to me and many people outside this place that Conservative and Cross-Bench colleagues and Labour Back Benchers did not stay with my colleagues and take the Government to the wire. It would have been a perfectly justified constitutional challenge and a reasonable defeat of the Government, and would have resulted in a much better Bill.

If the Home Secretary thinks this is the end of the matter, he is wrong. Many of us have made it absolutely clear that we will do everything in our power, personally and on behalf of other people, never to have identity cards or to be on a national identity register. I encourage everybody listening and watching to renew their passports now so that they will not have to be subject to the ID card regime for the next 10 years. I hope that many will do so.

The Liberal Democrats hope that the Government lose their majority—not just their moral majority but their majority support among the British public, which they lost a long time ago—but also their majority in the House of Commons. They won only 35 per cent. of the vote and were backed by only 20 per cent. of the British public, yet they have a majority in the House of Commons. When that majority goes too, one of the first things that my colleagues and I will insist on in the next Parliament is that the ID card legislation is reversed.

We are happy to go to the country in defence of liberty, to oppose an increasingly authoritarian Government. That is true to our traditions, and the British public will respond far better to us than to the Bill, with its new powers of enforcement, even if there is a Labour majority for the proposal in the House of Commons tonight.

Dr. Palmer: Very briefly, because we have all been debating the Bill for sufficient time, I should like to reaffirm the basic principle that the Armstrong amendment reaffirms this evening: as each individual in Britain renews their passports, and later, after the next election, we hope that for each individual throughout the country, everyone's identity will be secured, so we will not have a situation where others can pretend to be us. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Steve McCabe), when I consult my constituents, there are those who are in favour; there are those who are opposed, but I know no one who has argued that we should delay and delay until 2010 or beyond. So there is overwhelming support for the principle that we ought to get on with it, that we should get the register working and that we should get that protection in place for the British people.

10.15 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Through certain of our laws, this country has defined its character, and there are some laws that are of particular importance. Through our common law and our statute law, we can trace a finger to show why we are an independent, free and liberated country. If there was a message that we sent around the world, it was the concept of our liberty. It was reiterated through the declaration of independence of the United States and the constitutions of Australia, Canada and New Zealand. That is the tradition of which we are part.

Today we are faced with the final round of a Bill that restates who we are: we are the servants of the state if the new Labour Government prevail in the passage of the Bill. It looks a lost cause, but I believe profoundly that this nation is more vibrant and more lively and that it will in the end not tolerate this nonsense. If we look to the history of who we are and we stand firm by the belief in the individuality and autonomy of the citizen, we know that the measure gives unto the Government the central control of information through a register that may or may not be secure, and the information that we have had from people who understand these matters is that no system can render secure the information that is our personal data.

On the proposition of the Government therefore, the House is now prepared to launch billions of pounds in an experiment that not only diminishes the people of this country, but beggars them in a sense: it beggars them in liberty, but it beggars them through taxation, too. For what purpose is this engineered? The rules of the game have changed, we are told. To what extent does that mean that we must surrender the first presumption of every citizen of these islands that we are free, independent and not the servants of the state?

The House should go out with a ringing defiance of a majority predicated on party, because this is a measure that extends beyond the sense that we are loyal party men or women. We are representatives of something stronger, deeper, longer and more intense than anything that the Home Office now presents to us as the settled will of the new Labour Government. I agree with much of what has been said this evening: people will unpick and begin to understand about all those who will provide information to the Government, who say that they deserve to know all about us. What about the derelicts under the bridges beneath Waterloo? What about the old and confused? What about the mentally anxious?

Those are the people who will be squeezed to try to remember who they are, but we will remember who we are. One day, this Government will experience the wrath and indignation of a country that understands that this is not a small social measure; it is in fact a declaration by Government that the centralised state is more important and greater than the sum of every individual free citizen of the country that we were sent to represent. We should oppose to the utmost and to the end this benighted and wrong Bill.

Lynne Jones: I will be brief. I just want to make two points. First, the Information Commissioner said:

> "The measures in the Bill go well beyond establishing a secure, reliable and trustworthy ID card."

Secondly, none of our fellow states in Europe is going down the route of having the central database. Indeed, the European Commission's data protection working party believes that the centralised storage of biometric information on a centralised database presents an increased risk of data misuse. I share its preference for information to be kept on a smart card that is within the control of the individual. The Lords amendment does not address any of those issues. For the privilege of being involved in this draconian scheme and having their data on the centralised database, even those who do not wish to have an identity card, but want to have a passport, will have to pay £30. I remain opposed to the legislation.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I will be brief. There is no real compromise in the amendments for UK citizens. They do not change the compulsory inclusion on the central biometric database, merely the carrying of an identity card. Although there is a time-limited opt-out in the amendments, that is only for carrying the card and that time limit ends prior to the last date possible for the next general election. That is important. This series of measures has been opposed, at least until tonight, by six Opposition parties and many Labour Members. It is a shock that the Conservative party has capitulated at this late hour. The measure is a fundamental shift in the relationship between the citizen and the state.

The Labour manifesto offered a voluntary scheme, not a compulsory one. Notwithstanding the power of the Labour Whips, given that a manifesto that offered a voluntary scheme was supported and backed by some 21.6 per cent. of the electorate, it was incumbent on the Government to accept the longer time-limited opt-out to allow the proposal to be put before the electorate at another election.

Many on the Labour Benches—indeed, many in the Chamber—will remember the opposition to the poll tax. When the scale of the opposition to carrying an ID card or to being included on a central biometric database rises to the scale of the opposition we saw to the poll tax, I fear that the entire edifice will collapse. Our resistance to the central database will continue.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I have listened with interest to the remarks that have been made. At the beginning of the whole debate, the Home Secretary pointed out that the measure was essential in the fight against terrorism. Those who come from Northern Ireland certainly have a great interest in that, because we have been doing that for more than 30 years, particularly and personally. Many of our colleagues have suffered grievously because of that. However, at the time when the Home Secretary was presenting the measure as so essential in the fight against terrorism, we could not understand why the scheme was going to be voluntary and was going to come in in 2008. Now we hear the date of 2010.

It is interesting to note that a Labour Member, speaking about how essential the measure was, said that it would aid the fight against crime, fraud and identity fraud, but seemingly someone can be a criminal or a fraudster, or be involved in the identity fraud game, up until 2010. As far as my colleagues and I are concerned, on the fight against crime or terrorism we believe that if something is essential, it is essential now. However, it seems that the measure is to do so with something other than the fight against terrorism. It is like Big Brother desiring all the details of the citizens of the United Kingdom. My colleagues and I will vote against the Lords amendments.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), who always speaks with experience. His experience was missed for many a year in the House, but he is now with us again.

It is said often—you know as well as I do, Mr. Deputy Speaker—that it is true that everything that can be said has been said, but not everyone has said it. At this stage of this Bill, everything that could be said, either in the other place or here, has in fact been said. I will thus not particularly draw out my remarks.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) used his notes copiously, and copiously did he use them. May I give him some advice? He will be better off in the future if he puts more of his thoughts into his mind, rather than reading them from paper. He also said that the Bill was rammed through, but if I may say so, that shows a lack of intellectual rigour in his remarks. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Steve McCabe) said that the Bill has been subject to scrutiny.

I wish to be kind to Liberal Democrat Members. I could say that their speeches are sanctimonious and filled with cant and hypocrisy, but I would not wish to cast aspersions on any particular Member. I have sat in the Chamber for many a year listening to the same kind of speech, but they have not had the slightest effect in the country or anywhere else.

I hold the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) in high regard. He made a fine speech, but I must remind him that he made the same speeches under the Government of John Major. He literally hacked that Government to death, but when it came to a vote of confidence, he found himself in the same Lobby as John Major. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to find himself in the Lobby tonight with the Liberals, Godspeed to him.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is trespassing on a matter of some importance. I simply say to him that if the vote of confidence had gone the other way, his party would have come into government with a more federal Europe than we would have achieved under the Maastricht treaty.

Sir Stuart Bell: We might also have brought about the kind of economic reforms that we saw from 1997.

Let me make some kind remarks—I hope that they are kind—about the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes). He reminded me, if I might go into Shakespeare, of the blasted heath of "King Lear":

> "I will do such things,—
>
> What they are, yet I know not; but they shall be
> The terrors of the earth."

I am sure that the country will take that into account. He urged the country to take note of him through our television screens, although, of course, that is against the rules of the House.

I will finish with a kind word for the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). I simply say to him that Edmund Burke would be very proud of him tonight.

Question put, That this House agrees with the Lords in the said amendment:—

PETITIONS

A46

10.43 pm

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity tonight to present a petition on behalf of nearly 3,000 people from north-east Nottinghamshire concerning the dualling of the A46. You will be glad to hear that I shall be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the past six months, that road has accounted for just under 60 casualties. It is strangling Newark in terms of business opportunities and making sure that we cannot fully achieve the business potential that the town so desperately needs. That road needs to be dualled in order to link Newark with Lincoln and with Leicester and Nottingham in the other direction. Unless that 17-mile stretch of road is dualled in the near future, we will continue to have a disproportionate number of casualties and the town will continue not to achieve its full potential. Plans have been implemented to make sure that dualling occurs, but it now seems that those plans will be delayed indefinitely or even scrapped.

The Petition of residents of Newark and others,

Declares that the petitioners believe that the case for dualling the remainder of the A46 in Nottinghamshire is irrefutable, and that authorisation for the project is long overdue. The single carriageway road forms a dangerous bottleneck in the high speed route from the M1 at Leicester to the A1 at Newark. The petitioners are alarmed that the Secretary of State's expressed intention to provide a speedy solution to a key problem in the strategic highway network might be thwarted.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Transport to confirm that the programme for dualling the A46 in Nottinghamshire will not be further delayed.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Children's Play Areas

10.45 pm

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): I present a petition that Declares that Peterborough City Council has removed a number of children's doorstep play areas from North Bretton, against the wishes of the residents. A petition of some 347 signatures was raised over a period of two weeks, to request that the equipment be reinstated. The areas removed were an important part of the community, and had been in place for over 30 years. Their value was immense with regard to community spirit and local children's daily exercise, some of whom do not have gardens of their own.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to take action to encourage the City Council of Peterborough to listen to the residents' wishes and reinstate the doorstep play equipment.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Friarswood Primary School

10.46 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to present a petition on behalf of Friarswood primary school in Newcastle-under-Lyme—a wonderful school, attended by many of my friends when I was growing up in the town. It is a school that does so much for inclusion and special needs in my constituency. The petition has been signed by 2,448 parents, relatives, past pupils and local residents.

The petition states:

The Petition of the SaveFriarswoodPrimary.com Campaign,

Declares that Friarswood Primary School should not be closed based on the results of statistical projections and conjecture commissioned by Staffordshire County Council and/or its agents.

Further declares that it has a site, buildings and facilities that should be preserved for primary and special educational use for the foreseeable future.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons ask the Secretary of State for Education to recognise that the Friarswood Primary School has been awarded the DfES Schools Improvement Award twice in recent years and offers tangible benefits not recognised by statistical analysis and urge her to recommend that it stay open to service the needs of the local population despite a temporary reduction in intake.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Kent Science Park

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

10.48 pm

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): This is the third time that I have raised the issue of the Kent science park in the House. On 14 July 2004 I had an Adjournment debate on the issue, and on 2 February 2005 I had an Adjournment debate on the Kent and Medway structure plan in which I mentioned the science park. So I am extremely grateful that I have again been given the opportunity to raise the issue of the future of the Kent science park in my constituency.

In 2004 the Minister responding was my right hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Keith Hill), but he is now PPS to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The Minister who responded in 2005 is now a Minister in the Department for Education and Skills. I make no apology, therefore, for raising the issue yet again, because Ministers and indeed Departments move, sometimes more frequently than we would like. It is important that this issue remains in the in-tray at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Kent science park is still affectionately known locally as the Shell research centre. Shell had two research centres, and in one of its rationalisations closed the one just outside Sittingbourne in the mid-1990s. It was a blow to the town, because in many ways, it had been our postgraduate university. Many of its 900 staff could be found as leaders in our community. When it closed, part of the town died.

In due course, the research centre was bought and renamed the Sittingbourne research centre. It had the job of trying to attract small businesses of any description to the 116-acre site. There were several different owners, but gradually it attracted some science-based companies, some public sector organisations and some non-science-based companies. It has never been 100 per cent. full, and to my knowledge, is only 70 per cent. full at present. It has always had a more general business ownership than strictly science.

In the middle of 2004, Sittingbourne research centre, now owned by the De La Salle pension fund, which is part of the secretive Mars organisation, relaunched itself as the Kent science park. The new owners were smart. They persuaded my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister to join them in their relaunch, and from the outset this so-called association has made our local villagers from Bapchild, Rodmersham, Milsted, Tunstall and Bredgar assume, wrongly, that that meant that the Government had given their blessing and were working secretly with De La Salle to approve its grand expansion plans, of which more anon.

In Swale borough council's local plan for 2007–17, we have been asked by the Government to agree an additional 8,000 homes. I should add at this stage that as a result of the water shortage in Kent, I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to ask her to put an immediate stop notice on all future build until the water shortage is resolved. It is madness for us, as the Government, to promote the notion of sustainable communities when not only do we face a water shortage, but it looks as if by 2020 we shall face a power shortage too.

[Derek Wyatt]

We all know that the planning laws favour the developer. It is a huge sadness to me that after almost nine years we have not produced sufficient legislation to change the balance of power between the developer and the local community. In Sittingbourne and Sheppey, such is the quality of the leadership in our Tory councils at both borough and county level that almost every section 106 has failed to be taken up. There has been no new primary school at Warden Bay, no school at all at Thistle Hill in Halfway, and no additional recreational support for our great rugby clubs at Sheppey, plus no shops, pubs or village halls on the Meads estate. Moreover, what starts as 350, 500 or 750 houses in an initial plan always ends up as 550, 780 or 920. It is no surprise to me that there is sometimes a disconnection between our citizens and the political process.

Where is that more evident than with the Kent science park development? My constituents are involved in a cat and mouse chase. Kent science park cannot get enough adhesion to its ideas, so it is ducking and diving at every level. For instance, in the recent Kent and Medway structure plan—page 16, policy NK3, Swale 25—it says:

"Purpose of the proposed modification was to acknowledge the need for new access arrangements to serve Kent Science Park whereas it refers merely to 'improved' arrangements."

It continues:

"Description of development of Kent Science Park"—

this is the critical part—

"as a 'technology and knowledge-based cluster' would be more appropriate than 'science based cluster'".

The critical aspect of that is that if "science" is changed to a "technology and knowledge-based cluster", there does not have to be an affiliation with an academic institution. One of our bones of contention has been that there was no connection whatever to any international or national university.

Let me draw to the Minister's attention the scale of science and technology parks in the United Kingdom. I quote from the 2004–05 and 2005–06 UK science park statistics:

"Number of operational Science Parks ... around 60 ... Property in square metres ... around 1.2 million ... Number of jobs in tenant companies ... around 50,000 ... Number of tenant companies 2204 ... 62 per cent. of tenant companies are independent single site companies ... Only 15 per cent. of companies are Bio-related ... 45 per cent. of companies have 1–5 employees ... 30 per cent. have 6–15 employees ... Less than 8 per cent. have more than 50 employees ... Around 62 per cent. occupy between 1–150 square metres, with only 18 per cent. occupying more than 400 square metres."

One can conclude from those statistics that the average science park employs around 861 people, the average number of tenants is 40, and the average floor space is 20,909 sq m. Kent science park currently has 56,000 sq m of floor space, nearly three times the national average. It wishes to create an additional 145,000 sq m of floor space, which means that it will account for approximately 17 per cent. of all the science park floor space in the United Kingdom. Kent science park is already one of the largest science parks in the country. At 116 acres, it is larger than Oxford science park at 75 acres and just a little smaller than Cambridge science park at 152 acres.

The owners of Kent science park plan to expand to more than 300 acres. The park will be required to expand its company base from 84 to approximately 375 companies. The largest employers in the park, which account for a large proportion of jobs, include Amicus Response Ltd, a housing association call centre and Galleon BBC magazine distribution centre. One can therefore get a feel of how much science is currently on the site.

At no time has De la Salle Investment Management introduced a plan to redevelop the current site of 116 acres. Unsurprisingly, neither Kent county council nor Swale borough council have demanded that. Both should be ashamed of themselves. There is substantial space on the current site for it to improve what it wants to do without developing on a greenfield site.

Science parks have become the vogue, and in all cases, they are attached to universities. Leeds university, Leicester university, Bristol university and Bath university announced science technology or innovation parks in 2001. Liverpool university and Liverpool John Moore's university followed suit in 2004. Interestingly, they are funded by the local regional development agency. London, too, followed suit. More recently, Nottingham and Nottingham Trent have also announced science parks.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a science enthusiast and has increased science research funding substantially in successive Budgets, but at university level. At the same time, he has ensured that our investment in share option tax breaks are better than those of California. According to last year's league tables in "The Times Good University Guide", notwithstanding the usual reservation about league tables, Kent was placed 44th and Greenwich was 94th. However, Kent has one newcomer, which constitutes the most stimulating part of the discussion. It is Imperial college, which is currently in Kensington, but owns Wye college near Ashford.

Imperial is ranked third in the UK, after Cambridge and Oxford, but first in technology and science. Although it is a university college of London, it recently announced its determination to become a full-blown university. Imperial is hampered by its location at Kensington, and it could not develop a science park except on its site at Wye.

I was the only Member of Parliament who attended the Kent and Medway discussions on science parks in September 2004. Kent county council said then that there was no intention to develop a science park at Ashford. However, late last year it announced a £1 billion science and technology park to be based at Wye college and run by Imperial and Kent county council.

I am not sure that one can have two science parks in Kent—one in Sittingbourne and the £1 billion science park. There is simply not enough investment or companies. If I were a young entrepreneur and I had a choice, I would choose Imperial, because of its history, rather than an independent science park.

The downgrading of the Kent science park to a technology cluster means that it will be no more than a glorified business park. The Minister should seriously consider asking the Thames gateway to downgrade the Kent science park as a flagship project, because it has been superseded by events at Imperial.

Let me state some of the things that the Kent science park wants to do. According to its website yesterday, it wants to increase its floor space to 145,000 sq m. It wants a new £29 million motorway junction and southern relief road to connect the science park to the M2 and A2. It wants approximately 5,000 new dwellings—on top of the 8,000 that my community has already been asked to provide in the next 10 years. It wants a £3 million enhancement to the public transport system as a link to it, through the provision of additional buses and bus routes. We are not sure who will pay for that. It is prepared to put down a £5 million endowment for providing the academic campus but I believe that that, again, that is superseded by Imperial's intentions.

Kent science park wants to create a country park and a conservation park totalling 54 acres, but we already have a country and conservation park, called South Sittingbourne—a very beautiful place that houses five wonderful Saxon villages. I do not see the point of breaking up the countryside and putting it back in an artificial place, as is being suggested.

One of the reasons why Kent science park wants to do that is that the Government have provided £25 million for a northern relief road called the northern distributor road, which will give the 6,500 people who go to the Eurolink industrial estate every day fast and easy access to the estate without having to clog up the centre of Sittingbourne. Kent science park now wants to build a southern ring road to match the northern ring road. The game is this: it hopes that the Government will also pay for the southern ring road, even though there is absolutely no economic reason for it. And when we say that we are not prepared to build it because it is the responsibility not of the Highways Agency but of Kent county council, Kent science park will say, "Now we will have to build the 5,000 houses, because under section 106, that will allow the funding for the £28 million road."

We do not like the game that Kent science park is playing, because it is not representing what we feel that we need in our community. I hope that my hon. Friend understands that there is a great deal of concern about this in the five parishes—which contain 3,500 of my constituents—about the pace of this process, which goes against the feel and flavour of what we would like in our community for the next 10 years.

We have a local plan hearing after Easter, at which the future of the Kent science park will be debated, and of course I recognise that the Minister is hamstrung, because of the quasi-judicial role of his Department. I understand that he cannot comment too much on the matter tonight.

The only people who will benefit from the expansion of the Kent science park are the pensioners who benefit from the pension funds of De La Salle and Mars, the two farmers who own the land, and the consultants. After all, this will not be a science park; it will not offer added-value jobs for my community. It will be an ordinary business park, and we already have substantial business parks in the community, and substantial space left to develop for the next 10 years.

I will finish in a moment, but before I sit down, will the Minister tell me whether the De La Salle team can withdraw their plans at the local inquiry in April, May and June and appeal over the heads of the system directly to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? In conclusion, I can put it no better than Michael Peters did in a letter to the local paper. It was headed:

"Time for another Wyatt's revolt".

The letter reads:

"More than 450 years ago, when Wyatt's rebellion broke out in Kent, the government in Whitehall began to quake. Roger Truelove's letter"— published in the East Kent Gazette on 27 October—

"gives grounds for hope that history might repeat itself. The Deputy Prime Minister is rumoured to support the Kent Science Park plan for a huge new commercial zone sprawling across the fields of Tunstall—five times the size of the present one—bringing traffic hell to our roads as streams of vehicles drag through the town to the site. Maybe our present-day 'bloody Wyatt' (seemingly more effective than his 16th century namesake) can stop this dreadful plan in its tracks."

I hope that that will be the case.

11.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) on securing another debate on the subject of the Kent science park. He has raised two key themes: the role of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minster in the planning process and the role that Kent science park may have in the regeneration of the Swale area as part of the Government's Thames Gateway programme.

On that first point, I would like immediately to reassure my hon. Friend that the Government are not pre-determining planning applications on this or any other site. Our national planning system is very clear on this, and we have a robust set of planning guidance to support it. Decisions of this nature on site-specific allocations and on determining planning applications will be made by the relevant planning authorities. Where applications involve a departure from existing policy—and following the planning authority's determination—the Government, via the Government Office, will take a view on how to respond.

I need to say—my hon. Friend will have heard this before—that the Government have made no decisions about the expansion of the science park. As there is no planning application at present, the Government are not commenting on the proposed development. As my hon. Friend acknowledged, that could prejudice the Secretary of State's position. Pre-application discussions may well be happening at regional and local level, but it is not for me or my Department to comment. I am aware that the emerging Kent and Medway structure plan, the local plan and south-east plan suggest that economic expansion is something to be considered, and that the Kent science park is recognised by local authorities as a key employer in the area. I would, however, like to reassure my hon. Friend that there is no way to circumvent the planning process.

My hon. Friend will be aware, following his earlier parliamentary questions, that officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have met and exchanged correspondence with Kent science park. That, however, is in respect of Kent science park and its location within the Thames Gateway area. As a major employer, consisting of some 85 businesses, and with its record as one of the fastest-growing science parks in the country—I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's qualification in respect of the definition of a science park—it is only right that local and national officials dealing with the Thames Gateway have the freedom to engage with this company and arrive at the correct judgments.

In the Thames Gateway, there are almost 4,000 hectares of brownfield land—17 per cent. of the south-east's total—located between London and mainland Europe. That is a massive area of market failure and relative deprivation, lying amid the buoyant economy and prosperity of the rest of London and the south-east. Not surprisingly then, the regeneration of the gateway, as a national and local priority, has been in progress since the early 1990s.

The Thames Gateway is an opportunity to deliver growth alongside regeneration—a regeneration that is physical, economic and social. It is an agenda for change—the chance to impact on whole communities in a positive way and enable them to share in the prosperity historically enjoyed by their neighbours. That is why some £450 million from the ODPM's budget is being specifically targeted on projects in the gateway, and some £6 billion of Government spending is going into the gateway to help to create the infrastructure needed to support growth and regeneration.

Significant delivery is starting to occur. For example, last weekend the new Fastrack buses began their first services from Gravesend to Dartford in Kent Thameside. In Medway, the new university campus at Chatham Maritime is open for business and helping to almost double student numbers in the area at that unique facility, which is shared between five higher and further education institutions. In my hon. Friend's constituency, the completion is approaching of the new crossing between Swale mainland and the Isle of Sheppey—some £100 million of investment in transport making a real difference to the area's regeneration opportunities. That is on top of some £25 million that has already gone from the ODPM towards a range of local infrastructure needs, ranging from brownfield land assembly and the community consultation work at Queenborough and Rushenden, to creating new vocational learning centres, such as that at Sittingbourne community college.

To make such transformational changes and enable regeneration to occur, we need to be mature about the assets that we have and our priorities. We need to make sure that the economic conditions are correct to accelerate growth. That will be part of the focus for the new strategic framework, which the ODPM is currently taking forward in consultation with all our main local partners. The new framework will clearly set the direction for the future of the Thames Gateway.

With that in mind, we should not be thinking about downgrading Kent science park. It is an economic asset for the Swale and north Kent area, and local partners, including Kent county council, Swale borough council and the South East England Development Agency, need to consider carefully the role that it can play in aiding regeneration of the area. However, any expansion plans will need to be considered with regard to the normal planning process.

To conclude, our planning process remains in place and remains robust, the Thames Gateway continues to gather steam, and by the end of this year we will benefit from a more focused vision that local and national partners will both have agreed. That will act to boost our delivery of growth and the related benefits to local people within the Thames Gateway. I hope that my hon. Friend is reassured by my comments about the planning process. Obviously, I will be happy to continue this dialogue, which previous Ministers in my position started, and I look forward to speaking to him about the matter in the near future.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Gershon Process

1. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): What recent representations he has received on the implementation of the Gershon process. [62322]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Reductions in posts so far have been 40,000 gross and 33,000 net, as we achieve the Gershon purpose of releasing resources for front-line services. To further this aim, we have today, while accepting the recommendations of the pay review bodies, staged the awards for judges and senior civil servants—including Ministers, MPs and consultants—with an initial award of just 1 per cent. from 1 April. Nurses will receive 2.5 per cent. immediately and, granting them with progression awards, average rises of 5.2 per cent., as we match anti-inflation discipline with fairness. Average rises in the public sector pay awards will be 2.25 per cent.

Mrs. Dorries: I thank the Minister for his reply. I wonder whether he saw the damning "Panorama" programme on Sunday night called "The NHS blame game". I wonder whether Gershon is to blame for hospitals closing, wards closing and thousands of nurses losing their jobs.

Mr. Brown: As a former nurse—I welcome her to the House—the hon. Lady should know that there are 79,000 more nurses in the national health service. There are 27,000 more doctors in the national health service. Even in the last year, as deficits have been adjusted, there have been thousands more people working in the national health service. That is the why there are a quarter of a million more operations taking place in the health service now than there were under the Conservatives.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend accept our congratulations on the great success that he is already having in increasing front-line services in the national health service? Will he have a look to see whether it is possible, as part of or in addition to the Gershon review of non front-line services, to introduce a policy of natural wastage, which is probably the fairest way? Those who, for one reason or another, leave the service could be replaced by recruitment from within, promotion from within or redeployment from within.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In the Department for Work and Pensions, some redeployment has been taking place already to new front-line services such as helping single parents into work and helping with our incapacity benefit reforms, and we will continue to do that. In addition, I announced last week in the Budget that there would be zero settlements for the Home Office between 2008 and 2011 and minus 5 per cent. settlements for the Treasury, the Cabinet Office, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs and the Department for Work and Pensions. So we will continue to release resources by administrative savings for front-line services. The difference between ourselves and our opponents is that we will release resources to improve front-line services whereas they simply want to cut public services.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): How does the Chancellor reconcile his proposal to make 5 per cent. real annual cuts in the Inland Revenue and the DWP, which is much more than Gershon thought prudent, with his overall strategy of trying to deal with poverty by extending mass means-testing, which relies much more on those Departments? Is there not a lack of joined-up thinking here?

Mr. Brown: May I first welcome the Liberal Democrats shadow Chancellor to his new job as deputy leader of his party. He has come a long way since we jointly worked on Labour party tracts in the 1970s. The last shadow chancellor to become deputy leader of the party was Roy Jenkins, and he walked out of both jobs within a few months. At least he went to better paid jobs as a result.

On the issue of poverty, last Wednesday in the Budget I showed that if we could combine the rise in the child tax credit with getting more single parents back into work we could take 300,000 more children out of poverty. I just hope that the Liberal party will reconsider its position on these issues. The single most important factor—Opposition Members should recognise this—in taking children out of poverty in the past few years has been the introduction of the child tax credit and helping single parents and others into work. That has taken 700,000 children out of poverty. The measures that I announced last week will take another 300,000 people out of poverty. No party in the House has produced an alternative plan to take so many people out of poverty. More children have been taken out of poverty in the past few years than in any period for 40 years.

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement of the increased pay for nurses. That will make a great deal of difference. It will make a great deal of difference to nurses working in my constituency. Does the Chancellor agree that it is in the spirit of the Gershon review that we move resources from back-line to front-line services?

Mr. Brown: That is absolutely what we are trying to achieve. We want to move resources from back-office services by means of technological change to the front-line caring services, especially in the NHS. My hon. Friend will notice that the average salary for a nurse is going up today from £27,000 to over £28,400. That is to recruit more nurses into the national health service. I would have thought that, as a former nurse, the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) would welcome what we are doing today. It represents both fairness to nurses and achieving anti-inflation discipline in the economy.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Several hon. Gentlemen wrongly claimed that I was banned from the Budget debate, but on Tuesday night I suspect that the real Chief Secretary wished that he had been banned from it.

The Chancellor has always claimed that the Gershon review would produce efficiency savings without having an impact on quality of service. Does he agree with the Chairman of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions who said of the impact of Gershon on Jobcentre Plus:

"In their drive for efficiency, the Government has caused a serious failure in customer service, staffing, procurement and IT. The Secretary of State himself described the Agency as being faced with a 'shed load of difficulties' and the Committee agrees."?

Are not the Government failing some of the most vulnerable people in Britain by presiding over what the Select Committee described as "truly appalling service levels" at Jobcentre Plus?

Mr. Brown: I would think more of the Conservatives' position if they were not in favour of cuts in basic services in the first place. If the hon. Lady really wants to look at evidence, why does she not look at the National Audit Office report? Mr. Keith Davis of the NAO said:

"Our view is that this Gershon programme is more serious and more systematic than previous attempts to achieve efficiency in Government."

The report noted that there were many examples of good progress and listed all of them. If people want an overall view of the effect of Gershon, which has brought 40,000 post reductions, they should look at the NAO report and what it says in support of what the Government are doing.

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): A nurse who came to see me over the weekend told me that because we are investing in front-line services, particularly nurses, she is looking forward to an increased career as a nurse practitioner or a nurse consultant. Does not my right hon. Friend agree that, far from damaging front-line services, that is an example of resources being moved from the back office to front-line services?

Mr. Brown: Surely, the challenge is to make the savings that we are talking about and then to improve front-line services. The difference between ourselves and the Opposition is that the shadow Chancellor committed himself, on GMTV only a few days ago, to cut the share of national income taken by the state—a £17 billion cuts programme this year, with £16 billion next year. That can only damage basic services in the economy.

Tax Burdens

2. Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the average tax burden on a family. [62324]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The tax for a single-earner family with two children on male mean earnings of £31,600 a year will be 20.4 per cent. of gross family earnings in 2006–07, which is 0.8 percentage points lower than in 1997–98. For the same family on median earnings of £24,000 a year, tax will be 14.2 per cent., which is a 3.4 percentage points lower than in 1997–98.

Mr. Wilson: According to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, Britain pays more tax than Germany and our tax burden is growing almost 30 times faster than that of France. Does the Minister agree with the chief economic adviser to Ernst and Young who has warned that the high level of taxation now threatens the stability of the UK economy?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in his assertion. The recently published OECD report on family income demonstrates that the UK is below the European average and below levels in Germany. As the Chancellor said in his Budget speech, the child benefit and child tax changes mean in effect that income tax liability on a family with two children, with earnings of up to £425 a week, is wiped out. That means 3 million families in Britain with no income tax liability.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): May I refer the Paymaster General to the OECD report, which indicates that income tax as a percentage of labour costs for people on 67 per cent. of average earnings in the UK is 8 per cent. below the EU 15 countries and 4 per cent. below the average for OECD countries? Does not that indicate that progress has been made on our poverty targets? We need to engage in a national debate on tax to ensure both economic growth and social justice in this country.

Dawn Primarolo: My right hon. Friend is entirely right. He quotes from the correct OECD study, as I would expect him to do, and it demonstrates that the cuts in tax undertaken by the Government—the 10p rate and the 22p rate—the increases in child benefit and the tax credits not only ensure that we can give the most resources to those who are least well off, but that we are lifting children out of poverty: precisely the points that my right hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Table 2 of the OECD report this morning shows that the tax on a married couple with two children has been cut over the past five years in Australia, Belgium, Canada, Germany, Ireland, the Netherlands, Portugal, Slovakia and the United States, whereas it has risen in the United Kingdom. When will Ministers wake up to the damage that they are doing to our economy?

Dawn Primarolo: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's comments, because he is very well-informed on these things, and he knows that the tax wedge—the calculation that the OECD uses for those figures—also takes into account the contribution of employers in working them out. He will also know, because he has been a Member for a long time, that this Government introduced the 10p rate, that this Government reduced the tax rate to 22 per cent., that this Government increased child benefit when the Government of whom he was a member froze it and that this Government introduced tax credits in the teeth of opposition from the Conservative party.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend not listen to the siren voices of Opposition Members or fall for their interpretation of the tax burden and recognise, as I think that she has, that tax has an important role to play in ending child poverty? How does she think that the Government can redouble their crusade against child poverty, which has already taken 700,000 children out of the poverty that the Conservative party left them in when it left office, so that we can reach the target to halve it by 2010?

Dawn Primarolo: As my hon. Friend acknowledges, the number of children in absolute poverty has been halved by the Government: 1.8 million children and low-income families have been lifted out of poverty since 1996–97. She will also have noted the comments that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made in his Budget speech about the importance of the commitment to tax credits and child benefit rises in continuing to challenge the level of child poverty in this country and to raise children out of poverty. That is the only suggestion on the table. Despite the fact that Opposition Members constantly complain, they make no positive suggestion on how to improve the situation and raise more children out of poverty.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Now that the Chancellor has had it explained to him from afar that he will be expected to introduce at least another two Budgets, will the right hon. Lady try to persuade him to apply his mind to the reduction of the vast overall increase in taxation that he has imposed on the people of this country?

Dawn Primarolo: It does not matter how many times Opposition Members try to assert that view, the fact is that the Government have been reducing tax—[Interruption]—and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budgets, directed specifically at families, ensure that that happens. I look forward to continuing, if I can, to contribute to Budgets that take forward those principles.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Further to the question on table 2, does my right hon. Friend agree that the table shows that, over the past five years, the tax burden has gone up by 0.1 per cent. to 27.1 per cent., which is still below that of Germany at 35.7 per cent. and France at 41.7 per cent.? Will she continue with the policies of holding down tax for families and ensuring good quality public services for my constituents?

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend knows that this Government reduced tax from 23 to 22 per cent., that this Government introduced the 10p starting rate, that this Government pay tax credits to ensure that families do not start to pay tax, in effect, until they are on a weekly income of £425 if they have two children and that only this Government will use those policies to ensure that families get the very best, both from public services and from jobs and incomes.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): In Question Time yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister talked about looking at tax changes in the round. Will the Paymaster General tell me, in the round, how much a two-pensioner household will get to compensate them this year for the loss of their £200 pre-election bribe and an average increase in council tax of £254?

Dawn Primarolo: Those on pension credit will continue to see rises this year in line with the announcements made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. They will continue to receive the heating allowance, as he identified, and they will continue to be the beneficiaries of the massive increases that the Government have put into local government to ensure that council tax rises are minimised.

Fuel Duty

3. Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): What the total revenue from fuel duty has been since 1996. [62325]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The answer is £215 billion. In the Budget, I froze duty until at least 1 September. I also announced a renewable transport fuel obligation with a higher 35p differential for biofuels; an environmentally based payment system for vehicle excise duty, ranging from zero to £210; and progress on introducing sulphur-free diesel.

Mr. Chaytor: In spite of the revenue from fuel duty, which is a very large amount, is it not the case that the cost of private motoring continues to decline year on year? Is it not also the case that, in the light of the climate change review programme published this week, sooner or later all parties in the House are going to face up to the fact that an above-inflation rise in fuel duty is the most effective means of reducing congestion, and of reducing CO_2 emissions in the transport sector?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend takes a big interest in environmental issues and I appreciate what he has said on many occasions over the years about the progress that we have made in our environmental policy, but I have to say that the doubling of oil prices—indeed, in many ways, the trebling of oil prices—over the past three years has created a new situation for both motorists and the freight industry in this country. We have got to balance the needs of the economy with meeting our environmental objectives. I hope that he understands that, at a time when oil prices have doubled, we have got to take that into account in setting fuel duties.

Public Sector Bodies (Debt)

11. Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the transparency of the classification of public sector bodies' debt. [62335]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The classification of a given body and its assets and liabilities as public or private sector is a matter for the Office for National Statistics, acting in its capacity as an independent statistical agency and using international guidelines. Further, the UK Government are one of the few Governments in the world who have a statutory obligation to report liabilities in the same way as private companies and whose accounts are subject to independent audit.

Mr. Binley: I had hoped that the Chancellor would answer the question, but will the Minister be very kind and tell the House what benefits the taxpayer gets from not knowing how much public money is currently off balance sheet thanks to PFI?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman should be well aware that off-balance-sheet accounting is assessed in circumstances in which the assets belong to the private sector and so the debt that is financed is a liability of the private and not the public sector. Consequently, it is not appropriate to consider it as a debt for the purposes of the sustainable investment rule, but that does not mean that those assets are not used to the advantage of the delivery of public services. In every single constituency up and down our country, there are the advantages of PFI investment in delivering public services.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend taken the opportunity to examine proposals to move PFI and contingent liabilities, breaking with best international practice and the practice of past Governments of all parties in this country, on to the Budget—[HON. MEMBERS: "Balance Sheet."]—and the balance sheet? What impact does he think that that would have on the prospect for public investment in our country?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct to identity that particular area. The Opposition argue that such movement on to the balance sheet would put the country in a position in which it could not meet the sustainable investment rule and thus could not invest further in public services and our infrastructure. That would be the effect of us not being able to treat those accounts in such a way.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): In a Committee prior to Christmas, I pressed the Economic Secretary to reveal the Government's estimate of the proportion of gross domestic product represented by their off-balance-sheet debt. He said that he would write to me, but I am still waiting for the letter. I pressed him again in a debate on 7 March, but I have still not had an answer, and we have not had an answer today. Is not the real reason why the Government will not reveal the estimate that they know full well that it would fatally undermine their sustainable investment rule if they were to do so?

Mr. Browne: I understand that the hon. Gentleman has had his answer, but clearly he does not accept it. As he knows, it is for the Office for National Statistics to compile the number for the purpose of the public sector finances, not Her Majesty's Treasury. That is its job and that is why that is done independently.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Since the Labour Government came to power we have had record investment in schools and the health service. PFI is building four new primary schools in York, we have just got approval through conventional finance for rebuilding the first secondary school in York for 40 years and we have had £30 million of new investment in our hospital. Does the Chief Secretary remember the days when the Conservatives supported the private finance initiative, and will he give a commitment that the levels of investment that we have had from the Labour Government in schools and hospitals will continue for as long as we are in power?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend is right. There was £600 million of investment in schools when the Conservatives were in power, but there is now investment of £6 billion. The reason why they no longer support such investment in the public services is that they affirm to the third fiscal rule, which would require them to strip it out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I must apologise to the House for, in the absence of Mr. Afriyie, getting the sequence wrong. I hope that I may have the co-operation of Ministers and hon. Members, in particular, to ensure that we at least get to Question 10.

Economic Growth

5. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What assessment he has made of the correlation between overall tax levels and economic growth; and if he will make a statement. [62327]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The Government's macro-economic framework has consistently delivered stability with strong growth and low inflation, thus establishing a track record that has been internationally acknowledged. Gross domestic product has now grown for 54 consecutive quarters and inflation remains at historically low rates. The Government's approach to taxation balances the need to finance better quality public services, deliver fairness and promote sustainable development, while ensuring that the UK benefits from the advantages of being a lightly taxed economy.

Michael Fabricant: A few moments ago, the Paymaster General said that tax had fallen under this Labour Government. The Institute for Fiscal Studies says that the total tax receipts have increased from 37 per cent. of GDP in 1996–97 to 39.3 per cent. now. Who was right and who was wrong?

Mr. Browne: My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General was, of course, talking about tax rates. These comparisons are extremely interesting, so if the House wants comparisons on the tax burden, let us have some. The tax burden is actually lower now than it was during the entire period between 1981 and 1988, under Margaret Thatcher, and well below the peak tax burden in 1984. According to the experts at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the net tax burden on the average working family in the UK today is half what it was when we came to power. Of course, the amount of tax collected rises fastest when the economy is doing well. For example, the lowest tax burden of the past 30 years was in 1993–94, when the economy was barely growing, unemployment was above 3 million, millions of families faced negative equity and wage settlements were at a 25-year low.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Tax levels in Denmark, Sweden and Finland are substantially higher than in Britain. Public spending in those countries is substantially higher than in Britain. The quality of public services in those countries is very high and the levels of poverty are low. Their levels of economic growth are higher now than before. Will my hon. Friend reject the nonsense that is spoken by Opposition Members?

Mr. Browne: I am happy to reject the nonsense that is spoken. I am happy also to point out to my hon. Friend that we have doubled investment in health and in education while at the same time holding down tax rates. The key to continued investment in our infrastructure and the support of services, while holding down tax rates, is to increase employment. There are 2.3 million more people in the tax system, potentially paying tax, than there were when we came to power in 1997.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Does the Minister agree with his colleague, the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, the hon. Member for Harlow (Bill Rammell), who this week said that taxpayers had reached the limit of what they could pay for public services? I see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is helping the Chief Secretary, so I will carry on a little longer until the message has got through.

Mr. Browne: My understanding from my colleague, the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, is that he denies that he said what is being attributed to him and that he was talking about adult learning grants. He is a member and a supporter of a Government who have cut tax rates, increased investment and increased employment.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): As we have indeed had a remarkable period of growth year on year for 10 years, will my hon. Friend assure me that he will invest the proceeds of that growth in education in science and research so that we can continue to achieve such growth? Will he note that although we have doubled investment in education, we are still behind some of our major competitors, such as America, in terms of national income? On a recent trip to India, I saw how quickly that fast-growing economy was expanding its education service. Does my hon. Friend agree that the growth in our economy should be invested in education so that we can increase growth in future?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend has made a number of important points. She sets them in a globalised environment and sets out the challenge that we all face. I can reassure my hon. Friend and others. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said when he delivered the Budget statement, we shall continue in our stewardship of the economy, pre-Budget reports and Budgets, to get the balance right between investment, tax and borrowing. We will do that to ensure the continued progress and development of our economy and of social justice in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Was the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) right to offer the Government the constructive and helpful advice and warning this week that 1 million more people than in 1998 now face marginal tax rates of more than 60 per cent.?

Mr. Browne: We have reduced the number of people on high marginal tax rates since we came to power. We will continue to develop our policies to respond to the challenges that face us. Our policies have delivered for the poor, and particularly for the poorest in our society, by bringing children out of poverty as well as pensioners, and the hon. Gentleman well knows that.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend met Mr. Andrus Ansip recently, the Prime Minister of Estonia, where they have the flat tax? Has he considered such a flat tax and its impact on the British economy?

Mr. Browne: I have already expressed my view on Estonia, which I think was attractive to the shadow Chancellor at the beginning of his post. Strangely, I do not think that he has mentioned Estonia in the past few months in an analogy to the substantially more developed economy of the United Kingdom. The House knows my position on that. It is not an appropriate analogy and Estonia's position in relation to the rest of the European Union facilitates its ability to be able to run its tax system as it does.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Was the junior Education Minister, the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning speaking for the Government when he said that people are now taxed to the limit?

Mr. Browne: I have already told the House that my hon. Friend did not say what is being attributed to him. He was talking about adult learning grants.

Mr. Osborne: If the right hon. Gentleman will not agree with the junior Education Minister, does he agree with Sir Derek Wanless, the Chancellor's health spending guru, who said on the radio this morning that the money spent on the NHS should have been spent much better? Does he think, like Sir Derek Wanless, that the results that we have got from that money are extremely disappointing?

Mr. Browne: I am delighted to share with the House some of the results that we have got from that money—that unprecedented investment in the NHS, which I remind the House the hon. Gentleman and his party opposed root and branch. I will give some examples of what has been achieved: 662,000 more heart operations, compared with 1997–98; 1 million more elective admissions each year, including 35,000 more heart operations—a rise of 88 per cent.; 465,600 more cataract operations—a rise of 89 per cent.; 21,000 more hip fracture operations—a rise of 34 per cent.; and 29,600 more knee replacements—a rise of 108 per cent. I am distinctly proud of that achievement.

Private Finance Initiative

6. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): How much public money has been (a) committed and (b) spent under the private finance initiative since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [62329]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): Since 1997, the Government have signed over 650 PFI projects, with a total capital value of £43 billion. Since 1999, the Treasury has published forecast future unitary charge payments signed under PFI projects alongside the Budget.

David Taylor: The Chancellor and his team have indeed been remarkably successful since 1997 and I look forward to early promotion for every one of them, but can the Minister explain the continuing Treasury love affair with PFI? The Budget small print hid a large sum of £26 billion—2 per cent. of gross domestic product—being ladled into 30-year projects which, if conventionally financed and run, would be lower cost and have the greater flexibility that is needed in a rapidly changing world. Would it not be prudent in a market with historically low interest rates to abandon PFI and expand public borrowing for investment?

John Healey: As my hon. Friend really knows, one cannot sensibly make such calculations because the payments on the PFI projects include the cost of catering, maintenance, cleaning—the servicing of the asset. In typical PFI projects, those costs are 40 to 50 per cent. of the unitary charge payments. In those circumstances, the PFI has been an important but modest part of the fivefold increase in the public sector net investment that we have put in place since 1997. There are hospitals, schools and transport projects around the country that could not have been put in place without the contribution of the PFI.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): How many hospitals are cutting front-line staff because PFI contracts have taken away their flexibility to meet budget cuts by cutting or dealing with maintenance, cleaning or financing, as the Minister just described? Many of my constituents use the West Middlesex hospital and they are suffering because the only cuts possible are in front-line staff.

John Healey: The hon. Lady needs to understand that PFI is a form of procurement. Whatever the type of procurement, the needs locally must be assessed and established. The capacity to cover the cost of that investment, conventional or PFI, must be established. PFI contracts have mechanisms in place to vary the arrangements, should the needs locally change. In the context of the Budget, we published a document that I think the hon. Lady would welcome if she read it. It strengthens the mechanisms that allow us to put in place the contract variations that may be necessary in the future.

European Single Market

7. Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress towards the European single market. [62330]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Next week, the Treasury will publish a paper on the benefits of open markets for Europe and for a Europe that rejects protectionism. At the meeting of European Finance Ministers in Vienna, we will propose that all energy and other sectors that fail to liberalise and open up to competition in the European Union be subject to independent investigation and enforcement.

Mr. Austin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the incomplete liberalisation of European energy markets has been a major factor in recent high gas prices? Will he put pressure on other European countries that have failed to open up their markets, so that we can get prices down for hard-working families facing higher bills after the last, coldest months of the year?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has pointed out the direct effect of the lack of competition in European markets on consumer prices for people throughout the United Kingdom. The cost to us of not having a fully liberalised gas market is about £10 billion a year, which forces up consumer gas prices and means that pensioners and others face higher energy bills. That is why the European Union must now reject protectionism and move towards a far more open market for energy, for financial services, for telecommunications and for utilities, which is why we are now advocating a different course of action. Instead of just reaching political agreements about timetables for liberalisation, a process should be set up in Europe so that those sectors that fail to liberalise and open up to competition are subject to investigations on behalf of consumers and then to new enforcement mechanisms. That would end the practice of economic patriotism, which is against the interests of consumers right across the European Union.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I congratulate the United Kingdom on the way in which it has liberalised its market. We believe in fair and free competition, and the problem lies with a number of countries within the European Union, not least Italy and France. When will the system allow immediate action to be taken against those countries that are not liberalising and that are protecting their industries, particularly in energy, to our disadvantage?

Mr. Brown: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who has spoken about those issues in the past. It is completely unacceptable that British industries should play by the rules while industries in other countries do not play by the rules of the single market. It is essential that we send out a message that beggar-my-neighbour policies, protectionist policies and the restriction of competition are damaging both to the consumer and to industrial growth right across the European Union. Indeed, if we fail to get a world trade agreement, such practices will damage industrial growth right across the world, which is why we are proposing a different course of action. In the past, we have had meetings to set timetables on liberalising the energy sectors by this date, the utilities sector by that date, the telecommunications sector by another date and the services sector by a further date. Instead of simply relying on people honouring promises that have been made at such meetings, a mechanism should be implemented so that the European Union itself, perhaps through an independent competition authority separate from the European Commission, investigates sector by sector what is going on and who is restricting competition. Such an authority should have enforcement powers to deal with restrictions on competition, so that we can open up trade across the single market and influence world trade talks, where the damage that will be done by a return to protectionist policies for both developed and developing countries is something that we cannot accept.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend must be delighted by the results of the Lisbon scorecard published by the Centre for European Reform, which shows Britain as one of the best performing economies in Europe as far as those benchmarks are concerned. Is he confident, however, that the rest of our partners have learned the lessons set out in the Kok report?

Mr. Brown: Progress has been made in every country. Reforms are taking place in France, which is experiencing a reaction to them at the moment, and they have also taken place in Germany and Spain. It is true that, in particular, our employment record is one of the best in Europe on the Lisbon scorecard, and we will keep it that way. If I may say so, the reason why we have a good employment record is the combination of the policies that we have pursued for economic stability and the introduction of the new deal, which has helped people who are unemployed and who are without skills to get back into work. Even now, the Opposition should reconsider their opposition to the new deal and support a measure that has given more than 1 million people the chance of jobs in our country.

Biofuels

8. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What recent representations he has received on his tax policy for biofuels. [62332]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): The Government receive many representations as part of the Budget process and we consider them very seriously. The Budget included an announcement on the further extension of support in a range of ways for the development of the UK biofuels market.

Miss McIntosh: Although I am grateful for that answer, the Financial Secretary will be aware that there is disappointment that no firm commitment has been made to increase the renewable transport fuel obligation beyond 5 per cent. in 2010. Does he agree that that will be a barrier to investment that will prevent farmers from benefiting from the measure? What are the chances of the UK Government receiving Commission approval for the state aid of enhanced capital allowances, which, although it was announced in last year's pre-Budget report, has still not been given Commission clearance as state aid?

John Healey: There are at least two questions there. We are confident of the case for the enhanced capital allowance and hope to see it in place by 2007. I do not agree with the hon. Lady's initial comments. The renewable fuel transport obligation is there to give as great a long-term certainty as possible for those who must invest in future plant, particularly in Britain. I respect the arguments of bodies such as the National Farmers Union, but in the end the companies will make the investments to deliver the market and the production. The hon. Lady might like to talk to the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser), who has the first British bioethanol plant in his constituency. Another company, Losonoco, which has big bioethanol plants, said of the Budget:

"From our perspective it was a good Budget. We were impressed by the way the process of consultation between Government and industry has taken place, the care around the analysis, the genuine interest shown in the views of industry and the support that the Government has given to the biofuels sector."

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the introduction of the mechanism for making the renewable transport fuel obligation escalator work, particularly the 15p per litre buy-ups measure and the continuation of the 20p discount on tax. Will he ensure that there is a mechanism to monitor the introduction of those processes to ensure that the necessary investment goes into the plant for producing bioethanol and biodiesel in the UK?

John Healey: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. He takes as close an interest in these issues, and is a source of as many ideas on them, as anyone in this House. As part of the process of producing the regulations that will help to put the obligation in place, we will carefully consider the carbon emissions assurance scheme that will be required to ensure that we get the most benefit to the environment from the development of a British biofuels market.

Public Sector (Local Pay)

9. Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Whether he has discussed his proposals for local pay in the public sector with the Finance Ministers in the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Executive. [62333]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Treasury Ministers periodically meet Finance Ministers from the devolved Administrations to discuss a range of issues of common interest, including public sector pay. The objective of the Government's public sector pay policy is to ensure high-quality delivery of public services while ensuring value for money for the taxpayer. In some cases, that may require a local pay variation to reflect differences in labour market conditions across the country. In devolved areas, it is for devolved Administrations to determine pay settlements. In some cases, they have decided to be part of the UK-wide systems.

Adam Price: In a report funded by the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), the Bevan Foundation, a Labour-leaning think-tank, concluded that the introduction of local pay in the public sector would widen further the pay gap between Wales and the rest of the UK. Did the Minister's colleagues in the National Assembly make that point to him forcefully, or does the Labour party say one thing in public and another in private?

Mr. Lewis: Wales has done better than almost anywhere as a consequence of this Government's policy. In recent years, public sector workers in Wales, particularly those in the front line, have received significant, year-on-year salary increases. That is the real gap compared with the pay that they were receiving up until 1997. There are arguments for localised pay in some circumstances, but there is no room for any grievances about the rates of pay for public service workers on the front line in Wales.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the strength of the Welsh economy is eloquent testimony to the effective partnership between the Welsh Assembly Government and central Government?

Mr. Lewis: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend and congratulate him on his new book, which was published recently. The combination of economic growth and public service improvements in Wales that has occurred as a consequence of the partnership between the devolved Administration and the Westminster Government means that the people of Wales are experiencing, on a daily basis, a difference in their quality of life and standard of living.

Youth Volunteering

10. Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): If he will make a statement on funding he has provided for youth volunteering. [62334]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Following millennium volunteering for young people, which was introduced in 1999, and the young volunteering challenge after 2000, the Government set up the Russell commission in 2004. It has recommended—and the Government have accepted—£100 million of new investment in gap years and other volunteering for young people. That is already sponsored by 26 companies and the programmes are run with the involvement of young people. The national youth community service board is independent of Government in its appointments and its allocation of money.

Mr. Jones: Does my right hon. Friend agree that many young people do not get a good press? Will he join me in congratulating Action Durham Millennium Volunteers in my constituency? It comprises a group of 16 to 24-year-olds who are involved in a range of voluntary projects. Many of them have won the award for excellence for completing 200 hours of volunteering.

Mr. Brown: I congratulate the volunteers in my hon. Friend's constituency. In every constituency in the country, more young people are taking part in voluntary activities, and there is a greater demand that they do that. All the evidence from the most recent volunteering initiatives shows that, when young people are given the opportunity, they respond, not only in traditional projects for volunteering but in environmental projects, for which we announced new measures in the Budget. The importance of the volunteering initiative is that we hope to have 1 million more people volunteering as a result of the Russell commission proposals and the work of the national youth community service that has now been set up. I repeat that its board is independent of Government in its appointments and its allocation of money.

Illegal Workers

12. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): If he will make a statement on the role of the Inland Revenue in identifying illegally employed workers. [62336]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has no formal responsibilities for dealing with or identifying illegal migrant workers. When HMRC officers come across information that suggests that an employer has committed a criminal offence by employing an illegal worker, it can be and is passed to the immigration and nationality directorate.

Dr. Pugh: The Paymaster General will acknowledge that the failure of agencies and gangmasters to account properly for their tax affairs is often the clearest indication of the systematic use of illegal labour and, of course, it gives them a competitive advantage. Does she acknowledge that there have been cases in which the Inland Revenue's pursuit of unpaid tax has conflicted with police investigations and attempts to prosecute under proceeds of crime legislation? Will she admit that that is ripe for further investigation?

Dawn Primarolo: No. I assume that the hon. Gentleman is aware of the joint workplace enforcement pilot, which involves all the agencies, including HMRC, and the gangmasters licensing scheme, which the Gangmasters Licensing Authority operates. He will also know that HMRC co-operates fully with and has information gateways to the Serious Organised Crime Agency and he will therefore understand that I am confident that relevant information is passed to the relevant authorities.

Charitable Donations

13. Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact on charitable giving of the introduction of tax relief at source for charitable donations. [62337]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): In 2000, the Government greatly expanded tax relief for giving to charities. Since then, tax repaid to charities on donations using gift aid has increased from £222 million in 2000–01 to £625 million in 2004–05. Payroll giving has increased in value from £55 million in 2000–01 to £83 million in 2004–05.

Ian Lucas: I recognise the excellent progress that has been made since 1997 in the development of charitable giving. However, the development of charitable foundations and tax deduction at source in the United States means that there is a far higher level of charitable giving there than in the UK, even now. Has any long-term assessment been made of a change in the charitable giving system?

Mr. Lewis: In the Budget, the Chancellor announced the creation in the Treasury of the office of charity and third sector finance, which will focus on financial support to the sector. In addition, as part of the comprehensive spending review process, we will undertake the largest ever consultation with the third sector in this country. It will include every region of the country and consult not only the large and medium-sized charities but some of the grass-roots, community-based charities. We have an impressive record of incentivising giving in payroll giving and gift aid, but we want to do much more.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): While acknowledging what has been achieved, may I ask the Minister what impact VAT has had on charitable giving? Will the Treasury take on board the representations made by the charitable sector for the removal of VAT for charities?

Mr. Lewis: We have conducted two fundamental reviews of VAT and charities and have concluded that there would be no equitable solution. However, thanks to the changes to gift aid and the encouragement, particularly of small and medium-sized enterprises, to give through payroll giving, the amount of charitable giving is increasing significantly year on year. We need only reflect on the recent tsunami and other events to see that the charitable nature of the British people has never been stronger.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend shares my belief that this Government have done a great deal to encourage charitable giving. Does he agree that more attention should be paid to giving to universities—which are charities—and to the higher education sector generally? I know that there was a taskforce, and that the Chancellor has made some real changes, but people still say that there are not enough advantages to giving to universities as charitable organisations. We still lag far behind the level of giving in the United States in this regard.

Mr. Lewis: As my hon. Friend is aware, we have recently announced further investment support to universities. As part of the comprehensive review process, and of the stream that is looking into the needs of charitable organisations, we will of course examine the needs of the higher education sector. I have to say to him, however, that more resources than ever before are going into that sector year on year to meet the challenges of globalisation.

Low Incomes (Tax Burden)

14. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What steps he is taking to reduce the tax burden on people on very low incomes. [62338]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The Government have already done a great deal to reduce the tax burden on people on low incomes. We have introduced the 10p starting rate of income tax, reformed national insurance contributions and introduced the working tax credit for hard-working families and the minimum income guarantee for pensioners.

Mr. Bellingham: Further to the question asked by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), I should like to quote the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn). In Tuesday's Budget debate, he said that the number of people "facing marginal tax rates of 60 per cent. or more has increased by nearly 1 million, largely as a consequence of the workings of the tax credit system . . . I was brought up to believe that hard work and endeavour would be rewarded, not penalised."—[Official Report, 28 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 710.]

Those are not the words of some junior Labour Parliamentary Private Secretary, but the wisdom of one of the most highly regarded new Labour Ministers of his generation. Will the Minister tell us whether the right hon. Gentleman is right or wrong?

Mr. Lewis: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) would be happy to hear the hon. Gentleman describe him as one of the most highly regarded Labour MPs, although I do not think that he was saying that when my right hon. Friend was Secretary of State for Health and he was asking him questions across the Dispatch Box.

I shall respond directly to the hon. Gentleman's assertion. The number of families facing a marginal rate of more than 70 per cent. has fallen by more than 700,000 since 1998, from 740,000 to 240,000. The reality for low-income families is a take-up rate of 89 per cent., compared with 57 per cent. under family credit. For the poorest, the rate is 93 per cent. As we are talking about the burden on low-income families, let us remember when there were high interest rates—and therefore high mortgage rates—and when there was no minimum wage, no working tax credit and no minimum income guarantee for pensioners. Let us also remember what mass unemployment did to people on low incomes.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): When the Paymaster General put through the tenfold increase in the one-year income disregard from £2,500 to £25,000 in Standing Committee last week, Conservative Members argued vehemently against the measure before voting for it. Will the Minister take this opportunity to explain to them again exactly how this extremely imaginative measure will help and support working families into, and back into, employment?

Mr. Lewis: Conservative Members are clearly disoriented at the moment. They are not sure whether to be right-wing ideologues or to support people on low incomes. When we consider the consequences of incentivising people to work rather than to remain on welfare, we see that that is one of the primary reasons why people's standard of living is growing and why the unemployment figures have never been lower.

HIV/AIDS

15. Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): What estimate he has made of the level of funding the UK would need to contribute to achieve universal access to HIV/AIDS treatment in developing countries. [62339]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Forty million people around the world have HIV and 4.9 million people were infected last year. The total funding gap is therefore £16 billion. The United Kingdom is committed to spend £1.5 billion from 2005 to 2008. We are the second largest donor in HIV/AIDS, and we are supporting programmes that cut the price of antiretroviral drugs. On that and other issues, I am today publishing the seventh annual report of our Government on the International Monetary Fund.

Dr. Harris: I welcome that answer and pay my tribute, which is shared in many quarters, to the Chancellor's leadership on this issue internationally. Will he accept, however, that unless we ensure that not just our contribution but everyone's—encouraged by his leadership—is met, the danger is that, because there is a target, funding and infrastructure will be taken from other health priorities in the countries concerned to meet that target? I hope that he will agree that that is an issue.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has taken an interest in these issues over time. The sad fact is that the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which was to be a fund of $20 billion, is financed only to the tune of about $2.7 billion. We will have to do better in future years if we are to make the 2010 target. I believe that the only way in which we can do that is to find new forms of innovative financing, such as we have found for vaccinations, and such as we can find for other drugs. It is important that we get a consensus in this country to promote an international finance facility for those issues, so that we can then win support around the world.

Business of the House

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the weeks after recess?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for the week after the Easter recess will be as follows:

TUESDAY 18 APRIL—Second Reading of the Commons Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 19 APRIL—My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will propose an Humble Address to mark the occasion of Her Majesty the Queen's 80th birthday, followed by consideration in Committee of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill.

THURSDAY 20 APRIL—Conclusion of consideration in Committee of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill.

FRIDAY 21 APRIL—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 24 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

May I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, record on behalf of the entire House our thanks and appreciation for the extra duties that you have undertaken in recent weeks?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. May: May I join the Leader of the House in thanking you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the extra duties that you have performed in the Speaker's absence over recent weeks?

I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the forthcoming business. I note that today, the last day before the recess, there are 39 written statements by Ministers, with no chance for questions to Ministers. Given his responsibilities to the House, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that in future fewer written statements and more oral statements are made by Ministers?

On Tuesday, the Foreign Office published its White Paper, "Active diplomacy for a changing world", which moves the Government away from an ethical foreign policy to a policy of "active diplomacy". Will the right hon. Gentleman make Government time available for a debate on that White Paper?

According to a survey by the Faculty of Public Health, only a third of primary care trusts believe that they can deliver public health effectively. This month, there have been more than 4,700 job cuts in the health service, the Daily Express reports that cuts in vaccination programmes could put children's lives at risk, the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), a former Health Secretary, complains that £200 million has been spent on consultants—not medical consultants but management consultants—and the man the Chancellor asked to sort out NHS funding, Sir Derek Wanless, said today:

"The issues about the NHS are the issues about where the money's gone . . . Less has been achieved than might have been achieved".

What a fitting epitaph for this Government. And yet, with all of this, the Health Secretary says in an interview in today's Financial Times, that this year the health service has "had its best year ever".

Perhaps it was the best for deficits and job cuts, but not for patients. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure a debate in Government time so that the Health Secretary can come to this House and hear from Members what is going on in the health service for which she is responsible?

May we have a debate on equal opportunities? In his Budget the Chancellor cut tax relief on home computers, which could hit women particularly hard. The Government have scrapped the scheme of NHS golden hellos, and have cut funding for the NHS flexible careers scheme. Both schemes were intended to help women return to the health service. They are also cutting funds for the Equal Opportunities Commission. Those are hardly signs of a Government who are committed to equal opportunities and helping women in the workplace. We need a debate on the Government's policy for women.

May we have a debate on the elderly? According to a survey by GE Life, about one in five people think that they will have to work part-time to supplement their incomes in retirement—double the current number. And what can they look forward to in retirement? The Chancellor has cut help with their rising council tax bills. A report from the Healthcare Commission, the Audit Commission and the Commission for Social Care Inspection said that older people were subject to "patronising and thoughtless" attitudes. Age Concern has said

"too many older people in need of public services are . . . treated as second-class citizens."

The elderly will not even be able to take up evening classes. The Association of Colleges tells us that funding will be frozen, charges will shoot up and classes will close.

Finally, may we have a debate on the meaning of Cabinet government? We have been waiting for a ministerial reshuffle for some time, and the time may have come. After all, a week after the Budget statement the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning told us that people were being taxed to the limit, saying

"We are probably about at the limit of what people are prepared to pay to improve public services."

Admittedly, attacking the Chancellor may be the way in which to keep a job at the moment. The Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for International Development has said that "the Prime Minister himself" is the key issue for voters, and that he should "allow a smooth and rapid succession for Mr. Brown".

Just at the time when the Prime Minister has changed his mind and supports elections to the House of Lords, the Leader of the House has told the Press Gallery that he is against a democratically elected second Chamber.

Somehow I feel an Easter recess reshuffle coming on. I wish the right hon. Gentleman a very peaceful and uninterrupted recess.

Mr. Hoon: Once again, I am extremely grateful to the right hon. Lady for raising such a range of subjects. Obviously, in the fullness of time, they will afford the opportunity for debate in the House. The right hon. Lady began by complaining that there had been 39 written statements. I did not quite reach 39 when I counted the debates that she encouraged us to hold, but the list fell not far short of that number, ranging across foreign and domestic policy.

Of course, the House has a procedure for written ministerial statements. I assume that if my right hon. and hon. Friends did not table such statements, the right hon. Lady would complain about that as well. Trying to keep the House informed about matters that are of obvious consequence and fall within the House's rules seems to me a matter for congratulation, not complaint. If the right hon. Lady believes that written ministerial statements should be made in a different form, she has the opportunity under the House's rules to make representations to that effect. I am not aware that any such representations have been made other than today, just now, which—as the right hon. Lady will see if she looks at the rules—is a little late.

The right hon. Lady asked for a debate on Foreign Office policy. The matter was raised last week, we are considering it, and I am sure that there will be an opportunity for such a debate in due course As for job cuts in the national health service, the right hon. Lady has adopted a common Opposition policy, which I vaguely recall from former times—the policy of highlighting particular incidents, and purporting to suggest somehow that they represent a general trend. If she checks the position, she will find that a large number of jobs have been created in the NHS. There are a large number of new nurses, consultants and doctors, all providing vital health care for the people of this country. I hope that the right hon. Lady will put the record straight in future.

I should have expected the right hon. Lady to welcome the use of consultancy to assist large organisations such as the national health service. I assume that she shares the Government's wish to ensure that the money that the NHS receives from the taxpayer is spent properly, wisely and effectively, and delivers the service that we all want. I should have thought that she would welcome the contribution that consultants can make to that, rather than criticising it.

The use of the word "epitaph" was interesting. I know that Opposition Members do not like being reminded of the number of recent general elections that they have managed to lose, but I remind them that the most recent took place less than a year ago. As far as I recall, Parliaments can run for as long as five years. The Government have many more years to run, many more new policies to introduce, many more reforms to make and will continue with their commitment to the people of this country, delivering high quality services at an affordable price—

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): On and on and on.

Mr. Hoon: Well, I am being heckled about the length of time that this Government may continue, but that is a matter for the British people. They have certainly not shown much enthusiasm for the Conservative party recently, and there is little sign in the current polls that they intend to do so. I know that the hon. Gentleman is busy trying to change the party's policies, but we will all wait to see whether the result of those flip-flops is any more successful than previous efforts. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman lives in hope, otherwise he would not be here. At the moment, it is all that he has got.

As for a debate on equal opportunities, the Government would be delighted to defend their record on equal opportunities and, in particular, on care for the elderly. The Government are extremely proud of the substantial amounts of extra money that have been provided to support pensioners, especially the poorest pensioners, and we would be delighted to defend that record in any debate on the subject.

As for the question of Cabinet government, we heard earlier today from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and we have heard from a series of Cabinet Ministers this week. I assure the right hon. Lady that Cabinet Government is alive and well. It certainly was an hour ago when I attended the most recent meeting of the Cabinet.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): With reference to the superfluity of written ministerial statements today, I remind the Leader of the House that the ministerial code of conduct contains a specific rule that such statements should not be given the day before a recess. Will he get a grip on his colleagues in other Departments and ensure that they abide by the rules?

We need an urgent debate on long-term care for the elderly. I have asked two questions in consecutive weeks of the Prime Minister on the subject without any sort of sensible reply—so I tried a different question to the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday. The Wanless report reinforces the point made by the royal commission that long-term care for the elderly should be provided free at the point of use and is an urgent matter. Given that five long Budgets ago the Chancellor peppered almost every paragraph with, "Mr. Wanless this and Mr. Wanless that", he obviously sees Mr. Wanless as a guru—

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): He's a knight, now.

Mr. Heath: He is now, but he was not then. In any case, it is time that we did something to give elderly people dignity in their old age. I hope that we can have an urgent debate.

May we have a debate on housing? We have 1.5 million people waiting for a council house and homelessness has doubled in the lifetime of this Labour Government. We had an announcement in the Budget, with considerable fanfare, of £970 million for housing, but the small print of the budget for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister contains not a single extra penny for housing. We need an explanation of why this Government do so badly in providing social housing that people can afford.

Finally, may we have a debate on communications with Australia, because there is evidently a problem? We hear that the Prime Minister has apologised for the only thing that we did not want him to apologise for—saying that he was going—and we also hear that he has fundamentally undermined the energy policy by saying that new nuclear power stations are the future. Why on earth are we bothering with a review? There is clearly something garbling communications with Australia, and it is not even the Deputy Prime Minister. Will the Leader of the House look into that and arrange a debate?

Mr. Hoon: I was intending to commiserate with the hon. Gentleman because there was a superfluity of candidates for the deputy leadership of the Liberal Democrats, and he sadly came third. However, we live in hope, because the website that encourages such matters has already opened a book on the next leadership contest. With our sterling support, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can only improve his position for next time.

We welcome the Wanless report and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has not seen the Government's response. We want to study it, and we believe that it endorses our vision as set out in the White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say". Everyone recognises that the social care system needs streamlining and reforming, and the report will help in a constructive debate about how to achieve that.

I will take no lessons from the hon. Gentleman on ensuring the dignity of elderly people in retirement—an issue that this Government have concentrated, and will continue to concentrate, on. On housing, he is well aware of the significant changes in our society, which clearly mean that more people require housing. In fact, today, more people have a roof over their head than ever before. I recognise that some of the social changes mean that more people are on waiting lists and looking for accommodation, but that does not mean that they are homeless, in the sense that they have nowhere appropriate to live. As for communications with Australia, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that they are extremely good; indeed, the flight home is going well.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to see a recent documentary by the BBC on the unscrupulous and unacceptable practices of some estate agents? I know that the Government are committed to legislating for the introduction of a mandatory redress scheme that will cover all the activities of estate agents, but can he assure me that such legislation will be introduced as soon as possible, and that its scope will extend to the establishing of minimum criteria that must be met to qualify to set up as an estate agent? We owe it to our constituents to ensure that they are fully and properly protected in making what, for most of them, will be the most important financial transaction of their lives.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this important issue and as he rightly says, for most people, such financial transactions are probably the most important ones that they undertake in their entire lives. Estate agents are currently regulated by the Estate Agents Act 1979, which gives the Office of Fair Trading the power to prohibit persons from acting as estate agents in certain circumstances. However, the Government are looking at ways of improving estate agents' regulation, and we will put in place arrangements to ensure that consumers get redress from an independent body when they have legitimate grievances against estate agents. So the Government do take this issue very seriously, we recognise that there is public concern and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the Department of Health's private finance initiative programme? Constituents in west Kent have been waiting for eight years for a hospital to replace one that relies on wooden huts and another that was built before the war. The decision rests with the Secretary of State for Health and she needs to make it without delay. We could use a debate to urge her to get on with it.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the Government's extensive hospital building programme, which has not been matched by any other Government in the entire history of the national health service. Obviously, we want to implement such proposals in each and every area of the country as soon as we can, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be the first to recognise that it is important that they are soundly financially based and deliver improvements for his, my and other Members' constituents. We need to look carefully at each proposal to ensure that it can proceed, but I can assure him that the building programme for the NHS continues, and we can all be proud of it.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): We heard this week that the Joint Committee on House of Lords Reform will be set up as soon as possible. How are Members going to be selected to participate in it? Will the same people who served on the previous Committee serve on it, and will there be room for people like me?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is well aware, given his considerable previous experience of how Committees are selected in this place, that they are selected through the usual channels by agreement. Those who show expertise and promise in these matters are often preferred. I make no comment on his qualifications.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): May I echo the request for a debate on the health service? In particular, who is responsible for it? This year, 200 staff in the Isle of Wight health service have lost their jobs, and it has been announced today that no further cuts are possible without damaging the quality of health care available to my constituents. The Secretary of State has said that such matters are for local managers, even though she appoints the people who appoint those managers. Who is actually responsible?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not mean that question in the serious way that he seems to suggest. Clearly, the management of the NHS is ultimately the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. However, if she were seeking to manage each and every detail in every part of the country, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would—rightly—be the first to complain. There has to be a system of decentralised control and, as I know from my own constituency, it is important to have local managers. They know the local situation and understand the concerns of all our constituents. Decisions should be taken at the lowest level possible. I am sure that, if he thinks about it, the hon. Gentleman will agree with me.

Andrew Mackinlay: May we have a statement about senior civil servants getting honours? I should like to know why Sir Nigel Crisp was given a peerage. My working-class constituents get the sack if they screw up and, if they think that that is wrong, have to muster the courage to go to an industrial tribunal to argue for unfair dismissal. Why is it so different for senior people? Is there not a culture in our society that means that the ones who make the biggest cock-ups get the highest rewards?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is being uncharacteristically unfair about a very distinguished civil servant who has made a very significant contribution to the NHS. Sir Nigel set out very clearly why he felt that it was appropriate to move on. I, for one, am delighted that he has moved on to the other place.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May we have an early debate on how to carry forward the reform of the House of Lords? Of course, I welcome the Prime Minister's conversion to the cause of having an elected second Chamber, although I doubt his motives in making that announcement. However, it is highly undesirable that that discussion should be confined to parliamentary opinion, and even less desirable that it should be confined to the opinion of Front-Bench Members, who have a vested interest. Surely the debate should involve the whole nation, by means of a royal commission or of a Speaker's conference: will the right hon. Gentleman consider either of those alternatives?

Mr. Hoon: [illegible]e Government set out in the manifesto on [illegible]we fought the last election, certain fundamentals of the nature of reform must be put in place, and the relationship between the two Houses is not the least of them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is probably one of the few hon. Members eligible to stand for election in the other place. I am not encouraging him to do so, but I recognise that there is an important debate to be had. We made it clear in the manifesto that we wanted the Joint Committee to sort out the relationship between the two Houses and determine the power of the second Chamber, and then bring forward options about that Chamber's composition for this House to debate. I am sure that there will be a vigorous national debate when that happens.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Before I wish my right hon. Friend a happy Easter, may I ask whether he was able, at his recent lunch, to discuss with his friends in the media the possible reform of the Lobby? Some of us believe that, given that everything in this wonderful institution is being reformed, it is about time for the Lobby to be reformed too. The matter is worthy of discussion. I advanced my interest in politics by reading about what happened in this place, which used to be well reported in the serious press. That is no longer the case, and many hon. Members would prefer briefings to be attributable, rather than unattributable. Is not that something that he, as Leader of the House, should take up?

Mr. Hoon: I got myself in trouble just lately with the media, so I understand and sympathise with my hon. Friend's concern. I made the same point yesterday, in a way that was perhaps more dramatic than his carefully observed criticisms. I think that Lobby reform is a matter that the House should consider although, ultimately, it is a question for the Lobby itself. How members of the Lobby report our proceedings is a matter for them, and for their editors, but there is a debate to be had about the relationship between Parliament and the media. It is a debate that I am happy to continue.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we have an urgent debate in Government time on the detention of children by the Home Office? More than 2,000 children a year are held in immigration detention centres behind locked doors, high fences and barbed wire, with their privacy invaded, their family life compromised and their mental health threatened. Would not that debate be an ideal opportunity to look in some detail at the humane and successful alternative approach practised in Sweden?

Mr. Hoon: I will not accept any suggestion that the Government do not behave humanely in relation to children, whether or not their parents are legally entitled to be here. Obviously, a balance has to be struck between the country's interests in ensuring that we have a proper and effective asylum and immigration system and a requirement that that system covers the children of people who come here without an entitlement to remain. I am confident that we get the balance right, although I recognise that there is always room for improvement.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the illegal gangmaster responsible for the deaths of 21 cockle pickers was sentenced to 14 years in prison just this week. I hope that sends the clear message to all illegal gangmasters that we are after them. Unfortunately, the people who benefited and profited from the product—the cockles—escaped prosecution. Will he use his good offices to highlight the plight of the families of the people who died, and make representations to the Chinese Government to protect them? Even today, those people are being harassed and intimidated by illegal gangmasters still chasing them for money.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important aspect of that terrible and appalling case. Those responsible have been brought before the court and given quite a severe punishment, and he is right to stress the international dimension. Organised criminal gangs stretching around the world are able to move people from one part of the globe to another, rather like commodities. That is why the Government are determined to use existing powers and take extra steps to deal with the consequences of that appalling business, and to do so at source. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May we have an early debate on the Government's policy towards pensioners? We have just concluded a four-day debate on the Budget, but the Government at no time explained why a £200 rebate was appropriate last year but not this year, when the council tax is even higher. Can we have an early debate so that Ministers can explain, to the House and to the nation's pensioners, why all of next month's increase in the state retirement pension has been wiped out by the removal of the rebate?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman knows full well that last year's payment was a one-off provision of additional support. That was made clear at the time. He will also be aware that the Government have spent a substantial amount of extra money on pensioners, and that the very poorest pensioners in our society are £39 a week better off than in 1997. We have targeted extra resources on those pensioners who struggled up to that date, and at the same time we are looking at the question of local government funding and the arrangements for the council tax. That is a comprehensive approach, both to pensioners and the question of local government finance.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): Post Office card accounts have been the subject of some debate in the House. Will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to speak to Ministers in the Department of Work and Pensions and the Treasury to ensure that, post-2010 and irrespective of what happens with those accounts, every person claiming benefit who wants to get those benefits via the post office will be able to do so?

Mr. Hoon: That issue is a regular feature of business questions on a Thursday, and I am delighted to be able to give my hon. Friend my regular answer. We absolutely agree that it is important that pensioners should be able to use the post office to receive payment and conduct necessary financial transactions. The Post Office account was always designed as an interim measure to ensure that pensioners would get used to the idea of using the post office in that way. Some 25 different Post Office accounts are available, so pensioners will be able to continue to use the post office as they do today, and to derive interest and financial benefits from the process. That seems to me to be something that the whole House should support.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Will the Leader of the House review the arrangements for the Electoral Administration Bill? As far as I understand it, the Government will now seek to amend the legislation as it passes through the House of Lords to require all political parties to register all loans.

Neither the Scottish National party nor Plaid Cymru have any places in the House of Lords—we simply cannot afford it. Given that we are perhaps the only political party unsullied by this dirty money, we have quite a lot to say on this issue. In view of the public interest in the issue and the serious allegations, surely the Bill should come back to this House.

Mr. Hoon: I have never noticed on the Benches, or I should say Bench, occupied by SNP Members any difficulty in hon. Members raising their voice, setting out their views or getting their ideas across. If the hon. Gentleman feels frustrated about his inability or indeed his isolation, I will be delighted to hear from him and I will ensure that his representations are passed to the appropriate quarter.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend consider an early debate after our return from the Easter break on the nature and quality of corporate social responsibility, particularly in respect of what we used to regard as the public utilities of this country? More and more we are dominated by a small number of large companies in every sector—energy, retailing and so much else—but public utilities are particularly important. Are we sure that, among companies, we still have a standard of investing back into the communities the money, resource and volunteer effort that we used to have?

Mr. Hoon: It is an important issue. I recognise that all companies make some contribution back to the community. I recognise equally in the modern world that more companies could do that. I am well aware, for example, of the energy companies engaging more in ensuring that we all properly insulate our homes. We can all congratulate them on that, but I recognise that they could do more.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): May I amplify the call that my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made for a debate on the plight of older people? It is necessary in view of the long-term care issues that Wanless highlights and which the Prime Minister first promised to deal with in 1997 at the Labour party conference. There is also the issue of old people who find it increasingly hard to access public services, who cannot get an adapted home because the Government have cut the number of social houses being built, and who will not be getting the £200 that they were given last year before the election when the Government exercised largesse, which has curiously metamorphosed into heartless parsimony.

Mr. Hoon: I simply do not recognise what the hon. Gentleman is describing. He talks about support in the home. Forty per cent. more people are today supported to live in their own home than in 1997–98. I do not know what is his experience with his constituents, but my experience is that most people appreciate that support. They believe that they are best in their own home surrounded by friends and family and familiar circumstances. That is what the overwhelming majority of my constituents say that they want and why the Government have responded. I simply do not recognise the description that he gives.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Now that the tectonic plates appear to be shifting in respect of the Government's attitude to House of Lords reform and in view of the heightened public awareness of the composition of the House of Lords and related issues, does my right hon. Friend remember that the last time this House was given an opportunity to vote on Lords reform we could not reach agreement on any of the seven options? Does that not provide a powerful argument for an early debate on the subject in this House before the Joint Committee is established to do its work so that we avoid the risk of once again not being able to agree on any of the options that the Committee may bring forward.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

Mr. Hoon: It is fair to say that on other technical issues my hon. Friend often confuses me, but on this one he does not. I invite him to look carefully at the experience that not only Robin Cook but previous Governments had in bringing forward options. The reason for establishing a Joint Committee is to avoid the problems that occurred in the past. No result could be achieved because no one believed that the various options were suitable in the light of the powers enjoyed by the second Chamber under the present arrangements. That is why it is so important to achieve an agreed understanding of the relationship between the two Houses and the powers of the second Chamber before those options are put.

I invite my hon. Friend to look carefully at the manifesto, because it sets out a clear process for achieving that. Only once there is a shared understanding of the relationship between the two Houses does it seem sensible to bring forward options. On that basis, we can then have a clearer and more definitive vote on those options, on a free vote.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): As the Leader of the House presumably believes in ministerial collective responsibility, will he arrange for a personal statement at the Dispatch Box from the Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning, who this week said that taxpayers were at the limit of what they were prepared to pay for public services, which was then repudiated by Treasury Ministers at Question Time only an hour ago.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman raises the question of collective responsibility as if it is some form of theological doctrine. As a former Minister, he will know that all Ministers are bound by the principle and all Ministers, including Ministers of education and at the Treasury pursue it consistently.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In a few hours the Division bell will ring for the last time and hundreds of Members will pour out of Carriage Gates back to their constituencies for the 18-day recess. Many will spend all of that time in their constituencies and will need good access to information and equipment to continue to give the high level of service that constituents rightly demand. Will the Leader of the House arrange time for a debate on the stability and range of services given remotely by the parliamentary and data video network—PDVN—to Members in their constituencies? On the parliamentary estate, the quality of service is reasonable and improving, but remotely that is much less true. We need to give a far better standard of service in the third millennium than we are able to give now with the current equipment.

Mr. Hoon: I rather suspect that the great majority of our colleagues have already set off to serve their constituents without necessarily waiting for tolling of the final Division bell. My hon. Friend raises an important issue. I know that the authorities of the House are continuing to improve the computer provision available to hon. Members. If he has a particular concern and there is a particular issue, I am sure that I can take it up for him.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): From across the world, with remarkable clarity, the Prime Minister has re-emphasised the importance he attaches to climate change and especially to beginning work on efforts Kyoto post-2012. However, such was the importance that he attached to that that the Government's report on climate change came out under the cover of a written parliamentary answer.

Will the Leader of the House consider having a debate in Government time so that the House may express its own views on this important issue and have an opportunity to comment on the Government's review of climate change and to help inform the work of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, which is holding an inquiry into climate change after 2012?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend's comments demonstrate the fact that this Government and this country have one of the best records in tackling greenhouse gas emissions. The new climate change programme built on the United Kingdom's position as one of the world's leaders in promoting global action on climate change. That is precisely what my right hon. Friend has done. I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman's observations would be better received on the Labour Benches if he gave credit to the significant leadership that my right hon. Friend has shown in the world. I realise that the Conservative party is beginning the long journey towards taking those issues seriously, although the Conservatives' approach to the climate change levy means that there is still some doubt about their consistency.

I remind the right hon. Gentleman of an observation made recently by Mr. Zac Goldsmith, editor of The Ecologist and, I understand, a member of the Conservative party, who said:

> "Cameron would not have got involved in the environment agenda if there was not a demand for it. I am taking advantage of a political party in disarray, desperately trying to find a new identity and my goal is to help that identity form around some of the ideas that are essential to The Ecologist."

I wish him well and I wish the right hon. Gentleman well.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May we have an early debate on a shocking report published yesterday in Leicester, which shows that inactivity among children could result in type 2 diabetes in later life? The survey, based on a review of five schools in my constituency, shows that two thirds of children do not walk to school and half of them spend at least four hours a day watching television or playing computer games. As my right hon. Friend is committed to fitness and activity, despite being a supporter of Derby County, could he arrange for an early debate? Those findings have serious implications for our children in future years.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising such an important issue for society. I recognise that it is vitally important that young people and schoolchildren should exercise and participate in school and other sport, and should take full advantage of the opportunities that the Government make available to them. There are a number of projects and programmes in Leicester to encourage healthy eating and exercise, although I am not sure whether they are in my hon. Friend's constituency, and I am sure that they will be taken up—perhaps following the example of the team that he supports, which I wish some success next season, but not as much as Derby County.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Given that the new dental contract kicks in on 1 April and that there is massive anxiety about it in every constituency, would not it be appropriate to have a statement or a debate about it soon after the Easter recess?

Mr. Hoon: The new dental contract, which is available to all dentists, is a good one; it is fair and offers NHS dentists average remuneration of about £80,000, after their expenses have been taken into account. That income is guaranteed for about three years. There are more NHS dentists than ever, so it is right that dentists accept the contract and the indications are that they will do so. I realise that there is continuing debate about the need to go on improving the quality and range of NHS dentistry, to which the Government are committed.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): In my constituency, dentistry has been privatised by the Government, yet on Tuesday I received a phone call from Dr. Edmund Chan, a senior dentist in Rushden in my constituency, who had found a fully qualified Polish dentist who wanted to work in his practice under the NHS, but the local PCT will not fund it. May we have an urgent debate on the health service?

Mr. Hoon: We have had a number of debates recently on health service matters. On the hon. Gentleman's point about privatisation, most NHS dentists are actually private businesses, working under a contract with the NHS. They have been offered a contract that is generous and fair and will give them significant opportunities not only to practise their profession but also to make a decent living from dentistry. Of course, if dentists choose not to take up that offer—in our society, they are free to choose not to do so—the local NHS can use that funding to buy in other dental services. That is how our system works and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that it should be so.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): May we have a debate in Government time about patients whose operations are cancelled by the NHS? I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the case of Mr. Geoffrey Wright, who lives in Rothwell in my constituency and, at 72 years of age, has just had his heart bypass operation cancelled for the fifth time. He is extremely unhappy about the situation.

Mr. Hoon: I perfectly understand why the hon. Gentleman raises a particular case and I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health responds to him about it in detail. However, I am sure that he understands that operations are cancelled for a variety of reasons and that he is in no way suggesting that that case is typical of the national health service as a whole.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Does the Leader of the House agree that one group who will not be enjoying Easter are the families of people murdered by criminals released after serving only half their sentence under the Government's early release scheme? Is he aware of the reports last weekend that people sentenced to life imprisonment are in fact being released after serving only a fraction of their sentence, and will he review his policy of brushing aside repeated requests for a debate on honesty in sentencing, which should not be left to half-hour Adjournment debates such as that secured yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies)?

Mr. Hoon: This is not the first time that the hon. Gentleman has raised the question of early release; in the past, he has also complained about probation arrangements. The issue is straightforward. Everyone sympathises with anyone who has been the victim of a serious crime, such as he describes, because a criminal was released early, but those measures have been in place for a long time and, as he is aware, they are a necessary part of managing our prison population. They were examined under the last Government, so when the hon. Gentleman refers to this Government's early release scheme he knows full well that it was also his Government's early release scheme. Such arrangements have been a constant feature of penal policy for a long time, and having looked at them the last Conservative Government came to the conclusion that any change along the lines advocated by the hon. Gentleman would be damaging to the maintenance of good order in our prisons.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House consider allocating part of the debate on the NHS to the role of nurses in the NHS? I am sure that he is aware that this week nurses were awarded a 2.5 per cent. pay rise, yet according to the Royal College of Nursing, taking inflation into account that is a pay cut—a view that I support. Nurses are being asked to take on greater responsibility, served with redundancy notices and given a pay cut, so does not that professional body of hard-working people deserve to have their voice heard in this place?

Mr. Hoon: I could have agreed with almost everything that the hon. Lady said, apart from the slightly strange suggestion that there is a pay cut. Not only are nurses being awarded—rightly, for their service to the NHS—an above-inflation pay increase, they also benefit from a range of incremental improvements in their pay every year. The real-terms increase for nurses will be quite a bit above the headline pay increase to which she refers. So the first point is that there will not be a cut.

[Mr. Hoon]

The second point is that the Government value enormously the work of nurses. That is why we have employed more than 78,000, in addition to those who were in employment, serving the health service, in 1997. Perhaps next time the hon. Lady will look at the figures a little more fairly, but I hope that she will accept that we enormously value the work of nurses and will continue to do so.

Points of Order

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether I could ask you to examine this proposition and to use, if you think it right, your authority to improve an infuriating situation that increasingly concerns me. I received a reply from the Foreign Office on Tuesday to a question in which I asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to define the British national interest in the middle east. After five working days, the reply came that the Foreign Office would let me know shortly what the definition of British national interest is in the middle east. That in itself is an outrage. However, the following day, I got a more detailed answer that merely refers me to a website at the Foreign Office at which the answer about the British national interest is apparently given. Incidentally, that practice is widespread across many Departments. I believe that it is right that if Members of Parliament ask a parliamentary question, they are entitled to a full answer from the Department, not some impertinent note referring them to a website, which they may or may not have time to go into to try to find the answer. If a proper parliamentary answer is to be given to Parliament, it should be given in the Queen's English in understandable terms, so that Members of Parliament have it on the record and do not have to go off to the Library to ask someone to look it up for them.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I suspect that I am possibly more used to gaining access to websites than my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), but I have great sympathy for his concern, because a website can change—it can be edited and amended—whereas a parliamentary answer remains on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The Leader of the House, who is sitting on the Front Bench, is perhaps the appropriate person to hear what the hon. Gentlemen have said, because he looks after the interests of Members—as, of course, does the occupant of the Chair. Although the occupant of the Chair has no responsibility for answers given by Ministers, it is right that Members of Parliament should get the fullest help when they ask parliamentary questions and not be faced by either undue delay or any kind of elongated paper chase. However, it is not uncommon for parliamentary answers to refer to other documents or previous answers, so that cannot be excluded, one suspects, in the name of efficiency. On the whole, there should be a bias in favour of providing correct and prompt answers to Members of Parliament.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In my business question a moment ago, I properly referred to the importance of climate change, with reference to the Prime Minister's remarks. My further observations involved making a sensible request, particularly in the light of the investigation that the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee is to undertake into matters connected with the Kyoto protocol post-2012. Will you rule whether the Leader of the House was in order in not addressing that issue or being helpful in response to a Member's question, as the code of ministerial practice requires, in not indicating whether parliamentary time was available to assist the work of the Select Committee and in responding to me in simply party political terms on a serious issue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would not be a unique occasion in the annals of parliamentary history if a Minister did not give the fullest answer to a question. The right hon. Gentleman must not pursue business questions now, but in a spirit of indulgence, as we are on the eve of the recess, I allowed him to put that point on the record.

BILL PRESENTED

HOUSING CORPORATION (DELEGATION) ETC.

Mr. Secretary Prescott, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Geoffrey Hoon, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Mr. David Miliband, Yvette Cooper and Jim Fitzpatrick presented a Bill to make provision about the delegation of functions by the Housing Corporation and Housing for Wales and about the validation of things done or evidenced by, and the authentication of the fixing of, their seals: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Tuesday 18 April, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 164].

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Appropriation Act 2006

Council Tax (New Valuation Lists for England) Act 2006

Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Act 2006

Criminal Defence Service Act 2006

National Insurance Contributions Act 2006

Terrorism Act 2006

London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Act 2006

Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act 2006

Consumer Credit Act 2006

Identity Cards Act 2006

Natural Environment and Rural Communities Act 2006

Adjournment (Easter)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

12.24 pm

Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden) (Lab): At the last election, I made five personal pledges to my constituents. All those pledges appeared in my election literature, and one of them was to turn two schools in the east of my constituency—Mitcham Vale and Tamworth Manor—into academies. Both schools have been completely rebuilt since 1997, and they have some of the best facilities anywhere in the country, but while other schools in Merton are improving fast, they are both still in the bottom few per cent. of the country's schools for GCSE results and for the value that they add to pupils' education. In Mitcham Vale, nine out of 10 boys still fail to get five good GCSEs.

Local people are well aware that those schools are poor. They both have space for 1,200 pupils, but they are barely half full. Every year, I see dozens of parents in my surgery, many in tears, because they have been told that the schools that they want are full and that their children must go to either Mitcham Vale or Tamworth Manor. So, on the doorstep, the reaction to the suggestion of creating academies was very positive, as residents are fed up with bad behaviour and low results. They want to see schools with a new ethos, strong discipline and good results. So my pledges went down well at the ballot box. Although Mitcham and Morden was Conservative until 1997, Labour's majority is now more than 30 per cent.

I am pleased to say that Merton's Labour council shares my belief that academies, with new sixth forms to attract ambitious students, could take both schools out of the doldrums. The council is working hard to get the new academies opened in September this year—a very tight timetable. Like me, it is concerned that any delay could make the schools unsustainable.

At this point, I should stress that we have had great support from the Department for Education and Skills and, in particular, Lord Adonis. In fact, I cannot praise my noble Friend enough. In my nine years as an MP, I have witnessed some truly excellent Ministers, but he has always been available for advice and support, and he has been the most helpful of all. I hope that that can be put on the record.

With the support of the DFES, we were able to find two excellent sponsors for our academies. One of them was the Church of England, which has been involved in education for centuries. That sponsor would appeal to many of my constituents who want a local faith-based school. We have a very large African population in Mitcham, and a school based on Christian values, morality and good behaviour will appeal to many parents.

The other sponsor was Lord Harris of Peckham, whom hon. Members perhaps best know of as a close ally of the new Conservative leader, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). The general public may know of him as the millionaire owner of Carpetright, but in south London, he is also known as a sponsor of several successful schools. His Croydon city technology college started in 1990, with 57 first-choice applications and only 13 per cent. of pupils getting five A to C GCSEs. Now the figures are about 3,000, and 91 per cent. respectively. Bacon's technical college's results have gone from 14 to 72 per cent., and the academy in Peckham now has a sixth form of 130 students, where previously there was none. Independent data put Harris schools in the top 6 per cent. in England. I may not agree with the noble lord's politics, but even I have to admire his personal commitment and drive to educate children who often find things tough in south London.

Both sponsors would give their schools an immediate change of ethos, which is just what they need if they are to attract students, improve results and, in the end, stay open. The wonderful new facilities at those schools were built using the private finance initiative, so there were still significant financial and legal issues to overcome, but I am pleased to say that they have been sorted out, thanks to hard work by those in the DFES and Merton council. That takes us to the consultation stage.

Earlier this year, there were three public meetings, attended by more than 500 people. A questionnaire was sent to all local parents and another was put on Merton's website. I, too, ran a survey of residents in the neighbourhoods around the schools. There was a well-organised campaign against academies, led by unions, governors and retired teachers, who, for perfectly honourable reasons, believe that religions and business men should not be involved in our schools. Those who ran the consultation went a long way to ensure that those voices were heard. Indeed, some people complained that the eight or nine people behind the campaign against academies all got to speak at length at the meetings, drowning out the voice of ordinary parents, but at least they had a chance to air their concerns and to have their questions answered. For instance, it was made clear that the schools would be charitable trusts. The new sponsors could not profit from them or sell their assets. If for any reason a school closed, its land would revert to the ownership of the local authority. It was also made clear that there would be no selection by ability.

The result of the consultation was a clear majority in favour of the proposals, by about two to one. Sadly, there were only about 700 responses—three quarters of them as a result of my survey—but it is fair to say that that whole process showed no widespread opposition to the plans. Next was the simple matter of getting Merton council's overview and scrutiny panel to agree. Labour does not have a majority on that committee, even though Merton is a Labour council, so this was obviously a concern.

Back in September, however, a rising political star made an amazing statement. He said:

> "There are times in this quite new politics we have when Tony Blair sits in the middle of the British political spectrum . . . Tuition fees. Foundation hospitals. City academies. When he does these things, I want a Conservative Party that says yes, that is a good idea . . . Not one that seeks a way of opposing him and just looks opportunistic and insincere."

That speaker was the right hon. Member for Witney. So, there was no way that Merton's Conservatives would now oppose city academies or behave in a way that was opportunistic and insincere, or was there? Well, while the Leader of the Opposition in the country was telling us that he wanted to speed up the creation of city academies, the Conservative party in Merton decided to slow it down. In November, it brought a motion to Merton council

> "to advise Cabinet to reconsider its decision regarding . . . Mitcham Vale and Tamworth Manor and to postpone it until January 2007".

When it lost that motion, it put out leaflets that said:

> "Labour Councillors voted to hand"

the schools

> "over to private sponsors—give away millions of pounds of Council taxpayers money . . . .The Labour Government shower the sponsors with Knighthoods and peerages."

Merton's Conservatives seemed not to notice that the only peer involved in the Merton academies was a Tory and an ally of their leader, or that he would be investing his own money in the schools, not receiving money from Merton council tax payers. But, of course, when the crunch came at the overview and scrutiny meeting, surely they would follow their leader and back academies. Well, there might be a new face at the top, but on the ground, they are still the same old Tories, and yes, they are opportunistic and insincere, because, along with a handful of unelected so-called representatives, they voted to ignore the public and reject academies.

Thankfully, there was still time to hold an emergency cabinet meeting, where the proposals were put back on timetable. However, there are still other hurdles to be crossed if the schools are to become academies in September. There are still more meetings to come. I am raising the issue today to draw attention to the damage being done by local politicians who are opportunistic and insincere—politicians who deliberately defy their leader and when he says "flip" they say "flop"; politicians who would rather put their personal agendas ahead of the future of thousands of children. Our children get only one chance. Funding in Merton's schools is up by more than £1,300 per pupil since 1997. Results have gone up at all key stages and many of our schools, including Mitcham Vale and Tamworth Manor, have been rebuilt.

Sadly, however, the fact is that some schools need extra help. I believe that academies are one answer. My constituents agree with me. My local council agrees with me. Even the Leader of the Opposition agrees with me. I hope that, as a result of this Adjournment debate, we can persuade Merton's Conservatives to agree with all of us, to stop behaving so irresponsibly, and to start putting our children first.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is always a delight to take part in pre-recess Adjournment debates, because they provide such a splendid opportunity for Back-Bench Members, in particular, to raise issues that may be particular to their constituencies, or wider issues that they do not have the opportunity to raise on other occasions. That is a valuable opportunity, and I am a little saddened that today fewer Members than usual seem able to take advantage of it. I have no doubt that the quality will outweigh the quantity.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm for the House, the nation and the record how many Liberal Democrats there are in the Chamber?

Mr. Heath: My colleagues are all fully engaged in Committee work at the moment, maintaining the Opposition to this rotten Government that the Conservatives seem to have abandoned over recent days. I applaud my colleagues for that. It is extremely important that we have a party of opposition in the House, not one that is always willing to collude when things get tough.

Some issues that have been raised time and time again in business questions, which take place each week on a Thursday, simply never get the benefit of a debate. I am not going to use this opportunity to raise issues from my constituency; I shall suggest matters that ought to be debated before the recess, and certainly before the next recess. No. 1 on my list was raised again in business questions today. It has been raised at every business questions for weeks, if not months. I am talking about the future of Post Office card accounts and the effect on sub-post offices. I found the Leader of the House's response today one of the most laughable that I have ever heard. He suggested that one of the reasons for having what he described as the interim Post Office card account was to allow old age pensioners to get used to using the post office.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): That is what he said.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful for the confirmation from the right hon. Lady. I have got news for the Leader of the House: pensioners do not need practice in using the post office; they have used it throughout their adult life, and possibly in their childhood as well. They value the post office as something precious in their community. That was why they were so desperately keen to ensure that the Post Office card account was put in place: it enabled them to take cash out at their local sub-post office, which was to their benefit because of the way in which they prefer to do their business and budget, and was also to the benefit of the local post office, in making sure that it was a viable concern.

Mrs. May: Perhaps I could come to the assistance of the Leader of the House at this point, and suggest that there was one aspect of what he said that might have had an element of truth. Many pensioners in my constituency are having to get used to using a different post office because their local post offices—such as those in Ross road and Woodlands park in Maidenhead—have been closed under this Government.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady and I note how cunningly she inserted a reference to her constituency in that intervention—but the same story applies in every constituency and, frankly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you ain't seen nothing yet. If we see the demise of the Post Office card account, we see the demise of small sub-post offices across the country, whether they are in rural or urban areas. That is something that we in the House fought to ensure did not happen. Promises were made at the Dispatch Box by everybody from the Prime Minister down that arrangements would be put in place to ensure the safety of the post office network. The Post Office card account was an integral part of that. I maintain that there was never any suggestion that it was a temporary or interim measure when it was introduced. It was there as a safeguard for the future of the post office network.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for talking about this matter, because we have all been subjected to massive closures. In the largest town in my constituency, we went from five post offices down to one, in Belper. That was done under the urban regeneration programme, or something like that.

David Taylor: Reinvention.

Mr. McLoughlin: Well, it is another new Labour word. Can the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) tell me when he first heard that the Post Office card account was only a temporary measure?

Mr. Heath: I recall that I heard it from the Leader of the House at business questions when it emerged as a way of getting him off the hook when hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber were asking him why Post Office card accounts were suddenly being closed, and why the Department for Work and Pensions clearly had not the slightest interest in maintaining the post office network, despite all the promises that were given. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) revealed last week that letters had been written to pensioners to warn them that if they went to the post office and took cash out, they were likely to be mugged on their way home—that is a great help to the post office network. That is the sort of nonsense that we have had to face throughout the sad and sorry decline of the network, because of the Government's abandonment of the promises that they purported to give about its protection.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman remind the House how much the Conservatives invested in the post office network during their 18 years in government, and will he tell us how much this Government have invested—for example, to continue the rural post office network?

Mr. Heath: I have not the slightest idea how much the Conservative Government invested in the post office network. There were closures of post offices under that Government, as there have been closures since, but the latest development is the unkindest cut of all, because it will mean that the postmasters and postmistresses who foolishly took this Government at their word when they said that they intended to maintain the post office network will see that that was a con. The fact that the Government are reneging on their promises will be disastrous for our post office network, and I feel sorry for the people who invested their life savings in trying to maintain a viable business, but are now having the rug pulled from under them.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: I am taking a lot of interventions, which means that we are extending the length of the debate—although perhaps that may be a good thing today.

Bob Spink: I can put the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest, because I was going to raise this issue but now I will not, because he is covering the points in an excellent, admirable and eloquent manner. Does he realise that there were 19,000 post offices when the Conservatives left power in 1997, but that many of them have been shut down by the Labour Government? That is hurting the most vulnerable people in our society, damaging our high streets and changing the fabric of our community, which is deplorable.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman's last point was absolutely accurate. He knows that I share his view, because I have been arguing about the matter for several years. Labour Members sometimes experience self-delusion. They believe their rhetoric and think that the Government are performing better on some areas than the previous Conservative Government, although they are not. I was no supporter of the Conservative Government—I thought they were disastrous.

The problem hugely affects vulnerable people. I referred to housing during business questions, and that is a similar such problem. Some 1.5 million people are waiting for a council house—500,000 more than under the Conservatives. The number of homeless people has doubled and the Government are building half as much affordable social housing as the Conservatives did in their last year in government. That does not sound to me like a Labour Government—it certainly does not sound like a socialist Government.

David Taylor rose—

Mr. Heath: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has something to say about that.

David Taylor: I was never one for inhaling Millbank press releases in my time as a candidate. Nevertheless, it has to be said that during the 18 years of the Conservative Government, for all sorts of reasons—I do not necessarily go by the simplistic cliché of holding the Government of the day responsible for everything that happens—the number of post offices went down from about 24,000 to about 18,000. There was a 25 per cent. reduction in those 18 years, and the Conservatives cannot walk away from that.

Mr. Heath: Indeed the Conservatives cannot, and I would be the last person who would allow them to do so. The hon. Gentleman has always been a beacon of common sense from the Labour Benches, which, I suspect, is why he has not had the advantage of any preferment during the long period of this Government.

Let me move on to the second topic that clearly requires a debate because of its importance to many hon. Members: the state of the health service. I will start with a clear statement: the Government have invested more money in the health service than I can remember any previous Government doing. That is extremely welcome and we should not run away from that fact, or be anything other than pleased that they were prepared to make that investment. However, the outcomes do not match the input, and that is why members of the public and Members of the House are worried.

I was part of the primary care system in my previous professional existence, although that was an awfully long time ago. I am extremely worried about what is happening in primary care. I worry that out-of-hours services have been decimated throughout the country. The situation is especially worrying for those of us who live in rural areas because there is now every likelihood that people will not get a general practitioner to attend for a considerable time if they have the misfortune to fall ill. A similar point can be made about the ambulance service, which is underperforming in many of our rural areas.

There is no such thing as NHS dentistry in many parts of the country. No matter how many times the Government insist that everything is all right in dentistry, our constituents know that everything is not all right because their local dentist practices are opting out of the health service and no longer providing NHS treatment. The idea that people having to travel 40 or 50 miles to visit their dentist is convenient health provision under the NHS is nonsense.

There is huge variation among our acute services and hospitals. The substantial programme of hospital building has been extremely welcome. I have been waiting for a new hospital in Frome for nine or 10 years, so it is wonderful news that it looks as if we will soon have one. However, equally, cottage hospitals in many parts of the country are closing because of a lack of funds. Major general hospitals are being hamstrung by their lack of funds, which might be because of existing operating practices, or debts that they inherited from management failures years ago. For example, the Royal United hospital in Bath is still shackled by the mistakes of a previous generation of managers, and that is affecting care in our communities now. I do not for the life of me understand how it can be right for a present generation of patients to pay the price for funding mistakes made a generation ago, and the situation is a real worry.

Siobhain McDonagh: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in celebrating the fantastic reduction in waiting times for hip replacements in the NHS since 1997? The average waiting time was well over 18 months then, and it is six months today. Will he also welcome the introduction of statins, which have reduced the need for cardiac surgery, yet do not appear in any statistics on outcomes in the NHS?

Mr. Heath: Of course I welcome those things. I welcome the significant advances that the Government have made on reducing waiting times, although that certainly should have been the case, given the investment that has gone into the service. I am sorry, but I cannot give the Government the credit for discovering statins and disseminating their use. However, it is welcome that they are available. I was one of the first Members to call for their provision as a first response, and that is now a matter of course. It is extremely welcome that the need for cardiac surgery has been massively reduced.

However, I do not welcome wards that are mothballed. There are medical and surgical staff, as well as lay staff, who are being laid off. I do not welcome the fact that I have a constituent who came to see me the other day who is in the third stage of breast cancer—a late stage. She has been refused Herceptin by her hospital trust. All the arguments about Herceptin involve whether it is appropriate for first-stage cancers, and the need to await an assessment by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence as to whether it is an effective remedy for first and second-stage cancers. I am talking about a third-stage cancer. The only reason why the lady cannot receive the drug treatment that not only she wants, but her consultant physician insists is the right course for her, is that the hospital will not pay for it, because it does not have the money. That is scandalous.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): That is wrong.

Mr. Heath: The Minister says that that is wrong. But that is what has happened to one of my constituents. I have written to the Secretary of State for Health. Other constituents who write to me cannot understand why their long-term prescriptive needs are not met by the health service, when those of some other categories are. We should be profoundly worried about that, and about the state of the health service.

I worry that we spend our time changing the structures of the health service rather than getting to grips with the outcomes, which are so important for patients. Mental health is always a Cinderella service. It is always the last area to be considered when it comes to funding, and the appropriate emphasis is not placed on it. I thought that we would see that happening when the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) was the Secretary of State. He showed a genuine interest in the mental health service. Since then interest has evaporated, and we can see it no longer.

Long-term care is a scandal in this country. When I say "in this country", I mean in England, because it is not a scandal in Scotland. In England, patients receiving long-term care are still required to sell their homes so as to maintain their dignity in old age and look after their personal social care, as Sir Derek Wanless has pointed out in his report published today, and as the royal commission pointed out years ago. The Prime Minister said in 1997 that he could not live in a country where people had to sell their homes to secure long-term care. Yet he is still living here, and elderly people still have to sell their homes to secure long-term care. We must deal with that.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): Is it not incredible that the Government set up a royal commission to examine the matter that my hon. Friend has raised, nothing was done to implement the recommendations, and now a taskforce is being set up to re-examine it?

Mr. Heath: It is incredible, because we know what the answer is. We know what needs to be done.

There is an artificial division between personal care and nursing care when dealing with elderly patients, particularly with people who have Alzheimer's disease or another dementia. This is nonsensical, but the practical implications for patients and their families are immense. If we are a civilised society, it is something that we need to address. There are many things that pensioners would have on their list of priorities.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without mentioning yet again the £200 rebate. I cannot think of anything more cynical, or more guaranteed to bring the body politic into disrepute, than offering a bribe of £200 before a general election. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said from the Dispatch Box that the Government could now afford, because of their management of the economy, to mitigate the cost of the council tax for pensioners. One year later, council tax increased by 5 per cent. and the Chancellor could no longer afford the £200. Pensioners ended up paying an extra £200 or £250 on council tax. That is disgraceful. Labour Members should be ashamed of that.

I despair of a system that is so unfair for so many of our fellow citizens. I will not prolong the argument over council tax, but the system does not work for those who are on low or fixed incomes. It is unfair to them. We should recognise that and do something about it.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Whatever the demerits of council tax, does the hon. Gentleman accept that with local taxation the key issue is the decisions made by local councillors about how much to increase the tax? Whatever the system, if councillors spend too much they will have to put up the tax by too much. That is self-evident from my local authority. Having been under Liberal Democrat control for almost 20 years, in the past four years it has increased council tax by 13 per cent., 14 per cent. and then by about 3 or 4 per cent. consecutively. This year, when the Tories took control, they were able to increase council tax by less than the rate of inflation. That is a decision for local people, whatever the tax system.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman can make his local political points if he wishes. I invite him to reflect on the experience of Conservative councils throughout the country, which had to increase council tax year after year because of the withdrawal of Government grant. Let us not get into a big debate—[Interruption.] I am happy to have a debate if that is what hon. Members wish. I make it absolutely plain that there is no relationship between local spending decisions and the main part of council tax increases, because of the gearing effect and the infamous effect of central Government decisions. That is why councils throughout the country, whether they are Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat, find themselves increasing council tax every year, knowing that the people whom they serve cannot afford the increases. Councils have to meet the statutory requirements that the Government foist upon them.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way to me for a second time. In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), he referred to Conservative councils. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that the figures clearly show that the average band D council tax throughout the country for people living under Conservative-controlled councils is still £81 less than those in the same band under Labour-controlled councils, and £88 less than council tax under Liberal Democrat-controlled councils?

Mr. Heath: The right hon. Lady knows better than that. She knows the structure of local government finance. If she wants an illustration, I will take her to my constituency. I can take her to Milbourn Port, on one side of the county border, where the average band D payment for a council tax payer will be £50 less in Liberal Democrat-controlled South Somerset district council and Liberal Democrat-controlled Somerset county council than if one were to cross the county border into Conservative-controlled Dorset county council.

We can all give such illustrations, but they do not mean anything. There is something deeply wrong about the structure of local government finance. There are some authorities that historically have never had a fair share of education funding, for example. They have never had the resources provided per pupil to match in any way those provided for other areas. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) knows this very well, because Leicestershire has been dealt with badly over many years. Somerset is another example, and I believe that Norfolk is another. There must be transparency in the system.

What the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) says is right. People make local decisions and they should set the tax, which would be related directly to the amount that they were spending. The local population could then decide whether to back the councillors or sack them. That is the right way in which to operate local government.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: I will not take any more interventions on this point, because I want to move on to my last point.

Norman Lamb: Will my hon. Friend give way on another point?

Mr. Heath: All right. This is the last intervention that I shall take.

Norman Lamb: My hon. Friend mentioned the £200 payment, which was used as a means to get the Government through the general election. We have found that in health, for example, difficult decisions appeared to be postponed until after the election. In Norfolk we have a £20 million black hole with the Norfolk and Norwich University hospital—a flagship private finance initiative hospital that is facing some 700 possible job cuts. Does that not demonstrate that the system was manipulated to get the Government through the general election? Now all the problems are coming to light.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend is right. I make a prediction: we will have a particularly liberal Budget in about three or four years, which will see the Government through the next election. It was ever thus. Whichever Government are in power, they manipulate the figures for their electoral advantage. It is a great shame.

My last point takes us right away from parochial and even national matters to the international scene. We need a debate on what is happening in the areas of the world in which we as a nation have taken a particular interest. I find it extraordinary that since the onset of the conflict we have not had a debate on the foreign affairs issues associated with Iraq. We have an Army in the field in a country racked with violence, where enormous difficulties face our very brave men and women who go out there and serve their country—and the House does not debate it.

The House hears occasional statements from the Ministry of Defence, but we do not have an opportunity to say what we think about the conduct of affairs in Iraq, or in Afghanistan, another dangerous theatre in which we are engaged. That seems wrong. I look back at the speeches that I made on 18 March 2003 in the debate on the Iraq war, and I do not resile from any of the points that I made then. I believe that I was right. Others will take a different view. I accept that there respectable differences of opinion about whether we should have engaged in the conflict in Iraq, but events have happened exactly as I said they would at the time, to the detriment of many people in Iraq, and sadly, many British lives have been lost. We owe it to the people whom we send to Iraq to have a clear view about what is likely to happen.

A much more mature debate is taking place in America. American military doctrine is being questioned—not just the decision to go into Iraq, but how the American military conduct themselves. The idea of overwhelming strength, which has been a basic American military doctrine since Colin Powell, is being questioned as an appropriate response to insurgency. Americans are looking at the conduct of British troops back in the Malay insurgency and in east Africa, to learn lessons about how to deal effectively with insurgency.

That may be a lost cause for the Americans. I was disturbed to read in a poll recently that 90 per cent. of all American soldiers believe that they are fighting Iraq as a direct consequence of 9/11—a matter in which Iraq was not involved. But they believe that that is a direct response. Iraq lurches towards civil war, despite the good things that we perceive happening. I am not one of those who say that the election was not a good thing. Of course it was a good thing to have an election, but I also recognise the escalating violence, the determination of large parts of the population to engender further conflict, and the difficulties that our troops face daily.

We should have a debate on that in the House, as we should on the very difficult task that we have set our troops in Afghanistan, another lawless area in the world, without a clear mission that they are expected to achieve. The sooner we have that, and the sooner we establish the grounds that we set for the withdrawal of our troops and an appropriate exit strategy, the better it will be not only for British interests, but for world interests and increasing stability.

That was a brief canter—with many interventions, which prolonged the time for which I spoke—through essential topics of debate for the House, which we have failed to debate over the past Session or before the recess, and which we should debate at the first opportunity when we return.

1.4 pm

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I shall be fairly brief. I am grateful for the opportunity to make a plea to Ministers to implement as rapidly as possible some of the recommendations in the recent health

White Paper, particularly in relation to integrating care services. In my constituency I have a special interest in seeing the integration of Swindon social services, run by the borough council, with Swindon primary care trust.

Since its inception in 1997 Swindon social services department has had a long and troubled history. It inherited from Wiltshire county council a deficit of £1 million, and it has never been able to get out from under that burden. That has nothing to do with the quality of the social workers involved, who are all, in my experience, public-spirited public servants who work extremely hard to try to deliver services to their clients. The Government have recognised the considerable problems with Swindon social services over the years, and there has been Government intervention.

Thanks to £1 million from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the borough council was able to bring in consultancy services from Kent county council, one of the better social services departments in the country. Under its tutelage and with a great deal of engagement by the borough council, there have been real improvements in Swindon social services. I pay tribute to everybody who has been involved, particularly to the social workers on the front line, who have a difficult and often thankless job. I know from my own experience how hard they work and how deeply they care about the people they serve, and I pay tribute to them.

There are, however, still huge problems with social services. We cannot run away from them. Every week I see examples in my caseload. Recently, I had a case of a young woman with pronounced suicidal tendencies who had been made known to Swindon social services over many months. She had not had a proper assessment and she was getting no support. One afternoon recently she threatened to commit suicide. Her mother was desperate. She rang social services, but she could get no one to come out.

In the end, the situation was so desperate that the police had to go to the house and spend six to eight hours with the young woman to ensure that she did not harm herself. All the time the police were there doing that job—I pay tribute to them in this case—I was on the phone, trying to get social services to engage with the case. Having spent most of the day on it, it was only at about 6.30 pm that we got a duty officer to come out and take charge. That was an extreme case, but there are other cases that I see every week, showing how far social services have to go.

On the other hand, Swindon primary care trust is widely recognised to be one of the best in the country. It is an exceptional team led by Jan Stubbings, with high quality management throughout the primary care trust. It is discussing its future, a matter to which I shall return at the end of my remarks. We have the opportunity to combine an operation that desperately needs better managerial support and continuing reform with an organisation that has already proved its worth.

In a bold and inspired move, Swindon borough council has appointed the chief executive of the PCT to spend four days a week running Swindon social services. It is early days, but it seems to be working extremely well. She still spends one day a week running the primary care trust, but because of the quality of the team that she has built up there is no dilution, as far as anyone can see, in the quality of the management of the primary care trust. The gains from integrating those caring services are potentially enormous. The Government have begun to recognise that—the recent White Paper on health suggests that they do, but we must move fast.

I conclude my remarks by drawing attention to dementia care. We know that the numbers of people suffering from dementia are growing all the time. As people live longer, that is increasingly likely to affect many people in the United Kingdom. It is extremely difficult for the statutory agencies to deal with the problem. Symptoms are often not recognised early on. Typically, long-standing partners shoulder a huge burden of care, particularly in the early stages of dementia. Statutory agencies often come in quite late. There is often a great deal of confusion, which is difficult to resolve, about who should take responsibility for the care. For example, in the local hospital there are still a large number of delayed discharges, which are due to people suffering from dementia not being able to go anywhere. When elderly people are unable to look after their partners, it creates huge problems for hospital staff. As everybody knows, people with dementia need a lot of care and attention, because they go wandering, which takes up an awful lot of hospital staff's time. When I visited the hospital last month, staff told me that managing the day-to-day routine of people with dementia is still a considerable problem. People in the early stages of dementia should not really be in hospital, but there is nowhere else for them to go.

Integrating caring services could do a great deal to provide more effective care for people with dementia, and it would also have wider benefits at the boundaries between the various caring agencies, which are often quite diffuse. I hope that the Government will move quickly to implement the recommendations, because there are huge gains to be had, and I also hope that they will examine the opportunity to make Swindon a pilot for such integrated services.

In conclusion, I hope that my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House will pass on to Health Ministers the point that the huge gain offered by such integration can be achieved only if Swindon PCT remains as a stand-alone PCT and is not integrated with some of the other potential partner PCTs, which the strategic health authority is currently advocating. I hope that my hon. Friend will carry forward the message that Swindon should have a stand-alone PCT and the rapid integration of social services.

1.11 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), who spoke passionately and wisely about the care of vulnerable people and held the attention of the whole House.

In the past two years alone, the police cautioned 807 people for taking or possessing indecent photographs of children—the majority of the cautions were issued for taking indecent photographs. Given the nature of paedophiles and their tendency to reoffend, it is a fair assumption that some, if not many, of those 807 people went on to commit further offences, and a caution, rather than a public trial, helps them to do so.

[Bob Spink]

We all know that those offences destroy the lives of our innocent young children. I put it to the House that if only one of those offenders, whom my constituents and, I guess, your constituents, Mr. Deputy Speaker, consider to be perverts—they have admitted the offence—goes on to reoffend, the use of the caution for paedophile activity is wrong and should be stopped. Cautions should be used only where, first, the offence, which must be admitted in full by the criminal, has only minor consequences for either individuals or society at large, and, secondly, offenders are unlikely to reoffend after they have been pulled up by the caution. It is as plain as the nose on my face that neither of those tests is met in the case of paedophile activity—I can see my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) nodding about how plain the nose on my face is. Instead of leaving it to the decision of an individual police officer, we should stop the use of cautions for paedophile activity in all but truly exceptional cases, and then only on the advice of the chief constable.

Once paedophiles are caught, they should be put through the courts, which would ensure that the public are aware of their proclivities. That would give us a better chance of defending our innocent children by keeping on eye on those offenders.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does my hon. Friend recall that when the subject was debated in this place, the argument was advanced that it is sometimes easier to secure a confession, and therefore to impose a caution, than it is to secure a conviction? It is therefore sometimes possible to pin down someone as an offender by offering a caution, when they might escape conviction before the courts.

Bob Spink: I recall that debate, and that is the only half-decent argument against taking such people to a full trial, but the offence and its consequences are so serious that I believe that a trial is essential in almost all cases. I am surprised that the use of cautions for that offence has increased almost tenfold over the past three years.

Today, I have tabled new clause 1 to the Police and Justice Bill, which is titled, "Protection of children: prohibition of police and conditional cautions". I hope that it ensures that paedophiles get the justice they deserve and that our children get the protection they deserve. I hope that hon. Members support my new clause, which will allow us further to debate the issue and let individual police officers know that this House takes the matter very seriously.

Mr. Heath: I shall make two brief observations. First, people who are issued with cautions are entered on to the sex offenders register, which is an important factor. Secondly, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me that not nearly enough resources were applied to Operation Ore in order to pick up the large number of suspected cases of paedophilia that emerged from it. If the resources had been put in, I am sure that a more effective policing job could have been done.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman, who is speaking for the Liberal Democrats today, makes an excellent point.

We all value our children, and that view should not stop or be varied in the case of the unborn child. Changing technology—in particular, 4D imaging technology—has drawn greater attention to the true and horrendous consequences of the abortion of a child at 24 weeks. That has raised public and political awareness of the issue of the timing of abortions, which came to a head last year in the general election campaign, when all three party leaders made a formal pledge that this House should readdress the legislation on the timing of abortion. Since then, the Prime Minister has failed to deliver on his pledge—he is the only one of those three party leaders who is still in office. I hope that all three parties honour what their party leaders said to the public.

The Leader of the House of Commons wrote to the Science and Technology Committee on 13 March in the following terms:

> "You propose, on behalf of the Science & Technology Committee, and following discussion with the Lords Science & Technology Committee, that the time may be right for the establishment of a Joint Committee on time limits for abortions.
> I am in no doubt about the importance of this issue, nor of the fact that . . . scientific, medical and social changes have taken place since Parliament was last asked to come to a decision on these issues in 1990. The Government . . . have no plans to change the law on abortion."

The Leader of the House did not recommend the formation of a committee to examine the matter.

I hope that the Government will listen carefully to the public view and the changing awareness of the consequences of abortion at 24 weeks and will enable, even if it is through a private Member's Bill, the issue to be debated again at the latest in the next Session of Parliament. I accept that it is a matter of conscience and is not a matter for direct Government legislation, but it needs a push, and I hope that the Prime Minister will provide it—he is an honourable man, so I am sure he will.

I will be surprised if my hon. Friends do not address the issue of police force mergers. The vast majority of people in Essex adamantly oppose the ending of the Essex constabulary. Objectors in Essex include the county council, the 12 district or borough councils and 15 of the 17 Essex Members of Parliament, some of whom are on these Benches with me today. There is clearly an overwhelming majority among those who have been democratically elected to represent the people against the merger of Essex police.

The people of Essex are equally overwhelmingly opposed to this ill-considered merger. The Home Secretary has not made the case for the merger. He has shown by his decision last week that he is failing, and the Government are failing, to listen to the people. We as Conservatives found out in 1997 what happens when the Government fail to listen to the people. I hope that he will change his mind. I also hope that he can explain the inconsistency with Hampshire and Kent, which are highly comparable with the Essex police force in terms of size, operation and nature but have been allowed to remain a stand-alone force while Essex is being merged. Policing in the UK is by the consent of the people. As Lord Hanningfield said in his letter of 20 March,

> "it is crucial that the wishes of the people are heard and are respected."

This ill-considered proposal would lead to higher costs and higher council tax; dangerous centralisation of police control in future, or at least the risk of that; loss of local understanding and responsiveness; and loss of local control. The Home Secretary must know that Conservative Members will continue to fight him on this. I thank Lord Hanningfield and Essex county councillors for leading us in this worthy battle.

Overdevelopment is a major problem, particularly in the south-east. The public are deeply concerned about the fact that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is trying to concrete over our green spaces, as well as brownfield sites, without providing the necessary infrastructure to support such increased development. The chief constable of Essex has stated that that overdevelopment, if not checked, could add up to 30 per cent. to crime over the next five to seven years. This is being driven by the ODPM and is giving a terrible headache to local councillors on planning committees who are doing their best to fight off the demand for ever more houses and the destruction of our green spaces. As the Basildon Evening Echo editorial sagely said,

"Too many homes can kill a town."

Overdevelopment is a particular problem for Castle Point. It threatens our green land and quality of life and will make much worse the already unacceptable congestion and further overburden our infrastructure.

There is an additional problem—not a new one, sadly—in Castle Point: the widespread and justified concern about a lack of transparency in planning. The public have lost confidence as a result of that. A company called Hickfort is seeking to develop 400 acres of our green belt in Castle Point. I do not want to be unfair to Hickfort and will not say today anything that I would not repeat outside this Chamber. However, there seems to have been an attempt to mislead, to some extent, landowners and the public on its proposals. I must thank the Yellow Advertiser and the Evening Echo for their coverage of this. For instance, the Evening Echo's front page is starkly headlined, "'Land Grab". Hickfort seems to have made exaggerated claims of support and advice by the ODPM, Thames Gateway and the head of Castle Point borough council. Its letter of 12 December last year states:

"We have held preliminary meetings with representatives of some very influential organisations that oversee the delivery of new homes and economic growth in the Thames Gateway region. Specifically, Thames Gateway-South Essex, GO East, The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Head of Castle Point Council . . . We have been recommended to . . . submit a scheme".

I have written to Hickfort but have had no reply. I have written to all those bodies, each of which denies ever having made such a recommendation. Indeed, they would not do so, as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My investigations on behalf of deeply concerned residents show that Hickfort's letter to residents is untrue. Moreover, Hickfort has refused to engage with me in any way whatsoever, not even to answer the various letters that I have sent over recent months so that I can protect the interests of my constituents. That creates a lack of transparency, which must give rise to concern in local people's minds. My own position as a Member of Parliament continues to be threatened by vested interests, which I believe are driven by these issues. Several national newspapers and the Press Association have contacted me this week about that threat to my position. I can only quote my letter to all residents last week:

"I reject the old fashioned, bickering politics. I just want to get on with the job . . . simply doing what is right . . . I work for you"—

the people—

"not for 'The Party' or vested interests."

That will remain the case.

1.25 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Let me first pick up one or two points from earlier speakers. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) was quick to cite the band D council tax statistic that is so often bandied around—no pun intended. It is a particularly misleading statistic, because better-off areas tend to have more properties in higher bands than D, therefore the median property would be a band C or D. A far better measure is council tax per dwelling, not at band D level. It is not surprising if Conservative areas have a lower band D council tax.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said that it was unknown for there to be a Budget prior to an election that was not a come-on to the electorate—I paraphrase a little. I point him to the example of the Budget by Roy Jenkins in which, despite great pressure from his Labour colleagues, he was very abstemious in that regard and Labour lost the ensuing election. I do not know whether the two facts are linked.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) mentioned abortion. Wide cross-party support has been given to an early-day motion asking for a lower limit of 20 weeks, in some cases 18 weeks, or in my view, 16 weeks. He also discussed the merging of police forces in Essex. We have a similar situation in the east midlands, where there is no support for an east midlands-wide force but that seems to be our fate.

I have the privilege of representing the constituency of North-West Leicestershire, which is, and has been for centuries, a mining and mineral seat. Unfortunately, the mining has now disappeared but it is still very much a constituency where the extraction of roadstone and building materials is an important part of the local economy. In the pre-Christmas Adjournment debate, I raised concerns about the roadstone coating industry. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead was good enough to say in her winding-up speech that she had been riveted by it and that it had been the highlight of her parliamentary year. Again, I paraphrase a little.

The builders' materials industry and construction products firms located in North-West Leicestershire have some problems. Like every other Member of Parliament, I visit employment bases in my area as frequently as I can, and I am in regular contact with them. Those firms have had a mixed reaction to last week's Budget. They point out that a good number of firms are facing the triple problem of high energy prices, participation in the emissions trading scheme, and an increasing climate change levy, which they are not sure will help companies to become more energy efficient. They are happy about working within the climate change agreements but suggest that it would be more effective to have more firmly enforced climate change agreements, which imposed penalties, instead of a levy that is recycled back into the broader industry.

[David Taylor]

Some of the measures in the Budget that assist firms in my area and other parts of the country are welcome. I am pleased that our Government remain committed to reducing red tape and speeding up the planning system. However, we must wait and see whether the words, which we have heard before—not only from our Government; it is a difficult goal—about reduction of red tape will be followed by effective action.

The fact that there is no significant increase in other businesses taxes has been met with relief. However, the Government need to acknowledge the time required by industry in North-West Leicestershire to absorb past tax increases. I look forward to the Chancellor's setting a clear programme for further easing the tax burden on business rather than simply saying that he is not making it worse.

The Budget had an environmental theme. As someone who was active in environmental pressure groups even before I joined the Labour party, I welcome that and I am pleased that the environment is a Government priority. However, the construction products industry in North-West Leicestershire believes that the measures introduced have fallen short of what is possible. There are some genuine opportunities to provide financial incentives to improve energy efficiency, which would benefit firms in my area. Although plans to ensure that an additional 250,000 homes are properly insulated and the £50 million extra funding for micro-generation are welcome, they are relatively modest measures given the scale of what needs to be achieved. The industry and I would like a clear, long-term strategy for making existing building stock more energy efficient.

Mr. Heath: As a fellow Member for a mining and quarrying constituency, may I bring the hon. Gentleman back to aggregates? Has his constituency experienced the benefits of the aggregates levy in dealing with the after-effects or continuing effects of quarrying? Is he as alarmed as we are in Somerset at any prospect of the proceeds of that levy being nationalised and distributed throughout the country rather than in those areas that are directly affected by quarrying?

David Taylor: Yes, the aggregates levy has made a significant impact on the numerous quarries in North-West Leicestershire. I remember being part of a lobby to the Financial Secretary at its inception, but I have to say that its benefits have been limited and its downside even more significant than was feared when it was introduced.

I want to consider ways in which carbon emissions from existing housing stock can be reduced more rapidly. The 2003 energy White Paper stated that it placed energy efficiency at the heart of UK energy policy and sustainability. The sharp rise in energy costs for domestic consumers and industry in North-West Leicestershire and elsewhere in the past year serves to underline the economic as well as environmental benefits of improved energy efficiency.

The construction products industry is a major user of energy in producing and supplying its goods. It continues to invest heavily in measures to improve energy efficiency and generally enhance environmental performance, as I know from my visits to the numerous sites in my area. The industry has a critical role to play in increasing the energy efficiency of other parts of the UK economy.

Domestic households are responsible for 30 per cent. of total UK energy use. That is the equivalent of approximately 40 million tonnes of carbon a year. Of that, 82 per cent. is used on heating and hot water. More thermally efficient heating systems and better insulated homes can substantially cut those emissions and relieve the pressure on sections of the economy and society that are being asked to bear the burden of reducing carbon emissions.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to intervene on my hon. Friend and I agree with him about domestic premises. However, does he also agree that it is especially riling that many public buildings are unnecessarily hot? I am sure that that has much to do with those of us who work in them getting ill because when we go outside, we immediately feel the worst of the cold. If the heating in public buildings could be turned down by 5° or even 10°, I am sure that we would save an enormous amount of energy. Does my hon. Friend agree?

David Taylor: Yes. If one drives past the Palace of Westminster in the small hours of the morning, it is disappointing to see the extent of the lighting on large parts of the parliamentary estate. Surely we should do more about heating and lighting.

The construction products industry welcomes the wide variety of measures that the Government have introduced in the past seven years to help household energy efficiency and to keep homes warm. The decent homes target has begun to deliver significant improvements in energy efficiency in the social housing sector, and the commitment to the warm front programme has helped many vulnerable private sector households.

Although the current mix of policy measures is lifting many households out of fuel poverty, it does not yet deliver the significant change in the required related housing investment. That must happen if the Government are to secure their target of a reduction of 5 million tonnes of carbon in household emissions in 2010.

The disappointing reduction so far is due to two factors. First, many existing programmes have been primarily directed at lower income households to tackle fuel poverty. I understand and endorse that. Secondly, the greatest environmental problems are emissions from poorly insulated, inefficiently heated and, typically, larger homes. I occupy a similar home. Indeed, such dwellings are often occupied by higher income households for whom energy costs are a small proportion of their expenditure. How do we provide incentives to that large group of people to tackle the energy inefficiency of their homes?

The Government should develop a much more comprehensive strategy for curbing emissions by all households. They should do that by building on the existing programme, which is already tackling fuel poverty. Without a clear strategy and a well resourced approach, industry will continue to bear the brunt of the necessary reductions to deliver the Kyoto and other targets. The domestic and transport sectors must play a bigger part. In all three cases, there will be a beneficial effect for firms such as the construction products industry in North-West Leicestershire and elsewhere, which are in the engine room of the economy. They are pleased to be there but believe that they bear more than their fair share of that target burden.

1.38 pm

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). He was right to say that there is almost no support for combining the police forces in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Northamptonshire and Lincolnshire. I hope that he can influence the Home Secretary, who seems intent on ignoring all local opinion and pressing ahead with those proposals. They were not mentioned just over 12 months ago, when the Government were re-elected.

The Government are becoming notorious for their broken promises, on road congestion, climate change, carbon emissions, pensions, the Child Support Agency, dentists and so on. Indeed, all hon. Members can draw up a list; the Post Office was mentioned earlier. Last year, the Government picked up one of the policies that the Opposition were pursuing with some vigour to reduce council tax for pensioners by £500. The Government tried to trump us and introduced a £200 reduction for pensioners, but only for a year. They did not tell anyone at the time that it was going to be for only one year. I got a leaflet in my flat in London last weekend from the leader of the Labour group in Lambeth council. The leaflet said:

"We will:

Press the Government to provide more help for pensioners to pay their council tax bills."

It is a pity that they did not try to influence the Chancellor before he made his Budget speech.

The main reason for my speech today is that I want to talk about some specific issues that are important to my constituency and to the people of West Derbyshire. For some years, I have been pressing the Government to resurface the A50, which is a very heavily used concrete road that links the M1 and the M6. I was delighted when, in April 2003, I received a letter from the then Transport Minister, the right hon. Member for Warley (Mr. Spellar), saying:

"I am sure that you will be pleased that the A50 Doveridge Bypass has been given a high priority and, subject to the availability of funds, is programmed for the period 2004/5" for resurfacing. I then got a letter from the Secretary of State for Transport to confirm what the Minister had said. In a letter dated 22 July 2004, he said:

"There are four sections of concrete road along the A50 Stoke to Derby link road. Resurfacing of the Doveridge Bypass could be done in financial year 2006/07" once finalised budget decisions have been taken.

Hon. Members can therefore imagine my sorrow, and that of all those who are affected by this very noisy road, when I received a letter from the Minister of State, Department for Transport, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) in June 2005, in which he says:

"I am sorry that the Highways Agency is not able to take forward this resurfacing work over the next three years. Resource funding for transport came under particular pressure following the last spending review. Following detailed scrutiny of departmental and the Highways Agency's budgets, Ministers"— in the past, these decisions have been taken by the Highways Agency—

"agreed that the resurfacing of concrete roads ahead of maintenance need, for noise reasons, would not be allocated funding."

So there we have it. It was not the Highways Agency but Ministers who decided that the resurfacing would not happen, and I want to hold the Government to account. For two and a half years, we had promises that it was going to happen, and that we would get the benefit of the road resurfacing. Then, lo and behold, mysteriously, just after the general election, we were told that the promises that were made before the general election no longer held any weight. That is very disappointing to my constituents, and to all the people in Doveridge and the surrounding area. It is not only Doveridge that is affected.

I have the honour to represent one of the most beautiful constituencies in the country. The Peak district attracts more than 20 million visitors each year. It is known as the lungs of England, and is within an hour's drive of 60 per cent. of the UK population. One of the biggest issues in the area is that of quarrying. A few months ago, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) came up to look at a problem at Backdale quarry, and he was very sympathetic to the case that the Peak park was making that a stop notice should be served on that development. Indeed, he encouraged and helped the Peak park along the way.

So it was with great disappointment that I heard yesterday that a public inquiry into the issue, which had already been postponed once, has been cancelled just a few weeks before it was due to start. I wonder why that particular public inquiry would be cancelled at short notice. Unfortunately, it is true to say that this comes after the Deputy Prime Minister declared that the stop order preventing quarrying at Longstone Edge was null and void. The park authority had issued the stop order to the quarry firm in January. The decision to overturn the stop order comes after a similar order by a local authority imposed on a company in Wales was thrown out by a judge.

The people in the Calver area have been waiting for a determination from this public inquiry for quite some time, and it is very disappointing that yet again the stop order has been overturned. Between 2003 and December 2005, some 573,000 tonnes of limestone were quarried in Backdale. Only 11,500 tonnes from that extraction were for fluorspar, which is what is allowed to be extracted under the present regulations. That is why the inquiry was due to take place, but it has been cancelled yet again. This is causing great disquiet throughout the Peak district. It is time for a serious re-evaluation of this case, so that lessons can be learned for other parts of the country.

[Mr. Patrick McLoughlin]

We have been assured for the past 12 months or so that the single farm payments would be made on time. Indeed, the latest edition of Farming Link from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs states:

"Full payments on track for farmers", and that those payments will be made by the end of March. I believe that the end of March is tomorrow, and I do not think that that target will be met. Even the Government now accept that there is no chance of that happening.

This is causing devastating problems for the rural economy. The payments have been made in Wales and Scotland, but because of the particularly complicated system introduced by the Secretary of State, England is suffering from an almost complete computer failure and farmers are not going to get the money that they were expecting. This is causing serious concern in the rural areas of my constituency. This morning, I spoke to a young farmer from Ashbourne, Mr. Cotterell, who told me that the Department was full of chaos and confusion. That attitude towards DEFRA is now recognised throughout the agriculture industry.

Mr. Heath: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman is raising this issue, which is important for many rural areas, including my own. Does he agree that there was always an argument for making an interim payment to farmers before detailed calculations were made? In the light of the debacle at the Rural Payments Agency, that argument is now overwhelming. Those payments must be made if businesses are to survive.

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. All of us who represent farming constituencies or rural areas understand the problems that this is causing.

The Government's apparent disregard for the rural economy is the most dispiriting thing for my constituents. I have seen many thousands of farmers, and they also want to know when the Government are going to take some action on bovine tuberculosis. The Government's record is one of promises of action, followed by inaction. Yet another consultation will not inspire the confidence that they have the will to tackle the disease effectively. Meanwhile, the disease is spreading. The number of cattle slaughtered in Derbyshire under the TB measures rose from 57 in 1998 to 608 in 2005. The number of new confirmed bovine TB herd incidents increased from seven in 1998 to 66 in 2005. The cost to the taxpayer nationally has increased from £17 million in 1997 to more than £90 million in 2004–05. The Government have spent eight years delaying what I accept are difficult decisions. Unless they make those decisions soon, however, badgers, cattle and farmers will continue to suffer.

There is genuine concern in the rural economy about the attitude of the Government to agriculture, and about the attitude of the Secretary of State to the farmers whose interests she is supposed to look after. I have had correspondence from Mrs. Pilkington, who farms in Hartington, and asks, "Where is the money?" The shambles that is the Rural Payments Agency is a disgrace. What makes it more of a disgrace is that the Government have been warned consistently by Committees of the House that there was a problem. Not long ago, the Minister responsible dismissed the report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, and said that everything was fine. Sadly, we now know the truth, and it is not fine.

David Taylor: As one of the two rapporteurs on this issue from the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to exempt from his sweeping condemnation of the Rural Payments Agency the middling and ordinary staff who are working their hardest under the most difficult of circumstances, with a computer system that fails to deliver? They are not responsible for this problem.

Mr. McLoughlin: I totally accept that point. I attended the debate about those problems in Westminster Hall, which the hon. Gentleman also attended, and I acknowledge the work that he has done and the time that he has spent considering this matter. I am not blaming the staff, but I am blaming the management, and obviously, the Secretary of State has blamed the management, because she sacked the chief executive. It seems that the responsibility ends with the chief executive, and not with the Ministers who were responsible, I am afraid, for ignoring the advice given by this House and instead listening to officials. There is confusion about what the two ends of the Department are up to. As I have said, many farmers have contacted me, including one, Mr. Cotterell, who said that the trouble is that there is a 31 March deadline for farm waste grants, and unless he can have a confirmed payment from the Rural Payments Agency, he cannot apply for the other grant. It seems that neither of the two sections in the Department knows what the other is doing.

Those are some of the problems that my constituents are facing as a result of Government promises. When the time came for road resurfacing to happen, a letter arrived saying that it had been reviewed, it was not affordable and it was not going to go ahead. In the Rural Payments Agency, there is chaos. Bovine TB and other issues affecting my constituents leave them frustrated. They believe that the Government do not care about the rural environment, and if they did care, they lost interest a long time ago. Those serious problems face many ordinary people in my constituency, and I hope that the Government take measures to put them right in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my right hon. Friend the Opposition Chief Whip, and I certainly endorse his remarks about the failure of the Government to take appropriate care of and interest in the rural economy. I think that I exempt the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) from that. The problem is that he does not have sufficient clout in his Department, and his Department does not have sufficient clout within the Government, to ensure that the needs of the rural economy are properly taken care of.

The contributions this afternoon, particularly that of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), have demonstrated the value of this kind of debate. It is a great pity that there are only three such debates a year. The Deputy Leader of the House and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) are responsible for that issue, unlike most of the issues raised in this debate. May I suggest to them that we should repeat this kind of debate whenever the business of the House collapses? If the business of the House collapses at six o'clock, and we are not due to finish until 10, we should have a debate of this kind, in which Members who perhaps have not been called at Question Time and have not had the opportunity to have a Westminster Hall debate or to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or that of Mr. Speaker or the other Deputy Speakers, could raise matters. There could be a member of the Government on the Front Bench taking note, perhaps with messages sent back to the appropriate Departments, or with the Departments watching the debate on television, so that they can send notes to the member of the Government on the Front Bench, who can be inspired to respond to the issues that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House think are important on that day. It is far better to deal with these issues immediately than to save them up until the end of term or to wait in the hope of catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In making that recommendation, may I also apologise to the Deputy Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in case I am unable to attend for the wind-ups of this debate? I hope that I shall be able to attend, but, obviously, it depends on the duration of the debate, and I have business elsewhere later.

First, I want to follow up an issue that I raised in business questions, and which I believe that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) raised in an earlier business questions: who takes responsibility for the health service? The Leader of the House responded in business questions today that responsibility for the health service is divided between the Secretary of State and local managers. He said rightly that the Secretary of State cannot possibly take responsibility for every individual decision of local managers up and down the country. I would accept that, were it not for the fact that the Secretary of State appoints the people who appoint those local managers, instead of the local managers being answerable locally. Indeed, the Secretary of State intervenes at almost every conceivable stage in the local management of the health service, by setting targets, trying to abolish postcode prescribing, raising salaries, imposing the European working time directive and a range of other methods, which make it much more difficult for local managers to manage their health service in a way that is acceptable to local people.

As one might expect, I want to give as an example what has happened on the Isle of Wight in recent years. Shortly after I was elected, I was presented with a document that set out the needs of the island's health economy for more money. It is generally accepted that we are fortunate to have St. Mary's hospital on the Isle of Wight, largely owing to the pressing and hard work of my predecessor, Barry Field, and of course to a Conservative Government who agreed to its rebuilding. It is a district general hospital that serves between a third and a half of the population normally served by a district general hospital, and is funded accordingly.

It is understood that living on an island has certain disadvantages, although they are hugely outweighed by the advantages, but one of those disadvantages is that not all services are available as easily as one might expect. However, the Government have been pouring on to my local hospital additional responsibilities that do not necessarily result in better patient care. The hospital already had other responsibilities, and it takes a certain number of people to man a maternity unit regardless of the number of births with which it deals. We cannot have a hospital, or an island, without a maternity unit—we cannot expect a population to survive without one. It is largely because of our need for a maternity unit that we still have the hospital, because of the other services attached.

However, the need for a maternity unit cannot be measured simply by the number of births. It must be measured more in terms of the basic need to man the unit, and I fear that the system that allocates resources between hospitals does not take account of that basic need. Another example is an accident and emergency unit which requires a consultant to be available at all times. Owing to the imposition of the European working time directive on my local hospital, we need to employ more consultants, without more resources, in order to provide that unit.

The position has been recognised for a long time by my local health managers. For months, indeed years, I have been saying to them, "Come on, we must make the case for more resources to the Government." They have put me off and put me off, on a number of occasions. For what they consider to be good reasons, they have said, "We are going to try a different approach. We are going to try to economise, try to introduce efficiency savings, try to displace some services to the mainland, and try to amalgamate." I am pleased to say that the amalgamation was agreed earlier this week, between the primary care trust and the hospital trust. Let me say for the benefit of the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), although he is no longer in the Chamber, that the new set-up will take on adult social services in the fullness of time.

That shows that such things can be done. It seems to me, though, that managers in the health service—and, indeed, chairmen and directors—have received the message that it is inappropriate to make representations through a Member of Parliament for changes in funding arrangements. That is what I understand from what I have been told. There appears to be no appetite—certainly there has been no appetite in the strategic health authority or the Department of Health—for difficult messages conveyed by local managers through their Members of Parliament. Managers may press them through the bureaucracy of the national health service, but if they go through Members of Parliament they are likely to have their heads chopped off.

I consider that unacceptable. Sir Ian Carruthers, who was chief executive of my strategic health authority and that of Dorset and Somerset, has now been elevated to the post of acting chief executive of the national health service, but I am assured by the new acting chief executive of Hampshire and Isle of Wight SHA, Eileen Spiller, that there is no such imposition on local managers. She says that they are free to give evidence to Members of Parliament, which they may use in the House and elsewhere, on how the allocation system, for instance, should be changed. It has not happened, though. The evidence is there, and can be obtained. Certainly it could be obtained five years ago, so there is no reason why it cannot be updated and obtained now. It does not seem to be acceptable, however, for it to be produced.

We hear that in the current year 200 staff have been lost to St Mary's hospital and Isle of Wight Healthcare NHS Trust. Today, I think for the first time, it has been admitted by officials of the trust that no further cuts can be entertained without a significant reduction in the quality of patient care available on the island. That information was on the Isle of Wight radio website today. I have concluded that it was possible for the trust officials to say that partly because they have made as many cuts as they can, but partly because Sir Ian Carruthers has been moved to a higher post. The acting chief executive of Hampshire and Isle of Wight SHA assures me that bad news may be presented by senior health service managers.

There are, of course, bits of bad news that I too present from time to time, and I thank those who provide me with that information. An example of bad news has been, in the past, the lack of NHS dentists on the Isle of Wight. I must thank the Minister of State, Department of Health—the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton)—first for admitting that it was unacceptable for people to have to cross the Solent to find NHS dentists, secondly for coming to the island and ensuring that real efforts were made to appoint more of them, and thirdly for allowing, or perhaps ensuring, the appointment of 14 more of them over the past 12 months. That is excellent. The only problem is that the number of people who are no longer registered with NHS dentists has not fallen over those 12 months but risen, because more and more dentists are leaving the NHS.

Taken together, the 24,000 people who have registered their need for NHS dentists on the Isle of Wight and the 36,000 or so who are already on NHS dentists' lists make up only half the population of my constituency. So half the population have no prospect of securing NHS dentists, 30,000-odd have NHS dentists, and, we are told, 24,000 are likely to obtain NHS dentists—not while those 14 are being appointed, not within 12 months of their being appointed, not, in fact, until two years have elapsed since their appointment.

That is an entirely unsatisfactory level of service to my constituents. It reflects very badly on the Prime Minister that he made a promise back in 1998 or 1999 on which he could not deliver. He should have checked. He made a promise that by the end of 2001, everyone would be able to have access to an NHS dentist. He could not deliver on the promise, and he should have known that when he made it. It was a promise made either flippantly or with malice, to mislead. I am sure that it could not have been the latter, and it reflects ill on the Prime Minister if he made it in other circumstances.

The most damaging cut, potentially, that my NHS trust has made over the past 12 months is the withdrawal of payment of fares to people who need radiotherapy. The fares were paid to enable them to cross the Solent and attend a hospital in Southampton. The health service estimated the saving at a meagre £38,000, which could have made the difference between people undergoing radiotherapy and not being able to afford it.

I am pleased to say that Isle of Wight council—which, as I said earlier, is now under Conservative control—stepped in, and provided money to meet the shortfall. It really is disgraceful, however, that in days when Ministers talk of equal access to NHS services, those who are poorest cannot have access because they cannot afford it. It really is disgraceful that pensioners cannot have access to radiotherapy services. It is disgraceful that they cannot be accompanied by their husbands or wives when they attend for such services, because they cannot afford the journey.

The more the health service is centralised and, indeed, the more choice the Government give patients—I accept that that is a good thing—the more people will fail to gain access to the services that they want or need. I believe that the Government should address that issue before appointing new health service bureaucrats and setting up new health service quangos.

I am very proud of the work that the Isle of Wight council has done, not only in stepping in to fill that breach, but in several other areas. I do not often boast about my local authority—I did not have the opportunity to do so until May last year—but, to paraphrase my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson), I went to the trouble of helping the Conservatives get elected, so I am entitled to boast about them. They inherited a near to failing local authority with a near to failing education system—

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Liberal Democrats!

Mr. Turner: It was indeed run by the Liberal Democrats, who led the Isle of Wight council for more than 20 years. My colleagues on the council, led by Councillor Andy Sutton, have taken determined steps to improve the quality of service, not only for 12 months but for the next four years. I congratulate them warmly on what they have achieved.

First, my colleagues have put considerably more resources into education and adult care. Secondly, they have paid the cost of cross-Solent travel for many elderly patients. Thirdly, they have extended the Government's scheme for free off-peak public transport for pensioners, so that now the over-65s on the Isle of Wight can travel by train or bus anywhere on the island free of charge at any hour of the day or night. Fourthly, they have introduced a 50p standard bus fare for anyone under the age of 19, which is a great improvement on the £2.50 or so that it cost until recently to travel from Newport to Shanklin.

That 50p bus fare will not only transform the access that young people have to schools, colleges and recreational facilities, but will save lives. We have a sad record of too many young people dying on our roads. I congratulate my local bus company, Southern Vectis, which is introducing buses that run until 4 am on Fridays and Saturdays between Newport and the other main towns, so that young people can now travel by bus late at night. That will get them out of the habit of sharing cars late at night. There are few things more dangerous than several young men sharing a car, except possibly several young men and young women sharing a car.

Finally, the council has introduced an all-island £50 parking permit that entitles islanders to park anywhere on the island at any time of the year. That is a huge achievement and I congratulate all 36 Conservative councillors, especially Councillor Andy Sutton, on their first 12 months. As I told the Minister when I attended a meeting with him and Councillor Sutton, I did not believe that things could be turned round as quickly as they have been. There was a mountain to be climbed on the Isle of Wight. We are still in the foothills of that mountain, but in the past the leaders of the council displayed no vision, hope or direction. At least now the leader of the council has his eyes fixed firmly on the summit of that mountain, and we are climbing out of the foothills.

2.13 pm

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate, which—as my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) said—is a useful opportunity to make a wide-ranging speech. Perhaps there might be opportunities to increase the number of such debates.

I also wish to echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) about a debate on foreign affairs. We could discuss not only Iraq and Afghanistan, but other matters. This week is the seventh anniversary of the bombing of Yugoslavia. Without repeating the arguments about whether that was right or wrong, that part of the world has largely been forgotten. Although talks are taking place to establish the final status of Kosovo, it is a shame that we have not really had the opportunity to discuss the present situation. Thanks to Mr. Speaker, I managed to obtain a debate in Westminster Hall recently, but I was not able to go over the subject fully and other people did not have the opportunity to join in.

I make a plea to Ministers, right hon. and hon. Members and the media to visit Kosovo and see what is happening. The pendulum has swung the other way and an apartheid system is operating, with the few Serbs remaining living in small, enclosed areas that have to be guarded by troops. Even more worrying is the complete destruction of the centuries-old culture, with the razing of churches, monasteries, graveyards and cemeteries, some of which have been turned into car parks and some into football pitches, seemingly in an attempt to try to deny the history and culture of the area. Those are difficult issues, but we do not do the peace of Europe a service by trying to ignore them.

One of the most pressing problems for my constituency, as for many others, is the health service. The problems of gaining access to NHS dentistry have already been mentioned, and Uxbridge has exactly the same experiences. More worryingly, Hillingdon primary care trust has one of the largest deficits in the country. I have to say that I was not impressed when the previous chief executive fell on his sword and a part-timer was appointed, who was at the same time the chief executive for Harrow—which had its own problems—and had to split his time between the two. That has now been resolved and we have another full-time chief executive, but the problems continue.

I am not surprised at some of the goings on, because I have taken a great interest in the fiasco of the Paddington health campus, on which millions of pounds of taxpayers' money have been wasted. The National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee will look into that and I do not wish to prejudge their findings, but it is a matter of record that the Department of Health and the strategic health authority obstinately refused to accept that their vision was unworkable and unaffordable. In the meantime, huge amounts of money were wasted, and that is just one example in which I have personally become involved. When I think of all the money that was spent on consultants and so on, I am not entirely surprised to learn of the deficits around the country in health services. It is not that the Government have not put the money in: it is how it is used and, in many cases, wasted.

Another problem to the north of my constituency, but which affects my constituents directly, is the threat of withdrawal of cancer services from Mount Vernon hospital. Like Harefield hospital, Mount Vernon is world renowned and much loved, but it is proposed to send people to Hatfield for treatment, even though the site for the Hatfield hospital has not yet been identified or planning consent obtained. It is obvious that the travelling time will be a huge problem for anyone suffering from cancer and needing radiotherapy or chemotherapy.

Mrs. May: The concern about the closure of cancer services at Mount Vernon hospital to which my hon. Friend refers is shared by those of my constituents who are asked to go there for treatment. Indeed, I have received a number of letters expressing worry about the proposal.

Mr. Randall: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for that intervention, which emphasises the problem that exists. Those responsible for these decisions seem not to understand the real needs of our constituents.

A perennial problem that is unfortunately on the minds of most of my constituents is the potential expansion of Heathrow through the creation of a third runway. I am delighted to say that the political parties in Hillingdon and the various other local boroughs are still united on this issue. My concern is that the Government are not taking aviation emissions seriously, although I have to say that that would probably be true of any Government at the moment. I was interested to hear on the "Today" programme this morning that the Conservative party policy group is taking this issue seriously. I hope to make my contribution to the debate, to ensure that people understand just how serious an issue this is. We really must have cross-party consensus on it, because the decisions that have to be taken will not be universally popular. The Government and the political parties have got to take a real lead.

Heathrow does of course bring benefits in terms of jobs, but it is a major polluter. Another effect locally is that it brings various people into this country who are seeking asylum, and we accept that responsibility. Some two years ago, the London borough of Hillingdon was asked to take responsibility for unaccompanied child asylum seekers. As a result of the "Hillingdon judgment", Hillingdon has financial responsibility for such people up to the age of 25. Of course, that imposes a great financial burden on the local authority, which has, it is true, been recompensed through national Government resources. We accept the situation, which is the result of our geographical position, and we are prepared to take on such responsibility, but we do not think it fair for council tax payers' bills to be increased as a result.

Two years ago, the Home Office and the Department for Education and Skills were not providing enough money to enable us to deal with this issue. The Home Office quickly came up with the goods after representations were made by a cross-party delegation. Eventually, the DFES sorted out the situation, and we thought that we had an agreement; then, it changed its mind about how much it was prepared to provide. I have examined the relevant papers and I am trying to be fair on this issue; in fighting for Hillingdon, I want to ensure that we are in the right. The local authority had set its council tax for this year, so it cannot do anything about that; indeed, had it not done so, it would probably have been capped. However, as a result of the DFES's decision, the local authority has had to issue redundancy notices to some 250 civic centre staff in Uxbridge.

It is unquestionably unfair to blame the asylum seekers, the civic centre workers or the local authority for this situation. I hope that the DFES realises that it has an obligation to provide the money promised under the agreement reached. I need not spell out the possible impact on what is a diverse and largely happy population in Hillingdon. The population is fairly settled, but a development such as this could be the match that ignites something.

I get a lot of letters about the increasing intrusion of the state into our private lives. An increasing number of closed circuit television cameras are taking our pictures while we drive, for example. We are assured that such measures have been adopted for good reasons, and we are perhaps prepared to accept some of them. There was talk some time ago of council tax inspectors being able to come into our homes. I think that we were assured that that would not happen, but one never knows with this Government.

Many people write to me saying that they are getting demands for the payment of congestion charges, parking tickets and speeding tickets on behalf of people who do not in fact live at their address. I can speak with a degree of knowledge on this issue. Only the other day, a constituent of mine—she is also my mother—sent me some letters that she had received from the Metropolitan police, claiming that she had been speeding. It is unlikely that she would do so in her wheelchair, at the age of 86. Presumably, somebody has registered their vehicle with the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency using her address. Her case will of course be looked into, but given that this is an increasing problem, I want to know how rigorously it is being dealt with. It is one thing to say, "Don't worry Mrs. Randall, we will sort it out," but are these people being pursued, or being allowed to get away with it?

When the other Mrs. Randall in my life—my wife—tried to get a new number plate, she was told that she must bring in her registration details because lots of people are asking for new number plates so that, when they are caught by speed cameras or incur the congestion charge, they do not get fined. This is a serious problem, which, ironically, is perhaps the result of increasing surveillance, and I would like the Home Office and the Department for Transport to deal with it.

I look forward to the 2012 Olympic games, of which I have been a supporter since the early days, before it became too popular. My sporting days are, sadly, slightly over. However, in what I took as an early April fool's day joke, but which apparently was not, I received an email from the parliamentary rugby team telling me that I had been selected to play against the New Zealand XV. I suspect that I received that message because some Labour Members wanted me to go to casualty.

The council tax bills that have just gone out carry a small surcharge for the Olympics. Many people in west London are concerned that they will not get much in return, as Londoners will not get reduced-price tickets for the various events. Another annoyance concerns the restoration of the old Uxbridge lido. Its outdoor nature will be retained, but an indoor swimming pool and a leisure centre will be added. Hillingdon borough has enough money for a 25m pool, but we would like the lido to have an Olympic-size, 50m pool. The official bodies responsible for British swimming say that such a pool is desperately needed in west London.

We were told that there was a good chance that success in the Olympic bid would lead to some extra funds for the lido restoration. That extra money would make it possible to go for the larger pool—even though the local authority would prefer to stick to the 25m size, as it is cheaper to maintain. Somehow, though, the money has not appeared, from any source. All the help seems to be going to other areas of London.

That is a shame, and a wasted opportunity. Many constituents write to me to complain about the money being spent on the games, and I should be delighted to be able to tell them that at least we had something to show for it. I hope that the matter can be drawn to the attention of Ministers at the Department of Culture, Media and Sport, although from time to time I correspond with them about the matter.

All hon. Members will agree about the need to provide more youth and leisure facilities to reduce antisocial behaviour. I accept that the people one would like to get off the streets are the ones least likely to join in such activities, but the approach is worth considering and I want to commend some of the things that are going on.

This weekend, I shall accompany my eldest son on a rugby tour, and I shall do the same with my daughter the following weekend. I shall not say where we are going, in case the paparazzi follow in hopes of getting a shot of me in a poncho and a sombrero. I have discovered that team sports are incredibly good for bonding people and giving them a sense of responsibility. The more I see, the more I want to spread the word.

The House may not be aware of the softer, more feminine side of my character. My youngest daughter is 10 and keen on sport, and that has led me to try to promote women's sport. I want it to be more prominent than at present. The other day, the England women's rugby team won the grand slam, and I am delighted to say that I was lucky enough to be able to see it—as opposed to going to Twickenham and watching the men fail.

England's women cricketers won their version of the Ashes last year, and women are succeeding at other games, including football. The House of Commons should do more to promote and give equal status to women's sport. I have to be careful in this matter, as I understand that, while some sports like to refer to women, others prefer to call them ladies.

I have given the House a quick run-around of some of the problems that I have encountered, and my thoughts on them. I do not often get an opportunity to make some of the points that I have raised, but I want to remind the Government that we are approaching Easter. It is a time of renewal, rebirth and hope. Labour Members may want to whistle the ditty "Always Look on the Bright Side of Life" by the Monty Python team as they return to their constituencies, but they should also remember that the first line of the poem "The Waste Land" by T.S. Eliot tells them that "April is the cruellest month".

2.33 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Before we adjourn and leave the House for the Easter recess, I want to ask Ministers to deal with an issue that is important to my constituents. It concerns the private finance initiative scheme for the Mid Essex Hospital Services trust, based on Broomfield hospital.

The scheme is a magnificent project worth over £100 million, and has been in hand for some years. The plan is to close an old Victorian hospital in the centre of Chelmsford and to move some of the facilities to the Broomfield hospital on the outskirts of the town. That will make it an even better local hospital, with state-of-the-art facilities and equipment. We will see a rebuilt and regenerated accident and emergency department, a new pathology department, a new children's ward and improved maternity services. It is a scheme that is logical on health and patient care grounds as well as financial grounds. Everyone in the mid-Essex area supports it.

A great deal of work has been done by trust officials, consultants and medical practitioners to put the scheme in position. We have been awaiting the final approval of the PFI scheme. We were promised that the approval would be given in October last year. October became November, November became "before Christmas", Christmas came and went and the new year came and went and still delays through bureaucracy meant that we did not get our final approval.

We then discovered on 26 January that the Treasury had changed the ground rules and that a freeze was put on all PFI schemes subject to a reappraisal. The Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) told me in a written answer on 23 March:

"We announced on 26 January 2006 that all trusts would need to confirm their capital investment plans through a reappraisal process, including where applicable private finance initiative (PFI) schemes. The aim of this process is to ensure that all schemes properly take account of the current reforms to the national health service such as choice, a movement of services" and so on. I hope that you noted, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I emphasised the words "all schemes".

It is slightly surprising that a few weeks ago Barts and the London NHS Trust, which had been subject to the same freeze and the same reappraisal, was given approval. We are awaiting the guidelines from the Government for the basis of that reappraisal. We were promised that the instructions for the guidelines would be issued to the trusts by 31 March. That is tomorrow. As of this morning, the trusts had not received it. We have to wait for the guidelines for the reappraisal before we can comply. The House should remember that that applies to all trusts and all schemes.

About two or three weeks ago Barts managed to get its PFI scheme fast-tracked and approved. I am not the sort of evil person who would suggest that there was a correlation between that decision and the vote that was pending in the House of Commons on the Second Reading of the Education and Inspections Bill. I know that people such as the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) and the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) and others in the east end of London were causing the Government a degree of difficulty with regard to that vote, but I am not the sort of person who would suggest that the application was fast-tracked to try to ease the passage of the Bill, although I suspect that some less charitable hon. Friends of mine may have drawn that conclusion.

I do not begrudge Barts approval of its PFI scheme. What concerns me is that the Broomfield scheme has not been approved, given that it has been waiting since October for approval and it is not its fault that it did not get approval before 26 January when the Treasury issued new rules. It was due to slippage and bureaucracy that the trust did not manage to get it; the Department of Health could not find the time to approve it.

There is a knock-on effect. It will possibly take some considerable time to get that approval. I am heartened that in the same answer the Minister said:

"Departmental officials will shortly be writing to all trusts" about schemes such as those I mentioned, although it looks as though they will miss that deadline, which is hardly encouraging. She continued:

"Schemes such as the one at the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust, which are closer to financial close, will be focused on first."

That is welcome news, although it is disappointing that the trust has been put in limbo due to the Treasury changes. However, given that the scheme was ready for approval last October, I do not understand why it has to go through all that rigmarole again.

There is another knock-on effect—the cost of the scheme. Delay has financial implications. I asked the Minister about that but the answer was somewhat disingenuous:

"The trust may incur some additional costs in carrying out this work, but this will be more than offset by the savings which will be realised by the reappraisal exercise."—[Official Report, 23 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 577–78W.]

That is comforting, although most of us do not think that there is much to reappraise, because the scheme is reaching conclusion and is now awaiting approval.

Despite the Minister's golden words, there are considerable knock-on effects, but it is a sad fact of life that I cannot disclose them to the House because the information is commercially confidential. I have a vague idea about the cost, so it is slightly disingenuous for the Minister to gloss over it in a written answer by spinning the line that the reappraisal will ultimately bring financial benefits when everybody knows that there will be none at all. I only hope that the Minister's answer was not code and that it does not really mean that there will be a decision to cut part of the scheme after the reappraisal. That would be a saving, albeit in a narrow, legal sense; the scheme would cost less, because there would be less of it.

Will the Minister draw my concerns to the attention of the relevant Health Minister so that something can be done to fast-track a decision? The scheme is excellent and will benefit not only my constituents but those of my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) who has worked as hard, if not harder, than me to persuade the Department of Health to expedite the matter.

I want to raise another matter: an absolute scandal involving the use of stolen or false identity to avoid the consequences when people break the law, especially with regard to road traffic offences, something to which my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) alluded. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) has worked on the matter over a number of months and I pay tribute to him for his involvement.

In my constituency, we have a particular problem: 25 Duke street. It is an innocuous-looking building in the centre of Chelmsford, but in fact it is a mass-mailing address. It is notorious with Essex and Bedford police—people from south Bedfordshire are particularly attracted to the services offered by 25 Duke street—and with Hertfordshire police, as an address that people use to register vehicles. Mr. Smith at 25 Duke street looks perfectly viable. Who is to know that it is actually a convenience address? The advantage is that Mr. Smith can speed past safety cameras, jump red lights and commit with impunity other road traffic offences caught on camera. When a letter arrives at the address setting out the offence and demanding a fine, there is no one to collect it. Officials cannot speak to Mr. Smith if they call at 25 Duke street, because it is not a residential address; it is a mailbox address.

I have had the benefit of being shown photographs of young people joyriding past speed cameras, using the middle finger on their right hands with impunity to show what they think of the system. I have explained their way of avoiding paying any fine, getting any points and—ultimately, if they are convicted often enough—losing their licences. Like any so-called good little wheeze, most of those involved are serial offenders, and it is amazing how often people can run up speeding fines or jump red lights if they know that no one will identify them or their residence from the photograph that has been taken, or hold them to account for breaking the law.

To my mind, there is something very wrong with such behaviour, and we should consider not simply the morality of breaking the law by speeding or whatever with impunity, but the fact that local authorities are deprived of the money that they are owed because of the offences that have been caused. That money could be ploughed back into road safety measures. I cannot understand why such things are tolerated.

I have tabled questions to the relevant Minister in the past two weeks to ask how many road traffic offences have been caused in that manner by people who are registered at 25 Duke street. I was slighted surprised that he replied that he could not give me the information because of the Data Protection Act 1998. I was not asking for the names of the people who were committing those offences; I was simply asking for the number involved. When I asked other factual questions of that nature—not about the names of the individuals, but about the numbers of offences and the amount of money that may have been lost to the local authority and the state—I was also slightly surprised to be told that all that was covered by the Data Protection Act 1998. When I also asked what type of offence had been caused, I was also told that that was not something with which the Government could supply me.

I am slightly surprised. If one is an avid reader of Hansard and one reads the in-depth and knowledgeable speeches made by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire—I recommend those speeches to my hon. Friends—one finds that he has been given information for his constituency, not specifically for 25 Duke street, about the offences that have been picked up on camera that have not been pursued because the address given for the vehicle is a mailing address or bogus. Why can such information be given to my hon. Friend, who is a law-abiding colleague—for example, by Bedfordshire police, I assume—whereas the Government cannot give it to me, because they say that doing so would breach the Data Protection Act 1998?

I was horrified at the answer when I asked the relevant Minister in a written question how the Government proposed to change the law to block that loophole. I would have accepted it if they had said that it is a very difficult issue and they must consider how to draft legislation that would effectively deal with that specific problem, but not at all: they simply said that they had no plan to change the law. So the problem will continue, unless hon. Members, such as my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire and others, keep pressing the Government, because it is wrong and it is a scandal. Given the irresponsibility of the individuals involved, particularly the young people—they are speeding, jumping red lights and so on—they could well threaten their own lives or injure themselves. Equally important, if not more important to some people, they could threaten the lives of or injure innocent people who become caught up in their antisocial and illegal behaviour.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I can update my hon. Friend a little on the issue that he is talking about, which was also mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall). This morning, I spent 45 minutes with the head of road policing from the Association of Chief Police Officers, who is seized of the problem. He assured me that, within the next year to 18 months or so, he will use his best endeavours to ensure that some remedies to the problem are on the statute book. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) for giving the problem further publicity.

Mr. Burns: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend and I am reassured that ACPO has given that commitment. My only disappointment is that Transport Ministers will not give it. As he knows as well as I do, sadly, the only way, realistically, one can make a change to the law in Parliament is through Government legislation or a private Member's Bill that the Government either support or are not prepared to block. I hope that, through his initiatives and lobbying, through ACPO and through the Minister relaying our concerns to the Department for Transport—and equally importantly, because Whips are the nuts and bolts that keep the system working, through the Whip, who has been listening very attentively—something can be done, in a reasonable but realistic way, to put an end to an abuse that not only costs money, but increases and to some extent encourages irresponsible driving, accidents, deaths and personal injuries.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Before the House adjourns for the Easter recess, I wish to raise a number of points. I apologise in advance for my voice. I do not sound like this because someone has made an unsuccessful attempt to strangle me; it is simply that I have a sore throat.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on his speech and, in particular, join him in welcoming the Olympic games to London in 2012. I know that Members have different views on that, but I certainly intend to make sure that Southend is at the heart of the celebrations. We intend to get the pier rebuilt in time so that it can be part of the opening celebrations.

I also want to take up my hon. Friend's very valid point about ladies playing sport. I have a 14-year-old girl who plays No. 9 for Arsenal. I can cope with her playing for Arsenal, because, although I support West Ham and Southend, it is a very successful ladies' team. He is right that we do not celebrate the success of women in sport enough. That is why it was disappointing that the BBC news did not report on the excellent progress of the ladies' football team in making their way towards the World cup finals.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I am interested to hear my hon. Friend's comments about women's football. They give me the opportunity to tell him and the House that the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, which I chair, announced yesterday that it will hold a one-day inquiry into women's football, where I hope that we can address some of the issues that he has raised.

Mr. Amess: There we are. I am pushing at an open door, as far as my hon. Friend is concerned. That is wonderful news and I shall certainly make time, if not to be there in person to observe the inquiry, to read the evidence. I congratulate him on that.

I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who was a distinguished member of the Health Committee. I have just returned from Stockholm, where the Committee is doing important work examining independent treatment centres. He will be interested to know that yesterday Committee members had a robust debate on PFI initiatives and it was felt that one was slightly more successful in having PFI programmes endorsed by the Government if one happened to be a Labour Member of Parliament. Both my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) and I felt that if one was a Conservative Member of Parliament—as we obviously are—one did not have much of a look in. My hon. Friends the Members for West Chelmsford and for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) have a very strong case as far as Broomfield hospital is concerned and I am sure that the excellent Minister who will be replying to the debate will get the right answer from the Department of Health.

The Minister knows that I have raised on many occasions the situation of my constituent, Majid Narwaz. I am delighted to tell the House that I was at Heathrow airport last month to welcome him and his two fellow detainees back from Cairo. They had been sentenced to five years' imprisonment on absolutely trumped-up charges. They were tortured while in prison and what went on was deplorable. I pay tribute to the Foreign Office and the British embassy in Cairo for working as hard as possible to try to get my constituent released. I know that the Prime Minister takes regular holidays in Egypt, so I am sure that he took the opportunity to raise the matter with President Mubarak whenever he could.

I am delighted that Majid has been reunited with his wife, son and parents, but not delighted about the disgraceful reception to which the three young men were treated at Heathrow airport. I am mystified about what happened because in the endless debates in which I spoke about the matter, the answers to questions that I asked, and meetings with Ministers, it was clearly indicated to me—from the Foreign Secretary down—that the British Government agreed that the three men had been treated badly. I thus naturally assumed, in all innocence, that there would be a welcome reception for them at Heathrow airport, so I took the trouble, as I was instructed to do, to ensure only that they were escorted on to the plane in Egypt because it is apparently a practice of the Egyptian authorities to release people and then re-arrest them.

There were a huge number of people at Heathrow, many of whom were elderly relatives, but no provision had been made for the reception of the three young men. None of us can imagine what it was like to be in prison in Cairo. Never mind about the way things are in this country, for the first six months, the men were sleeping on concrete floors. They had no toilets and they were not allowed to go to the toilet—it really was "Midnight Express" stuff. However, rather than provision being made at Heathrow airport for a private reception for the three men and their close relatives, everyone was just left standing.

The plane touched down on time, but there was such a fiasco that it took four hours before we saw the men. I made phone calls to Whitehall during that time. It was not easy to get hold of an official, but, to cut a long story short, I was told that the arrangements were not the Foreign Office's responsibility because its responsibility was to get the men on the plane at Cairo. I was also told that the arrangements were not the responsibility of the Home Office, but a police matter. However, unless I have missed the plot, the Home Office has responsibility for the police.

Something that should have been a joyous occasion was absolutely spoiled by the arrangements. Whatever the reasons for the men being questioned, surely to goodness arrangements could have been made so that they could spend five or 10 minutes with the people whom they had not seen for four years before the questioning took place. I am more than disappointed about what happened. I hope that the testimony that the three young men will be giving the Foreign Office about torture will be taken seriously because that is entirely against the United Nations convention.

I recently led a successful delegation to Rome and then on to the Vatican. We enjoyed a good meeting with Italian Members of Parliament in their Parliament, but, obviously, the highlight of the trip was meeting His Holiness Pope Benedict XVI. As you can imagine, Madam Deputy Speaker, I was delighted when, for the first time ever, the British ambassador to the Holy See happened to be a Catholic. I thought that that was a smart move. It is less than a smart move for the Foreign Office to decide to close the embassy to the Holy See and the ambassador's residence in the Vatican. This is a disgrace. These facilities have existed in the Vatican since the Lateran treaty. It is also a pretty dumb move on the part of the Government to invite the Pope to visit Britain next year and then to close our embassy to the Holy See and to take away the residence.

The Holy See maintains diplomatic relations with 174 nations and all major powers have separate missions to the Vatican and to Rome. Britain and the Vatican are currently engaged in a vital dialogue on issues such as relations with Islam, development aid to Africa—the Chancellor of the Exchequer was happy to make a big speech in the Holy See last year on aid to Africa—as well as Anglican-Catholic rapprochement. On every count I would ask the Minister to ascertain from the Foreign Office what on earth is going on.

I have already decided to set up a forum for discussion and action on this issue, by setting up an all-party parliamentary group on the Holy See. I know that Members, quite rightly, get sick of these groups. I think that we have everything from tiddlywinks to "Coronation Street". However, I have decided to set up a forum on a serious issue. I hope that as many Members as possible of both Houses will join it and support the embassy in the Vatican as an independent entity and recognise the important international role that it performs. I cannot think of a more stupid time to close the embassy and to take away the residence than now. We have a wonderful ambassador there, Francis Campbell, and it is an insult, considering that we have the Holy Father visiting this country next year, that we should change our diplomatic relations.

I move on to local government. The Minister knows only too well that Southend borough council has been faced with extremely tough financial decisions following the fiasco of the census. It is wonderful that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has decided that the Office for National Statistics will be independent. That seems a bit late for Southend. The 2001 census left 20,000 people off the register in Southend. That meant that the Government's grant was reduced by £7 million. I and some of my hon. Friends met fairly recently at county hall at Chelmsford to discuss these matters, which greatly affect us. I intend to mention the disgraceful thing that has happened to the Essex police force.

At the beginning of the year, I and my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) and representatives from Southend borough council met the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), to discuss the shortfall in local finance. We took the opportunity to raise the fact that Southend received only a 2 per cent. increase in its grant from central Government, while local councils received on average a 3 per cent. increase. We all know about the Government's intention to cap councils. I think that they have decided to cap two and have threatened another three.

We were told at the meeting that council tax could not rise by more than 5 per cent. I am beginning to wonder what is the point of anyone standing in the council elections on 4 May. It seems that the Government tell people how much money to raise and how they should spend it. In every aspect of local government life, throughout the time that I have been a Member of this place, I have seen more and more central direction, and never more so than under this Government.

Despite the meeting that we had with the Minister, who was extremely courteous, when the figures for the final local government assessment were released they showed a fall in the total formula grant from the Government of £34,000. Perhaps there is a lesson for my hon. Friends; do not seek meetings with Ministers because we end up getting less money than if we did not bother to meet them. [Interruption.] Yes, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford says, it is a coincidence that I happen to be a Conservative Member of Parliament.

To meet the Government's restrictions and produce a balanced budget without raising council tax by more than 5 per cent., Southend borough council needs to fill a funding gap of £11 million between expected income and expected expenditure. Southend is a small unitary authority and that has caused havoc locally, on top of budget reductions of £25 million over the past five years. Local councillors have had to make painful decisions. I suppose the Government think, "Oh well, let's hope the local electorate blame Conservative local councillors." It would be a great shame if that happened, because the difficulties are entirely a result of 20,000 people being omitted from the national census.

One critical casualty of the funding cuts has been the subsidy paid to commercial bus operators in Southend, forcing them to withdraw a number of vital services. I have been working hard with fellow councillors to restore a decent network of bus services in Southend. Unfortunately, thus far it has been difficult to find a prime sponsor without some sort of subsidy from the council, as the council does not have the money to provide a subsidy. However, the scheme that we are examining, and which I hope we can launch soon, is a taxi bus sharing system that will at least help our senior citizens get to Southend hospital and, I hope, take them to other parts of the town.

Southend is, I repeat, a small unitary authority faced with some very large challenges, such as the rebuilding of the pier, which has burned down for the third time, and the halting of the slippage of the cliffs. The council's current financial problems are the result of the Government's failure to recognise local needs. My constituents are paying the price through cuts to local services across the town. That is unacceptable.

I understand that the Office for National Statistics is unwilling to review the population estimate. Why? The ONS should be made to accept that it made a mistake. Any Member of Parliament would complain on behalf of their constituents if they had 20,000 people left off the funding stream.

The next topic that I wish to raise is the matter of badgers. I recall Lord Waldegrave, as he now is, taking the Protection of Badgers Bill through the House. I spoke on Third Reading and said how much I welcomed the Bill. All these years on, I am beginning to reflect on that legislation. All the badgers in my part of Essex seem to have had a meeting and decided that they like the look of the back gardens of various terraced houses. In the small hours of the morning, they all seem to join arms and somehow—someone must leave the front door open—take over umpteen back gardens in Southend. That is causing havoc in residential areas.

Residents of Lymington avenue in Leigh-on-Sea, for instance, have had their gardens destroyed—not just one or two, but a number of houses. Garages are beginning to collapse and the foundations of houses are being destroyed. As if that was not bad enough, two weeks ago in Queen Anne's drive and Rochester drive in Westcliff, another crowd of badgers apparently got together and moved into back gardens there. Fences have been smashed, pets attacked and property destroyed by the animals from the six badger setts identified by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs that run beneath their gardens.

I will not tire the House with details of the endless meetings that I have had with residents about getting the badgers moved. I would be so grateful if the Minister would have a word with his delightful colleague in DEFRA and try and get him to agree to a meeting with me and a few residents. I understand that since the Protection of Badgers Act 1992 came into force, only two orders have been served to try and get badgers peacefully removed.

The residents whom I have mentioned are not farmers and landowners who are concerned about the spread of bovine TB to their livestock. They are town dwellers, and their properties have been invaded by what I can only describe as urban badgers. Some people think that badgers are cuddly, but if one goes near a badger, one might lose one's arm, so no member of the general public should try to remove a badger. So far, DEFRA has failed to come up with a tenable solution to the problem, despite the increasingly bold and violent behaviour of those animals. Urban badgers are a bit like urban foxes. When I get off the train at Mudchute and go to my little pad on the Isle of Dogs, the foxes do not run away from the commuters, although some of them have three legs. The foxes walk around like dogs, and they have become increasingly domesticated.

An e-petition opposing badger culling as a method of preventing the spread of bovine TB has been signed by 11,350 people. Residents have advanced translocation as their preferred option, but DEFRA has rejected the application for a licence because of concerns about the spread of TB. It proposes to capture and humanely cull the badgers, but that would also involve the animals being moved away from the houses, which still raises concerns about the spread of TB.

Mr. Heath: The House is treating the hon. Gentleman's comments with some levity, but the issue is serious. I used to be woken up every Sunday morning by people complaining about the badgers in Castle Cary. However, that particular problem has not arisen in my constituency recently, so perhaps those badgers have moved to Southend.

Mr. Amess: The badgers may have arrived by boat on the Thames estuary. My constituency is a tiny little urban area, so the situation is incredible—the badgers are on the march to Southend, West.

DEFRA's conviction that badgers are the chief transmitters of the disease to cattle is the foundation of its proposal to introduce some sort of licensed cull. On 15 December last year, DEFRA issued a consultation paper on badger culling, seeking views on its three proposed licence-based culling options. The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee inquiry on bovine TB and badger culling was undertaken to contribute to that consultation, which finished on 10 March. The evidence collated in the report shows some significant holes in the Government's proposals—the holes were identified by scientific experts and had been overlooked by DEFRA in the pre-consultation process.

There was wide concern that not only was there not enough scientific proof to achieve consensus on any one of DEFRA's proposals, but the evidence from the badger-culling trial, which took place in 2005, and the work of the independent scientific groups on cattle TB, show that localised reactive badger culling was associated with increases of up to 25 per cent. in the number of cattle herds with TB. Incidents of confirmed TB were also higher on land neighbouring proactive areas, which is otherwise known as the edge effect. Those results help us to understand why badger culling has been an effective strategy in the past for controlling TB, and the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) recently admitted that 80 per cent. of the transmission of the disease is from cattle to cattle.

There are many ways to deal with the spread of TB other than killing badgers. For instance, Professor Tim Roper, who is currently running a three-year investigation on the activities of urban badgers, has said that in the long-term which goes against the view of the National Farmers Union that robust culling measures are the answer. Professor Roper is well aware of the sensitive nature of incidents involving urban badger populations, and he has mentioned the extent of the public and parliamentary demonstrations that were mounted when attempts were made to catch and destroy badgers in Saltdean in East Sussex that were undermining the foundations of several homes in the area.

"the only solution is vaccination",

That emotional response is just a taste of what would ensue should the Government decide to follow through on a much larger culling programme. In 2004, when questioned on how to deal with the problem of urban badger populations by my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Amess]

Castle Point (Bob Spink), who had also had considerable difficulties with badgers in residential areas—although he has probably moved them all on to Southend, West—the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Exeter, responded by saying that there is no simple answer to the question.

You can say that again, Madam Deputy Speaker. The point is obvious in the extreme. If there were a simple solution, my constituents would not have suffered years of indecisive inaction from DEFRA on the removal of these badgers from Leigh-on-Sea and Westcliff. I am still awaiting a response from the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), as to whether he will meet me and the affected residents to discuss the extent of the badger problem in Southend. I hope that such a discussion will bring home the plight of the urban dwellers, as well as rural landowners and farmers, who are affected by the issues surrounding badger culling.

As two of my hon. Friends from Essex—my hon. Friends the Member for West Chelmsford and for Maldon and East Chelmsford—are here, let me say that I share their anger about what has happened as regards the merger of Essex police force with those of Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire. In Essex, we enjoy very good relations with Kent police force. However, it is completely unfair and unreasonable that its police force is allowed to stand alone while Essex's is not. My hon. Friends and I, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), have campaigned and worked extremely hard on this issue.

One reason why we are so upset about it is that for several years we had concerns about the style of policing in Essex, many of which are well known to the House. Just at a time when we have secured the employment of an excellent chief constable whom I believe to be the best in the country and who is absolutely determined to give the general public the style of policing that we all want—in other words, when a crime is reported it is not ignored but someone turns up to investigate the situation—we find that this merger is to take place. I hope that it will be possible to have a referendum on this issue in Essex. My hon. Friends and I are absolutely determined to continue to campaign on it.

I know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that as Members of Parliament we are not allowed to criticise the judiciary, and I understand that. However, I am very concerned about the inconsistencies in sentencing, particularly when someone takes another person's life. Several of us feel very strongly about that. Recently, when someone was murdered fairly locally, the two young men were caught, and one got 12 months and one got 14 months. That was the value placed on that person's life. I know that Ministers will say that the Sentencing Guidelines Council considers all these issues, but I am less than happy with the lack of consistency.

My hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point, for Rochford and Southend, East and for Rayleigh and I remain concerned about the proposed reconfiguration of cancer services in Southend. If some of the important specialisms are removed, that will eventually lead to Southend being a less attractive place for clinicians to work in.

British Airways used to be the best airline in the world. That is no longer the case as far as I am concerned. Lord King was a wonderful pioneer, and I am afraid that since his departure British Airways has gone down and down in my estimation. Its flights are poorly timetabled, its airliners are often not clean and tidy, some of the prices that it charges are outrageous, and it has a monopoly on some services. I understand that one or two lords serve on the board and I hope that they will read my complaint about the airline.

I was glad that several hon. Friends mentioned abortion. Before the general election, the leaders of the three main parties said, initially in response to a magazine article, how important it was. A year later, nothing has happened. It cannot be right that we continue to abort babies up to term on the ground of a cleft palate when we have special baby care units that now save babies at 22 and a half weeks. There is no point in being in politics unless one is interested in people's lives. Parliament's continued equivocation about when life begins is unacceptable.

3.20 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): As ever with pre-recess Adjournment debates, hon. Members' contributions have ranged widely. One of the delights of my role as shadow Leader of the House is the opportunity that the debates afford to learn a great deal more about colleagues' constituencies. The challenge of my role is to do justice to the many contributions. I will do my best.

It was interesting that several contributions referred to issues that have been raised regularly in business questions in recent weeks, when hon. Members have urged the Leader of the House to hold full debates in Government time on them. The right hon. Gentleman has resisted. The fact that so many hon. Members were willing to raise them again today shows the genuine need for a proper Government debate on matters such as the Post Office card account and the national health service.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) did the House a service by speaking about the Post Office card account. It is remarkable that the subject has been raised week in, week out, by hon. Members of all parties—Labour Members have mentioned their concerns, too—for almost the whole time that I have been shadow Leader of the House, yet the Government have not been willing to grant a debate in Government time on that important issue. Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, with its responsibility for the Post Office, and in the Department for Work and Pensions, with its responsibility for the card account, have not even made oral statements on the matter.

The Leader of the House has consistently reiterated the Government's commitment to the Post Office. Given that its chief executive told an all-party group that removing the card account could lead to a reduction in the number of post offices from approximately 14,000 to 4,000—meaning the closure of 10,000 post offices—the Government must wake up and understand that they will face a stark decision as a result of their action. How will they back up the commitment to the Post Office, continue to support it in future, and ensure that the damaging closure of branches, which we have already experienced, does not become the threatened cull of post offices?

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome mentioned several other issues, some of which were picked up by other hon. Members, and I shall refer to them later.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) raised serious issues concerning children. His commitment to fighting for children's interests is well known. He also mentioned such matters in the Christmas Adjournment debate. His remarks about the use of the caution for those who take indecent photographs of children raises two issues: child pornography and the treatment of paedophiles, and appropriate use by the police and the judiciary of their powers, not only to punish wrongdoing but to protect society. They have a duty to do both. We must never forget that every indecent image of a child reflects an incident of child abuse. I hope that the Government have listened very carefully to my hon. Friend's observations on this serious issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point also raised the issue of abortion, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). I share their interest in that issue being reassessed, and the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point about the time limit for abortions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point also mentioned the Government's proposals for police mergers—an issue that was picked up by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West. I hesitate to say that there was an Essex mafia in the Chamber today, but that did appear to be the case. Time after time, the Prime Minister has said in the Chamber that he will listen to local people's views on police mergers, so why are the Government ignoring the views not only of local people but of the police? That is happening not only in Essex but across the country. This illustrates the fact that the Government have no proper regional policy, which is a sad fact for a Labour Government. Their answer to regional policy is simply to create larger and larger bureaucratic structures, be they police forces, strategic health authorities, primary care trusts, fire authorities or ambulance services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point also mentioned overdevelopment, a problem that affects many constituencies up and down the country. We all agree that there is a demand for housing, and particularly for affordable homes, but that is not a reason for cramming development into back gardens and infill sites. Nor is the need for family homes met by the tendency to knock down family homes and replace them with flats, as I have seen happening in Shoppenhangers road in my constituency. Such a practice might meet the Deputy Prime Minister's density requirements and his target number for dwellings, but it does not provide the kind of housing that people need. It changes the character of areas, and puts unacceptable pressure on infrastructure such as roads, schools, GPs' surgeries and utilities such as water.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point might like to suggest to Essex county council that it follow the example set by Conservative-controlled Wokingham district council, which has commissioned independent consultants to assess the cost of the infrastructure needed to support the new homes that the Government require it to build as part of their target. If every council did that, we would have a clear picture of the hundreds of millions of pounds that will need to be spent on infrastructure to support the new homes that the Government are proposing to build.

The hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh), who, unfortunately, is no longer in her place, mentioned her desire for two schools in her constituency, Mitcham Vale and Tamworth Manor, to be given academy status. I think that I am right in saying—I am sure that she will correct me, on reading Hansard, if I am wrong—that Mitcham Vale is the school that I knew as Eastfields when I was chairman of the local education authority in Merton. I was grateful to her for her words of gratitude for the significant contribution made to education by my noble Friend Lord Harris, who has shown an incredible commitment to improving education in south London. He has truly put his money where his mouth is.

The hon. Lady made a number of comments about the position taken by the Conservative group on Merton council, and implied that it was blocking progress on the academies. My understanding is that, in fact, the official survey on the issue showed that people in the London borough of Merton were four to one against that development. The issue raised by Conservative councillors was that these decisions needed to be taken in full knowledge of the implications for other schools. Merton is tied in to a 25-year private finance initiative for its schools. The two schools mentioned by the hon. Lady would be allowed to withdraw from that, but that would result in implications for other schools that would need to be addressed.

Education in Merton as a whole has undergone a considerable upheaval in recent years, with the move under a Labour authority from a three-tier system to a two-tier system. I recall from my days of chairing the education authority there that the Labour councillors were rather more in favour of three-tier education than they now appear to be. Sadly, since my time, Merton has slipped significantly down the league table of education standards in London, and that is a matter of considerable concern to the residents of that borough.

Another topic that has been raised by several Members, as well as being raised constantly in business questions—and rightly so—is that of the NHS. As we see thousands of jobs being cut across the health service, operations cancelled, waiting times extended and trusts in deficit, the Health Secretary has said that this has been the "best year" for the health service. I sometimes wonder what Ministers in this Government spend their time doing. They certainly do not seem to spend their time going out there to find out what is happening in the services for which they have responsibility. We need to take every opportunity, as a number of Members have done today, to bring home to the Government what is happening in the health service in our constituencies, because it is not what the Government like to think is happening.

The issue of the health service was raised by my hon. Friends the Members for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), for Uxbridge (Mr Randall) and for Southend, West. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford put in an excellent and well-argued claim for the private finance initiative in Mid Essex Hospital Services trust, centred on Broomfield hospital, to be given proper consideration by the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge referred to Mount Vernon and the removal of cancer services, which, as I said to him, affects some of my constituents, too. The issue of the reconfiguration of cancer services was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West. That issue is of concern across many areas of the country. In my area, cancer services are being moved from the Royal Berkshire and Battle hospital trust to the John Radcliffe in Oxford. Again, local people want to have easy access in their locality to the services that they need from the health service.

The NHS was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome and, from a different angle, by the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), who gave a serious speech on the integration of social services and the health service, and spoke particularly about the needs of people with dementia. He is right that there is a real need to reassess services for those with dementia, particularly given the paucity of beds in residential care homes for people with dementia. I trust that my hon. Friend the Whip on duty will ask where the hon. Member for North Swindon is. I trust that he will read my comments in Hansard to see what has been said about his contribution.

The issue of integrating social services with health services is particularly important and will cause considerable concern to many people, in many areas, in the coming months. Given the deficits in primary care trusts in many areas, increased pressure will be put on social services departments in local authorities. We are told by the Association of Directors of Social Services that social services budgets are already £1.76 billion underfunded. The Government therefore need to address that issue, which arises from deficits in the health service.

Apart from Essex, the east midlands—I think that I have got my midlands right—were well represented in our debate by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire referred to my response to his speech in the Christmas Adjournment debate. Were he present, I would assure him that I always find his contributions riveting, although I suspect that the same cannot always be said for his Front Bench. He raised important points about our reactions to the problems of the environment and of climate change in particular, and talked about the need for the Government to ensure that the measures that they introduce in those areas are going to work.

We all know, of course, that the Government have now admitted that they will not meet their own targets for greenhouse gas emissions. In business questions earlier, the Leader of the House indicated to one of my right hon. Friends that he felt that only this Government had done anything on climate change. Of course, the Government's initial success on carbon dioxide emissions, from which they are now slipping back, came about only because of decisions by the last Conservative Government to change from coal-fired power stations.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire referred to measures such as the aggregates levy, which have not always achieved what they set out to achieve. He also did something else that I thought was important: he spoke of ways in which, at a very local level, individuals could take effective action. He referred particularly to energy efficiency in homes and insulation. I pay tribute to a local authority that has done a great deal in that regard—Woking council, which is Conservative-controlled and has made significant strides in reducing emissions. It is, I suggest, a beacon for other authorities.

My right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire raised the important issue of farm payments and the Rural Payments Agency. I consider it despicable that the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has failed to come to the House to explain what has happened in the agency, and to apologise to farmers up and down the country for the fact that, month in month out, she and her Ministers have been saying that there is no problem and that farmers will receive their payments. As we know from my right hon. Friend and others, that is not the case. Farmers are not receiving their payments, and many are extremely frustrated by the bureaucracy in the agency.

One of my local farmers recently sent me a letter that he had received from staff at the agency telling him that he had not filled in a form which needed to be sent back. He rang up and told them that he had completed the form, and that it had been sent to them some time earlier. They said, "No, that was a letter that we sent out just in case." That is the sort of bureaucracy that really does frustrate people, and when they are not receiving payments it becomes even more frustrating.

It was a pleasure to take a trip to the Isle of Wight during the debate, courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner). He raised specific issues about the operation of the national health service on the island. The overarching theme was that the Government should note that his constituency, as an island, experiences particular problems with the provision of services—not just NHS services—which are not experienced in other parts of the country. It is not as easy for people on the Isle of Wight to travel elsewhere to obtain their services. My hon. Friend has consistently raised the problem of the lack of dentists on the island, and he did so again today. The same theme has been repeated by many Members in all parts of the House during other debates and question sessions.

What concerned me was my hon. Friend's comment that he felt that some people in the health service were being discouraged from asking him, as a Member of Parliament, to raise issues that were important to them. It is the job of Members to raise issues that are of concern in their constituencies. It may be uncomfortable for Ministers; it may even, on occasion, be uncomfortable for senior managers in public services, but they cannot and should not silence the elected representatives of the people. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for continuing to raise his concerns despite attempts to prevent him from doing so.

I join my hon. Friend in commending Conservative-controlled Isle of Wight council for making positive changes for the islanders. I commend it particularly for stepping in to pay the fares of those who need to cross the Solent for health service treatment, and for introducing a low bus fare for young people. Young people often tell me that they cannot afford to travel to places that they want to visit, and that it is too expensive for them to do the many things that they want to do. The new service on the Isle of Wight is very valuable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge ranged widely over a variety of topics, but began with a thoughtful comment on the situation in the Balkans, particularly Kosovo. One of his remarks really struck home, at least for me: he said that for the sake of the peace of Europe, we should not ignore developments in that area. Indeed, I suggest to my hon. Friend that the history of Europe shows that we should never ignore the Balkans.

My hon. Friend's wish for a debate on foreign affairs was also expressed by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, although his emphasis was on Iraq and Afghanistan. Both speeches demonstrated the real need for us to engage in a proper debate in the Chamber, in Government time, on the Government's foreign policy and their foreign policy aims. That was also reflected in a comment by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West about the closure of the embassy to the Holy See. We need to know from the Government what they are trying to achieve with their foreign policy. They published a White Paper this week that talked of active diplomacy, but people cannot indulge in active diplomacy if they go around shutting embassies and high commissions.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome also referred to the work being done by our armed forces, and I am sure that we all wish to pay tribute to all our armed forces personnel, both regulars and reservists, who serve abroad on our behalf.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge also spoke about the Olympics, and said that the promised development of facilities should be encouraged rather than deferred because of the prospect of the Olympics. When Olympic bids were first being discussed, I understand that there were more 50 m swimming pools in Paris than in the whole of England. The new 50 m pool that my hon. Friend mentioned is therefore much needed.

I also heartily endorse my hon. Friend's comment that we need to promote women's sport. I add my congratulations to the women's England rugby team, and I recall the success of the England women's cricket team in winning the Ashes last summer. It was noticeable during the Commonwealth games that our women athletes had rather more medal success on the track than the men. And while I am on a sporting theme, I cannot miss this opportunity to congratulate Reading football club on their promotion to the premier league.

Several of my hon. Friends raised the serious issue of identity fraud, and the use of other people's addresses and mailbox addresses. My hon. Friends the Members for West Chelmsford and for Uxbridge raised that issue and paid tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), who has taken a particular interest in it. As he mentioned, he had a meeting today with the senior police officer from ACPO responsible for that issue. It has been recorded that one vehicle was responsible for 120 offences—I assume that they were speeding offences. That reveals the size of the problem. It is an interesting problem, because the Government keep telling us that identity cards will resolve it, but they will not. I only hope that the serious way in which ACPO are treating the issue, according to my hon. Friend, will be reflected in the measures taken by the Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West also addressed a range of topics. He has been assiduous in his work to get his constituent released from jail in Egypt, and as he said, he was very pleased when that was achieved, although he was understandably saddened by the Government's approach to his constituent's return. I trust that the Government have noted my hon. Friend's comments about their treatment of that individual.

My hon. Friend also mentioned local council funding, and made an interesting point about why people would wish to become councillors, given that so many decisions are now made by central Government. That is a very real problem. So many powers have been taken away from local government that many people think twice about becoming councillors. That is also why turnout in local government elections has fallen so dramatically. The restoration of powers to local government would be a real means of restoring people's interest in local democracy.

My hon. Friend also raised the serious issue of delinquent badgers. I am tempted to say that the Government's response to such behaviour is usually to slap on an ASBO, so perhaps he should consult the police and local authority on that possibility. Despite the enjoyment that we had in listening to his description of those badgers, it is a serious issue. My hon. Friend questioned the effectiveness of culling in preventing bovine TB, but many farmers are distraught at the lack of action by the Government and the length of time that they have taken to recognise the seriousness and importance of the issue. Most of the evidence suggests that culling of some sort is what is needed.

Turning to some of the key themes emerging from this debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire gave examples of how the Government are not fulfilling their promises. That is perhaps a familiar theme, but he illustrated it well with—dare I say it?—concrete examples from his own constituency. As I know from the experience of the A404, Ministers turn up and make promises about resurfacing a road to eliminate noise, and then—lo and behold—the budget is scrapped and the scheme does not go ahead. Ministers make everybody feel happy by giving the impression that something is going to happen; then, two years down the line, the budget is scrapped and nothing happens.

Imagine what pensioners felt about the Government's approach to last year's £200 council tax rebate. Suddenly, council tax was so high that pensioners needed support from the Government to help them pay for it. This year council tax is rising even further, so one assumes that the problems experienced by the many elderly people who had to be helped last year are even worse. What are the Government doing? They are not providing a single penny. The Deputy Leader of the House will probably say that in a pre-election year, all Governments try to present their best face to the electorate, which is of course true, but the £200 rebate was the most blatant and cynical election bribe we have ever seen.

[Mrs. Theresa May]

However, that fits in with the theme of this debate: the Government's failure to deliver, when they are taxing people so highly that the Minister with responsibility for higher education has told us that people have been taxed to the hilt and cannot take any more. The Government are out of touch. The Health Secretary considers this the best year ever for the health service, yet thousands of jobs have been cut and trusts up and down the country have deficits of hundreds of millions of pounds. So many promises, so much money spent, so little achieved. It is a sad fact that this Government, who have two Prime Ministers and are internal disarray, are in no position to give the Easter message of new birth and hope for the future. The Government's record was summed up by Sir Derek Wanless on Radio 4 this morning when he said:

"Less has been achieved than might have been achieved".

Optimism and hope for the future can be found not on the Labour Benches, but on the Conservative Benches.

I finish by echoing what I, and the Leader of the House, said at business questions earlier today. I am extremely grateful to Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Chairman of Ways and Means, for taking on extra responsibilities in Mr. Speaker's absence. I also thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means, for taking on those extra responsibilities in turn. You have all stepped into the breach, and I wish you, all Members of this House and all its staff and Officers a very happy Easter.

3.48 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): It has been interesting to listen to the thoughtful contributions made by a number of Members. The debate was begun by my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh), and I thank her for praising the Government's education strategy, the great efforts of schools, teachers, head teachers, students and carers, and the success of academies. The even-handed nature of her praise should be recognised. She spoke in favour of Lord Harris's support for the programme, and she acknowledged that funding for schools in her area has risen by £1,300 per pupil since 1997.

My hon. Friend told us that local people have overwhelmingly endorsed and sought a new city academy in Mitcham Vale and Tamworth Manor, and that it has been rejected not by the council, which is a minority Labour council, but by colleagues of the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) who serve on the council. They are attempting to put off the decision until next year and beyond—against the wishes of the community and of Conservative private sponsors such as Lord Harris.

Mrs. May: The Deputy Leader of the House may not have heard me, but I said just now that the official survey of opinion showed that the ratio of people opposing the plans was 4:1.

Nigel Griffiths: To correct the record, the survey of parents most affected conducted by the schools showed that they supported the plans by 2:1. The wider group contained people who may not be directly affected.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) raised a long list of issues, as usual. He began with comments on the Post Office card account, but he and other Opposition Members peddled so much misinformation that I am sure that the House will be grateful for the full facts. The Government are spending £1 billion of public money on funding the Post Office card contract until 2010. It is one of 25 accounts that people can use to access their pensions and benefits, although I understand that some of the others may be cheaper. I urge all consumers of Post Office services to look at all the available accounts, but assure them that the present card account will run for another four years in any case.

I hope that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome will join me in encouraging local councils to follow Edinburgh's example in ensuring that as many council services as possible are paid through local post offices. That includes the business portion of the council tax, domestic council tax bill, rents and other service and environmental charges. I hope too that he will urge people to reject the position adopted by Liberal Democrat councils such as Aberdeen, which has steadfastly refused to fund residents in using those accounts. The consequence is that more post offices have closed in Aberdeen than anywhere else in the country. Moreover, that council's approach may be one reason why Edinburgh's Councillor Longstaffe, an erstwhile Liberal Democrat, deserted that party this week and joined the Labour party.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome spoke about homelessness, a topic that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House dealt with in business questions. However, if the hon. Gentleman needs further amplification, he should realise that the poorest providers of public housing in this country are Liberal Democrat councils. For example, Inverclyde council has been branded by the Accounts Commission in Scotland as the most incompetent authority, and closer to home Lambeth council has been an absolute shambles. There, the Liberal Democrat executive member responsible for housing, Councillor Fitchett, has been forced out after almost a year in office because a fraudster was allowed to get away with £3 million. For seven months, he had clung on to his executive title and £15,000 special allowance, but the people of Lambeth finally drove him out without waiting for the elections later in the summer. That is hardly surprising, but it is rather typical.

When we consider the problems posed to senior citizens by local councils, our best advice is that they should compare the average council tax levied per dwelling by Labour, Liberal Democrat and Conservative authorities. They will find that the average under Labour is the lowest by a considerable margin.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Deputy Leader of the House mentioned Lambeth council. Its Labour leader sent a leaflet to my door saying that he and his colleagues would be pressing the Chancellor and the Government to reduce pensioners' council tax burden. The Chancellor had the opportunity last week, but refused to do so. What message does the hon. Gentleman have for that Labour councillor?

Nigel Griffiths: I remind the hon. Gentleman that when Labour controlled the council the average council tax was £810, whereas now under the Liberal Democrats it is £1,130. So I advise people to listen to the advice of the Labour leader on the council and vote for him in the council elections.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome raised the serious issue of the availability of Herceptin for the treatment of breast cancer. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has made it clear that local trusts must not refuse to fund Herceptin for women with HER2-positive early-stage breast cancer solely on cost. They need to take account of the complete range of factors before they make such a decision while the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is carrying out an appraisal of this unapproved drug using the fast-track process. No one has successfully challenged that approach in court, although an appeal is pending.

I have a copy of the letter that the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), wrote to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome. She spelt out clearly to him in paragraph 5 relating to his constituent that "It is down to individual clinicians to decide whether it is suitable to prescribe a specific drug. The clinician will make this decision after discussions with the patient about the potential risks and taking into account his or her medical history ... As the Secretary of State re-confirmed in a Written Ministerial Statement on 1 March, PCTs should not refuse to fund Herceptin solely on the grounds of its cost. PCTs should not rule out treatments on principle but should consider individual circumstances."

Mr. Heath: I am pleased that we have got away from the pre-local election nonsense and that the Minister has started answering points made in the debate. It is impossible to debate with the hon. Gentleman the details of a constituent's case, but I make three points. First, it was not an early-stage cancer; it was a stage 3 cancer. Secondly, the Minister appears to have sight of a letter that has not yet reached me—I am glad to know that it is on its way. Thirdly, the individual's clinician had clearly recommended this course of treatment and it had been turned down by the hospital authorities.

Nigel Griffiths: I am sorry to contradict the hon. Gentleman, but if he reads the letter, the Minister says in paragraph 2 that stage 3 breast cancer is considered to be early-stage breast cancer. There is no point in bandying the details of an individual case. We all want the person to get the best treatment available. We wish the hon. Gentleman's constituent the best chances of recovery and the best treatment possible. I make no criticism of the hon. Gentleman for raising the case of a constituent. I merely point out the facts that the House will want to have presented to it.

Bob Spink: Will the Minister give way?

Nigel Griffiths: I shall make some progress. I shall respond to the hon. Gentleman directly in a minute, I hope.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome mentioned the position in Iraq. There is much in Iraq that has improved. There has been an underpinning move to democracy, two successful elections and a constitutional referendum. The council of representatives met a fortnight ago. It was elected by 70 per cent. of the electorate. It is good that 4 million more Iraqis have access to potable water than before, and that 9.6 million of them have access to a sewerage system. There were no sewerage or working waste water plants operating before the intervention. That was another legacy of 20 years of Saddam's warmongering, brutal repression, mismanagement and chronic underinvestment. The Secretary of State for Defence does not hesitate to keep the House apprised of developments in Iraq as and when necessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) made a thoughtful contribution. He stressed the vital need for the closest co-operation between social services departments and PCTs. I welcome the offer that he made to look at Swindon hosting a pilot project. I will certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State responds to him on it.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) raised several issues, including police reorganisation, to which other Members also referred. No one doubts the need for modern, effective police forces to tackle terrorism and crime—the drug dealing and the Mr. Bigs. The current 43-force structure is 30 years old. I reject the claim that there is no need for change, as does the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, which states:

"The 43-force structure is no longer fit for purpose."

Cumbria, Lancashire, Northumbria and Durham have drawn up voluntary merger proposals. In February, Durham's chief constable, Jon Stoddart praised the review, saying:

"From a professional policing point of view there has only ever been one option—a single strategic force".

Last week, the Home Secretary announced four merger proposals, for the south-east, the eastern region, the east midlands and Yorkshire and Humber. A statutory four-month consultation period is under way and HMIC has identified savings that will, it states, dwarf any initial start-up costs. Of course, we have to ensure that disruption is minimised in carrying out those proposals.

The hon. Member for Castle Point raised concerns about the Thames Gateway initiative. We recognise the importance of infrastructure for housing and job growth. We support the principles of the sustainable development communities plan, which is why there is £6 billion-worth of Government investment covering the past three years and the next financial year. Although he and other Members attack demands for new homes, his constituents and others want local housing for their sons and daughters. When people's marriages break up, they want to be housed locally near their jobs and families. They can hardly be expected to move hundreds of miles away—from Castle Point to Castle Douglas. The Government, the hon. Gentleman, as a local MP, and his local authorities will have to reach an agreement on a sustainable number of homes to meet that need. Otherwise, he will have to face his constituents and tell them why they have to stay in marriages in unsustainable conditions, or why their grown-up children will have to continue to live at home.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) focused on two main issues. He mentioned the lower rates of business tax, which I warmly endorse. The whole House supports the Chancellor's decision to reduce corporation tax from 33 to 30 per cent., small business tax from 23 to 19 per cent., and capital gains tax on long-term assets from 40p to 10p in the pound. As my hon. Friend said, he welcomes what has been done for his local businesses, some of which are among the 554,000 new businesses that have been created.

[Nigel Griffiths]

My hon. Friend stressed the need for energy conservation, a cause that he has championed for much of his working life. He will share my pride that 2 million more homes have been insulated over the past eight years and that 250,000 homes will receive subsidies for insulation within two years. He mentioned his support for the £50 million allocated for microgeneration technologies, which will help 25,000 homes and businesses to generate their own renewable energy, and for the far bigger sum—£1 billion—for a new energy and environmental research institute.

The Chancellor's fiscal policies have contributed to all those measures, and include the climate change levy, which I have yet to hear the Opposition endorse. None the less, my hon. Friend presses the Government to do more and I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will heed his call.

It was a pleasure to hear the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire. Of course, I welcome him to his fairly new elevation to the post of Government Chief Whip—[HON. MEMBERS: "He will be soon!"]—Opposition Chief Whip. I thought that, if anyone broke the mould of silence falling on Chief Whips, he would do so, and he has not disappointed me.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the resurfacing of the A50. I am aware, as he said, that he has been in regular contact with the Department for Transport on the issue, and he quoted from his correspondence. For reasons of which I think he is aware, the Department decided not to continue with that programme of replacing lengths of road surface with concrete in advance of normal maintenance requirements, primarily because of the pressure on budgets and for safety reasons. The Department must ensure that there is adequate funding for routine surface renewal schemes. I appreciate the disappointment felt by the right hon. Gentleman and his constituents. However, when the A50 requires maintenance and resurfacing, I am assured that a quieter surface will be used as a matter of course.

The right hon. Gentleman also mentioned his regret at the overturning of a stop order on a local quarry. Again, I will ensure that his observations are drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister.

On farming payments, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has made clear her anger that the payment procedure was not being honoured in the way she wished. When the chief executive reported to her that, on his latest reassessment, he and his agency would be unable to make the payments, she took the decision that that was wholly unacceptable. She took the action that the House would expect her to take. The chief executive was removed, and the leadership has been strengthened to find out whether the payments can be made within an acceptable time. She made her views very clear that the situation was quite unacceptable and recognised the problems. It is to be hoped that those payments will be made as quickly as possible.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) made a thoughtful contribution about providing health care for a population of about 130,000, especially at a time when previously unimaginable advances have been made in medical technology. That involves massive investment in state-of-the-art technology and ever-larger teams of the highest skilled people to carry out the treatments and operations that are now necessary. Speaking from my constituency experience, even with a population of 500,000, problems can be generated in getting the critical mass. In fact, I come from a rural area, so I know better than many that the issue is how we ensure that the critical mass is achieved and the proper resources provided. The hon. Gentleman argued that more money should be put into the issue. It is a common cause, and more money has indeed been devoted to health care, but we now need to work in a bipartisan or tri-partisan way to consider the problems of such areas, including how close to home people's needs must be serviced.

To echo the words of the right hon. Member for Maidenhead, there is no reason why Members of Parliament should not take up any issue with the chief executive and chairman of their local strategic health authority. In my 19 years as a Member of Parliament and in the seven years before that, when I served on a local health council, I have met chairmen and chief executives of health authorities of every and no political complexion. I have always told them to be plain with me, and still do, and I expect them to focus on the interests of the people they serve—in the case of chairs, mostly in a voluntary capacity; in the case of chief executives, I hope as consummate professionals. I know that the whole House will urge the hon. Member for Isle of Wight's local health officials to be frank and honest with him since he is quite clearly very capable of articulating their concerns at the highest level.

The hon. Gentleman lamented the loss of 200 staff. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will want to know the details of that because thousands of nurses and doctors have been provided in the Hampshire and Isle of Wight strategic health authority area in the past nine years and it is important that it balances its budgets as others have done. It is one of the sad facts in relation to the present financial outlook of the minority of health authorities that some 50 per cent. of the overspending is accounted for by only 6 per cent. of them. I urge them to look at health authorities that are able to bring in their services on budget, at a very high level, meeting local demands.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of dentists. Not only have we increased investment in dental schools and dental education by more than 30 per cent., to ensure even better value for money we have increased the number of dental students by 34 per cent. The facts about the number of dentists are also clear. There are 4,600 more dentists now practising in the general dental service and the personal dental service than in 1997. Adult registrations with dentists fell by 1 million between 1992 and 1997, but under this Government they have increased by 1 million. The demand is ever greater and the budget to meet it is great too. Some 17.7 million people are now on the lists of our dentists. It is with some regret that I tell the House that the trend in the number of NHS dentists reducing their commitment to the NHS—it started well before this Government came into power, as those dentists did more and more private work—has not been reversed.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome might be interested to know that the money for his local health service—I think that he mentioned Bath—and his local hospital, in terms of the £1.3 million for the purchase of land and for fees, is secure. There is some £12 million for initial funding, as well. I gather that the full business case is already being prepared.

I join the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) in congratulating the women's rugby team on achieving the grand slam—a terrific achievement. He also raised the issue of Kosovo. As the House will know, I chaired the Scottish charities' Kosovo appeal, which was charged by the UN with rebuilding some 8,000 homes in Kosovo. Although I completely endorse what he says about the criminal wilful damage to churches and monasteries, I know that he will join me in condemning the damage that I saw, when I went in shortly after Kosovo was liberated, to the mosques and other buildings, too. I also know that he will want to praise and get an up-to-date report from David Blunt, who is our Foreign Office highest representative there, and his colleagues on the present position. I hope that we can ensure that a copy of those comments is passed to him. We want to ensure that the intervention, which I am convinced saved 250,000 lives, in contrast to the failure to intervene in the previous decade, allows the country to be rebuilt properly.

The hon. Member also spoke about the North West London strategic health authority. He asked for extra money and raised the plight of his cancer hospital. My colleagues will read his comments with concern and interest.

Mr. Randall: First, I was referring to the deficit of the primary care trust. I was not necessarily talking about extra funding for the cancer facilities, but where they were being placed.

Nigel Griffiths: I think that Hansard may show that the hon. Member mentioned funding before he went on to cancer, but, none the less, his constituents will not blame him for wanting to ensure that the right resources are in his authority. His comments about the possible third runway at Heathrow were balanced.

Like the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), the hon. Member for Uxbridge talked about the alarming increase in the number of identity fraud cases. People appear to be registering using the addresses of innocent constituents so that they can gain driving licences and other documents in such a way that they completely evade the law.

Mr. Burns: I was not talking about people registering at other domestic addresses, but hundreds of people registering at a commercial mailing address.

Nigel Griffiths: I was coming on to the point that the hon. Member raised. The hon. Member for Uxbridge talked about a domestic address, but the hon. Member for West Chelmsford made us well aware of the problem with 25 Duke street. Both hon. Members made the clearest case for identity cards that the House has heard. It is important that people who are able to take out driving licences and passports in such a way and the criminal gangs that organise the activity are tracked down.

Mr. Randall: I am slightly astounded by the Minister's comment. I do not know whether it is necessary for my 86-year-old mother to have an identity card. I am always open to suggestions, so if he can explain how identity cards would avoid the situation that I described, I will be all ears.

Nigel Griffiths: Because one of the great advantages of an identity card is that it relates solely to an individual, so when an application is made—passports have been mentioned—the individual is tracked, which makes forging any document that might relate to the identity of a person much more difficult. It is because people do not have identity cards at the moment that we have the sort of explosion about which the hon. Member talked. The matter is so serious that he and another colleague raised it in this important debate.

Mrs. May: I am having some difficulty understanding the Deputy Leader of the House's explanation of how identity cards will address the problem. The issue is not people turning up with a different identity, but individuals putting down an address that is not theirs when they fill in forms, whether that is the address of another person or a mailing house. How will that problem be solved by identity cards? If an identity card holds such an individual's address, presumably it would just hold the incorrect address.

Nigel Griffiths: No. I would have thought that the right hon. Lady would know the answer if she had sat and listened to the debate, as I did. Any filling in of such forms could be checked on the national identity register. There would not be a question of the original address. People completing forms can apparently make up any name that they choose at the moment, which is why the problem is serious.

The hon. Member for West Chelmsford even-handedly praised the £100 million commitment to invest in Broomfield hospital. I know that he will celebrate the 100 or so major hospital projects that are under way or have been completed under the Government. I believe also that as a Minister in the previous Conservative Government, he will know the background of despair and frustration that I am sure that he shared in the 1980s and 1990s—his constituents certainly did—while waiting for another Government to come along to deliver a hospital for which people had been waiting for decades, if not since the last war. It is important that the hon. Gentleman pays tribute to the fact that without commitment to the necessary money, his constituents would have no hope of any hospital in the future. It is important that they have that hope. There is the need for the best funding package for a hospital in the hon. Gentleman's area. I am sure that that is inflamed by the hon. Gentleman's constituents being able to see up to 100 hospitals throughout the country being built, and that the hon. Gentleman does not feel that he and his constituents are at the head of the queue. I would feel the same. I can assure him that when a new hospital opens, as one has on the edge of my constituency, using PFI, that will be widely welcomed and greatly appreciated.

We have not made up in nine years for 50 years of neglect under the previous Conservative Government and Governments before that. That is not something for which I can apologise, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will regret not voting with the Government to treble the NHS budget.

I was disappointed when I did not see the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) in his usual place at the beginning of the debate. However, I was pleased to see him come along into the Chamber. He is one of the few Members who are difficult to predict when it comes to exactly what issues will be raised. The hon. Gentleman did not disappoint us today. He raised some serious points, and I would like to be the first to praise him for his outspoken support for the release from imprisonment of one of his constituents and two others. I know that he has praised the Government, including my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, for the representations that they have made consistently about the conditions in which his constituent was held and about the treatment that he and the others received.

I understand that they were convicted of the offence of supporting a banned organisation, the Islamic Liberation party. They served three quarters of their sentence and applied for remission, which I know the hon. Gentleman strongly supported, as I understand did our Government. That remission was granted. When they returned, special branch wanted to interview them at the earliest opportunity, because of conditions that I think are explicable. I regret if that caused further distress to their relatives. I hope that they have got over that and acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman's constituent is now home in the warm embrace of his family.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's views on the future of embassies will be noted.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the grant settlement, as did others. Given the support for councils under this Government, compared with anything that was given under the previous Government, I take criticism ill on this subject. I am not qualified, as the hon. Gentleman is, to comment on badgers. I know that the relevant Minister—I am not sure which one it is—with responsibilities for urban badgers as against rural badgers will doubtless want to tackle the issue. The hon. Gentleman made a number of observations about a private airline and where it has gone. More seriously for his constituents, he made observations about cancer services in his area, all of which have been noted.

The shadow Leader of the House is a model of ingratitude. If we consider what has been delivered in her constituency by the Government in terms of funding, I am surprised that she could not bring herself to say "Thank you" for the £1,160 extra per pupil. I am happy to tell the right hon. Lady that the Windsor and Maidenhead local education authority had an allocation of £4.4 million this year. That compares to £2.3 million, which was inherited, to the devolved schools' budget. In her constituency the number of five, six and seven-year-olds in classes of more than 30 is now 32. It used to be 738. She had no praise for the 120 more teachers.

On crime, the right hon. Lady expressed no thanks to the Government for 4,114 more police officers in the Thames Valley area serving her constituents and others. That is an increase on last year, and 4,000 more than when she was in government.

Mrs. May: I was not.

Nigel Griffiths: On health, the right hon. Lady failed to praise the Windsor, Ascot and Maidenhead PCT, which now has 2,760 more nurses, over 1,200 more doctors and over 350 more consultants. She failed to praise us for the work that we have done with local and other businesses in her area, which has resulted in youth unemployment falling by 22 per cent. She failed to apologise for not supporting the new deal, which has been instrumental in helping her constituents.

A number of great achievements have been made in the past nine years. I am glad that Members have given me a chance to showcase some of them. I am sorry that those have been only grudgingly received, and not acknowledged at all by some hon. Members.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Deputy Leader of the House was doing a reasonable job, but he spoiled it towards the end. If the Government have such a wonderful proud record, why are there not a huge number of Members on the Labour Benches to sing their praises?

Nigel Griffiths: I noticed that the hon. Gentleman had to use his pager to rope in some of his colleagues late in the day. I thought that I was being generous to one of them by noting that he was not in his place—the rather charitable convention in the House. A number of Members, including the hon. Member for West Chelmsford, were not in at the beginning of the debate or not in for the whole debate.

Mr. Burns: The reason that I was not present at the beginning, about which I notified the Speaker's office, was to help the Government to complete the Committee stage of a Bill. We sat 40 minutes late.

Nigel Griffiths: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for putting that on the record. What it tells the House and people who care to read Hansard is that there are many serious reasons why Members are not in the Chamber. It is the Opposition who chose to raise the matter and dwell on it, to their own embarrassment. I am sure colleagues on the Government side have equally valid reasons.

I end, Madam Deputy Speaker, by thanking you for the role that you have played in this debate and in the absence of the Speaker. We wish the Speaker a recovery to full health, and I wish every Member of the House a peaceful and restful Easter.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PETITIONS

Children's Hospices

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I wish you, Madam Deputy Speaker, all colleagues, officers and staff of the Palace of Westminster a happy Easter, and thank you and everyone else for what you do. Today I especially thank the excellent and honourable team of Doorkeepers who are waiting at the Bar, ready to carry into the Chamber some 250,000 signatures calling for fair play on children's hospice funding.

I have more than 12,000 signatures. These were organised by The Sun under its caring and excellent journalist, Dave Masters, and by Somerfield supermarkets' wonderful Butterfly campaign. I congratulate them. They are heroes. The campaign does not end here. There are plans for the whole year, starting with No. 10 Downing street in May.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of UK residents,

Declares that there is a scandalous lack of funding for children's hospices which care for the most poorly kids, which means these are forced to rely on charitable donations.

The Petitioners therefore implore the House of Commons to call upon the Government to urgently provide short term funds to children's hospices to cover the loss of lottery funds and to improve the longer term funding arrangements for children's hospices and further urges the Government to do all within its power to ensure that children's hospices are, at the very least, funded at the thirty per cent. level awarded to adult hospices.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Lip Reading Services

4.30 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Mrs. Irene Haylock of Benfleet hard of hearing club is chairman of the Essex league of the hard of hearing. Deafness and hearing loss is seriously undervalued as a disability in some areas of society. Deaf people feel that others think that they are just stupid, and they are often excluded in social environments. I am grateful to all those who supported the petition and who care about that disability, including, of course, the Royal National Institute for Deaf People.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Castle Point and others,

Declares that deafness and difficulty of hearing are serious and very debilitating conditions and is undervalued as a disability in many ways therefore the petitioners believe that lip reading is a skill for life and should be provided free of charge to those who need it and are concerned that there is effectively postcode discrimination on the provision of this essential skill, with, for instance, fees in Castle Point being increased from £5 to £90 and that this discriminates against the poor and vulnerable and will prevent people achieving healthy and active life styles and will cost the state more in the longer term.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to ensure there is universal free provision of lip reading services for deaf people and the hard of hearing.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Prevention of Antisocial Behaviour

4.31 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Many good people in the neighbourhood of King George playing field, Canvey Island, are deeply concerned about antisocial behaviour by some youths on the island. Castle Point has a large number of youths, the vast majority of whom are great, caring, honourable, hard-working kids with bright futures, but the situation is spoiled by just a few yobs, who seem to get all the publicity. I am grateful to Inspector Kevin Diable-White of the local police, who is doing all that he can to tackle that problem along with Castle Point borough council and residents.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Castle Point and others,

Declares that the petitioners are deeply concerned about yob behaviour which is causing serious problems for local communities and particularly the elderly with hordes of noisy young people creating more than a nuisance of themselves, particularly on Friday and Saturday nights and that individuals have attempted to bring this to the attention of the council and police which jointly have the responsibility to stop it, but without success, therefore we have decided to get together and hope that this community wide appeal to the authorities will bring results.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon Castle Point Borough Council and the police to take tough action to ensure that yob behaviour which is destroying quality of life is addressed in a sustainable manner.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

DNA Database

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Kevin Brennan.]

4.33 pm

Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): I am delighted to see that hon. Members on both sides of the House are busily engaged in other important matters this afternoon.

The national deoxyribonucleic acid database—the national DNA database—has the potential to transform our country into a low-crime society, but it also has the potential to make us feel that we are living in the "Big Brother" house. There are currently about 3 million people on the database, and that number includes what has been described as "virtually the entire criminally active population".

By 2008, it is predicted to include 4.2 million people, and presumably most of those new additions will be people who are not currently criminally active. Since last year, well over 100,000 law-abiding people have been added, even though they have not been charged with any crime. The number continues to increase each year.

The police currently have the authority to take DNA from any person who is arrested and detained for a recordable offence, including road traffic offences. Samples can be taken by force if necessary, but are generally taken using a swab from the mouth. Those are known as criminal justice samples, but they are not taken only from criminals. There are two other types of sample: those recovered by the police from the scene of a crime; and those taken from volunteers. For example, 4,000 people in Croydon are being tested to eliminate people from the investigation into the murder of Sally Anne Bowman.

The UK database holds the largest amount of data in absolute numerical terms and in percentage of population terms of any other country in the world. It currently stands at 5.2 per cent. of the population; in the United States, it is 0.5 per cent. of the population. To put this in some context, in addition to the profiles of the 3 million or so individuals, there are nearly 300,000 crime scene profiles on the database relating to a variety of crimes such as burglary, theft and fraud. It also contains a significant number of rapists, murderers and kidnappers.

Recent Home Office figures show that where there is DNA at a crime scene, the overall detection rates shoot up: in domestic burglary, from 16 per cent. to 41 per cent.; in theft from a vehicle, from 8 per cent. to 63 per cent.; and in criminal damage, from 14 to 51 per cent. That shows that the average detection rate across all crimes rises from 26 per cent. to 40 per cent. for crimes where a DNA profile has been obtained. In a typical month, that equates to around 15 murders, 45 rapes or sexual offences, and 2,500 motor vehicle, property and drug crimes.

My friend, Commander Dave Johnston, head of homicide at New Scotland Yard, cites the example of a gerontophile—somebody who rapes elderly people—who has for some time been at large in south London. He has raped about 40 women and killed two of them through rupture injuries. The commander says: "We've got buckets of this man's DNA—we just don't have anything to compare it with." He points out that this is just one of the 300,000 outstanding crimes where the offender is known, but only by the DNA that they have left behind. These people cannot be matched to a named person because they are not on the database.

People in my constituency suffer from far too high levels of crime associated with vastly inadequate routine police resources, despite the overall increase in police numbers in recent years. Mercifully, very serious crime is rare, but when it happens, Kent police, under chief constable Mike Fuller, have an excellent record; we need only look at their performance over the £53 million cash heist that took place a month or so ago.

But if we are to reduce crime and make our community safer, we must remove or control those who pose a risk to our well-being and safety. Many of the outstanding DNA samples held by the Forensic Science Service relate to repeat offenders, particularly in cases of rape and serious sexual assault. Many of those as yet unidentified are continuing to offend. Furthermore, the power to take DNA from people after death would be useful in cases of a sexual nature. It would mean that undetected crimes did not remain outstanding if it could be established that the perpetrator had died.

There may be a strong argument for taking DNA from dead people to help manage the current database. At the very least, the police could tell the victim, who might still be living in fear, "Sorry, we didn't get them, but they died." That might be helpful for victims dealing with the effects of such awful crime.

The UK police currently obtain DNA from only 1 per cent. of crimes. Research shows that, with proper investment, that could be increased to more than 54 per cent.—in other words, those crimes where DNA might reasonably be expected to be found. That would significantly increase the number of criminals brought to justice. Of course, that would be wasted if the number of people on the database did not increase.

The science of DNA does not only convict the guilty. It also helps the innocent who may otherwise face trial because of compelling circumstantial evidence or witness statements. There may be cases where a prosecution would have been based on that sort of evidence but for the presence of DNA, which led to another person being convicted or the original suspect being eliminated.

Apparently, in five years, we are likely to be able reliably to tell the skin complexion, height, birthplace and details of any deformity or significant impairment of an individual through DNA. It is possible to grow a sample from the merest touch against a surface or a body using a system called low copy number—LCN. It can currently be used to determine an individual's physical characteristics including, gender, ethnic background, eye colour and hair colour. Many other characteristics are being worked on as the understanding of DNA develops. Recent changes to the law in California are likely to lead to another technological surge as private sector companies seek the massive profits that will be available.

The DNA of any individual comes 50:50 from mother and father. By using that knowledge, family connections can be made. Earlier, I mentioned the gerontophile. The police know, quite precisely, where his family comes from. The closer the family member, the closer the link on the DNA.

DNA can be obtained from almost any cell in the body but is normally taken from testing blood, saliva or semen. In cases of a badly deteriorated corpse, it can also be taken from bones or teeth. One should bear in mind that around 50,000 people remain on the missing list in this country alone.

The current methods are called SGM plus—single generation multiplex plus—which provide 10 different markers for identification. Extrapolated out, they give a statistical likelihood of two similar DNA samples being one in 1 billion.

The country—and my constituents who travel into London day after day—face another gigantic threat from terrorism. Eye-popping work is being done using DNA, as the Under-Secretary knows. Of the four July suicide bombers, we held DNA on only one. If we had had more, the police and national intelligence agencies could have established who they were far more quickly and linked them to other people, other addresses and possibly other scenes.

That is rather a long-winded way of saying that some amazing benefits have come out of the UK's advanced and world-leading position in DNA databasing.

The trouble is that I, and many other people, feel uneasy about the state holding information on us—whether about our financial position, our personal lives, or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) mentioned an hour or so ago, through council tax inspectors. Most of all, many of us feel uneasy at the thought that the state might have part of our physical being by holding our DNA. When I leave here this evening, I could be arrested for a traffic offence. I might not subsequently be convicted, but in five days' time, my DNA could be on the database for all time.

If we are to make the best use of this technology, we must have a proper debate about it. At present, it feels as though we are moving towards a national database by stealth. Perhaps the benefits would be so huge in transforming the crime profile of this country that the public could be swayed in favour of the move. The bottom line should be that, if innocent people's DNA is going to be held on the database, we should have a rational debate and try to bring this about in an open and organised fashion, and not in a haphazard manner, however well intentioned and successful the Government have been in this area.

If the Government want a database that contains the code for everyone, and not just for existing criminals, they should be honest about that. They are getting more and more people, many of them innocent, on to the database, and the challenge for them and the very senior police officers who are calling for a national compulsory database is to reassure people and to win the argument by demonstrating the extraordinary potential benefits to people like me, my constituents, and the civil liberties groups. At present, the bit-by-bit approach is doing nothing to ameliorate people's fears.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Holloway) on securing this debate. Normally, it would be considered "a difficult one" for someone in my position to get the Adjournment debate just before the Easter recess, but I am actually pleased to be here, because this is an important subject. The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to it, and it is right that we are here to discuss it and its implications.

This debate provides a useful opportunity to discuss the contribution that the database makes to the work of the police and the wider criminal justice system, and I want to begin by thanking the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has put forward his remarks today. He has balanced them by recognising what he called the "amazing benefits" that the database has brought, and it is important that the debate should be seen in the context of those benefits, although of course there is a balance to be struck. He has also aired some of the concerns about the retention on the database of the DNA profiles of people who have been arrested but not convicted of an offence, and it is right that we are here to debate those important issues.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Has the Minister considered the difficult and sensitive issue of the benefits and disbenefits of taking DNA samples from anyone who seeks to come to live in this country from abroad?

Andy Burnham: That question relates to the possible expansion of the database, which I will deal with more fully in a moment. However, the answer to the hon. Gentleman's specific question about people coming to this country is no. The Government's position is that we are moving towards a system of external identifiers, commonly known as biometrics. These are being progressively introduced into the British visa—that process is under way as we speak—and the hon. Gentleman will also know that many countries are introducing biometrics into their passports. They are external identifiers, and there are no plans to go further and to take DNA from people wishing to travel here.

Bob Spink: The Minister might not be aware that the Science and Technology Committee has looked at biometrics, including iris and facial recognition and fingerprints, and found no evidence from any large-scale project that using multiple biometrics in the way that the Government propose would work technologically. The Government are simply making an assumption that they would work, but there is no evidence of that. In the absence of a working biometrics system, would the Minister consider the use of DNA?

Andy Burnham: No, I would not. I do not believe that people would accept that. Even for someone often accused, as I am, of not having regard for such matters, it would raise substantial civil liberties implications. On that basis, I would rule it out categorically. As to the questions that the hon. Gentleman raises about the effectiveness of biometrics, I do not accept that that is the case. I do not know whether he has travelled to the United States recently, but it has a large-scale immigration system that uses biometric information extremely successfully. His assertion that there is no evidence of external biometrics providing a higher standard of identification in travel documents is therefore wrong.

Like the hon. Member for Gravesham, I recognise that the national DNA database is an extremely powerful tool. It therefore follows that it needs to be used carefully and proportionately, with the fullest possible parliamentary scrutiny. That is why I am pleased that he has secured this debate and that we are here today. I want to make a commitment to him and the House that that scrutiny will continue, and it is important that it does. He is right to say that it is important to explain the benefits of the national DNA database so that we can continue to build a consensus in support of it. It is right that the debate should be taken forward with openness, not secrecy. In that way, we will maintain and secure confidence.

As the hon. Member for Gravesham rightly says, the database is achieving some extraordinary public benefits by solving crime, especially some appalling crimes that have remained unsolved for many years. It rightly commands solid and sound public support, and in my view the majority of our constituents support it and want it used to the fullest possible extent. I want to give some examples of that success. It is important to conduct the debate, and explain the benefits, without resorting to language likely to raise fear or alarm unnecessarily among the public. In certain quarters, the database is viewed as something necessarily to be feared. I want to deal with that directly.

There is no material disadvantage or cost to the individual simply from being on the national DNA database—it is not a criminal record. A cost arises only if a further crime is committed. Even before the advent of DNA technologies, the police always retained information relevant to an investigation that they had carried out, even if that investigation did not subsequently proceed to charge or trial. Those decisions have always properly been at the discretion of the police and, ultimately, of the chief constable of a force. I would not want that to change. It is right, however, that processes are put in place to ensure that people can question the legitimacy of their data being held on the DNA database. The Association of Chief Police Officers has recently been working on guidelines for those procedures.

We can also consider other safeguards, such as the proviso that DNA is only taken when an individual is arrested in connection with a recordable offence. The hon. Member for Gravesham suggested a couple of times, although I do not think that he sought to be misleading, that someone arrested for a road traffic offence could have their DNA taken. That would only occur in the case of a more serious road traffic offence. It would not happen, for example, if someone had not been wearing their seatbelt, but in cases of serious offences such as failing to provide a specimen of breath when requested or tampering with a vehicle. It is important to put that on the record.

A further safeguard is that access to the database is strictly limited. Only a small number of people—less than 30—have direct access to the database. People cannot access the database from police stations all over the country. That is an important safeguard, which people want to hear about. The individuals who can access the database are highly vetted and security-cleared. The statutory purposes of the database are also clearly defined: those relating to the detection and prevention of crime, with the extension to the identification of dead bodies, following the awful events of the tsunami.

Let me give some background to the debate. The DNA database has been in existence for 10 years. It was begun under the Conservative party, and was set up as a police intelligence database to hold DNA profiles from persons charged with, reported for or convicted of a recordable offence. Between 1995 and 2000, the number of DNA profiles from sampled individuals grew slowly from zero to approximately 750,000. In the late 1990s there were around 21,000 DNA matches per year, providing the police with leads on the possible identity of offenders.

It was clear that DNA was having an impact on serious crime, and on high-volume crimes such as burglary and vehicle crime. That illustrated the potential value of the database. In 1999, therefore, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced plans to increase the use of DNA technology through the setting up of the DNA expansion programme, and significant investment—some £300 million—was allocated to the programme. Its aims were to expand the database to hold profiles of all active criminals—the hon. Gentleman mentioned that—and to take DNA materials from more crime scenes and load them on the database. The database holds both types of sample. We believe that the programme has achieved its aims, and that is borne out by the recent progress report on it.

It is impossible to be precise, but we believe that the database now covers a large proportion of the criminally active population. At the end of February 2006, it held more than 3.5 million profiles from sampled individuals. Between 2000 and 2005, more than 2.25 million persons were sampled and their profiles were added to the database. That is treble the number of profiles loaded in the previous five years, between 1995 and 2000.

The database is a key police intelligence tool, helping to identify offenders more quickly, eliminate suspected offenders earlier in investigations, make earlier arrests and secure more convictions. Those are very important public policy objectives, of which I am sure Members in all parts of the House approve. The database provides criminal leads for police investigations.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the forecast growth of the database. Forecasts indicate that it is likely to expand to 4.25 million profiles by 2007–08 as a result of the sampling of arrested persons and newcomers to crime. It is not the case that anyone added to it is "innocent". The hon. Gentleman may not have meant that, but it was possible to interpret what he said in that way. There are currently more than 6.2 million records on the national fingerprint database. That is to be expected, as the national fingerprint collection has existed for far longer—since the first half of the last century.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of a universal DNA database, and the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) strayed into the same territory, wondering whether DNA should be collected more generally. It remains our view that the national DNA database is an intelligence database for police service use, to assist in the fight against crime. That is clearly laid out in the statutory purpose of the database. The Government have no plans—I repeat, no plans—to introduce a universal compulsory, or voluntary, national DNA database, or to seek to obtain DNA samples from the entire population. Nor is it our intention to build the database by stealth. It is our intention simply that the samples will continue to match arrests made and crimes committed.

We believe that seeking to obtain DNA samples from the entire population would raise significant practical and ethical issues, and there would need to be a national debate on it. I do not think that the country is ready to hold that debate, as may be shown by our long debates on identity cards. I do not believe that we have reached the point at which people would accept such a step. I do believe, however, that we have reached the point at which people accept the existence of the national DNA database for the policing and crime detection purposes that I have described—as long as there is proper scrutiny and debate, and testing of issues around the edges of the debate, notably the retention of samples from arrestees.

Following an amendment to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, the police have been able to retain DNA and fingerprints taken from persons who have been charged with, but not convicted of, recordable offences, and detained in police stations. DNA samples retained under PACE may be used only for the purposes of prevention and detection of crime, the investigation of an offence, the conduct of a prosecution or, since April 2005, the identification of a deceased person.

The Government firmly believe that the 2001 amendment is both proportionate and justified in the interests of preventing and detecting crime. That view was supported by a Judicial Committee of the other place in the case of R v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire in July 2004. The case was a rape case, in which DNA evidence had been ruled inadmissible, even though it established the identity of one of those involved. Following that case, the House debated fully the issue of whether the rule needed to be changed, and whether the police required greater flexibility to retain DNA samples.

Since May 2001, some 200,000 DNA samples have been retained that would previously have had to be destroyed. From those, approximately 8,500 profiles of individuals have been linked with crime scene stains, involving nearly 14,000 offences. Those offences include 114 murders, 55 attempted murders, 116 rapes, 68 sexual offences and 119 aggravated burglaries. I urge those who campaign against the DNA database to reflect on those figures, which are evidence of substantial public benefit for the victims and their families of the policy that was introduced on the retention of DNA samples.

In 2003, following representations from the police service, new powers were introduced enabling the police to take DNA and fingerprints from persons who have been arrested for a recordable offence and detained in a police station. The great majority of profiles on the database are from individuals who have been either convicted of or charged with an offence. As at early December 2005, only around 125,000 profiles related to persons who had been arrested but no further action had been taken in the case.

It is a fact that the police arrest more people than they charge, and we do of course accept that broadening police powers in that way has civil liberties implications. The Government appreciate that some people may be concerned about building a larger DNA database, particularly where it relates to arrested people who have not been proceeded against for an offence. Although we recognise all those concerns, we have nevertheless concluded that any intrusion on personal liberty is both necessary and proportionate to the benefits for victims of crime and society generally in terms of detecting crime and protecting the public against criminals.

Those benefits are evidenced by the fact that since April 2004, sampling persons who have been arrested but not proceeded against has yielded a match with a crime scene stain in more than 3,000 offences, including 37 murders, 16 attempted murders, 90 rapes and 1,136 burglary offences. Those are links that might never have been made had the police not been given powers to take and retain DNA samples on arrest.

Questions have been raised about the under-18s and the database. Around 740,000 of the profiles on the database relate to young persons who were under 18 at the time the sample was taken. Many of those persons are now over 18. As at 13 December 2005, there were around 377,000 under-18s on the database. Young persons under the age of 18 who have their DNA on the database have been portrayed in some sections of the media as innocent children. We need to recognise that, sadly, that is not always the case. Under-18s make up approximately 23 per cent. of all arrests, and thus a comparable proportion of young persons' profiles on the database should not be unexpected. Home Office statistics published in 2003 indicate that the peak rate of offending is among young persons.

Many offences including burglaries, robberies, criminal damage and drugs offences are committed by under-18s, causing great distress to their victims. Some young people go on to commit very serious offences. For example, a case was reported last week of a 14-year-old who had raped four children of primary school age. It is crucial that the police have access to DNA intelligence to ensure that young people who commit such crimes are detected as soon as possible, for the sake of their victims and in order to prevent any further such crimes.

That said, there will inevitably be some instances where entirely innocent young people are arrested and sampled in a case of mistaken identity, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out. In such cases, chief officers have the operational discretion to remove the DNA profile from the database and to destroy the DNA sample. Recent guidance from the Association of Chief Police Officers has laid down how the process can be pursued. Members acting on their constituents' behalf can of course follow that process, details of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Let me give some examples of the benefits of a national DNA database. Almost every week the media report on the outcome of criminal cases in which DNA-matched intelligence has been used and relied on. On average, the database provides police with 3,000 intelligence matches a month, thereby enhancing their capability to detect crime; indeed, some 40,000 such crimes were detected in 2004–05. The hon. Gentleman gave figures for cases in his own region during Operation Advance 1, which, as he may know, was a nationwide review of cold cases. For example, in Tunbridge Wells in 1989, an 18-year-old woman was threatened with a shotgun and raped, and only when the offender was arrested in 2004—when Kent police began reviewing undetected serious crimes using modern DNA techniques—did he eventually plead guilty to rape and false imprisonment. He was sentenced to 13 years in prison. Other cases in the hon. Gentleman's region include the sentencing to life of a man found guilty of raping two students at knifepoint, 16 years after those offences were committed.

A powerful feature of the database is that if someone who committed a serious offence many years ago commits a more trivial one some years later, that requires the taking of a DNA sample and the link between the two offences is triggered. The ability to link a range of criminal behaviour back to serious crimes is very important, and the two cases from the hon. Gentleman's region that I mentioned are powerful examples of how the database can uncover such links. Members may have read this week of "Wearside Jack", the hoaxer who disrupted the hunt for the Yorkshire ripper. The man in question, who has since been arrested and convicted, had a sample taken in 2001 when he was arrested and cautioned for being drunk and disorderly. A cold case review in 2005 of the original hoax case retrieved DNA from the seal on one of the envelopes used to send the hoax letters. That DNA matched the later sample.

Amazing stories are emerging in our press almost weekly, and when people read them they will immediately appreciate the power and benefit of the national DNA database. The cases are, at times, incredibly moving, and the victims are given a chance to regain their lives as they perhaps thought that they never would. Following a successful prosecution in a serious case, a senior investigating officer involved in the cold case review said the following:

> "We would never have caught him had his DNA not already been on the database—he didn't even live locally so we had no intelligence leads either".

As Members will appreciate, the ability to make connections between cases in various parts of the country is a very powerful policing tool.

I could regale hon. Members with plenty more statistics and stories, but I do not want to keep them from leaving for their Easter break. However, I believe that the database is an intriguing subject, and that the House should take a close interest in it. I am ready to help it to do so, as I want the debate to be open and conducted in a spirit of explanation rather than the sort of scaremongering that would be a disservice to the public. The hon. Member for Gravesham has certainly shown the proper spirit in his approach to this debate.

I assure the House that it is not the Government's intention to build a database by stealth, or to amass more and more information for some ulterior purpose. We want that information to help the police—whom we pay to protect us—to do their job better. In that way, victims will get more justice, and the population as a whole will feel more secure. Apart from aiding the identification of deceased bodies—I am sure that no hon. Members will disagree with that use of the information—that is the only reason for compiling the DNA database.

The statutory purposes behind the database mean that people can be confident that it is being taken forward in the right way. From his remarks, I took it that the hon. Member for Gravesham supported the principles underlying the database's use, but that he wanted confirmation of its openness and accountability. That is a perfectly legitimate request, and I am happy to have been able to respond. I again congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate, and in wishing the House a happy Easter break, I also hope that more parliamentary time can be given to this important matter in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Rape Cases

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

9.30 am

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): In 1999, I wrote a pamphlet for the Society of Labour Lawyers called "Rape in Court"—that is a clever double entendre. If anyone wants a copy of the valuable first edition, an odd one is still available. In it I said that, in 1985, 25 per cent. of rape complaints brought a conviction, with no recorded assertion that the conviction rate was unjustly high. By the date of its writing, complaints had risen to an all-time high but the conviction rate for rape was just 9 per cent.

I set out the need to restrict the rules that allow cross-examination about previous sexual history, to encourage women who are afraid of such cross-examination, and to address the findings of a Canadian researcher called Calton that where jurors hear information about a rape complainant's previous sexual history it leads to a decrease in the perception of the accused's guilt, and that that varies directly with the amount of negative information put before a jury. A defendant was seen as most guilty where nothing was known about her. Calton also found that if all the material alleged against her was denied by the complainant, the perception of the defendant's guilt still decreased—a recipe, one may think, for unjust acquittals.

The change to restrict cross-examination about previous sexual history was brought about in section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, as far as its admissibility to show that she consented was concerned. It is subject to a number of exclusions, but basically it is excluded. However, that has not worked.

In "Rape in Court" I hesitated to recommend that the defence that the defendant believed that the woman was consenting even if she was not should be changed so that only a reasonable belief that she was consenting would do. Rape is having sex when the victim does not consent—and, in those days, when the attacker did not believe that she consented. I was wrong not to want to change that. A jury is told to decide whether she was consenting first, and simply to end the case if she might have been. Only if it is sure that she was not consenting should it go on to consider whether, even so, the defendant might have believed that she was. At that stage, in the jury's view she has had sex forced on her.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): On the question of whether a jury might believe that someone had consented to rape, what conclusions does my hon. and learned Friend draw from the Amnesty survey that showed that a third of people think that a woman is asking for it if she is drunk or dressed inappropriately? Does she think that such attitudes might influence a jury, and what can we do to change them?

Vera Baird: I agree that those findings were troubling, and one can only say thank goodness for the other two thirds. However, I venture to wonder whether those factors would carry the same force if the same people were not answering a question in a survey, but were in a jury confronted by the deep trauma of a rape complainant. Therefore, I am not totally pessimistic about those outcomes, but they are serious.

If, at the stage where the jury is told that it must consider consent, and that only if it is sure that the complainant has not consented should it go on, the jury finds that she has had sex forced upon her, it is told that next it must look into the question whether, even though it is satisfied that she was not consenting, the defendant might have thought that she was. In those days, if he said that that is what he thought, even if she said she was screaming her refusal, for whatever reason—perhaps because he is a man who thinks that all women who say no mean yes—the jury had to give him the benefit of the doubt and acquit him. Therefore, somebody who had had sex forced on them while screaming their refusal would get no justice because the man's state of mind carried the day—and her suffering meant very little. That was changed in the Sexual Offences Act 2003, and that was correct. A belief in her consent does not now count unless it is reasonable, so the jury not only looks at his state of mind, but asks itself that second question, probably testing his honesty through the prism of reasonableness, but also redressing the balance between him and her. Therefore, there have been two important changes in the law.

There have been many other changes. In 1999, special measures became available to allow a complainant an easier time in court; the public can be excluded, or she can give evidence from behind a screen. In 2002, the joint inspectors of the Crown Prosecution Service and the police found serious failings in investigations and prosecutions. Lobbyists from the women's movement were happy that at last authoritative sources—as it were—were supporting them. There was an action plan from the Government, which is being implemented. Consent has been redefined as agreement by choice, a model intended to show the need for active consent, and not to muddle it with passive submission. Where the complainant was unconscious or in a restraint situation there is a presumption that she was not consenting and he did not think so. Judges now have to go on a serious sexual offence training course. Also, sexual assault referral centres offer a very supportive model—a place of first resort—for complainants. All those changes have taken place; the Government have made those serious moves, and they are to be applauded for seeing the problem and helping.

However, what are the conviction rates? Seven years after the publication of my pamphlet and all those steps later, they are worse. Instead of the 9 per cent. that prevailed in 1999, 5.3 per cent. is the average nationwide conviction rate. The British crime survey, in which people are asked about their experiences of crime anonymously and for no other purpose but to record them, suggests that 47,000 women were raped in 2004 and that only about 15 per cent. reported that to the authorities. Rape crisis lines suggest that the figure is even higher. There is a myth that there are many false allegations of rape. Home Office research that I will refer to shortly found that 6 per cent. of those reported cases were probably false—that is small in comparison with the acquittal rate of 94.7 per cent.

[Vera Baird]

Let me explain the point that I am making. Those who talk to the British crime survey will be telling the truth, and those who phone rape report centres are doing so for help and are unlikely to be seeking help for something that did not happen. Therefore, those numbers—47,000 in a year of whom only 15 per cent. report—are likely, on first principles, to be accurate.

The conviction rate of 5.3 per cent. is 5.3 per cent. of the 15 per cent. who reported, which means a conviction rate in respect of those who suffer rape of less than 1 per cent. Of those acts of rape, 57 per cent. were perpetrated by men who were known to the assailant. All rape is deeply traumatising, but the trauma and long-term effects of being raped by someone who a person knows can be worse than those of being raped by a stranger; it calls into question not just the conduct of the assailant but the woman's judgment for ever being with that individual in the first place. Rape is a deeply traumatic event. The term for the fallout between the number of rapes and the number of convictions is attrition, and that is the subject of this debate.

What is happening and what can we do? There is no doubt that over the past decade we have succeeded in increasing the number of complaints—not necessarily because more rapes are taking place, but because women have been encouraged to come forward—but the number of convictions has been relatively static. The research—"A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in reported rape cases"—looks at 2004. Although some of the statutory changes that I have talked about were to do with the trial process, the biggest drop-out is right at the beginning of the case. We must look first at the large number who simply decide not to report at all—about 85 per cent.—and wonder why they do not report. A number of studies have looked into that.

It is true that, curiously, some people do not name the event that has befallen them as rape; they do not think that it is rape. A number of them do not want to report because they are afraid of their family and friends knowing, and feel some shame. However, the bulk of the reasons are to do with not thinking that the police or any other criminal justice agency will define what has happened as rape, fear of being disbelieved by those agencies, fear of being blamed or judged—in particular if they have a previous sexual history—by those agencies, distrust of the police, courts and legal process, and fear of further attack or intimidation. In other words, a large proportion of those who do not report have very low faith in the criminal justice system. That is why they do not report.

Attrition point 2, if I may call it that, is due to people who drop out almost straight away or do not get beyond reporting, and do not even give a statement. Some 34 per cent. of cases that are reported are lost at that very early stage. The import of the research is that the agencies were not pleasant and not supportive. Those respondents who did not even make a statement although they had gone with the intention of reporting cited as key factors being disbelieved or discouraged from proceeding by the police and fear of the criminal justice process. The availability of women police officers, women crisis workers and women forensic doctors was very important, and lack of those has also played a major role.

A proportion of women chose not to proceed because they wanted to take back control of the issue, but a lot of those had no contact with the police for some time after their initial report, and no offender had been identified. There is a real suggestion that many felt that they were waiting too long, could not take it any longer and needed to put the event behind them. That amounted to 34 per cent. of the withdrawal rate.

The third point of attrition is called insufficient evidence, but to that must be added two related categories: cases in which no offender is identified, and cases in which there is no prospect of a conviction. Those are the categories of the documents surveyed, and they account for a further 36 per cent. of all reports. The pro formas that the researchers found related to a failure to trace a named assailant and assessments by the police of weak cases or cases with no prospect of conviction. Some cases in which the assailant was not identified are most interesting. Of 239 cases in which the police could not identify the assailant, they made DNA tests in 19 only. In five cases, samples were sent to, and got hits on, the national DNA database. In 30 cases, the situation was clear: there were no forensic findings at all, so there was no DNA to send. However, in all 190 other cases it is completely unclear why nothing was sent to the DNA database.

Judy Mallaber: My hon. and learned Friend mentioned sexual assault referral centres, one of which is in my area. Does she agree that if they were more widely available, and if all of them had access to forensic nurses and were widely publicised, it might both encourage women to come forward and to be prepared to go to court, and assist in gathering the evidence, including DNA, to enable convictions? Does she have any evidence of how those centres have worked so far to encourage women in those ways?

Vera Baird: My hon. Friend, in her characteristic way, puts her finger on a shining light of success. Although it is early days, the evidence running through the research is that women who go to sexual assault referral centres are more likely to stay and make a complaint, to stay the course of a prosecution and to end up with a conviction—although not, I think, by a huge margin. There is none the less powerful evidence that the step of introducing SARCs is correct.

SARCs make DNA available, but the question is what the police then do with it. Paralleling the facts that I gave about the few cases from the sample sent for DNA comparison, if one looks back to the 2002 report by the inspectors of the CPS and the police, one can see that when the woman knew her assailant and a sample was taken from her, a large number of detectives—I think that the figure was 82 per cent.—did not send the DNA sample to the database to look for a match. Okay, so there was no issue about the identity of the individual; but the point is, of course, that the assailant's DNA could have been found on another crime scene stain. Equally, the DNA could be that of a convicted rapist, or of someone against whom there had been one or more previous complaints, even if they had resulted in acquittal. In a majority of cases, that simply was not done when the woman knew her accuser.

That information confirms something that runs through the research, and which is pretty well established: the police have a view of what is "real" rape and what is not. When the assailant is a stranger in a mask in a dark alley, that is real rape, and the police then work very hard at identifying him; but when it is a person known to the woman, they do not seem to treat it as a proper crime, or they would have sent the samples off to the DNA database. The police seem to think that he is unlikely to be a criminal because he is the woman's boyfriend, and that the whole thing is the result of some confusion between the two.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What the hon. and learned Lady says may be perfectly true—I have no reason to dispute it—but does she agree that the attrition of rape cases to which she refers may be equally applicable to other crimes of assault? Does she agree that the police may regard those who hit people in the street as not being guilty of a real assault if both involved were drunk, or something of that sort? I am not trying to diminish her case, but I fear that the police are not as active as they might be in pursuing other crimes.

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman may well be right that if two people are drunk, the police do not put much effort into the case; I am not in a position to say. However, there is no doubt that all statistics show that the drop-out or attrition rate for rape is far higher than that for any other assault.

My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General looks after the CPS rather than the police, and of course the CPS has enormous influence and control over the police. It is clear that the 2002 inspection, just like the research of 2004, shows scepticism about whether rape is a real crime. The attitude is, "Don't send a sample off to see if he's a criminal; it's highly unlikely that he is if he knows her. He's her boyfriend and something's gone wrong."

So, many assailants are not identified in situations where the woman knows who he is but does not know his address or cannot put a proper name to him, because the police do not check that up. In at least eight instances from the sample, the identified defendant absconded. I have here a story in which when a woman complained, the assailant

"contacted the police, and said oh, it was all a big mistake, and could he come and see them? And instead of saying 'No, we'll come and see you,' they said, 'Well come up on Monday' . . . So what did he do? Sunday, he got his brother to go down to London, to collect his car, and he caught the first train, bus, walked, whatever, boat, out of the country. Gone."

I doubt that that would happen with many other kinds of crime.

In the remaining types of case in the sample—those in which the assailant was not identified—police decision making turned on evidential issues, all connected with the complainant. Largely, those were cases in which the woman's account was regarded with suspicion or was not supported by any other evidence; cases in which her credibility was explicitly referred to as questionable simply because there was no support for it; and cases where previous, unsuccessful allegations of rape cast doubt on current complaints. Inconsistencies, perhaps explicable by the trauma, were relied on in 27 cases, and in 26 cases the police and the CPS simply took the view that the sex was consensual, and that was the end of it. In all the cases in that group, about a quarter of which were "no prospect of conviction" cases, the decisions were made or advised by the CPS. Some of those "no prospect of conviction" cases involved women with learning difficulties or mental health problems and people who had made previous allegations.

Two earlier studies have shown the complete failure to make progress on cases involving women with learning difficulties and mental health problems. That is a really difficult problem. How can such a person sustain their account against cross-examination? Specific attention needs to be devoted to developing prosecution strategies that will help those vulnerable victims.

Having chronicled the rather poor history of the CPS seeking to drive investigation, I draw attention to the impact of previous allegations on decision making. Where it is mentioned that the complainant has complained before and been unsuccessful, the cases are dropped. The data on multiple attendees at some sexual assault referral centres suggest that there is a group of women who are subjected to repeated sexual victimisation by different assailants. Currently, that vulnerability functions as a cue to dismiss the allegations, but if one thinks rationally about this, it could be argued that the entire attrition process will produce thousands of complainants each year entering a group that, should they have the misfortune to be assaulted in future, will mean that their complaint will be treated with even greater scepticism. The sheer fact of the attrition rate means that there will be increasing numbers of women who have complained before whose accounts will, consequently, be disregarded on a subsequent occasion.

A perplexing aspect of this category of cases is the number of them in which the police and CPS thought that witnesses proved that the sexual encounter had been consensual. However, in no case was there an eye witness. One of the complainants said that she thought "they were just going through the motions . . . The forensic stuff was never . . . sent off . . . the investigation consisted of them . . . getting"

the defendants in and

"giving their story, sending off questionnaires to students at the college I was at . . . .And people wrote things like, 'She appeared to be really happy in their company that evening,' which of course I was, because I hadn't just been assaulted by them" then.

"However, that, the officer in the case said, was what would make it quite impossible for there to be a conviction and off it went."

That is a prime example of the woman's case being reasonably clear. However, evidence that truly could not bear comparison with an individual's account was being used, exactly as the researchers' report says, to throw doubt on her account and say, "This is not worth taking forward."

All these examples seem to bear out the fears that characterise the decision of women not to make a report at all: that the matter would not be investigated and taken seriously, and that they would not be believed, but would be doubted if they had any previous sexual history. Such matters seem to show them that they were absolutely right not to take the case forward.

The last attrition point before trial is CPS decision making, which accounts for a relatively small group of cases that drop out at that stage, although it is correct to say that the CPS had offered opinions on large numbers of previous advice files, so it bears responsibility for many of the cases to which I have already referred. The researchers say that there is a shift in the CPS towards engagement with inter-agency processes and recognising the needs of victims. There is also a policy change towards the development of specialisations, which are new and welcome, although their implementation is inconsistent. However, they need to be linked to a focus on building cases, rather than doubting them.

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The report, which I have looked at, did not say very much about the significant change that has taken place in relation to charging, which will mean that as far as rape cases are concerned, the CPS will make the decision to charge based on the evidence, whereas in previous circumstances it would have been the police who made that decision. Given that that will probably be quite a significant change, I would welcome my hon. and learned Friend's views on it.

Vera Baird: Most of this sample postdates that change. The researchers complained that the CPS has been involved in advising at an early stage, but it should have been saying to the police, "That is not good enough; you should send the DNA away and try to arrest this person. You shouldn't rely on those questionnaires. Go back and do it properly." The complaint is that the CPS is not driving the process. The researchers acknowledge readily the change towards a supportive approach from the CPS—my hon. and learned Friend has a good deal to be proud of—but, none the less, they make those comments on 2004 material, and it was 2004 when the change came into play, as I recall.

There is a further drop rate at trial. Cases involving people under 16 were twice as likely to result in a finding of guilt as those involving over-16s. The absence of alcohol or drugs was associated with conviction. External injuries, which act as corroboration of oppression or force, meant that there was twice as likely to be a conviction. Those who had been to SARCs held on and gave their evidence better, and there was a higher conviction rate from them.

I am sure that hon. Members are aware that the report is a decent-sized piece of research, which, although it is not quite as big as "War and Peace", is a lot bigger than I can fully give an account of here. I shall give a summary of it, which is always subjective. I suggest that the report is read. I hope that I am putting it fairly, but it needs deeper perusal. The researchers conclude:

> "The belief amongst some criminal justice . . . professionals that many complaints are false, that victims are to blame for 'risk-taking', places unreasonable requirements on complainants to demonstrate that they are 'real' and deserving victims."

They quote from another piece of research and acknowledge:

> "Only a sober young woman, who does not have a bad reputation, who has not behaved . . . provocatively and who has said no in the right way can be raped, and only by a young man who is sober and 'deviant' and with whom she is not in love."

The researchers say:

> "It is the awareness of these realities, and the fact that their credibility will be questioned in court (and, potentially, their sexual history raised), that was the most potent reason behind women's decisions to withdraw their complaint. Very early decisions to not complete the initial elements of an investigation are influenced by careless and insensitive treatment by police officers, as well as an existing perception of not being able to face any potential court process. Examples were uncovered of miscommunications, where police officers, in good faith, honestly conveyed the unlikelihood of a conviction and the difficulty of the court experience. These messages, whilst accurate", were taken as discouragement.

In terms of understanding early withdrawal, victim care and satisfaction are important. The researchers paid great credit to the CPS and the police for increasing and improving the level of victim care and satisfaction enormously, compared with studies conducted even in the 1990s. However, although they say that that has improved, far less attention has been given to improving investigation.

All this is pretty well as it was in 2002 and 1999, when I wrote the famous tome that I have referred to. So, what more can we do? I had the good fortune to have a conversation with a senior, experienced circuit judge, who has requested to remain anonymous, but was good enough to talk to me in my part of the country about how he saw rape, as it were, at the coal face. He said that juries just will not have it unless there is corroboration; they take a moral and, perhaps, practical view that a lot of young women have had far too much to drink and are out for a good time, which might include having sex on the dance floor or somewhere nearby. He said that most acquittals are pretty quick, even after a three or four-day fight. Corroboration, he said, is the most important thing and without it the case is pretty hopeless.

Looking back at all the criticisms of the police, who did not send the DNA and relied on questionnaires and did not investigate people to whom the person had complained—all those failures of investigation—the judge put his finger on what rape researchers know. It is an unusual confluence of views from women in the rape lobby and judges that it is failures of policing and the failure of the police to be driven by the CPS into better policing that account for a great deal of this problem.

The judge also told me that the police do not investigate day-to-day matters well at operational level; they throw resources at getting target criminals and when there is a murder, the sky's the limit on the investigation, but they take rape insufficiently seriously. He said, "There is not a keen enough mind at an early enough stage being applied to how corroboration can be obtained in these cases." He also referred to the admissibility of previous sexual history, which is covered by section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, and said, "It always goes on previous sexual history." The idea behind section 41 was that the application to put in previous sexual history should be heard in advance of the trial, but he said, "Well, that will never happen. There are so many rapes and judges are shuffled about a lot, so it is simply not practical to do the application ahead of time. The defence would simply retake the point at the beginning of the trial." However, he also said that the point was not major, because the application is mostly simply not made. But trying to make it ahead of the trial would have a limiting factor; "rightly or wrongly, we would want to hear what the victim said, to form a view of her evidence before deciding whether her previous sexual history was relevant".

An academic called Neil Kibble was commissioned by the Criminal Bar Association to research the operation of section 41, and he concluded that it ought not to have been passed and that there was no point to it. Although it is an arrogant thing to say, I do not agree with his conclusions about his own research. A small number of judges found that the tests that section 41 made them apply to their own thinking made them focus more clearly than otherwise on the relevance of previous sexual history, and led to their excluding such evidence on occasions when they were confident that, but for those tests, they would have put the evidence in.

It is cheering rather than depressing that the section has made some difference. However, the limiting factor on section 41 exclusions is, and has always been, that it excludes previous sexual history only to cover consent. One could not put in previous sexual history to show that the victim was more likely to have consented because she had sex all over the place. However, such history could go in to show that the defendant believed that she was consenting. That is the second test, and showing such belief has never been, and cannot be, excluded.

If a defendant says in a trial that the victim was consenting, it is implicit that he is running both defences at once—first, that she was consenting and secondly that he believed that she was consenting. Whatever the merits of trying to exclude such evidence so that it cannot show consent, in any trial such evidence can come in around the legislation for the purposes of showing belief in consent. That, of course, is a problem.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I ask the following question out of ignorance; I have neither prosecuted nor defended in a rape case, although I have appeared in a similar case that I might talk about in a moment.

When the section 41 point is argued, does the defendant have to persuade the judge that he had some knowledge of the victim's sexual history? Clearly, if the defendant had no knowledge of that history, he could not argue that she must have consented, that she was likely to have consented or that he believed she had consented because of that previous sexual history.

Vera Baird: Yes, the hon. and learned Gentleman puts his finger on an important point. The difficulty is that to try to show that the victim had consented, such evidence could come in from anywhere—saying, in short, that she was a tart and very likely to have consented. That need not have been part of the defendant's knowledge. That area of evidence is narrower anyway, but it cannot be put in for that purpose now.

However, when the issue is about the defendant's state of mind, he can put in all sorts of rumour, chit chat and street-end gossip, because as long as such things were relevant to his belief, it would not matter where they came from, although such material would be utterly valueless. In his research, Calton stated that the more previous sexual history is put in—even if it is denied—the more likely it is that the defendant will be acquitted.

Is the time approaching when we have to look carefully at whether the only successful way to exclude previous sexual history is to exclude it for all purposes except in a narrow sector of cases, when it may be relevant to something separate from consent or belief in consent? That is the double-or-quits process with section 41 at this stage. On the front line, judges, rape complainants and campaigners agree that section 41 is not working.

A very interesting point, my next to last, is that there are—

The Solicitor-General: Before my hon. and learned Friend moves on, I should say that one of the section 41 issues that I have been considering is the application of rule 36, which is that prior notice needs to be given of questioning on previous sexual history. Some of that is being breached by the way that judges are reaching decisions. I am particularly considering how we can tighten that up so that women do not arrive at court expecting not to be questioned about their previous sexual history only to find out that they are. That area is key. If a woman knows that she is likely to be questioned on that, she may be prepared for it; if she does not know that she will be until the court makes that decision during the hearing, it will be far more traumatic for her to be cross-examined.

Vera Baird: What my hon. and learned Friend has said is absolutely right, and ties in a little with what the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) was saying. As such evidence can come from any kind of rumour or gossip, the victim may not expect it, and throwing such things on a person in public has a very powerful effect. It is imperative that the issue should be tried earlier.

The judge whom I mentioned said that it would not be easy if the issue were tried earlier, because a new judge might have a different view from that of his predecessor and it would be open to the defendant to try again at trial. However, the ruling of the first judge could be made binding on the trial judge, so that it would not be possible to reopen the issue. I agree that it is important that the decision should be made early so that the victim knows about it and can decide not to go.

However, the more important point is that it is easy to get round the whole of section 41, because implicit in saying that the complainant was consenting is the defendant's belief that she was consenting. However tightly we draw the exclusion, if it does not apply to belief and consent, it will not protect her.

The national average conviction rate for rape is 5.3 per cent., but there are amazing differences between different areas of the country. I am poor at geography, but I think that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough comes from somewhere near Northamptonshire, in which case he has cause to be pleased with his neighbours. Northamptonshire had a conviction success rate of 13.8 per cent. in 2004. The county prosecutes 25.25 per cent. of everybody arrested against whom there is a rape complaint, and convicts 53 per cent. of them. Compare and contrast Suffolk, where 11 per cent. of those complained against are prosecuted and only 14.25 per cent. of that 11 per cent. are convicted. Suffolk has a conviction rate of 1.6 per cent. of those complained against—compare 13.8 per cent. with 1.6 per cent!

My own police and CPS area of Cleveland prosecutes a fifth of people against whom there is a complaint and convicts 37 per cent. of them—a 7.76 per cent.

[Vera Baird]

conviction rate, higher than the national average, despite the negative views of the judge that I mentioned, who comes from that area. Cleveland has a very good CPS service. Lessons must be disseminated from good areas such as Northampton—south Wales is almost as good—to the poor areas that let everyone down.

Finally, great successes are being reported from specialist courts; the ones that we know of, although they are new, which are domestic violence specialist courts. Is there a lesson to be learned? In such courts, cases, having been investigated by a specialist prosecutor, are heard on the same day, in the same court, before magistrates who are trained specialists.

All the old-fashioned attitudes that permeated domestic violence—that it is a private matter, part and parcel of a relationship, and that we should not interfere—are simply ousted by much exposure and lots of training. Could we oust in the same way the poor attitudes that permeate the investigation and prosecution of rape? Is there scope for specialist sexual violence courts?

South Africa has specialist sexual violence courts. They are relatively new and I know little about them. As the theme that runs through my pamphlet, the 2002 inspectors' report and this research is that attitudinal difficulties, from the first reporting to the failure in the Crown court, are the problem, is further specialism, including specialism of the fact finders at court, the way forward?

All these five points should be considered seriously, because unless they are and unless we take more steps, on top of the good ones that have been taken, when, to public acclaim, I write the second edition of "Rape in Court" soon, I shall hardly have to change it at all.

10.10 am

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am always grateful that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) gives us regular opportunities to debate this issue, and it is important that we do so. I pay tribute to her consistent and well-informed work, including the writing of the pamphlet she mentioned, which I had not heard of and had not read. I would be happy to take, borrow or, if she is really desperate, buy a copy of it to put on my shelves.

I also pay tribute to the Solicitor-General. He has taken the issue extremely seriously. I detect a change of heart among Law Officers and the Crown Prosecution Service to try to address the fundamental failure of the criminal justice system in relation to violated and attacked women and to women in general who are victims of any offences of violence.

I pay a third tribute, to someone who is not present in the Chamber: my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who, after many years leading on women's issues for our party, has just stepped down to do other things. Just the other day she spoke in a debate to mark international women's day. It is important that there are doughty people in all parties who will ensure that these issues are always on the agenda. Such people, who take up the cudgels, must include men as well as women.

I want to make a few short points, because I do not want to repeat the statistics or the evidence. Depending on the timing of this debate, I may seek Members' indulgence to leave just before the end if the debate runs for the full time allowed, Mr. Olner. I have duties elsewhere but I am keen to hear the responses of the Solicitor-General and the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier).

First, it was good that four years ago the Government, having consulted all the agencies, came up with the rape action plan. I know that we are nearing the time when the audit of that will be published. I should be grateful if the Solicitor-General would tell us when that will be, because the statistics that we have heard, and which I knew, which show the very low average conviction rate, need to be evaluated against an objective assessment of what has been done since real effort has been made over the past five years across the criminal justice system.

In that context, I welcome the advertising campaign that is starting this month. It seeks to remind women of their rights and of their entitlement to be protected in every respect, unless they consent expressly to any activity. Indeed, by and large, even such consent would not protect somebody from prosecution if they acted illegally and assaulted someone.

I start with a fairly simple view about crime and criminality, which is that, in essence, there are two sorts of crimes: crimes against the person and crimes against property. Crimes against the person are always more serious. I start from the simple presumption that a crime against the person—a physical attack on somebody else—should result in the attacker losing their liberty. That should be the expectation. I have a simple view about that and the public expect that to happen as well.

Although I appreciate that it is early days, I hope that there will be a serious, informed and robust response when the Sentencing Guidelines Council produces its anticipated recommendations, because if the reports are correct, there appears to be a failure to understand that fundamental point, in relation to rape and other offences against women, and in relation to other offences.

I am not in any way being histrionic. Indeed, in the Chamber the other day I counselled against being histrionic. These things must be taken in a considered way and we have to await the report of the council. It is good that such a body is doing that job. That was the result of debates that we had in Committee and on the Floor of the House. There is now a better system for evaluating sentencing and the types of sentences, which I welcome.

I want to make a point that was raised not so long ago by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar in written questions to the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs. One of the things that will bring confidence into the system—I appreciate that it is marginal—will be increasingly to have a gender balance in our magistrates and Crown courts, and in the judiciary as a whole. Of course, one cannot presume that just because a woman is chairing the bench, or because there is a woman district judge or a woman circuit judge, there will be a different attitude, but my perception is that, as yet, the British judicial system does not look like and reflect Britain, and therefore it does not command the confidence that it should. I hope that we continue to make the strides that the Government have been trying to make to broaden the diversity of those who judge these things. Juries are diverse but the judiciary currently is not. That is important.

My next point was touched on by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar. There is always a dilemma in having a devolved system of justice—a devolved system of policing and so on; there is a great debate going on about policing—and complaining that the statistics vary in different parts of the country. However, there are some worrying differences in the statistics. Given all the efforts made to ensure that there are specialist advocates and specialists within the CPS, it would be helpful if the Solicitor-General would say why, in his opinion, such considerable variations exist between different CPS areas and different police areas. That such variations exist is more important in terms of the percentage of the allegations that are taken through to prosecution than in terms of the conviction rate. The conviction rate is obviously less explicable, but that first statistic should not involve such variation. There is a proper question to be asked and answered on that.

I want to endorse the point about corroboration, which will always be the most important issue. All our experience of criminal matters shows that an unsupported allegation, particularly in a personal relationship context, is far less likely to be believed.

I ask the Minister to examine one central point. I am interested to hear the responses of other colleagues on this matter. Over the years, there have been developments to make it easier, for women in particular, to go and tell somebody about an attack. I have visited the new centre that was set up for victims in the Camberwell magistrates court in my borough. However, it appears from the figures that only four of the 43 police services in England and Wales have specialist rape units. I appreciate that some groups of people who specialise in dealing with allegations of rape might not be called specialist rape units. It troubles me that so few forces appear to have a dedicated group of police officers dealing with such offences.

More important than having either a victims' suite at court, although that is important, or a specialist rape unit, although that might be important, is the fact that it is still not normally comfortable or convenient for women to report much of the crime against them. I have a strong sense that the reason why most women do not make a complaint is that there is nowhere that they can go, where they will feel confident, before they get there.

It is not easy to go into a police station, because members of the public do not know who they will meet in the porch on the way in and whether they will encounter the right sort of attitude when they speak to people inside. It is not necessarily easy for them to go to Victim Support, because to do so might give them a feeling that they are being stereotyped—or they might be self-stereotyping—and they do not want to be seen going in and out of such places.

I have a proposition. I have done a great deal of work with a co-operative police service and co-operative people in the CPS, Her Majesty's Courts Service and the local authority, and I still do not feel that we have received an adequate response in my part of the world, south of the river in London. Without being gimmicky in any way, it might be worth while for each local authority area, town and community to have something that I call, for the purposes of argument, a women's crime centre, where women can go and report a crime, whatever it is, in surroundings in which they feel comfortable.

My important point is that that would not be a place where women go to complain only about sexual offences; they could go there to complain about any crime. It could be a complaint about a handbag being stolen, or a mobile being taken on the bus, or about a parent in the playground. We need to make it much easier for women to go somewhere to make a formal complaint or discuss whether to make one.

A lot of the difficulty lies in the initial threshold of being willing to make the decision, for all the reasons given by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar. Many people do not go from the trauma of an offence such as rape or sexual assault to telling anyone in officialdom because of the fear, the perceptions of their friends and family, and the potential publicity. The Solicitor-General and other hon. Members will understand that as well as I do.

I am very happy to follow up these discussions with the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, colleagues of all parties and Law Officers, but one of the ways that we could pull together much of the very good work being done around the country area by area, town by town and city by city, is by having somewhere that is accommodating, accepting and not intimidating and is competent to deal with any matters concerning criminality against women. I am not being tokenist about the matter in any way: I do not suggest that we go down a road where we have six other species of place, such as centres only for black people or for young people. It is a women's issue in particular. They are the majority of the population and we ought to accommodate that.

I shall be very happy to hear an initial, considered response from Ministers as to where that approach might have been tried or piloted elsewhere in the country. I know that it is done in other countries, and that there is some evidence of success. It might be that at the beginning of the system we should grant more people a realistic opportunity to make a considered judgment as to whether they want to proceed, and so provide them with the protection that they feel they need in order to go through the criminal justice system.

Of course, once we get past that stage there are the other issues that affect what the hon. and learned Lady calls the attrition rate; I understand and endorse those concerns. But I did not want simply to repeat them; I wanted to make a slightly different point. I should be grateful if in due course Ministers could consider—as could we—how to make the initial doorway through which people can go to complain of offences against women much easier to access and more likely to lead to a successful outcome. My view is that we could considerably improve the number of successful complaints that are followed through if we start in the right way, and if we do that, the rest of the criminal justice process may well follow.

10.23 am

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I begin by congratulating the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on securing the debate, and I congratulate her on not being inhibited by a feeling that, as a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Home Office, she should be silent on issues affecting the criminal justice system. She clearly has a high reputation in relation to this aspect of public policy; she mentioned her own pamphlet from 1999, and why should she not? If one looks through the search engines on the House of Commons website, one will find that she has been a continuous questioner of the Government on such matters since she came to Parliament. It is a matter for some congratulation that she has achieved an hour and a half's debate on the subject today.

During an intervention, I confessed that I have no experience as a member of the Bar in dealing with rape cases as a prosecutor or defence counsel. As a recorder, I am not sufficiently qualified: I have not got, as the jargon has it, my sex ticket to try serious sexual offences, including rape. The fact that I have not suggests to me that the Lord Chancellor's Department, as it used to be called, and those who arrange the way in which criminal judges try cases of this sort, have thought about the matter quite carefully. They require judges—the hon. and learned Lady implied this even if she did not say so expressly—to have specialist training in this area of the law before they are allowed to try such cases because they involve huge sensitivities.

By mentioning emotional trauma, I am by no means diminishing the physical injuries and trauma that a complainant will suffer. In parentheses, I add that it is understandable that many women who are attacked in this hideous way are not strong enough or confident enough to report it straight away and sometimes leave it for days, weeks or in some cases, particularly in relation to child abuse, for some years before bringing it to the attention of the authorities or even their parents. The emotional trauma that a complainant has to suffer in bringing a case, from the first reporting of it, is enormous. It affects those women's families and in many ways it wholly ruins their lives.

However, balanced against that, those of us who have the responsibility of making law and those who have the responsibility of applying the law—judges and others who have the duty of ensuring fairness in such cases—also have to consider the effect on the accused. Although it is sometimes difficult to believe, and it is not always attractive to say such things, those accused have rights, as complainants do. Although I fully endorse much of what the hon. and learned Member for Redcar had to say on this very difficult subject, we should be mindful when we are discussing changes in the criminal law and procedure not to forget the rights of the defendant, particularly in cases involving sexual assault and rape, because in such cases the defendant's reputation, whether he is acquitted justly or improperly, is likely to be tarnished for ever as a result of being connected with such allegations.

Clearly, all criminal defendants who are justly acquitted have some loss of reputation as a consequence of that process. Public policy says that the acquittal is the immediate answer to that concern. I think it is fair to say that an acquittal in a rape case does not always lead to that remedial effect.

The Solicitor-General: The hon. and learned Gentleman is of course right that we need to strike a balance in any court proceedings. Defendants have rights and it is correct that those should be respected. However, when we are dealing with a conviction rate of just under 6 per cent., it is clear that the rights of the defendant are already being respected to a considerable extent. The problem is that the rights of the victim all too often seem to be going by the board.

Mr. Garnier: That is a perfectly reasonable comment to make on the figures presented to us by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar. If the balance is in the wrong place, we do not have a balance. It seems to me that all of us who have discussed the matter today, apart from the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) and my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who are no longer present, are lawyers of one sort or another. It is difficult on these occasions to remember that we are also citizens, we represent members of the public and we have families who are not lawyers and do not necessarily treat such subjects in the desiccated way that we might in a legal seminar or continuous development course—which we are now required to go on if we wish to remain as practising lawyers.

I do not want to have an argument with the Solicitor-General. I agree with him. I do not want to have an argument with the hon. and learned Lady either. It is important that she has presented to us information about which the public ought to know more. It is not widely known, and it is certainly rarely reported widely in the media. If anybody reads the Hansard record of this debate, we can all congratulate ourselves on disseminating to a wider audience a bit more knowledge about a rather esoteric legal subject.

Taking into account all that the hon. and learned Lady said, we must bear it in mind that as public policy makers and law makers, we are in the business of providing justice, and certainly justice for complainants. It is clear from what she said that in reality, many complainants do not get justice. One need only consider the five reasons that she mentioned for the drop-out rate—the attrition rate, as she called it. The individual does not complain at all; they withdraw or do not pursue a complaint at an early stage; the complaint is discouraged because there is insufficient evidence, there is no identified defendant or accused, or there is no reliable prospect of prosecution; there is something wrong with the way in which the Crown Prosecution Service decides to progress cases, which, to be fair to the CPS, the hon. and learned Lady said formed the smallest cohort of cases; and finally, the individual is deterred by the prospect and actuality of trial.

All five matters are inhibiting factors that, in one way or another, prevent complainants from getting justice. We must be acutely aware of that. However, as I said, we must be acutely aware of balancing those concerns with concerns for those who are accused of these hideous crimes. I want to build in the public a sense that justice is being done as a consequence of what Parliament, the courts, the police, the CPS and all other agencies do between the offence and acquittal or sentencing. We must not forget that a just acquittal either on the direction of the judge or following a verdict from a jury on the facts is not a "failure" any more than a conviction is a "success". Justice cannot be measured in those terms; it should be wholly disinterested—albeit that for the people involved in the case, the individual who has been assaulted, her family, the defendant and his family, it is almost impossible to come to terms with the situation. For them, it is a personal attack of the most hideous nature either on their bodies or, if they are the falsely accused defendant, on their reputation and possibly their career.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar highlighted an extremely difficult issue. She presented her argument calmly and rationally, on which I congratulate her. I hope that I do not sound patronising. It is always difficult to deal with such issues in a public forum in a way that does not attract criticism for being too much on one side of the argument and too ignorant of the interests, rights and arguments of the other side. She managed to deal with this issue utterly properly.

I am not in a position to comment on why the acquittal rates in particular parts of the country are too high. It is interesting that the neighbouring county to mine, Northamptonshire, is one of the "better" counties for convictions, with a rate of 13.4 per cent. of cases tried. I could not hear whether it was Southampton or Southwark—

Vera Baird: Suffolk.

Mr. Garnier: I have no idea why Suffolk managed only a 1.6 per cent. conviction rate compared with the hon. and learned Lady's area of Cleveland, which had a rate of 7.76 per cent.

I shall finish with what I hope is not a light-hearted anecdote. It certainly was not a light-hearted moment at the time. It relates to the north-east. In 2000 when I was the shadow Attorney-General, I was able to carry on my private practice, being instructed to appear for a complainant in a defamation action at the Crown court in Newcastle upon Tyne, one river north of Redcar. My client was suing for slander, which was reduced to libel, over an allegation of serious sexual assault in the workplace which, by the time the complaint had been developed through the company's personnel department, had taken written form on the pleadings in the action and had gone to trial, had been magnified from inappropriate sexual conduct in the staff restroom to the most hideous and disgusting rape. I shall not go into details, because it is simply not necessary.

The matter was tried before a jury of eight women and four men, with a male judge, myself a male barrister with a male junior, and a male defence counsel opposing us and acting for the woman who had made the accusation. The trial lasted two weeks, and it is the nearest that I have ever been to a rape trial. The jury, which as I said included eight women, were utterly disbelieving of the woman's account. At times, when I was watching the jury listening to the woman giving evidence, they were mouthing, "This is a pack of lies." They awarded the complainant in excess of £200,000. He could never recover it, of course, because the defendant did not have that sort of money.

If we present cases properly, if rape victims are taken through the hideous reporting process right the way to trial in the careful way that the hon. and learned Lady said was necessary to preserve the complaint and reduce the drop-out rate and high attrition rate, if the preparatory stages of the case are properly managed by the prosecuting authorities once the arrest and charge have been made, and if the trial judge is acutely sensitive of the issues—by and large they are—we have a greater expectation of achieving justice, not only in the disinterested sense, but in the personal, competition sense and in the necessary personal protection sense that the individuals in the case and the wider public require of our justice system.

That process is not impossible. It is difficult and it requires effort and resources, although it may require not more resources but simply the re-focusing of existing ones. It requires also determination within the prosecuting authorities, particularly within the police, although the modern police have changed considerably from the, "Well, she was wearing a short skirt so she deserved it" caricature, about which we so often hear.

There must be an understanding, which I think is growing, that becoming involved in such police work is not a Cinderella exercise. It is highly important, and it is essential for the civilisation of a country such as ours and for the greater confidence of those who—for whatever reason—sadly become involved in rape cases. I shall listen with great interest to what the Solicitor-General has to say.

10.40 am

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): It is a pleasure to appear before you, Mr. Olner. I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) not only on her success in securing the debate, but on her work over a considerable time in ensuring that issues relating to rape are put on the public agenda and addressed. I also pay tribute to my predecessor as Solicitor-General, who is now my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs. She helped to take through Parliament the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which significantly improved the law relating to rape.

Too many rapists are getting away with it, and some of them are repeat rapists. Parliament has strengthened the law on rape and the Government are taking steps to provide more help and support to victims. However, changing the law is not the only issue; we also need to change some people's attitude to rape. The "What did she expect, dressed like that?" mindset must be challenged. People should know that there is an absolute right to say no. That is partly why last week the Government initiated a public campaign emphasising that people have a right to say no.

Rape is an appalling crime that devastates the lives of victims and their families. However, rape will always be a difficult offence to prosecute and there is no sense in pretending otherwise. Most rapes are perpetrated by someone known to the victim. Often there is no independent witness, because of the nature of rape—it tends to happen when only two people are present—and often no forensic evidence is available. Particularly given the growth of DNA technology, we need to use the new opportunities that are available to ensure that forensic evidence is collected.

Like my hon. and learned Friend, I was struck by the Home Office report entitled "A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in reported rape cases". It is clear that in some areas the police have not always sought to bring forward DNA evidence. It is important that we ensure that all police forces adopt best practice. I will bring to the attention of the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), who deals with policing, the fact that we need to ensure that that happens. We need to get right the collection of evidence and the investigation, ensure that the Crown Prosecution Service takes the correct decision on prosecution and, as the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) said, ensure that we have judges who are sensitive. Getting all those things right is the best way to ensure justice in rape cases.

Conviction rates in rape cases remain unacceptably low, with fewer than 6 per cent. of recorded rapes resulting in a conviction. Nevertheless, reporting rates are rising, which is a positive factor. In addition, the number of convictions for rape of a female rose in 2004. Of the 741 people tried at the Crown court for rape of a female in 2004—up from 666 in 2003—28 per cent. were convicted. That is a rise of 4 per cent. from the position in 2003.

In Cleveland in 2004, there were 129 reported rapes, 26 prosecutions and 10 convictions. The rate of conviction is still very low. I have explained partly why that is the case. We need to ensure that we deal with the factors involved. The Government have made a significant number of changes to the law on rape, but research shows that a victim's needs in the aftermath of rape are significant and wide ranging and failure to address those immediate and ongoing needs can have long-lasting implications for the victim's emotional well-being, mental and sexual health and relationships, creating a significant cost for society as a whole and for the health service, as well as for the individuals and their families.

Home Office research published last summer attempted to quantify the costs of sexual violence. There is the cost to the individual and their family in emotional terms, which can be harrowing enough, but the cost to society of each rape is estimated at £76,000. That figure covers all the various costs that society has to pay for one instance of this appalling crime. The research found that sexual offences, rather than just rape itself, account for approximately 23 per cent. of the cost of crime to households in England and Wales.

Sexual violence is sometimes dismissed as a crime that affects a very small minority of people, and a reading of the recorded crime statistics gives the impression that that might be the case. The number of recorded rapes is increasing year on year, but the total figure—14,002 in 2004–05—is still much smaller than the figures for many other violent crimes. However, the British crime survey indicates that the actual number of rapes is much higher than that. The 2001 interpersonal violence module estimated that there were 190,000 incidents of serious sexual assault against women, including 80,000 incidents of rape or attempted rape, in the year leading up to the research. It also estimated—we sometimes forget this issue in discussions such as this—that 0.2 per cent. of men had been subjected to sexual assault in the previous year. There is at least anecdotal evidence that rape of men is an increasing problem. We need to deal with that, which is why some of the Home Office's recent advertisement campaigns have involved gay magazines. It is right that that is the case.

Sexual violence can affect men and women of all backgrounds, regardless of age, race and religion. Certain groups, such as people with learning disabilities and people who work in prostitution, can be particularly vulnerable.

The Government have made a series of changes, but we are determined to do more to tackle the barriers to the successful prosecution of rape, while not tampering with the burden of proof. We can do things around the edges of the burden of proof without changing that fundamental core. I hope that we will be able to do many things in this respect in the coming months and years. I shall issue a consultation paper setting out some proposals shortly.

It is worth delineating a few of the changes that we have made. We have introduced specialist rape prosecutors in every CPS area; there are now 520 of them. We have overhauled the law on sexual offences through the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and previous legislation. That includes clarifying the law on consent to ensure that we give better protection to potential rape victims. Special measures are now available to enable victims to give evidence behind a screen or by televised link, which perhaps makes the experience of giving evidence in court, which will always be very difficult, somewhat less traumatic. We have limited the circumstances in which a victim's previous sexual history is admissible in court. I shall return in a moment to the point on section 41 made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar. We have clarified and expanded the circumstances in which evidence of the defendant's bad character is admissible in court. That is particularly relevant when the bad character involves issues that are very similar to the offences of which he is accused.

We have worked with the Association of Chief Police Officers on producing guidance for the police on the investigation of serious sexual offences, and we are now working on developing training for the police. Through the "No witness, no justice" programme, we have introduced witness care units to keep victims informed of case progress and to provide information about support services. We have invested £4 million over the years from 2004 to 2006 in developing sexual assault referral centres—SARCs—and voluntary sector services for victims of sexual offences. We have funded the production of a handbook to help rape victims by explaining how the criminal justice process works—something that many of them fear.

My hon. and learned Friend referred to the research study, "A Gap or a Chasm? Attrition in reported rape cases", and it is worth emphasising that it was Home Office research. It was published in 2005 and I understand that the data that it reported were collected between October 2000 and 31 December 2002. A large part of the data arose before the changes that we have brought about, particularly since 2003. One of the biggest changes was the introduction of charging, which began in 2004 and is being rolled out throughout the country. It has not yet reached my area in Warwickshire, so it has not been fully introduced, but it will bring a significant change in the way in which rape cases in particular are dealt with.

Vera Baird: I am cheered and glad to be corrected that the data predate the charging change, which has come to Cleveland. The CPS's leverage is important. It can, for example, tell the police to go back and look at something again and to investigate more thoroughly. That is how it has been used and I am pleased that I was wrong.

The Solicitor-General: I was not going to point that out.

The charging change is important. A specialist rape prosecutor who has been specially trained looks at the case and advises the police on how they can ensure that all the evidence is brought forward and that a full file is ready for a judgment to be made on whether there is a realistic prospect of the prosecution securing a conviction. We hope that as a result, cases that are prosecuted will be more likely to succeed. That remains to be seen as the statistics are rolled out during the next couple of years, but we hope that there will be a significant increase in the success rate of prosecutions.

We need to recognise that there are disparities between various areas. My hon. and learned Friend mentioned Suffolk and Northampton. I hope that those disparities will be addressed to some extent by the standard training given to specialist rape prosecutors who work with the CPS. That will enable them to work to standards that are broadly the same throughout the country, which should enable judgments on whether a case should be prosecuted to be broadly standard and even out some of the discrepancies. However, that does not mean that my hon. and learned Friend is wrong to suggest that there are other areas where we need to improve, particularly the investigation of some rape cases. Some areas are better than others and we need to ensure that we have appropriate standards and best practice in all areas.

Progress in making some of the changes has been important. There are some key challenges on which we must focus. It is important that the police are adequately resourced and trained, that we have high-quality rape investigation and that barristers work closely with CPS lawyers to ensure that we get convictions. I am pleased to say that the CPS has recently agreed with the Bar Council that all barristers who prosecute rape cases should have special training accredited by the CPS. That is an important change, in that not only will specialist lawyers make the judgment about the initial prosecution—the charging—but when the case comes to court the prosecuting barrister will also be specially trained to ensure that they know how a case should be properly handled.

We have reached agreement that barristers, who previously tended not to talk to witnesses and victims before a trial, will now do so in appropriate circumstances to ensure that a judgment can be made about the case and that some of the questions that need to be asked can be answered. I hope that those changes will be useful and important in the coming months and years.

My hon. and learned Friend raised a series of other issues. First, she referred to police attitudes, which are sometimes dismissive. The police have introduced training, some of which was led by the Metropolitan police who have undertaken substantial work on how to ensure that rape cases and sexual offences are better prosecuted. We are now developing a cadre of specialist officers who are better able to deal with such matters. As the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) said, there are only four units of sexual offence liaison officers, but there are many more sexual offence liaison officers who are not in units. Whether a special unit is established depends to some extent on the number of cases in an area and some forces may not need to establish one because, thankfully, numbers are much lower, but they will still have a sexual offence liaison officer who will be able to deal with cases.

The key change is the introduction of SARCs; there are now 14 of them. We need to focus our attention on such areas.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar referred to a judge who said that a key issue was to improve the way in which investigations are carried out. I certainly agree with him or her on that. I also agree that corroboration is important, which is why we must ensure that we have adequate forensic facilities.

My hon. and learned Friend also referred to section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 and the fact that there are still too many cases in which previous sexual history is given. I have a great deal of sympathy with her point and will consider the issue further to see whether there is more work that we can do. Changes to rule 36—giving prior notice—will improve the situation somewhat, but there are other ways in which we can improve the legislation and I hope that we will be able to look at some of those.

My hon. and learned Friend suggested that we consider domestic violence courts and whether specialist courts might be helpful. We are developing a formulation with specialist police officers, specialist prosecutors and specialist barristers in court and we should see how that approach develops, but I am not dismissing my hon. and learned Friend's suggestion. I had a look at the South African model, which has much to recommend it, but I want to see how the data develop before we start to advocate it.

The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey raised a number of points. I agree that there should be more women judges and magistrates. The Government are seeking to increase numbers.

There is a two-stage process under way for the audit of the rape action plan. The first stage—a stocktake of progress and implementation of the rape action plan—took place in the summer and was based on self-report surveys. We found some excellent good practice, but we need to do more to ensure that that is replicated in all areas and a follow-up thematic inspection will report this summer. We look forward to the recommendations that will inform the new sexual violence action plan. I hope that we shall be able to ensure that we make improvements as a result of that. The hon. Gentleman also asked about variations between different attitudes and statistical differences between areas. To some extent, our standard training for rape prosecutors will address those issues.

I want to ensure that we have a better success rate in getting rapists off the street and into prison where they should be. I want to ensure that victims are better treated by the criminal justice system and that the Government's record on tackling these issues is at the top of the agenda.

Tuberculosis (Developing World)

11 am

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): It is a delight to introduce this debate today, as world tuberculosis day is later this week. People throughout the world will be encouraged to think about this devastating disease, which many thought was in the past, but which is raging throughout the world.

We can take a snapshot of the position in, for instance, Africa. Africa has 11 per cent. of the world's population, but it accounts for more than a quarter of the global TB burden. Since 1990, TB rates have doubled in Africa overall and tripled in areas with high levels of HIV infection. In Botswana, more than 70 per cent. of TB patients are also infected with HIV. Those statistics are truly sobering.

Africa may be on the front line of the global fight against TB, but Asia has the highest TB burden in the world, largely due to its massive population. India is home to just under 2 million TB sufferers, and while often we think of TB as a disease of the developing world—today's debate is focused on the developing world—closer to home, 67,000 Europeans have lost their lives to it.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman mentions outbreaks and the incidence in Europe. Indeed, TB is starting to emerge in a worrying way in my home city of Leicester. Perhaps he was about to deal with this, but does he agree that in an era of international trade, travel and migration, TB control is not confined to the countries and continents where it is becoming rife? We have a direct interest—not just moral, but social and economic—in driving it back to its position 40 years ago, when we thought we had virtually eradicated it.

John Barrett: I could not agree more. There have been several isolated outbreaks in this country, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in Aberdeenshire, but, more generally, there is a higher incidence in cities such as London. Increased global travel is certainly one of the causes.

People think about whether the issue directly affects them: they are aware that people from the UK travel abroad to the nearer parts of eastern Europe, but large numbers also travel on ever more direct flights to countries with a high HIV incidence. The hon. Gentleman's point is well made.

I was about to touch on an area relatively closer to home: the former Soviet Union has been hit badly by the disease and it has the second-lowest treatment success rate in the world—only marginally better than that of Africa. The collapse of the Soviet Union left many countries in the region with weak health care systems and particularly poor diagnostic facilities. The real problem is multi-drug-resistant TB, which is more expensive to treat and a particular problem in the Baltic states.

TB does not respect national boundaries or international treaties, and I would like to explain the problem in some detail. TB is the leading form of death from a curable infectious disease. Globally, it is second only to HIV/AIDS as a cause of illness and death, infecting 9 million people every year and killing 2 million. Nearly all those people are in the developing world.

What is more shocking, however, is the fact that the illness is entirely preventable and curable. That is why today's debate is so important. With world TB day on 24 March almost upon us, we must do all we can to highlight the need to get to grips with and eradicate the disease, which continues to claim a life every 15 seconds.

About two weeks ago, I was pleased to host an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall in this place. I hope that many Members took the time to look at it. The exhibition comprised a collection of photographs by Gary Hampton, a renowned TB photographer, of TB sufferers throughout the world, including in India, Africa, Europe and South America. The message was simple: TB is current, dangerous and on the increase in many parts of the world, but, despite the scale of the problem, we have the means to cure it completely.

About 80 per cent. of the individuals newly diagnosed with the disease each year live in the 22 most populous countries.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): My hon. Friend makes a strong case for the Government and the international community paying close attention to the serious problems of TB, particularly in developing countries. Does he agree that although the media in the west seem to be in a blind panic about avian influenza—which, while not wishing to diminish the deaths, has killed only 90 people—the preventable deaths of 2 million people should grab the attention of the world and of Governments who can make a big impression on this mass killer?

John Barrett: I agree with my hon. Friend absolutely. One problem is that the media are always looking for something new, and TB is not new. It has been around for generations, and many people in this country think of it as something from the past. It is not deemed to be a politically sexy story, but people continue to die. The scale of the problem is massive: 5,000 people die of TB each day. If we were to think that a disaster on the scale of that at the World Trade Centre—about 3,000 people died in that attack—was happening daily, what resources would we be prepared to put into dealing with it?

TB has existed for a long time, and many people have played a part in the fight against it. I shall mention just a few. One who deserves particular praise is Edinburgh's own TB pioneer, Sir John Crofton, whom I met some time ago. He demonstrated more than 50 years ago that TB was curable, and his work led directly to a massive decline in TB cases. Sir John was recently awarded the Union medal, which is the highest honour awarded by the International Union Against Tuberculosis and Lung Disease. I am sure that all who are aware of Sir John's remarkable achievements will agree that he is a more than worthy recipient. I was delighted to table an early-day motion before Christmas to congratulate him on his latest accolade, and I have been touched by the support it received and the contact I have had with people throughout the country who thank Sir John for playing his part in the fight against TB.

The Department for International Development has done much excellent work for many years. I praise the Minister, the Secretary of State and previous Secretaries of State for playing their part and continuing to fund worthwhile projects in several countries even though the issue has not always been at the top of the news agenda.

On a visit with the International Development Committee, I saw at first hand the work that has been done in Andhra Pradesh in India, and in Kenya, Malawi and Mozambique. The Department's absolute commitment for the long term involves considerable financial cost. The DFID paper produced in December 2005 lists sums committed in the fight against TB: £8.5 million in Mozambique, £7.5 million in Malawi and £20 million in Andhra Pradesh. I have seen some of the excellent work that is being done by the Department's staff in conjunction with local partners, and I cannot praise it highly enough.

Several groups and organisations are involved. TB Alert produces easy-to-access literature to ensure that people in this country know the basics about TB and are able to find out exactly how they can detect infection and what preventive measures should be taken if they are travelling to a high-risk area. Individuals play an enormous part in the fight against TB, none more so than Bill Gates of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which has pledged more than $900 million over the next 10 years towards tackling the disease. I shall come back to that.

There are also a number of advocacy groups, including Results, which deserves particular praise for its work on the issue—especially its lobbying of hon. Members. Two members of its staff, Sheila Davie and Louise Holly, deserve a special mention for having contacted several Members from all parties to keep the fight against TB high on the agenda.

As I said, however, the scale of the problem is truly massive. TB is curable, and we have to ask why the problem has not been dealt with. Up to 60 per cent. of TB cases can be detected using existing diagnostic measures, and nearly all of them can be cured using existing treatment methods, so what are the obstacles? One of the first that we need to overcome is the perception that TB is a disease of our grandparents' generation. TB is not a disease of the past, and I mentioned the sobering statistic that 5,000 people die from TB every day, which certainly concentrates the mind.

As recently as 1993, the World Health Organisation declared TB a global health emergency, and when we look at the figures, it is difficult to disagree. Incredibly, it is estimated that a third of the world's population, or nearly 2 billion people, are infected with TB and that 5 to 10 per cent. of them will deliver the active disease.

When I mentioned this debate to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), she said that she was unable to attend, but that she had been a TB sufferer as a young child. More than 50 years after the introduction of effective treatments for TB, the disease remains unconquered. Indeed, in many developing countries—particularly those stricken with HIV/AIDS—the disease remains dangerously unstable.

Moreover, although TB predominantly affects developing countries, as the title of the debate suggests, it is worth remembering that TB is making a comeback in western Europe. Indeed, as the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, the number of TB cases in England has increased by 25 per cent. over the past 10 years and continues to increase. About 7,000 new cases are reported each year, most in London. Although multi-drug regimes are available and cure 95 per cent. of patients with active drug-sensitive TB, newer and better drugs are needed because of poor compliance with the six-month treatment regime.

Andrew George: My hon. Friend knows that I share his interest in this subject, because we visited Kenya with Results last September to look at TB projects. Does he not accept, however, that the treatment regimes are pretty robust, at least in the UK, and that the vast majority of patients will survive if they stick to those regimes? Surely the problem is in the developing world, where multi-drug-resistant TB is developing and the bacillus is getting stronger because people do not stick to the regimes. A particular concentration of effort is clearly needed.

John Barrett: What my hon. Friend says is true for several reasons. Not only has the medical battle been fought and largely won in this country, but TB is very much a disease of poverty, and poverty is most clearly associated with the developing world.

I was astounded at the poverty that exists to this day in places such as Kibera—the massive slum on the outskirts of Nairobi—and the general public can see that poverty if they go to see "The Constant Gardner", which is on in cinemas as we speak. The vast majority of people in that slum have no supply of drinking water or sanitation and they live in cramped accommodation with no adequate ventilation—perfect circumstances for TB to thrive in.

In this country, we have managed to ensure that people have clean drinking water supplies and sanitation, but we have also managed almost to eradicate poverty. Poverty is why TB is such a problem throughout the developing world. Whether we are talking about drug-resistant TB or one of the traditional forms of TB, the disease is closely associated with poverty.

We must seek to alleviate poverty through the millennium development goals and other means of raising people's standard of living. We must improve how people live and the quality of their accommodation to ensure that individuals with TB do not live in cramped conditions, because that would mean the rest of their family, their neighbours and their friends being far more likely to contract the disease. Therefore, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George).

There has been progress, however, and there is hope. Despite the scale and severity of the problems, Marcos Espinal, executive secretary of the Stop TB Partnership, has said that "we have the possibility to finally beat TB over the coming decades."

Indeed, over the next 50 years, the aim must be to eradicate TB as a global health problem. In 1991, the World Health Assembly set a target of detecting 70 per cent. of all infectious cases of TB and curing 85 per cent. of those detected by 2005. Those targets were undoubtedly achievable, but they have not been met. Some 80 per cent. of known cases are successfully treated, but only 45 per cent. of cases are detected.

David Taylor: The hon. Gentleman refers to the targets that have been set. How confident is he that the unlikely alliance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Bill Gates—a commitment to double the £1.2 billion global spend on TB was announced at Davos earlier this year—will halve the number of deaths to which the hon. Gentleman referred? Past targets have proved difficult and illusive, have they not? Is he confident that the new target will drive down the number of deaths in the way the Chancellor and Mr. Gates anticipate?

John Barrett: I am optimistic about the commitments that Bill Gates and the Chancellor have made, and I look forward to the international dimension of tomorrow's Budget being given as much importance as the domestic agenda, but I am pessimistic about the end results. Large amounts of resources have been poured in, but we have not dealt with the combination of factors that have built up the environment in which TB thrives.

Although the resources have gone in, we have seen first hand how many countries have suffered from famine and drought—factors outwith donors' control. In addition, there is still conflict in some countries, and other factors mean that TB is a difficult nut to crack, even though the resources have increased. As I said, I want to ensure that donors, funders and organisations working on TB make the necessary commitment in the developing world, and I can hope for the best, but time will tell how successful we are.

As was suggested earlier, we need a plan for the long term and a commitment to see the issue through beyond national elections, G8 summits and Davos. The Chancellor said:

"If 2005 was the year of commitment then 2006 must be the year of delivery".

Although I wholeheartedly support those sentiments, it will take more than a year. We are all in this fight for the long haul. Tomorrow's Budget is the ideal opportunity for the Chancellor to confirm that the commitment to further spending will be high up the agenda.

At the beginning of the 21st century, TB has been declared a full-blown global emergency, and a global emergency requires a global plan of action. Thankfully, we have one in place. The Stop TB Partnership provides a platform for international organisations, countries, donors and governmental and non-governmental organisations. It recently launched its new stop TB strategy whose objectives are to achieve universal access to high-quality diagnosis and patient-centred treatment; reduce the human and socio-economic suffering caused by TB; protect the most vulnerable groups from TB, HIV and multi-drug-resistant TB; and support the development of new tools in the fight against TB.

The components of that strategy include the high-quality expansion of DOTS—the directly observed therapy short-course scheme—which is often used in the fight against TB and which, I am glad to see, has been successful. The strategy must be collaborative to meet the challenges of TB and HIV control, along with multi-drug-resistant TB.

We must help to strengthen health systems—I am aware that DFID has been involved in that work as well. We must engage aid providers and agree international standards for TB care while empowering those with TB and those communities that are badly affected by the disease. We must also help to promote and sustain research. The global plan, finalised just two months ago, aims to break the back of the global TB epidemic and to eliminate it as a global problem by 2015.

David Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is most generous in giving way once more. He mentioned research, but one difficulty is that there is no significant commercial market in developing countries for drugs that tackle the diseases of poverty. Does he hope that the Minister will refer to the possibility of pharmaceutical companies lowering the prices of their drugs that are designed to tackle the diseases of poverty, of which TB is but one?

John Barrett: As I mentioned, the film "The Constant Gardener", which many members of the public have seen, deals with the issue of the price that drugs companies charge to deliver effective treatment. Clearly there is not money to be made in the commercial world by supplying very poor people with drugs that will save their lives. We await the Minister's reply on that. It is in all our interests—not just morally, but economically—to help the poor nations of this world, which are often the sub-Saharan nations, to improve their economic growth and start trading their way out of poverty. They will benefit financially and we will also benefit.

Andrew George: I am sure that my hon. Friend accepts, however, the need for early intervention and proper treatment before the TB bacilli become multi-drug-resistant. If patients are caught early enough and the treatment is followed through fully, it costs only $10 to cure someone and prevent a death. Surely that is $10 extremely well spent.

John Barrett: My hon. Friend is one step ahead of me. I was aware that he was a keynote speaker at the launch of the global plan. Without a doubt, few things are better value for money than $10 that can save a person's life. As he said, one problem is that successful treatment can be started, but if it is not maintained for the full six months of therapy, patients might feel better and stop taking the drugs, which might allow drug-resistant TB to develop.

In certain areas, drugs are not available or people have to pay, and in countries of extreme poverty paying for drugs can often be the barrier between life and death. That is why I am pleased that some of the many projects funded by DFID ensure that drugs are freely available and that cost is not an issue. Access and maintaining the course for six months might be issues, but the cost of treatment is not in many countries.

The global plan for 2002–15 builds on the partnership's first global plan for 2001–05. It supports the need for long-term planning and for action at regional and country levels. The plan provides a consensual view of what the Stop TB Partnership can achieve by 2015, provided that we mobilise the resources to implement the stop TB strategy, according to the steps laid out in the global plan.

The global plan will help to stimulate political commitment, financial support, effective intervention, patients' involvement, community participation, and research and development. All those will be central planks of the overall strategy to tackle TB.

The cost of the global plan is $56 billion, which represents a threefold increase in funding as compared with the first global plan. Although that is a significant increase, any doubts that anyone might have should be dashed when we consider what we get for that $56 billion. The estimated funding gap is $31 billion, which must be met because the rewards are high. Full funding would save 14 million lives at a cost per life saved of $157, which is much less than the average economic productivity per person per year, even for the poorest individuals.

Even under such a crude economic calculation, the economic benefits far outweigh the costs. When we consider the amount of money spent post-9/11, this is a small price to pay. If averaged out, it is $5.6 billion a year, which is what the US spends in Iraq every month. The figure is three days' global military spending and the amount spent each month is estimated at $58 million—more than the total 10-year cost of the global plan.

What will be achieved if we implement the global plan? Implementation of the stop TB strategy will expand access for all to quality TB diagnosis and treatment. About 50 million people will be treated under the strategy and 14 million lives will be saved. The first new TB drug for 40 years could be introduced in 2010, with vastly improved diagnosis.

By 2015, we will have a new, safe, effective and affordable vaccine available if all goes according to plan. Targets could be met, such as the global achievement of the millennium development goal to halt and begin to reverse the incidence of TB, and the TB partnership's 2015 targets to halve prevalence and death rates from 1990 levels.

What else can we all do, in the House and elsewhere? As I mentioned, the exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall was one small attempt to raise awareness while today's debate will generate coverage, interest and column inches. Those interested will be able to follow it and know that hon. Members are facing up to the problem. TB is not a disease of the past, and we must remind people of that.

The decline in the incidence of TB in the developed world has been accompanied by a fall in the commercial incentive to develop and invest in new anti-TB drugs. The DOTS programme has revolutionised the treatment of TB across the world, but it is 50 years since its introduction, and treatment and detection rates have remained constant since 1995—still far below the rates and targets set out in the MDGs. To contain the disease properly, new drugs and vaccines are needed to tackle multi-drug-resistant TB. Despite the undoubted success of the DOTS expansion, most countries look unlikely to meet the MDGs for TB by 2015. Further innovation is crucial if, ultimately, we are to tackle TB.

The non-profit organisation Global Alliance for TB Drug Development, which is supported by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation, has brought badly needed new focus and leadership for drug development. In the short term, six new drug candidates for TB are now undergoing clinical trials. Indeed, Bill Gates has already pledged $900 million over the next 10 years towards tackling the disease.

However, action from above must be matched by renewed and improved action on the ground—the front line of the battle against TB. The DOTS strategy has helped not only to cure millions of people worldwide, but to strengthen public health care capacities. Indeed, it has been argued that the greatest legacy of DOTS to the overall health of developing countries might be not in control of TB alone, but in helping to build the basic infrastructure of a public health system. For example, in India, where the public health system is weak, more than 422,000 health workers have been trained during the expansion of DOTS. DOTS plus is the first step in moving beyond DOTS.

We must also be aware of the problems of HIV that are associated with TB. Although originally they were largely considered separate diseases, co-ordinated planning and implementation of TB and HIV programmes will lead to more effective prevention and treatment of TB among patients infected with HIV/AIDS. In countries with high levels of AIDS, the scale of the challenge posed by TB simply exceeds control capacities. As a result, DOTS, or any other programme focusing on one disease, will always fall short. TB symptoms are often the reason for accessing the health care system.

Andrew George: My hon. Friend makes an extremely strong case for giving the challenge of the global plan up to 2015 a much higher priority. Given that TB killed more people than all the wars, earthquakes, floods, armies, air accidents, terrorist attacks and murders worldwide last year, and following on from his comparison between the money needed for the global plan and military spend, does he believe that Ministers should use that comparison and take a fraction of the defence budget, for example, to fund the global plan? Should we not use such rhetoric to up the ante and get the plan the priority that it deserves?

John Barrett: My hon. Friend knows exactly where I stand on that. I have never thought that the amount spent in Iraq is particularly good value for money. The amount of money spent on—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is straying way off the point.

John Barrett: I stand corrected Mr. Olner. I may have been inadvertently led into that by my hon. Friend.

I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. Our efforts need not be focused on simply managing this disease. TB can be cured and consigned to the history books within the next 50 years if we are determined to tackle it in other countries the way that we have tackled it here. The fight against TB must be a marathon, not a sprint. It requires sustained action and attention from the international community. Just as the DOTS treatment is effective only if patients follow the full course of treatment, we will fulfil the aims of the global plan only by committing to it for the long haul.

I look forward to hearing from the Minister and hope that the Government also confirm that they will continue to play their part in the battle against TB.

11.32 am

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I did not want to interrupt your line of sight earlier by stepping forward, Mr. Olner. I thank you for the opportunity to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett).

[Susan Kramer]

Obviously, the case has been laid out exceedingly powerfully, and I very much want to associate myself and my party with the World Health Organisation and the stop TB strategy. It is not my goal to repeat the facts and figures that have been laid out so eloquently this morning. I wanted to speak in this important debate because world TB day is an opportunity to remind all of us that no matter what medical advances we pursue in our own country and the developed world, basic diseases continue to devastate much of the globe. It is also an opportunity to recognise that the developing world pays a double penalty by being affected by poverty and disease, which so often go hand in hand.

I want to draw attention to some aspects of WHO's strategy, and to pick up on the research provided by the African Medical and Research Foundation, which works extensively in this area. Through many of its studies in Africa, the foundation draws attention to the frequent difference between what appear to be effective TB strategies at national level, and the difficulty of delivering those strategies on the ground.

Many hon. Members will be aware that many African countries, as they develop their health systems, focus on managing TB in a hospital environment, and on diagnosis and prescription. But there is comparatively little penetration and effort to tackle the disease within the communities where people live. If one considers the poverty of the individuals involved, the difficulty in accessing more sophisticated aspects of health care and the way in which the disease impacts on mothers and children and undermines entire communities, looking at the disease in a community context is typical.

I draw hon. Members' attention to AMREF's research in the eastern cape of South Africa, in the designated homelands, which is where millions of black South Africans were forcibly removed during apartheid. It is therefore one of the poorest communities in South Africa. The research showed that health personnel did not have an adequate understanding of TB management; that on the ground, locally, within the community, there were insufficient supplies of TB drugs; and that testing was slow, so it sometimes took up to two weeks to get results. The situation was made worse by the fact that TB patients did not understand prevention, the cause of the disease, or why they needed to take medication for six or eight months to eliminate the disease from their systems permanently.

As a result of that health study, approaches to the problem are changing in the eastern cape. Nurses are being trained in TB management and public transport is being provided to ensure that sputum specimens can be delivered to laboratories and back to clinics with results within 24 hours. That is completely changing the way in which that community is experiencing and tackling the disease. It falls well within the DOT—directly observed therapy—strategy that has been structured and underpinned by WHO, and which has been so effective generally in furthering TB management worldwide.

An issue that has been touched on but not developed, and is, presumably, the risk that we face most viscerally in the future, is the link between TB and HIV/AIDS. Many people will be aware that that is a growing arena for TB as a disease. We are aware that it affects the developing world powerfully, and that it is beginning to take hold in our communities.

The presence of HIV results in a high degree of multiple-drug-resistant TB. Not only do TB drugs have a tendency to be ineffective on people with HIV, but it is much harder to diagnose TB in people with HIV, especially in its early stages. That is one reason why it is crucial that research in this area does not stand still. Although there are effective therapies for the more traditional variants and versions of TB, the HIV-related strains of the disease are not well understood or managed in almost any community. It is crucial, therefore, that the funding that is necessary for new diagnostics to enable efficient testing for HIV and TB in health facilities is available to communities not only in London, but in poor and rural areas across the globe.

TB is a disease of the poor. In the era in which we live, in which we have made the commitment to make poverty history, we must, by definition, also make TB history. I highly commend what has been said today, and I look forward to hearing what the Government have to say about the support that they will give the programme. I note that when my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West asked the Minister a question on this issue recently, the Government were unable to identify how much funding goes into TB work. I wonder whether they now have a clearer idea of how that money is being used. I appreciate the opportunity to associate myself with this debate.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on securing this important debate, particularly considering that world TB day is coming up, which he rightly highlighted. He summarised well the totality of the issues surrounding TB, and made the significant point that it is not only developing nations that suffer from TB; it affects the developed world as well, albeit, thankfully, to a significantly lesser extent. None the less, we can ensure that we constantly monitor that situation.

The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight and confront the perception that TB is a historic disease. Statistics and personal stories clearly demonstrate that that is not the case. The whole world community—both developing nations and donors—needs to ensure, both bilaterally and through multilateral institutions, that TB is at least stopped in its tracks, if not eradicated, as quickly as possible.

I also welcome the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer). I congratulate her on her new position and I am sure that she will enjoy the role. We look forward to significant contributions such as that which she has made today. She was right to draw attention to the disparity between national strategies in many developing nations and delivery on the ground in communities. I will say a little more about that later. The hon. Lady was also correct to draw attention to the link between HIV/AIDS and the prevalence of TB. I want to ask the Minister some questions about the cross-availability of antiretroviral drugs to enable both diseases to be eradicated.

As hon. Members will hopefully be aware, the Conservative party is supportive of much of what the Government are doing in this area. We support the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and we acknowledge and support the Government's commitment to double the amount of UK taxpayers' money that has gone into that fund. However, we acknowledge, as I am sure that the Minister will, that there have been problems of delivery through the global fund to date.

We support the international finance facility for immunisation and also world TB day later this month. We hope that it will raise the profile of that debilitating and dangerous disease in developing nations, not only in the traditional areas of sub-Saharan Africa but in those areas where the disease has significant and growing prevalence, such as Asia and the ex-Soviet republics, and where the problem has been ignored for far too long.

We welcome the recent announcement of £6.5 million of funding to the Global Alliance for TB Drug Development and the commitment from the Chancellor of £41.7 million to tackle TB in India. We also agree with the G8 Africa communiqué, which said that people should have "access to basic health care (free wherever countries choose to provide this)".

Alongside the Government, we want to encourage countries to drop user fees, which limit access to health care and are a major deterrent in developing countries, particularly for those who find themselves in poverty.

Like the hon. Member for Richmond Park, I do not wish to bore the Chamber by repeating the statistics that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West gave in his full and articulate speech. However, I would like to add two statistics that struck me, which I do not think he used. One person per second catches TB. That is a staggering statistic. Also, between 8 million and 10 million people per annum become infected with TB. The problem is not growing in a small way; it is a significant and accelerating disease, and we need to ensure that we tackle it across the international community.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out, effective treatment is inexpensive. A six-month course costs between $5 and $10, depending on which medical people one talks to. He was absolutely right to highlight the fact that TB is a totally curable disease. We need to ensure—through such debates in the UK Parliament, and in our constituencies—that we highlight the fact that the disease is not historic, but is growing and is more greatly prevalent in all parts of the world than people's perceptions would allow them to believe.

Having said that, in Africa 45 per cent. of people with infectious TB have access to life-saving treatment. However, an untreated person can infect 10 to 50 people a year, which tends to happen in the workplace and through the adult population. That can have a very debilitating impact on the economic performance of communities, giving rise to greater exacerbation rather than alleviation of poverty. The treatment of TB can take up to eight months, during which time a person is unable to work and falls deeper into poverty, as do their dependants if they are an adult. The World Bank estimates that TB costs the average patient three or four months of lost earnings, which can represent up to 30 per cent. of annual household income.

The millennium development goals made specific reference to stopping the prevalence of diseases such as TB by 2015. The international community is a significant way off that. Tackling TB will go a long way to making a significant contribution to many of the other millennium development goals, such as access to education. Fewer children will drop out of school because of infection, to care for relatives or because they do not have teachers any more because they are suffering from TB or, in particular, from HIV.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park rightly made a point about the correlation between TB and HIV/AIDS, which is one of the issues that I want to highlight today. Since 1990, overall TB rates across Africa have doubled, and they have tripled in areas with high levels of HIV. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West mentioned the fact that in Botswana 79 per cent. of TB patients also have HIV. It is our view that there needs to be significantly better collaboration between TB and HIV programmes, as that will vastly improve the control of both diseases.

I want to ask the Minister what progress the Government and DFID have made in expanding the collaborative TB and HIV strategy. What steps is DFID taking to ensure that developing nations co-ordinate TB and HIV programmes, that those infected with HIV are screened for TB, and that those infected with TB are screened for HIV? That would ensure the provision of antiretroviral drugs to all who need them, not just those who may require them on a superficial basis.

I want to highlight three particular issues: drug development, drug resistance and drug availability. I have some questions that I hope the Minister can answer. There have been some successes. We should not think that TB is on the rampage unchecked. The most notable success has been in Vietnam, where 76 per cent. of all infectious cases in the past year have been cured. That can be done with commitment from the international community and the Governments in the respective countries.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West rightly highlighted that there has been no new drug for TB in the past 40 years. The Global Alliance for TB Drug Development aims to have developed a new drug by 2010, but current estimates are not optimistic. It has been estimated that there is only a 5 per cent. chance of that. The cost of producing successful drugs in that time scale is estimated at about $400 million.

As well as research on new drugs, steps must be taken towards new methods of diagnosis and vaccination. I would welcome any explanation from the Minister of exactly what progress is being made not only towards the treatment of TB but towards its prevention. There also needs to be predictable and sustainable funding, particularly to assist research and development. What steps is the Minister's Department taking to ensure predictable and effective funding flows for those research bodies, so that they can come up with new drugs and vaccinations?

Multi-drug-resistant TB has been identified in 91 countries and is widespread in many populous countries, including China, India and the former Soviet Union. What steps are the Government taking to fund the development of treatments for MDR-TB? It is clearly more challenging and requires greater on-the-ground monitoring as people become resistant to the initial programme of drugs.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park also mentioned drug availability. It is important that DFID and other relevant institutions do more to encourage the pharmaceutical industry to allow the manufacture of generic drugs for use in the developing world. The former director-general of the World Health Organisation's HIV programme suggested the designation of humanitarian corridors, which would allow leading drugs manufacturers to produce drugs at low prices for modest royalties, giving greater access to those with limited resources in developing nations. What action is the Minister taking to ensure that TB drugs can be accessed in developing nations? He will be aware that some developing nations have placed tariffs on certain health care products. Some of those tariffs have been reduced, but not sufficiently to ensure the free access of drugs in the developing nations where they are needed most.

Can the Minister also say what steps his Department is taking to ensure collaboration between all the different interest groups—public sector, private sector and non-governmental organisation initiatives? Also, what improvements in collaboration are proposed between all the interested parties in the developed world and the developing nations to ensure the maximum impact of the inevitably limited resources that can be put into controlling TB? Are TB control mechanisms included in the respective countries' poverty reduction strategies? If not, why not? And if not, I hope that they will be included in future.

It would also be helpful if the Minister explained what supportive role the Government will play in implementing the Stop TB Partnership strategy. The 58th World Health Assembly took place in 2005, where all countries made a commitment to ensure the availability of sufficient resources to achieve the millennium development goal relevant to TB, but there is currently a $31 billion funding gap. What is the Minister doing to encourage the UK Government and other countries to fulfil their international commitments, particularly those made at the 58th World Health Assembly?

For strong health care provision to flourish, there must also be political stability. Corruption plays a role; I have debated that with the Minister at other times, and I do not intend to go into it again now. Suffice it to say that economic growth is impossible if a country's population are sick and dying. That is particularly the case in respect of TB, which disproportionately affects adults in the work force. We must encourage schemes that include civil society, NGOs, regional Governments, donor country Governments and the communities on the ground if we are to see progress towards the millennium development goal of halting and beginning to reverse the incidence of major diseases such as TB by 2015.

I want to repeat something that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West said in respect of the campaign against TB, because it succinctly summarises what the global community needs to do. It needs to "stimulate political commitment, financial support, effective intervention, patients' involvement, community participation and research and development."

If the UK Government are supportive of that strategy and programme, they will find Opposition Members supportive of them.

11.53 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I join other hon. Members in paying due tribute to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on securing this debate on tuberculosis. Given its timing just days before world TB day, he has done the House a particular service. TB places an unnecessary burden on the developing world in particular—TB causes 2 million deaths a year—and the House has benefited from the opportunity to discuss these issues again. I should also pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's continuing advocacy on this topic; he has not come to it fresh today. I know through his work on the Select Committee on International Development and his visits to our programmes in Andhra Pradesh and Kenya that he has followed this issue for some time.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) on her elevation to her current position. She is fortunate to have in her constituency arguably the greatest professional rugby club—London Welsh. That makes her almost, but not quite, as privileged as I am in terms of the constituencies that we represent. She raised a number of issues, as did the hon. Members for Edinburgh, West, for St. Ives (Andrew George) and for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). I will try to do justice to their contributions.

As all hon. Members said, there is a huge challenge before us because of the number of people who die or become infected as a result of TB. It is, however, a challenge that the international community, supporting developing countries, could rise to. There is already an internationally agreed strategy for TB control—directly observed short-course treatment programmes or DOTS—which we know has considerable impact. I understand that later this week the World Health Organisation will announce that in 2004 DOTS programmes were able to detect 53 per cent. of TB cases worldwide, and to treat successfully 82 per cent. of them. That is encouraging, but those figures also reveal the scale of the challenge that remains. We need to build on that success and do more.

A number of things need to happen if poor people are to get better access to effective TB care. Simply put, they are threefold: there needs to be much greater political commitment to this challenge, more money needs to be allocated, and we need to make better use of the existing money that is available.

Let me start with that last point. Making better use of the money means working in partnership with developing countries, donor partners, those in research institutions and NGOs that specialise in this field. I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to the campaigning work of Results UK, TB Alert and the African Medical and Research Foundation—AMREF—not least for their efforts to enlighten the House further by calling a meeting later this week. The Department for International Development is familiar with all those organisations because of their work in this area. The House owes them a debt of gratitude for their lobbying, campaigning and informative work.

Secondly, we need to ensure that we spend more of the money that is available on research, and make better use of the existing facilities. We also need to ensure that the systems are in place for the money to get down to health care services in the most remote areas and the most marginalised communities. The hon. Member for Richmond Park rightly alluded to that. We need to ensure that people who want to access the drugs are able to do so, wherever they live and whatever their circumstances.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly alluded to the Commission for Africa's underlining how critical TB is to the health and development agenda. He will be aware that a similar message was highlighted by the Gleneagles communiqué, the United Nations world summit, and the European strategy on development—that consensus was agreed towards the end of last year. All of them committed the global community to do more on TB.

All hon. Members have also referred to the excellent global plan to stop TB, which was launched by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with Bill Gates and President Obasanjo of Nigeria. As hon. Members said, that global plan sets out a clear picture of what we need to do to achieve the millennium development goal on communicable disease. That plan makes it clear that it is possible, with greater commitment and more money, and by using money more wisely, to halve deaths from TB by 2015. We now need to move from those commitments in the global plan and the various communiqués of last year to implementation on the ground.

Hon. Members who follow the issue will know that last year the Department held a consultation on TB and malaria, in which we reviewed our spend to date and considered whether we needed to increase our spend and how to make better use of the resources available. As a result of that consultation, we doubled funding for the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis—crucially—and Malaria for 2006–07. We increased our funding for country programmes; that is the direct bilateral support to which the hon. Member for Richmond Park alluded. As the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly said, the Chancellor announced funding of just over £41 million for TB drugs in India, through partnership with the World Health Organisation. We also committed some £5 million to the global Stop TB Partnership. Those are examples of our work on TB and Malaria. We intend to continue to expand such support later this year.

All the hon. Members who spoke raised the issue of finance. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness highlighted the current $31 billion gap in the plan and pointed out that $56 billion would be needed through to 2015. Some $25 billion is already available and, as I said, we must ensure that that is well spent. I accept that there is a major gap in resources, and we cannot pretend that it will be closed if it is a case of business as usual. We need to maximise commitments from developing country Governments and donors, and we need to work on the commitments made last year.

Crucially, we must explore new sources of finance. Critical to that is ensuring that TB is recognised in developing countries' own health plans—a point made by the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness—and that Ministries of Health are supported in making the case to Ministries of Finance for more funding for health care in general and TB specifically, so that that money is locked into poverty reduction strategies. Of course, we do advocacy work in areas where our country programmes are strong and where we have identified particular problems.

The global fund needs to be supported if it is to maintain its share of the growing response to TB. Hon. Members who follow the progress of the global fund will know that in June there is to be a mid-term review of the global fund's performance to date, and of how the replenishment has gone. That will provide an opportunity to encourage new donors, in particular the oil-producing countries and the private sector, to play their part in supporting the effort on all three poverty diseases.

Even with the new resources that have been pledged, the $30 billion gap is a considerable challenge. Hon. Members will know that this year the international finance facility for immunisation began its work. We hope that that does considerable good in its own right, but also serves to encourage other nations to support a full international finance facility, delivering new resources for work on TB—and health care generally—more quickly.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, knows that I cannot prejudge what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will say in the Budget tomorrow, but he will be aware of the commitment made last year by the Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to spend 0.7 per cent. of national income on aid by 2013. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will want to praise this Government for trebling spending on international development assistance since we were elected.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park asked for more information on how much we have already spent on tuberculosis. Perhaps it would help if I explained that although we fund TB control directly through a number of specific bilateral projects in the focal countries where we operate, we also increasingly fund broader health sector development plans for developing countries through multilateral agencies, including the World Bank, the European Commission and the Asian Development Bank. It is not always possible to draw out exactly what is spent on TB, because money that goes into health sector budgets helps to fund action on a range of other health conditions, too.

Let me give some additional examples of the direct, bilateral support that we provide. In Nepal, we committed some £5.4 million from 2001 to the end of next year to helping with effective diagnosis and treatment for all TB patients who come to existing primary care facilities. In South Africa, we are providing assistance on TB to KwaZulu-Natal, the province with the highest HIV prevalence and the worst treatment outcomes.

Hon. Members have referred to the often considerable links between HIV infection and TB infection. In Pakistan, one of the seven national health programmes supported by our sectoral spend of £60 million is a national TB programme. In Uganda we are providing direct support to strengthen the health system and to strengthen our response on implementing the DOTS programme at community level.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

One or two hon. Members mentioned Russia. It is worth drawing the House's attention to Russia's hosting of the G8 agenda this year. The Russians have shown an interest in discussing infectious diseases in St. Petersburg later this year. As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, rightly said, it is one of the countries with the greatest burden of TB, and it has a particular problem with drug-resistant TB, so we have been pushing for the St. Petersburg summit to endorse support for the global plan. Indeed, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor launched the global plan, he made specific reference to that.

I have mentioned the issue of the better use of money. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly drew attention to the need better to co-ordinate the response to HIV with the response to TB. In some African countries—Malawi is an example—70 per cent. of people with TB are infected with HIV, so there is a clear case for bringing responses to the two diseases much more closely together. In some African countries, people still need to go to one clinic to get their TB drugs and another to be tested and get treatment for HIV. Clearly, that is nonsense in the longer term, and we need to support those African countries in bringing those services together.

In 2005, the G8 committed itself to providing universal access to HIV treatment, prevention and care. That commitment was endorsed by the UN world summit. As part of the global steering committee that we co-host with UNAIDS, we have been trying to make a reality of that commitment. We are drawing up plans on how to achieve that, and on how to ensure that TB is seen as a core element of the package of AIDS care.

In an intervention on the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire rightly alluded to lack of drugs and problems with diagnostics and vaccines for diseases. Those are major problems; those in developed countries have considerable access to those services, and those in developing nations have very poor access to them. We know from international research on the issue that 10 per cent. of global health research and development is directed at diseases of relevance to 90 per cent. of the world's population. That is a huge imbalance and a glaring example of global inequality. That is one reason why we need to accelerate research and development of new technologies; a second reason is to deal with the specific issue of multi-drug-resistant TB. That is one reason why we are supporting the WHO's tropical disease research programme, which includes a major research project in improving TB diagnostics, which the hon. Member for Richmond Park mentioned. If we can get those new diagnostic methods to come on line, it will mean that we can detect TB earlier in primary health services and we shall be able to diagnose it much earlier in people who are also infected with HIV, where diagnosis is often particularly difficult.

We are keen to see new drugs developed, particularly ones that would allow for shorter and simpler courses of treatment that reduce the burden on often fragile health care systems. Ultimately, the goal must be to find a vaccine, if we are genuinely to achieve long-term control.

One key way to try to ensure that new drugs and diagnostics come on line is through public-private partnerships, which are beginning to change the landscape of TB research. The need for public-private partnerships will continue to increase, particularly when embarking on expensive clinical trials. That is why, earlier this month, I was pleased to announce UK funding of some £6.5 million over the next three years to the global alliance for TB drug development. However, that does not preclude the point that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire made, which was that we need to see, and should continue to encourage, the major pharmaceutical companies in their programmes of research into diseases in developing countries. We should try to ensure that they have effective differential pricing regimes in place to charge higher prices in developed nations and recognise the unaffordability of those prices for poorer nations and bring in cheaper prices there. I have already made it clear that this is a particular issue for second-line antiretroviral drugs to fight the HIV/AIDS epidemic, but, more generally, it is one that developing countries are facing.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness also mentioned access to drugs. He will be aware of the flexibilities in the legislation on trade-related aspects of intellectual property—TRIPs—which has only just come into force in general terms and is not in force for the least developed and very poorest countries. We are working with a number of developing countries, including Ghana, to ensure that they can take advantage of the flexibilities in the TRIPs regime.

The hon. Gentleman said that many developing countries impose tariffs on drugs and that it is difficult to see the sustainability of such tariffs, given the huge public health burden faced by many of those countries. Nevertheless, he will recognise that Finance and Health Ministers and Parliaments in developing countries must consider that in the round. As I said in answering the point made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park about our spend on TB directly, we put considerable resources into financing health systems to help with the fight against TB and more broadly.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has, in various speeches to generate debate on our forthcoming White Paper, referred to the need for us to increase access to basic health and education services. It is worth pointing out that the WHO estimates that it would only cost approximately £20 per person to provide an essential package of health services. Many Ministries of Health in low-income countries typically spend less than £5 per person, which indicates the scale of the challenge that we face and just how much of a step change we need to see in funding from domestic budgets in developing countries and from international aid.

I draw hon. Members' attention to Malawi, where we are providing £100 million of support to its health sector budget, as part of the health sector plan, which is specifically supporting the Government of Malawi to try to double the number of nurses and treble the number of doctors that they recruit over the next six years. That is being done partly by tackling many aspects of the poor conditions in which people in the health service in Malawi have to operate, partly by raising their pay by just over 50 per cent., an increase that only came on line in April. Early indications are that a significant increase in recruitment is beginning to happen.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly mentioned user fees for health care services. We have made it clear that user fees can deter people from accessing the health care services that are needed, that we support the elimination of health care fees and that we will put resources behind efforts to eliminate such fees. In Zambia, when the Minister of Health recently announced her intention to abolish health fees for those in rural areas, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced additional funding for Zambia to help compensate for the loss of those user fees.

In conclusion, I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West on securing this debate. I hope that world TB day receives considerable media and parliamentary attention; it certainly needs to. We in the Department for International Development intend to continue scaling up our work on health care services in general and, through that, our response to the fight to tackle tuberculosis. I look forward to working with the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members to continue the campaign on this issue.

Education Funding (East Riding of Yorkshire)

12.30 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): This is a fairly sparsely-attended debate, but the issues that it deals with are none the less extremely important. I shall talk a little about the state of education in the East Riding of Yorkshire and the funding of that education system. I shall then specifically address the issue of the F40 model, which is a mechanism by which the Government can better target funding at those most in need and ensure that they receive the correct funding.

The East Riding of Yorkshire has undergone great improvements in the past few years. In 2004, at key stage 2, 83 per cent. of its pupils achieved level 4 or above in English, which represents a considerable increase on the figure a number of years before. In maths, the relevant figures were 78 per cent. in 2004 and 79 per cent. in 2005. Both are above the national average. At key stage 2, East Riding schools are joint 25th nationally.

Likewise, at key stage 3, there has been a significant improvement and, given the funding, an outstanding performance on the part of staff. By 2004, 77 per cent. of pupils at key stage 3 had reached level 5 or above in English. The figure rose to 79 per cent. in 2005. In maths, the corresponding figure was 79 per cent. in 2004. It dropped slightly to 78 per cent. in 2005. Both results are also above the national average.

East Riding schools were 17th in the national GCSE performance tables in 2005, which was an improvement on 69th in 2004, and 61 per cent. of their students achieved five or more A to C grades. By contrast, the national figure was just 54 per cent. Four East Riding schools have this year been recognised in the national league table for the most improved state secondaries, according to the proportion of pupils gaining five A to C grades.

I want to highlight the performance of Beverley high school, which is the top performing state school in the East Riding at GCSE—some 80 per cent. of its students achieve five A to C grades. We are talking about a comprehensive school achieving that high level. Indeed, 15 of the East Riding's 18 secondary schools achieved improved GCSE results in 2005.

At A-level, East Riding schools were 56th in the national league tables in 2005. The improvement over recent years in the East Riding, despite the lack of funding, has been enormous, and it is gratifying to comment on it. I congratulate the head teachers and staff of the schools in the East Riding on their performance. I also pay tribute to the inspirational leadership in the local authority of John Mager, who is the director of education. I am unsure whether he is leaving the local authority today, but some time soon he will do so. He has done an excellent job. The political leadership of Councillor Penny Peacock has also made a big contribution.

Great improvements have been made, but what could the schools in the East Riding of Yorkshire have achieved if they had received a fairer share? There could have been more teachers, support staff, textbooks and equipment. East Riding schools have consistently received funding that falls behind both the national average and that given to the best-funded authorities.

[Mr. Graham Stuart]

The Minister will know all about the F40 group of poorly-funded local education authorities, of which the East Riding is a member. Those authorities represent almost 16 million people in more than 200 parliamentary constituencies. Research on the national funding arrangements over the past years reveals some stark facts concerning the funding allocations to the F40 authorities. I hope the Minister will respond on that. Between 1997–98 and 2005–06, there has been no real change in the spread among the F40 group of authorities in respect of the difference among that group between the amounts that the highest and lowest-allocated authorities receive.

As the Minister will be aware, during the past eight years, the cash gap between the best and worst authorities nationally has widened. The figure is £620 per pupil, even though most commentators already felt that the disparity was too great between the best-funded and the worst-funded authorities. And yet, the effect of Government policy and formulation has been to exacerbate that situation.

Let us consider how schools in neighbouring Hull compare with those in Holderness in my constituency in 2005–06. Bilton primary school received £2,458 per pupil whereas Wansbeck primary received £2,922 per pupil. Those schools are less than a mile apart. I hope that the Minister will respond favourably on those questions today and suggest that he, at least, shares my ambition, and that of many other MPs who represent F40 authorities, that the gap should be closed.

Parents and pupils in the East Riding had high hopes for the new funding arrangements for 2006–07 and 2007–08, but the dedicated schools grant, which comes into effect next month, has not been kind to them. The two-year settlement, beginning in April, has a baseline figure for the East Riding of Yorkshire of £3,117 per pupil. In 2006–07, the figure will be £3,322, which represents a 6.6 per cent. increase. Some 6.9 per cent. of that figure will be allocated on the basis of deprivation.

The East Riding of Yorkshire is the fourth-worst-funded education authority in the country. In 2006–07, Hull will receive £3,738 per pupil whereas the City of London will receive £6,708 per pupil, which is more than double the East Riding of Yorkshire's allocation.

The situation is indefensible and should already have been addressed, yet it is getting worse. In 2007–08, the East Riding will receive £3,535 per pupil, which represents an increase of 6.4 per cent. Such increases are below the national and regional averages. Unbelievably, the national increase in 2006–07 will be 6.8 per cent., but the East Riding will receive less than that, and in the following year the gap will further widen between the East Riding of Yorkshire and the national average.

The East Riding local education authority has not stood idly by while this has happened. Led by John Mager, it has helped to devise the F40 pupil entitlement model. It is a new funding model for determining the needs of individual education authorities and schools, and it is targeted on the pupil. The calculations are based on needs-based funding—what it costs to run a school.

I am sure that the Minister and his colleagues know all about the F40 group and the funding model. The group was pleased that civil servants came to examine the model and found that it was not designed primarily to address overall funding. It is not a completely different model of funding across the UK, but it shows that by using index of multiple deprivation data and education data it is possible, within the education management system, to attach a deprivation score to each child using a home postcode.

Using that model, it is possible to pick up in particular the current injustice whereby thousands of pupils leave Hull to come to the East Riding to be educated. Many of them come from some of the most deprived wards in the country. When they come to be educated in the East Riding and East Riding schools seek to provide them with the additional support that they rightly expect, the money does not transfer with them. The F40 model would allow that.

The East Riding spends more on schools than the amount allocated to it by the Government. It is rare among local authorities to have that happen, but, despite low funding overall, such is the commitment of the political leadership of the East Riding that it has found extra money to put into schools and, as I have explained, shown that that extra money converts into improvement and genuine delivery for pupils across the area.

The East Riding is suffering because multiple aspects of the system put it at a disadvantage. Although it is right that deprivation funding should go to those in the most deprived areas, the truth is that rural areas rarely manage to command the statistical basis for that much support. The allocation of funding according to where pupils live, rather than where they are educated, compounds the injustice. There are 2,665 pupils in residence at schools in the East Riding who live in other local authorities. As John Mager said:

> "One secondary school in the East Riding of Yorkshire receives 30 per cent. of its intake from one of the most deprived and disadvantaged estates in Hull. They will be expected to provide the personalised learning which many of these children will require but the proposals for deprivation funding will not provide the East Riding with the funds to support the school."

Funding allocated to the East Riding for deprivation is below the national average. Hull is allocated 14.7 per cent. of funding for deprivation. It has problems with social deprivation and it is right that additional funding is allocated to its schools, but the East Riding has deprivation of its own. The Ofsted report on the local education authority of January 2004 said:

> "Pockets of social deprivation, the steadily rising inward migration from neighbouring urban districts, the remoteness of some parts of the region and relatively low funding levels all pose a challenge."

Bridlington South, Bridlington Old Town, Bridlington North, Goole and South-East Holderness are among the 33 per cent. most deprived wards in the country. Household income is below the national average.

Tellingly, a recent survey undertaken for an obesity project in the East Riding revealed that 70 per cent. of children in Withernsea had a low body mass index, indicating under-nourishment. That highlights the unfairness of funding based on a local authority border rather than on the child.

Rural areas are losing out and Government cash has been targeted on cities. John Dunford, general secretary of the Association of School and College Leaders, said:

"This Government has put a large amount of additional funding into deprived areas and I give them credit for that. But in the way that grants are distributed, there are inbuilt inefficiencies because they are targeted in big areas, such as Manchester and Birmingham, and not on the individual schools and individual pupils where the need is greatest. There are pupils losing out and this is particularly the case for disadvantaged pupils in rural areas."

That quotation, which is recent, sums up the injustice of the system.

John Wilson, head teacher of Market Weighton school in the East Riding, said:

"The modest improvements in funding, though welcome, will not allow schools in the East Riding to progress as quickly as they would like. East Riding schools will be forced to make do and mend while schools in better-funded authorities are able to provide a wider range of opportunities for their students. Whether anyone will be looking at their staffing I don't know at the moment. What we would really like is a fairer system of funding."

The East Riding of Yorkshire council has brought significant improvements to its education, thanks to the hard work of many people, the pupils, the support of their parents and all the staff throughout the local authority. None the less, the gap between the East Riding and the best-funded authorities in the country continues to grow. In the F40 entitlement model, even before the reassessment of the overall funding, we have a tool that can allow money to follow the pupil, allow parents to exercise choice and ensure that support is provided to the most deprived in our society.

I urge the Minister to acknowledge that the East Riding has performed extraordinarily well on limited resources. I also urge him to consider carefully the situation in the East Riding and other poorly-funded local authorities, and to take that on board when reviewing the arrangements that are in place for 2006–07 and 2007–08 before deciding on a permanent model from 2008 onwards. I hope that we get a sympathetic response from him today.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): Mr. Cummings, may I say first what a pleasure it is to be under your stewardship for the first time as a Minister? I am glad to have that opportunity.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this important debate and very much welcome his description of the educational success in the East Riding of Yorkshire. I note his concerns about education funding—I shall say more about that in a moment—and thank him very much for his comments on the F40 model and the work the Department is doing in talking to that group of authorities about their proposals.

I would like to respond to the hon. Gentleman by putting on record my gratitude for the work of teachers and pupils in the East Riding, who have been responsible, as he so eloquently described, for significant improvements in the quality of education in the county. I have a few of my own notes to add to the statistics he cited. At key stages 1 to 3, East Riding is exceeding the national average in all subjects, which is quite an achievement. For example, the number of pupils achieving level 5 in key stage 3 science and English is five percentage points above the national average.

The improvement since 1997, when the Government came to power, is impressive. For example, the number of pupils achieving level 4 or above in key stage 2 English is up 17 percentage points to 83 per cent., which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The number of 15-year-old pupils in the East Riding achieving five or more A* to C grades at GCSE or equivalent is up by nearly 17 percentage points since 1997. Those quite impressive changes have happened during the past eight or nine years.

The changes genuinely reflect the hard work of teachers in the county. I am pleased to say that East Riding has nearly 12 per cent. more teachers than in January 1997 and almost 160 per cent. more teaching assistants. In both cases, the increase is well above the national average of 8 and 142 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Stuart: Those statistics are indeed extremely positive, but why is it necessary for the East Riding of Yorkshire council to find additional sums itself from very limited funds? The political leadership locally is the prime cause of those increased standards.

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman's intervention takes me on to the exact point I was going to discuss: the funding of education in the East Riding of Yorkshire. It is worth reflecting on the increases in funding in the East Riding since the Government came to power. The tremendous achievement that he and I have described today has happened because of, not despite, the record investment in education funding in the East Riding of Yorkshire.

If you will forgive me, Mr. Cummings, I have to say that that funding stands in stark contrast to the investment made by the Conservative party when it was in power, and in stark contrast to the platform that the hon. Gentleman stood on less than 10 months ago, which would have cut public spending by £30 billion.

Since 1997–98, revenue funding in the East Riding has increased in real terms by £1,080 per pupil—an increase of 40 per cent. in real terms, which equals the national average percentage increase. That record 40 per cent. real-terms increase might also have had something to do with the record achievements by teachers and pupils in the East Riding.

Mr. Stuart: I want to take issue with the Minister's introducing party politics to the debate, and particularly his producing a completely specious figure of £30 billion in cuts, which he knows was not in the Conservative manifesto. New Labour's continual desire to say things that it knows to be untrue does not greatly credit the Minister or the Government whose members he serves.

Phil Hope: We may have to agree to disagree, but the hon. Gentleman has come to the House on behalf of his party to plead for more resources for his constituency—an entirely understandable and appropriate thing to do. It is also appropriate and entirely right for a Minister to point out that when the hon. Gentleman does so, he contradicts the platform on which he stood.

Mr. Stuart: That is not true.

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order.

Phil Hope: Capital spending on school buildings in the county has also increased dramatically from £1.3 million in 1997–98 to almost £15 million in 2007–08. That is a more than elevenfold increase.

I listened carefully to the concerns that the hon. Gentleman raised about funding for the East Riding compared with that for other areas of the country. Whether we wish to agree or disagree about the overall funding of education as between his party and mine, we recognise that there are concerns about the allocation of that funding. Some argue that funding per pupil should be more or less the same across the country, and I got that feeling from the hon. Gentleman's contribution. I want to explain why it is not the same.

The Government aim to give all pupils an equal opportunity in life. Pupils from more deprived backgrounds are likely to have additional educational needs and to require additional help if they are to have an equal chance to succeed. That is why in the current formula funding system, on top of the basic entitlement, we provide additional funding to authorities with higher numbers of pupils from deprived backgrounds. If I heard the hon. Gentleman right, he said that he understands and supports the principle that those pupils in greatest need should be given the greatest support.

The main reason for the East Riding receiving less funding per pupil than other areas is that it has fewer pupils from deprived backgrounds than many other authorities. The hon. Gentleman referred to Hull, the neighbouring authority to his own. Just below 12 per cent. of pupils in the East Riding come from families on income support. The national average is about 19 per cent.

There is also extra funding for authorities in high-cost areas, because schools in those areas find it more difficult to recruit and retain teachers and other school staff. It is worth noting that the teacher vacancy rate in the East Riding is 0.3 per cent. compared with the average of 0.6 per cent. The council's own website says:

"Quality of life in the East Riding is exceptionally high—housing is plentiful and prices are lower than in many other parts of the country".

That is why the formula works as it does,

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the rural nature of his county and constituency, and the formula funding arrangements give extra funding to sparsely populated authorities such as the East Riding, where there are many small village schools that are more expensive to run. The formula recognises the circumstances that he describes.

That is the situation, but the hon. Gentleman might know that, from the beginning of April, we are making some important changes to the school funding arrangements. They are designed to ensure that the money meant for schools reaches them in every area of the country and gives head teachers and governors funding stability and certainty, so that they can make better plans. Those key benefits will be delivered through multi-year budgets for schools, backed by the dedicated schools grant, or DSG. The DSG is a new ring-fenced grant from the Department for Education and Skills to each local authority, covering funding for schools and other provision for pupils.

In spring last year, we consulted widely on the new school funding arrangements, including our proposals for distributing the DSG between authorities, but schools and authorities in areas that spend more than their formula funding allocation—a situation that the hon. Gentleman described in relation to the East Riding of Yorkshire—told us of their concerns about our proposals.

Those schools and authorities were worried that, were we to pursue that course of action, over time their relative funding would be reduced. The East Riding is such an area, demonstrating, as the hon. Gentleman said, the priority that the council, as well as the Government, gives to schools in his area.

We listened carefully to those concerns, and during the summer last year we consulted again on a modified DSG distribution method that put stability at the heart of local authority funding allocations. A majority of the people who responded to the new consultation supported the modified method, as did the East Riding of Yorkshire council, I am pleased to say. That is what we will use to distribute the DSG in 2006–07 and 2007–08.

I shall describe how the DSG distribution will work for the next two years. We will take each authority's existing spending on the schools' budget as the starting point, give every authority an increase of at least 5 per cent. per pupil over the current spending in each year, and then distribute the remaining grant according to the Government's priorities for education.

Those priorities include personalised learning at key stage 3 and in primary schools; the provision of more practical learning options for pupils in key stage 4; the full-year cost of implementing time for PPA—planning, preparation and assessment—in primary schools; and the cost of the increased entitlement to free early years provision, from 33 to 38 weeks.

I want to stress that, although we have earmarked sums for those priorities within each authority's DSG allocation for each year, decisions about the distribution of funding between schools continue to be for local authorities, in consultation with their school forums.

What does the school funding settlement mean for the schools of the East Riding of Yorkshire? I am pleased to say that the county can expect an increase in DSG over current spending of no less than 6.6 per cent. per pupil in 2006–07, with a further increase in 2007–08 of 6.4 per cent. per pupil. Over the two years, that represents an increase of 13.4 per cent. per pupil. The hon. Gentleman described that as modest; I would describe it as generous.

Mr. Stuart: Will the Minister be so kind as to deal with a direct point? The difference between the highest and lowest-funded authorities in the country is growing. Does he really support that? Some local authorities have very high school balances and do not use the money that they are allocated. There is no difficulty between us on the principle of supporting deprived areas, but the gap between the highest and lowest-funded is growing, and rurality and other issues are not being covered properly.

Phil Hope: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point; he has made it before. All I pointed out to him was the fact that, whatever his views on how much other authorities receive—I understand his concerns about that—his authority will receive, over two years, a 13.4 per cent. per pupil increase. As I said, that is hardly modest. It builds on the spectacular increase in revenue and capital investment during the past eight or nine years, which has led to the spectacular results and achievements on which we have remarked in this debate.

The settlement is good for East Riding schools and good for schools throughout the country. It combines clarity on the Government's priorities for school funding with flexibility for local authorities and school forums over how they respond to those priorities. Most importantly, however, it means that, for the first time, schools throughout the country will know their budgets for more than one year ahead, enabling them to plan with confidence in support of school improvement.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the F40 group, which relates to the funding model that the East Riding of Yorkshire council is developing, supported by the wider F40 group of authorities. During recent months, the group has made useful presentations on the model to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools, 14–19 Learning and officials from my Department. We will continue to listen to the F40 group's views on school funding and we will be interested to see how the F40 funding model develops. Indeed, our joint head of school funding spoke at the F40 group's national conference earlier this month.

The F40 model is designed in particular to help in the distribution of funding between schools. One issue when considering it is whether it could be successfully adapted for national distribution between local authorities. That is the discussion we will have.

We have heard about the record number of teaching and support staff in the East Riding of Yorkshire and about the record investment in education. That has led to record achievement. I repeat my thanks to the hon. Gentleman for raising these issues and congratulate the teachers and pupils in his constituency who are doing so much to improve the quality of life for families and people in his area.

Child Support Agency (Dawn Rennie)

1 pm

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): First, I thank Mr. Speaker for making this debate available to me at such short notice. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department for the communications between us on some of the facts of the case that I am about to present. I am also grateful to the sheriff clerk and the procurator fiscal at Kilmarnock sheriff court.

On 9 February 2006, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions made a statement to the House on the future of the Child Support Agency. I welcomed that announcement to terminate the agency, believing it to run a shambolic system that works only at times in relation to those in pay-as-you-earn schemes and which does not work in relation to many other people, particularly those in business, who seem to employ smart accountants to get out of their parental responsibilities.

The Secretary of State announced that a new system would be devised by the chief executive of Liverpool city council, Sir David Henshaw, and that the House could expect a further announcement in the latter part of July 2006. My first question to the Minister is, when does he expect that change to be implemented? I believe that it must be done sooner rather than later, given my experiences over the great many years during which I have represented constituents on the issue of the agency. As the Minister will see from the case that I will highlight, the Government need to act now to help individuals who have become trapped by the system and have lost heavily as a result of incompetence in the agency and in the law.

Dawn Rennie of Prestwick has been fighting for more than 13 years to get her former partner—Patrick Clancy of Irvine, who also happens to be a constituent of mine—to pay maintenance for their now 14-year-old son. Throughout that time, Mr. Clancy has managed to build up arrears of nearly £16,000. He has given pocket money to his son of some £20 a week, but he has persistently failed to meet his responsibility and liability to pay his child maintenance.

Liability orders were sanctioned by the court in Scotland—one on 14 August 1995 for £4,897.21 plus costs, and a second on 17 October 2002 for £12,298.15 plus costs—but little of that money, if any, has been paid. In fact, £15,725.51 is outstanding in respect of those two orders alone. Subsequently, Mr. Clancy offered a mediocre £5,000 payment to cancel out the £16,000 of debt. Dawn Rennie declined that as derisory, and I agree that the offer was derisory.

It took 13 years of persistence by Dawn Rennie before the CSA finally got Mr. Clancy to court, on the ground that if he did not pay what he owed he should be sent to jail. I hold no personal malice towards Mr. Clancy, but I feel strongly that the CSA has been totally hopeless in pursuing the case timeously.

I have to tell the Minister that when the word "timeously" is put through a spell check, it comes out as "timorously". That may be more appropriate to the CSA than "timeously". At this time of year, when we have just gone through the Burns period, the word "timorous" has a particular meaning—I am sure everybody knows about the little mouse.

[Mr. Brian H. Donohoe]

The trial eventually took place on 15 December 2005, when Sheriff Ruth Anderson ruled that Mr. Clancy did not have the money to pay the arrears because of his drink and gambling addictions. It seems almost bizarre that the sheriff would rule in that way, but that is exactly what she did.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend has hit on a point that is very interesting and serious, because many of us have come across cases like this. The question, which is really for my hon. Friend the Minister, is why did it take so long—13 or 14 years—to get the case to the court. Why has action not been taken before now?

Mr. Donohoe: I think that is a question for the courts. As my hon. Friend says, the Minister needs to answer the point, and I am sure that he will.

As I said, a decision on the case was taken on 15 December, when Sheriff Ruth Anderson ruled that Mr. Clancy did not have the money. Obviously, because of that, the matter was never pursued. Dawn Rennie was neither informed of that hearing nor given any opportunity to stand as what would be described as a prosecution witness. That fundamental flaw in the system must be addressed. She has since been informed that the court's decision is final and that there is no right of appeal—a decision that I do not accept and which I do not think anyone could accept. I therefore want the Minister to consider overturning the decision. That is the second reason why I want the debate to give me some answers.

To say that I find the position that I have described totally unacceptable would be a major understatement. However, this debate is not in connection with the failure of the justice system, which should perhaps be the subject of a debate on another day. Today, I must place it on the record that, having knowledge of the Clancy family, who are well known in the Irvine area, I am convinced that Patrick Clancy will not be working for the £80 a week he claims to be. Consequently, he is making a complete mockery of the system.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): My hon. Friend is going down a trail that I have trodden for quite a while. Will he ask my hon. Friend the Minister why—when self-employed absent parents can prove conclusively to the tax man that they are making only £10,000 a year, but they are living in rather a large house, with a nice sports car in the drive, and they have holidays abroad—we do not use the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 to get the revenue off those individuals? Why is the CSA not asking itself questions about why it is not chasing those people up? It should not walk away from the difficult cases.

Mr. Donohoe: I could not agree more. The situation is clear on the basis of my experience and that of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members. I am sure that the Minister is aware of dozens of cases similar to the one that I am describing.

Time and again, I have come across similar situations, which is why I made the point about the person on PAYE being caught, quite correctly, although it is almost impossible on occasion for the CSA to do much about the person who is self-employed. I encountered one case of an individual who I and everyone else knew full well was a second-hand car salesman. He was selling more than 60 cars a week, yet he said that his income was less than £70 a week. That cannot be right, and the problem must be corrected at some point

Mr. Jim Cunningham: I want to reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins) said. The situation that he described has been well known to the CSA for many years. I have raised it on a number of occasions, as have other hon. Members. I sometimes wonder whether those on the Government Front Bench listen and look into the issues that Back Benchers raise. The phenomenon is not new—it has been around a long time—but no one has done anything to tackle it. Now we know why the CSA gets itself into a mess from time to time.

There must be a way to bring to book the people who are dodging the system. On the one hand, someone who works in a factory can get clobbered; on the other, someone who owns their own business can get away with blue murder. It is about time that that loophole was plugged.

Mr. Donohoe: My hon. Friend is right, and this is why Sir David Henshaw has a job on his hands. He will have to convince me and my hon. Friends, as well as colleagues across the House, that a system will come into being that covers the points made by my hon. Friend and by my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins). This issue needs to be examined and we need some ideas from David Henshaw long before the end of the year.

I welcome the proposal to revisit the legislation and hope to have the opportunity of making some input to it. I am sure that my hon. Friends also want some input. Again, I ask the Minister what consultation is taking place to allow hon. Members with first-hand experience to have some input so that we can have a transparent system, which we must have. The system that operates just now is neither transparent nor fair.

In the first instance, I am here to seek justice—that is the only word for it—for my constituent from a system that has consistently let her down every step of the way. I fully accept that the individual has responsibility, and that is the case that has to be made, but the state equally has responsibility. It must be shown clearly that there is some form of state responsibility. That is the third issue on which I ask for clarification and comment from the Minister.

While I accept that liability orders were put in place, it took 13 years for the agency finally to take the case to a full court hearing. As I explained, when it came to court, Dawn Rennie was not given the opportunity either to attend or to defend her family. That is plainly wrong, and it must be addressed and resolved by the Minister and the Department.

It must be said—there is no other way to put it—that the CSA has been a charter for disaster since its inception. My constituent has received neither a formal apology nor any hint of meaningful compensation. She was offered £150 as a good-will gesture when my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne) took the case up some seven years ago. I hope the Minister can rectify that either today or in the near future.

No doubt the Minister has had to face difficulties, but they are minuscule compared with the grief of those caught in the net of a bungling, inept system that has been accepted as such by the Secretary of State himself. The Government must face their responsibilities and acknowledge that the system is inept. They must address the problem immediately, not at some time in the future.

The Government have been quick enough to compensate farmers time and again—the latest occasion was after the foot and mouth outbreak. It seems that people would be better off if they were animals, because compensation is so quickly offered to farmers, but it is not offered, and there is no proposal to do so, for all the mistakes that have been made by the CSA over the years. I look forward to the Minister's response.

1.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Central Ayrshire (Mr. Donohoe) on securing this debate on a subject that is obviously important to one of his constituents. I appreciate that he feels strongly about the agency, as do other hon. Members who intervened.

I shall speak first about the specific case, on which the agency has fully briefed me. It is a difficult one and I am sure that hon. Members appreciate that I am constrained in the comments that I can make on specific cases. However, I always welcome the opportunity to discuss child support issues and to lay out the steps that the Government are now embarked upon to address in the long term the current performance shortcomings to which my hon. Friend referred.

The case illustrates the complex and lengthy processes that are often involved in securing maintenance for children. Miss Rennie has been seeking maintenance for her child through the CSA since its inception in the early 1990s. She has experienced a number of problems that have thwarted progress in the agency's attempt to secure maintenance.

The complex system for calculating maintenance that was in place when Miss Rennie first made her claim has led to a number of different maintenance assessments. However, the two individuals involved have also played a part. Claims and counterclaims by Miss Rennie and her ex-partner, mainly in relation to his income, also led to a number of revisions of both the weekly assessment and the level of outstanding debt.

Although I acknowledge that Miss Rennie has not received from the agency the level of service that she had a right to expect, it is clear that the agency has tried a number of different ways to secure the money owed by the non-resident parent. Two liability orders have been obtained in respect of maintenance owed, the first in August 1995 for more than £4,000 and the second in October 2002 for more than £12,000, and a range of enforcement measures have been used or attempted. They include a charge for payment in January 2003, the registration of letters of inhibition in May 2003, an attachment to attempt to seize a vehicle in June 2003, arrestment to freeze a bank account in August 2003 and orders for deduction of earnings in December 1993, in November 1994, which was revised in February 1995, and August 2001. All those attempts took place before the recent sheriff's judgment on further enforcement action.

Although there have been a few brief periods when maintenance was paid—mainly in September 1998 and between January and March 2003—in addition to the informal payment of pocket money to the child, it is clear that overall Miss Rennie has not achieved the outcome that she was looking for. The question is: why has that happened? It is clear to me that the agency could have acted more quickly, but I do not believe that it can be held solely responsible for failure to obtain maintenance.

When looking at individual cases, we must first consider whether parents are facing up to their responsibilities. It is not the responsibility of the CSA to provide maintenance to children. That responsibility lies with the non-resident parent. If non-resident parents met all their financial responsibilities, there would be no need for the agency to exist. Too often, debates about child support cases focus on the poor performance of the agency when the underlying issue is whether the non-resident parent is meeting their obligations. In the most recent sheriff court judgment in this case, the sheriff found that Miss Rennie's ex-partner had "neither wilfully refused nor been culpably negligent in not paying the sum due".

The implication of that is that Miss Rennie's ex-partner has not been avoiding his obligations, but has been unable to meet them due to his financial position.

It is not the normal procedure for the parent with care to be called at the court hearing because the action is taken on behalf of the agency. Information was being gathered continuously from her and the agency case was presented by a specialist solicitor, but the sheriff accepted that the witnesses who spoke on behalf of the non-resident parent in ascertaining his income level were credible. As the judgment stands, the agency is unable to enforce the recovery of the outstanding debt.

I am sure that Miss Rennie has a view about the sheriff's ruling, as does my hon. Friend. I sense that their dissatisfaction may now be directed more at aspects of the Scottish legal process than at the agency, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on that.

Mr. Donohoe: Surely it is common sense to say that the person who is best versed in the case was Miss Rennie. It is clear that there is a serious fault in the system. Would it not be better when an application is made to the sheriff court or High court that the individual who is most aggrieved is present in court and, at the very least, asked to make some comment?

Mr. Plaskitt: I should not stray into the realm of how legal systems operate because that would be inappropriate. I have read through all the details of Miss Rennie's case and reviewed others as well. It is not the normal practice for the parent with care to attend court. However, it is the practice that the solicitor representing the agency in such hearings is usually in regular contact with them to collect the relevant information to pursue the case in the court. After all, the agency goes to court to take action because it wants to act on behalf of that parent. It usually gets to that point because it has exhausted all other attempts to obtain money from the non-resident parent.

Mr. Jenkins: I should like to take the Minister back about two and a half minutes. I cannot believe that he made the statement that he made then. He said that many people were critical of the CSA but that it was not the CSA's fault—it is the fault of the absent parent who is not a law-abiding, upstanding, righteous individual. That is almost like the Home Secretary standing up in the Chamber and saying that we would not need the police, prisons, enforcement or legislation if there were more honourable, law-abiding citizens who obeyed rules and regulations. Of course, we do have the police service, prisons and laws because we do not have such a situation. The Minister cannot come here and pretend that the problem is not with the CSA but with that difficult bunch out there. You were set up to deal with that difficult bunch.

John Cummings (in the Chair): Order. I am not dealing with anything.

Mr. Plaskitt: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's strength of feeling. I can answer as a Minister, but I am also a constituency Member of Parliament with my own CSA case load, and I am as aware as he is of the pressures. My point was that there would not be a requirement for an agency if parents always met their responsibilities when they split up or a relationship ended. He is right; the agency exists because some parents will not face up to their responsibility, and intervention is needed to make them do so. The agency has an enforcement role.

My hon. Friend and others will know from their case load of the extraordinary lengths to which some non-resident parents will go to evade responsibility. The agency has a certain armoury of powers to go after non-compliant, non-resident parents, but whether it has enough powers or uses them to the fullest possible extent are questions that must be answered. In a recent statement in the House, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that the CSA is not fit for purpose—we all accept that. One of the areas where it has failed and let down parents is by not having a sufficiently successful record in ensuring enforcement on the non-resident parent. I shall explain in a moment what action we are taking to try to improve the agency's performance in respect of enforcement and what we can do in the longer term with the successor agency or body to strengthen that role and ensure compliance of non-resident parents.

Mr. Donohoe: In replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins), the Minister indicated that the CSA depended very much on the responsibility of the absent parent. The absent parent in Miss Rennie's case has been served notices at five different addresses but has not responded to any of them. It is clear that that person is not normal, as one might suggest. It is obvious that he is trying to evade any responsibility as a parent, and that is surely the difficulty that must be addressed when we consider what alternatives to put in place.

Mr. Plaskitt: That is why the agency resorted to going to court in that case. It is not for me to comment on the sheriff's judgment—that is for others to comment on, and I am aware that they have. The agency can take the action to court, but it cannot determine the conclusion that the sheriff might reach.

The case that my hon. Friend the Member for Central Ayrshire raises illustrates one of the many reasons why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State concluded that the present system was not fit for purpose. The CSA was set up to replace a court system that was slow and complex, and which did not deliver for parents caring for children. Unfortunately, most of those complaints have also been levelled at the agency.

Throughout the agency's history, there has been an endless stream of negative stories and a constant flow of letters and calls from the public to the agency and to MPs pointing out its manifest failings. I have asked my officials to consider whether anything further can be done in this specific case, and I shall write to my hon. Friend when I have had a response.

Turning to the broader issues that my hon. Friend and others have raised, last year we asked the newly appointed chief executive of the agency, Stephen Geraghty, to conduct a root-and-branch review of the agency's operations. From his findings, we concluded that the current system was incapable of delivering the outcomes that we all desire from a child support agency. The problems are not just in how the agency operates, but in the policy and legislative framework that is supposed to support it. We therefore asked Sir David Henshaw to redesign the system. The terms of reference for the redesign have been drawn as widely as possible to allow all options for reform to be considered fully.

My hon. Friend asked about involvement of and consultation with other people. Sir David has already written to all Members of the House asking for their views. If my hon. Friends have not received the letter, I encourage them to give their views to Sir David Henshaw if they wish. He has also already formally been in touch with Opposition spokespersons for Department for Work and Pensions matters, and is expected to report to Ministers later this year.

In addition, we recently published an operational improvement plan that sets out how the agency will turn around its performance over the next three years. The £90 million investment will support the recruitment of more staff and the deployment of more staff to processing work, particularly enforcement. We will quadruple the number of staff who are dedicated to enforcement activity from just over 500 to 2,000 by 2009, with an aim to raise compliance from the 65 per cent. that is achieved at present to 80 per cent. by March 2009. We shall also consider the use of data from credit reference agencies and from Revenue and Customs.

A further £30 million will be invested in using private debt collection agencies to recover more than £100 million of historic debt during the three years of the plan. That will also allow us to draw on the expertise of the private sector. Work has already begun on introducing those improvements and will continue while Sir David is producing his redesign of the whole agency.

In conclusion, I believe that all Members of the House continue to support the original objectives of the CSA. The measures that we have announced are an important step towards improving the present arrangements and, critically, putting in place the foundations for a child support system that will have a better chance of meeting those objectives in the long run.

Mr. Donohoe: Will the Minister give some indication of how he intends to address the issue of the self-employed?

Mr. Plaskitt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of that. I believe that in his experience and that of every Member of the House, myself included, some of the most intractable cases that present in our surgeries are of exactly that nature. The non-resident parent, who may have been in employment, voluntarily goes into self-employment and then uses all manner of devices to conceal their income level. My hon. Friend will know that parents with care who have evidence of that can ask the agency to revisit and investigate if there is evidence that living circumstances do not equate to declared income, but that is difficult for the agency, and we all know that there are plenty of devices that people in self-employment can use in an attempt to evade responsibility. We have specifically asked Sir David, in reviewing how a future agency might work, to reflect on what can be done to give us more leverage against people who are trying to evade their responsibility. It is part of the wider enforcement issue.

The present system is not working, but it is time to learn the lessons from the past and to look to a new system to ensure that parents meet their responsibilities to support their children.

World Poverty

1.30 pm

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): As we are all aware, 2005 witnessed the unprecedented Make Poverty History campaign, with global calls to take action on debt relief, increased aid and trade justice. As my hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt mention, substantial progress was made on the first two of those demands, and the Government should rightly take credit for that. However, the issue of trade justice still waits to be resolved.

Those developments have created new opportunities to tackle global poverty, but the debate has moved on this year to the question of the best ways of achieving a sustainable route out of poverty. The Department for International Development's current policy review, which will lead to the anticipated White Paper this summer, should look at three macro-economic priorities: economic growth to create real employment for local populations; durable and sustainable tax systems to achieve a route out of aid dependency; and social protection systems to ensure that the most vulnerable in society can benefit from development progress. Those are weighty issues so I shall focus on the latter, although it is not unconnected to the other two or, for that matter, to the thorny issue of fairer world trade.

As the Minister will be aware, I visited Malawi with fellow members of the Select Committee on International Development a few weeks ago. One of our first visits was to a food aid programme that had been set up to cope with last year's partial failure of the maize crop, which forms a staple part of the country's diet. The system was being run—fairly efficiently, I might say—by a non-governmental organisation, with financial assistance from our Government. Indeed, almost 5 million people in Malawi currently benefit from such schemes, and famine has been prevented. However, I was reminded of a comment that Professor Jeffrey Sachs made when he visited Westminster last November. He said that people who visit Africa frequently comment that they can see little evidence of progress on the ground. According to Professor Sachs's figures, $38 per person was spent on development assistance to Africa in 2003. However, the cash flow that is released and which reaches the ground in sectoral investment is much lower than that figure suggests. Of that $38, $4 goes on emergency aid for food, $10 goes on what Professor Sachs terms debt relief accountancy and another $6 goes on technical co-operation, which he believes does relatively little for the developing world. On that basis, the real figure is reduced to $17 or $18 per person per annum for investment. That stands in contrast to the $70 per capita that Professor Sachs calculates is necessary to pull Africa out of poverty.

It is very likely that all the people we met on that food programme in Malawi faced malnourishment consistently and regularly, as did those who just failed to qualify for such schemes. Crop failures are nothing new, and with increasing signs of global warming they are likely to increase. However, we still appear to rely on methods that were considered outdated in our own country by the 19th century and which work on the underlying theory that we cannot trust the poor with cash. That is not to say that the current aid spending priorities are not important. Improving Government capacity at the upper levels is vital, and investment in major infrastructure and economic development is essential. Improving agricultural production in countries such as Malawi is a key long-term objective, while tackling corruption and inefficiencies in regulation must be a main priority. However, many people are falling behind and have witnessed precious little progress throughout their lifespan.

In its recent practice paper on social transfers, which was printed last October, DFID states that the number of people living on less than $1 a day is projected to rise in sub-Saharan Africa from 314 million to 366 million. Deaths from AIDS continue to rise over the next 10 years, leading to an increase in the number of orphans from the present level of 43 million. Only yesterday, Save the Children highlighted the fact that among 15 to 24-year-olds in sub-Saharan Africa, young women are six times more likely than men to be infected with HIV/AIDS.

Although change at the top of Government and in state institutions is essential, we also need to refocus our efforts on the ground to provide protection for the elderly, the disabled and children if we are to achieve the first millennium development goal of reducing the number of people living on less than $1 a day. There is growing evidence that the use of cash transfers as part of comprehensive social protection systems, which are grounded not in simple charity but in a human rights approach, can play a key role in reducing poverty and vulnerability.

In its report "Age and security", which was published in 2004, Help Age International showed how poverty in old age impacted on the whole family. In South Africa, one in three households is headed by an older person. In 66 per cent. of those households, older people care for children. The impact of AIDS means that the role of older people is changing rapidly. Many are acting as the main family breadwinner and caring for sick adult children and orphaned grandchildren. Some of the older people I met in Malawi also informally adopt orphan children when they have no children of their own.

The social pension scheme in South Africa has reduced older people's poverty by an astonishing 94 per cent. and the poverty of the population as a whole by 12.5 per cent. Research shows that even very low social pensions are extremely valuable to poor, older people. The fact that the payments are consistent and regular allows households to put money aside for emergencies and to invest in their children's health and education. That reduces their vulnerability in the event of a crisis and significantly reduces the risk of their remaining permanently stuck in absolute poverty.

A further report, which was commissioned by Help Age International, Save the Children and the Institute of Development Studies and issued last year, reviewed cash transfer schemes in 15 countries across east and southern Africa. It showed that most of the schemes had transparent eligibility criteria and were accepted as fair by community members. Those who support vulnerable children and community members are often poor themselves, so social transfers can help to reduce the burden of care. The study showed that, rather than creating dependency, cash transfer schemes are a crucial response to rising dependency ratios in the context of high HIV prevalence.

For children, specific payments that are dependent on school attendance or health care have proved successful in many south American countries. In Mexico, for example, the Opportunidades programme has showed impressive results, with improved health care for under-fives and increased school enrolment for girls, and the growth rate for 12 to 36-month-old infants has risen by 16 per cent. That last statistic is important because infant malnutrition often has an irreversible effect on life expectancy, and targeting vulnerable children, particularly in that age group, is key not only to their own long-term survival, but to that of future generations.

Clearly, many political and financial decisions will shape the size and type of social protection. However, it should always be remembered, as Plan UK noted in its report "Ending Child Poverty and Securing Child Rights", which it released last October, that "the most marginalised and the chronically poor typically lack a voice, organisation and political capital."

All too frequently, the voices of women and, to an even greater extent, children are undervalued in decision-making processes. Donors, including DFID, need to play a part in bringing the solutions that I have outlined into the poverty reduction debate. Such schemes not only give poor people dignity and choice in their everyday lives, but form an important social contract with Government that helps to improve state accountability.

Schemes also need to suit a country's individual circumstances. For example, payments dependent on children's school attendance or on attending health facilities have not been as successful in Africa as in south America, perhaps owing to the lack of adequate facilities, which have not been able to cope with increases in demand. Identifying the vulnerable children can be difficult in countries where births are not registered, or where there are urban street children or child-headed households.

Cash transfer schemes need to be integrated into a comprehensive package of social protection measures that involve scaling up pilot projects, providing the necessary capacity to achieve effective delivery and institutionalising those measures within Government structures. The social contract between citizen and Government must be upheld and cannot be viewed just as a donor-driven experiment that can be abandoned when the project cycle ends.

Securing sustainable funding for such systems is obviously crucial, but evidence that DFID presented last year shows that although the costs are not insignificant, they are affordable if the political will exists, even for many of the poorest nations. The cost of scaling up the Kalomo pilot cash transfer programme in Zambia to the national level, to provide the poorest 10 per cent. of households with around 50 cents a day, would be about $20 million a year, or just less than 1 per cent. of the 2005 Zambian Government budget. Similar schemes in sub-Saharan Africa could be achieved in most cases with less then 5 per cent. of existing development assistance.

The current increases in donor aid, which are based on much longer-term and predictable commitments, now allow Governments in sub-Saharan Africa and other poor parts of the world seriously to consider such initiatives on a wider scale. Obviously such schemes need to be linked with policies to increase taxable income streams, so that in the long term they can provide funds from their own resources.

I mentioned the link between social transfers and trade justice. Sadly, in the current trade discussions there is far too little debate about how trade should link with labour policies. Increasing globalisation and industrialisation lead inevitably to more "churning" of jobs. If we are to encourage workers in emerging economies to take risks, we must also consider the need to provide basic social protection during periods of unemployment, so that they are less vulnerable to financial disaster and better able to make use of new opportunities created in the labour markets.

In the approach to the White Paper, the Secretary of State for International Development has placed emphasis in his speeches on the need to look at fundamental rights, such as social payments. I very much welcome his thinking on that. I hope that we can use the principles of social protection that we developed to such success in the 20th century in our new policy approach. I should be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister how his Department hopes to take such initiatives forward in the coming years.

1.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North (Ann McKechin) on securing the debate and more generally on her work on the International Development Committee and as chair of the all-party group on debt, aid and trade. I share her view that we made substantial progress on debt and aid last year. We saw important progress for the very poorest nations of the world at Hong Kong. However, like her, I hope that we shall see more substantial progress on securing the outcome from the Doha development round of World Trade Organisation talks that we all want.

I have been interested in social transfers ever since I visited the Germiston township just outside Johannesburg to see a project that DFID was funding and which Christian Aid ran. The project supported a number of women in the township and provided support to those living with HIV/AIDS. The scheme helped to ensure that orphans got into school and—crucial to this debate—that elders in the community were provided with support to access the pensions that are available in South Africa. Those pensions make a fundamental difference to the lives of elderly people in that community helping to look after those who have been orphaned by HIV/AIDS.

My hon. Friend's contribution in this debate is particularly timely, building on the attention generated by the Department's paper on social transfers, which was published in October 2005, and on what was more recently expressed in the UNICEF and DFID-hosted global partners forum on AIDS-affected children, which also considered how social transfers might best help those orphaned by AIDS.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, the Department is preparing a new White Paper on international development. We are exploring a range of options and I shall take her comments about meaningful work on economic growth, tax systems and social protection systems as a contribution to the consultation process on that White Paper. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already made it clear that further work on economic growth will be a key part of DFID's work going forward. I accept my hon. Friend's point about the need to support developing countries to do more work on tax systems—I would see that as part of the broader work on governance—and social protection systems. There is a debate going on in the Department, and more generally with NGOs, parliamentarians and so on, about the role that social protection and social transfers can play.

My hon. Friend drew attention to a number of countries where social transfer systems are already in place. Bangladesh and Nepal have social pensions, and Mozambique has had a social transfer programme since the early 1990s. There is no question in my mind or the Department's but that social transfer schemes have a role to play. The idea that poor people cannot be trusted with money, which my hon. Friend described, certainly has no traction in DFID or on the Labour side of the House generally. If there were any doubt, the appetite for micro finance and the success of micro-finance institutions around the world should have put that to bed. The success of social transfer programmes also provides powerful evidence of that point.

There is an issue, however, about the speed at which social transfers are introduced. If it happens too fast, it can overwhelm local capacity and often undermine broader civil service reform initiatives. A gradual expansion, from smaller initiatives and pilot projects, has proved to be effective, not least in Brazil and Mexico, which are two of the examples that I think my hon. Friend mentioned. We see our role as providing finance and helping to build the capacity of the developing country Government to put in place social transfer schemes.

My hon. Friend will be familiar with the Commission for Africa, which recommended in its final document that donors should commit to long-term predictable funding of national social protection strategies with some $2 billion a year immediately, rising to $5 billion to $6 billion by 2015. We are seeking to build a consensus on the adoption of such commitments. As part of our work following last year's publication of the social transfers paper, we are developing a handbook to provide guidance and advice for developing country Governments and for our staff who work on such projects on the setting up of social transfer programmes, drawing on good and bad experiences from around the world. I hope that that will be ready towards the end of May and that my hon. Friend will see it as a tangible demonstration of the fact that the Department wants to take such work forward.

My hon. Friend is also right to highlight the scale of the challenges that face us in tackling poverty, which is demonstrated by many statistics, not least that half of Africa's children live in absolute poverty. A daily reality for many of the families wherein those children live is the constant worry as to whether the children will go to bed hungry or have to miss school because they cannot afford the user fees, and whether they can afford to go to the clinic and access the necessary medicines when they are ill.

Hundreds of millions of families worldwide live with those uncertainties, and are unable to care properly for their children or plan properly for their future. They cannot access the fundamental human rights to social security and an adequate standard of living. In that context, social transfers have a huge potential role to play in helping to reach poor families with regular and predictable grants of cash or food over a period of years.

My hon. Friend rightly pointed out that social transfers are not new. In the UK, our poverty rate would probably be three times higher if we did not have a national, tax-funded system of social transfers. In the past 10 to 15 years, middle-income countries such as Brazil, Mexico and South Africa have put in place national social transfer programmes. The most common schemes are non-contributory old-age pensions and programmes that provide cash transfers to support children and their families. In Brazil, the Bolsa Familia cash transfer programme aims to reach a quarter of the population by the end of this year.

Evaluations of existing social transfer programmes suggest that their impact has been pretty impressive to date. They have transformed the lives of millions of households and increased the incomes of poor households—significantly, in some cases. The evaluations show that in South Africa and Mexico there have been major impacts on early childhood development, with young children being significantly taller than they would have been. Clearly, the health and education of the poorest families has improved as a result of the programmes.

Evaluations of the effects of such programmes in Mexico, Brazil, and South Africa show that people are healthier as a result of their improved nutrition and greater ability to travel to and access health services and buy medicines. School attendance among those who benefit from social transfer programmes has also risen as families use the cash to send their children to school. Given the success of such programmes in middle-income countries, it is clear that well-implemented social transfers have a role to play and could have a similar impact in the world's poorest countries.

My hon. Friend might know that last October I travelled with the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), to Zambia and then Malawi. We were in Zambia at the start of a small pilot scheme, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North referred, that provides 1,000 households with up to $8 a month, which is beginning to demonstrate the potential of social transfers in the world's poorest countries. The early results of that scheme show that families are eating more meals, fewer people are dying, health has improved and there has been a significant increase in school attendance.

In Bangladesh, a social transfer programme that we fund has resulted in a 70 per cent. reduction in the number of families without enough to eat.

My hon. Friend talked about children who are affected by AIDS, and the potential for support to carers. Given the severe challenge that HIV/AIDS poses in sub-Saharan Africa, where the number of AIDS orphans is projected to rise to 18 million by 2010, we certainly believe that social transfers have a huge potential role to play.

Let me give a personal example of the difference that social transfers make. In Zambia, a 50-year-old widow called Jesinaya Kambanje, who cares for eight children who have been orphaned as a result of HIV/AIDS, has been able to access the social transfer pilot programme. The children used to go hungry and she was often forced to beg from her neighbours. Now, as a result of the pilot, she can buy maize and vegetables for the children, and when one of them was ill she was able to take her to hospital and buy medicine to support her.

Social transfers can provide millions of children with a future. They are an investment by the state in its poorest citizens. I agree with my hon. Friend's point that by sharing wealth, the state creates wealth. As a result, children can grow up free from hunger, better educated, and healthy enough to become more productive members of society, in turn providing poor countries with more competitive work forces. By directly channelling cash to poor people, the state is recognising that poor people know best how to care for their families. The evidence suggests that they spend that cash well. As my hon. Friend says, they can be trusted to spend money appropriately and in a way that suits their needs.

Supporting human development is not the only way in which social transfers contribute to economic growth. As well as providing poor people with security and the knowledge that they can provide their children with the essentials for life for the foreseeable future, social transfers encourage adults to invest in new business opportunities. In Mexico, beneficiaries of the Progresa programme—to which my hon. Friend referred—spend, on average, a quarter of their social transfer payment on investment in micro-enterprises, giving, on the basis of the evaluation that we have seen, high returns up to 50 per cent. In Zambia, Jesinaya used her transfer to buy two chickens to invest in production, and is planning to purchase a pig. My hon. Friend will recognise that there is potential for Jesinaya to make more money as a result of those investments.

The criticism that social transfers create dependency is not a valid argument. In South Africa and Brazil, recipients of social transfers are more likely to be in work than those without a transfer. That might be partly because the extra cash means that poor people are better able to cover the costs of finding work and more likely to keep their jobs due to their improved health. There is also evidence that cash transfers help to stimulate local economic activity by increasing purchasing power, particularly in areas where the economy is weak.

Ann McKechin: Does my hon. Friend agree that social payments establish—for the first time in many cases—a direct relationship between the poorest citizens and the state because they act as a contract of payment, and that that helps to strengthen the democratic accountability of the state to its citizens?

Mr. Thomas: I certainly agree that it helps to encourage the relationship between the citizen and the state. One hopes that it is not the first time that there is evidence of that relationship, and that direct democracy provides that first opportunity. However, I accept my hon. Friend's point that it helps to cement the relationship and give the poorest citizens confidence in the ability of the state to help them, and that it helps to build social cohesion in the poorest communities in that way.

Another argument that is often made about social transfers is that they cost too much and cannot be afforded. My hon. Friend referred to studies on this issue. A recent study conducted in seven African countries suggests that most countries could already afford a minimum package of social security, if it were a political priority. In all but one of the countries, a transfer equivalent to half a dollar a day to 20 per cent. of the population could be financed by less than 10 per cent. of donor assistance. A study by the International Labour Organisation suggests that if that initiative were rolled out across sub-Saharan Africa, it would cost $1.5 billion annually, which is a relatively small sum when set against the commitments made last year to scale up donor assistance.

It is not easy to implement social transfer programmes, because many countries have weak capacity, but it is clear from the experience across a range of middle and low-income countries that it is possible—

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 22 March 2006

[MR. MIKE WEIR in the Chair]

Ministerial Accountability

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mike Weir (in the Chair): Before we start, I should point out that there are three clocks in the room, each showing a different time. I intend to operate by the clock straight in front of me and behind me.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): It is a pleasure to open this debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Weir. I have never seen a happier Whip than the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Watson) when the Deputy Leader of the House arrived in the nick of time. It is good to see him in his place and to see my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on the Opposition Front Bench.

For any colleagues who do not know, it might be helpful to set out what the debate is not about—or at least what I do not intend it to be about. It is not about ministerial accountability as it relates to the ministerial code. The debate is about Ministers being accountable to the House and by so doing making the House of Commons and Parliament more relevant to the general public and perhaps getting better coverage in the media. Before moving on to some suggestions on how to do that that I believe are worth at least considering, it will be helpful to set the scene and lay out the problem as I see it.

We are all aware that in the 2005 general election turnout was a little higher than in 2001, but it was still the second lowest since 1918. Turnout has decreased by more than 15 per cent. since 1992, which should worry all of us who believe in democracy and the importance of Parliament to our political process. The late Robin Cook is quoted in Lord Puttnam's report, "Members Only? Parliament in the Public Eye", saying:

> "The problem is not that the British people have no opinion on the issues of the day, but that more and more of them no longer feel ownership of their parliamentary democracy, or believe that its political culture can solve the problems of their lives".

That is true. All of us talk to constituents, correspond with them and meet them at surgeries, so we all know that people are passionately interested in the issues. There is a range of subjects that energise our constituents, from local, domestic concerns right up to the great, global issues of the day. Constituents are engaged in political debate; the problem seems to be that they are just not very interested in Parliament.

The Power report contained some interesting statistics about political engagement. It found that, in a 12-month period, 62 per cent. of the population had donated money to a political or a campaigning organisation, 30 per cent. had helped to raise money for a political or a campaigning organisation, 42 per cent. had signed a petition, 25 per cent. had contacted a public official and 13 per cent. had contacted a politician to change laws or policies. That evidence tells us that the citizenry are engaged and intervening in the political process, which makes it even more surprising that turnout in elections is falling. The easiest thing for people to do is to go along, put a cross on the paper and put it in the ballot box or fill out a postal ballot paper.

Campaigning organisations such Friends of the Earth, Greenpeace, the National Trust and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds have seen their memberships grow in the same period as electoral turnout has declined. The Countryside Alliance demonstration, the demonstrations about the Iraq war and the Live 8 event were three of the best attended political events in the UK's history, so why, at a time when people seem more politically active, although not in the traditional party political way, do we see less involvement in elections and traditional party activity? Is it a matter of the perception of Parliament and whether it is relevant to those questions, or is it to do with the conventional political approach to addressing the issues?

One factor could be awareness of the important role that Parliament plays. The Power report's work demonstrates that that might be the case. The report states:

> "More media and especially television coverage is essential in order to make people more aware how central politics is to everyday life and the big questions."

Its most important finding was that the view of the majority of people talked to was that basic understanding of our political system and the way in which Parliament worked was very low, leaving people unclear about how to get involved in politics and how to participate in our parliamentary process.

No matter what the public perception is of Parliament, it is—or should be—the place where decisions are made and Government scrutinised. The excellent report published in July 2000 by Lord Norton of Louth and his commission says that one of the core functions of Parliament is:

> "To ensure that the measures and actions of government are subject to scrutiny on behalf of citizens and that the government answers to Parliament for its actions."

With Ministers attending Parliament less frequently than I would like them to, it is difficult for Members to scrutinise them on a regular basis. This is, I hope, the only party political point that I shall make, but it needs to be pointed out that the Prime Minister's attendance at Parliament is even worse than other Ministers'. The report of Lord Norton's commission states:

> "Evidence of prime ministers taking Parliament less seriously than before is to be found in the amount of time they spend in the House of Commons. Proximity is important and prime ministers are now relatively infrequent attenders."

The report continues:

> "The present incumbent, Tony Blair, has a particularly poor record of attendance. He is rarely in the House, even for the purpose of voting."

We need say no more on that.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): I think that we do need to say more, because that is clearly a partisan and ill-informed comment by someone who is usually better informed. Does the hon. Member accept that the Prime Minister has made more statements to the House and on more issues than any recent Prime Minister, thus being very accountable in the House of Commons to all Members, including himself?

Mr. Harper: The Prime Minister certainly has made a number of statements, but he chooses when to make statements and he does so for his own reasons. I have in mind issues over which he has less control. It was noticeable that the very first thing that he did when he was elected to Government was to change the frequency of Prime Minister's questions from twice a week to once a week. Having Prime Minister's questions just once a week, albeit for 30 minutes, makes it much less likely that topical questions will be raised. If questions arise just after Wednesday, by the time we get round to the following Wednesday they have ceased to be topical, as they have been done to death by the 24-hour news media. The Prime Minister thus avoids having to be questioned on those topical issues at a time not of his choosing and in a manner that he does not control. That is not very helpful.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Was it not noticeable that the Deputy Leader of the House did not comment on the Prime Minister's frequency of attendance in the Division Lobbies, for example, where he is accessible to hon. Members, or at least to Labour Members and occasionally to Opposition Members?

Mr. Harper: That was noticeable. We know some good examples of critical votes for the Government for which the Prime Minister was not present. Lord Norton talked about proximity; one of the important things about voting in the Division Lobbies, particularly for Government Members, is that it is really the only opportunity that most Back Benchers get to buttonhole Ministers, especially the Prime Minister, and raise with them issues of the day and their constituents' concerns in a free and frank way. There are few opportunities to do so during the rest of the week, because the Prime Minister of necessity has a busy schedule. We recognise that Prime Ministers have many calls on their time, but previous incumbents of that office, of both parties, made a bigger effort to attend the House and were more accessible to their Back Benchers—sometimes more accessible than they would have wished. That is something that we need to look at again.

There is an increasing feeling that decisions are frequently made in private and announced, dripped out, or leaked to the media, and that Parliament has become increasingly sidelined. In his report, Lord Norton says:

"The media revolution"—

the move to 24-hour news—

"has benefited government but not Parliament."

The report continues:

"Ministers use the media for making policy announcements",

but the

"exploitation of the media by ministers has been at the expense of Parliament."

It points out:

"An interview on the BBC Today programme reaches a mass audience, is not subject to questioning for 30 or 40 minutes, and helps set the agenda for the day."

Despite the best efforts of Front Benchers and the Speaker, on many occasions policy announcements and suggestions have found their way into the media before being announced to the House. For example, proposals that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may make in his Budget statement have been well trailed in the media in the past few days. None of those should be in the media, and if the speculation turns out to be well informed, we will wonder how the information got there.

The Executive have grown too powerful at the expense of Parliament. There are a couple of quotes in the Power report that bear repeating. The first is from the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who said:

"Parliament has run away from its responsibilities in the sense that it should not allow its programme to be decided by the Executive."

The second is a contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who said:

"My impression is that for at least two decades and possibly quite a lot longer, government control of parliament has been increasing . . . and ought to be diminished."

It seems as though Parliament only ever features in the media when there is a contentious vote, such as the recent vote on the Education and Inspections Bill, or at Prime Minister's questions. Those of us who regularly attend the House know that neither of those situations is particularly typical of the extensive work that goes on in the main Chamber, this Chamber or in the Committees of the House.

It is not the role of John Humphrys or Jeremy Paxman to hold Ministers to account. Although they can and do perform that task effectively, it is a task that belongs to the House of Commons and its Members. There is a vital role for the media in relaying and explaining to the public, but Parliament must have the first bite of the cherry. There are many ways in which that could be done. I am sure that all hon. Members who contribute to the debate will have their own ideas and I do not expect there to be a great deal of agreement with my humble suggestions, but I think that they are worth considering.

When I looked at other Parliaments, I was struck by a possible solution. In Australia, to pick a country at random, the parliamentary system is relatively similar to ours. There, it has traditionally been expected that all Ministers who are members of the House of Representatives will be present at Question Time, which takes place every day that the House sits, unless they are ill, overseas or engaged on urgent public business. At one point, they introduced a rota system whereby Ministers had to attend only on certain occasions, but they dropped it after one Session. Therefore, in Australia, all Ministers, including the Prime Minister, are available every day to attend and answer questions.

Compare and contrast the Australian system with ours, in which oral questions, which are the only opportunity that Members get to question Ministers on detailed departmental matters, take place only about once a month for each Department. I suggest that we should move toward the Australian system. I do not propose that we should go all the way—Ministers and potential Ministers would probably be horrified at the idea of having to come to the House of Commons every day—but I believe that there is a balance between our system and the Australian system that would enable us to increase ministerial accountability.

Nigel Griffiths: Like me, the hon. Member has looked at the Australian system very carefully. What debate did he find most enlightening in terms of the proposal that he makes?

Mr. Harper: I am sorry; I do not follow the Minister's question.

Nigel Griffiths: What did the hon. Member observe in the Australian Parliament—which specific debate or Question Time—that best illuminated the issue? I must say that I found it difficult to find one.

Mr. Harper: The strength of the Australian system arises from the fact that the Prime Minister and senior Ministers have to attend every day and questions are put without notice. Other methods might be more suitable to the way in which our business is done, but in the Australian system, if there are questions of the day or topical issues, rather than hold them over to be dealt with when the appropriate Question Time arises, the Prime Minister can be questioned on them that day by members of the House of Representatives. In these times of a 24-hour news media, such questions are of no interest to the media when, through a parliamentary process such as ours, the formal opportunity to ask questions comes along. In the Australian system, rather than an issue being discussed purely by the broadcast media and in conversations in TV studios, with Ministers being questioned by journalists, the coverage of that issue in the broadcast media that reach people at home will be of the Prime Minister in the House of Representatives answering questions put by Members of that House. The advantage of that system lies in topicality—Parliament is at the centre of the topical issues of the day.

As I said, there may well be other, more appropriate ways to achieve a similar focus in this House, which take into consideration the way in which we traditionally do things. I simply put that example before Members to provoke discussion. Parliament and Ministers need to be more responsive to the events of the day, and Ministers need to be available to Members to respond to current events.

Lord Norton's commission focused on that issue. Some of the recommendations that he made six years ago have been adopted by the Government, which is welcome to the extent that they have been adopted. The commission commented that "there should be greater opportunity for short debates on issues of immediate importance."

Obviously, this Chamber—Westminster Hall—provides such opportunities, but the commission thought that there was a need for that opportunity to be available in the main Chamber. It also recognised, as other hon. Members and I do, that there is provision

"under Standing Order No. 24 for MPs to seek leave for an emergency debate" but that that seldom happens. The commission's recommendation, which is worthy of consideration, was that "there should be provision for MPs to request short 60-minute debates, these debates to take place at the start of public business on the following day", and that

"responsibility for granting such debates should remain with the Speaker."

That is not to say that that should become the default setting—that we should have such debates every day, but neither should they be hugely infrequent and happen only once every few years. There is a balance in between. If the House were able to discuss topical issues on the Floor of the House at the start of public business—the time of day when there is a chance of influencing and engaging with the media agenda—that would put the House at the centre of public debate, rather than the debate taking place in the 24-hour news studio. That would enable us to set the agenda for the day, rather than follow behind and wait for the process of setting business for the House to allow debate.

My final proposal involves the only mention that I will make of the ministerial code. As I said, an increasing number of policy initiatives seem to be leaked to the media in a stage-managed way. I am sure that the present Government are not the first Government to do that, but the practice has increased. That is damaging because it means that those policy announcements are questioned not by Members of the House, but in broadcasting studios in short interviews, which do not involve 40 minutes or an hour's worth of detailed scrutiny on issues that Members can raise on behalf of their constituents. The final Norton recommendation that I think worthy of note is the recommendation that the ministerial code should place and making it part of the code to increase the importance of that, and the weight that Ministers should place on Parliament.

"a requirement on ministers to make the most important announcements to Parliament"

If we wrap all those things together, it means considering making Question Time more topical and allowing Members to ask questions without notice of all Ministers; perhaps returning to a system with Prime Minister's questions twice a week for 15 minutes to increase their topicality and so that the Prime Minister would have to respond to issues in the House rather than in some other format; and increasing the frequency with which statements are made to the House. Such moves would increase the significance of Parliament and of Members of Parliament in the public eye, and make us more central to debate. The news media would become more focused on what happens here, not because we want it to be but because we would be at the centre of issues. That would be helpful for Parliament and it would help constituents to engage with issues. We have already been through the numbers of all those who are engaged with political campaigning organisations. They would find voting more relevant, turnout would rise, and this place would be at the centre of national life rather than increasingly marginalised.

9.51 am

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on his choice of subject and on the thoughtful way in which he presented it. He has clearly done all the required reading, including the Power report and the Norton report. I shall develop one or two of his ideas in my speech.

The subject of our debate is every bit as important as that of our debate this afternoon on the Floor of the House. The health of our democracy is as important as the health of our economy. However, I fear that our debate in Westminster Hall might not get the same coverage.

I give the Government some credit for some of the changes that have been made. This debate takes place, metaphorically if not physically, in Westminster Hall. Ten years ago, we did not have Westminster Hall, so the frontier that Ministers have to patrol is now much longer. There have been many high-quality debates in Westminster Hall and I commend that reform. The Prime Minister appears before the Liaison Committee twice a year for up to three hours, which has been an important development in holding to account the most important Minister in the Government. So that the Government do not hoover up all the talent, we have begun to develop an alternative career structure within the House by paying Select Committee Chairmen and other Chairmen. Select Committees have been given more resources to do the work and to hold Ministers to account. The Minister may have other examples of reforms and I do not want to deprive him of all the raw material in his brief.

However, there have been some backward steps as well. For example, the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill is a step backwards as it gives more power to the Executive. We have seen a growth in unaccountable special advisers and the erosion of collective responsibility. We have seen the way in which Cabinet is bypassed highlighted in the Butler report, and much else that I am sure that my hon. Friends will discuss when they make their own speeches.

The first question that I want to pose is: who sets the terms of trade between Ministers and the legislature? In other words, who fixes the parameters that determine where power lies? At the end of the day it is Parliament, but one Committee of the House has enormous influence in setting those terms of trade between Ministers and Parliament, and that is the Modernisation Committee. Some of its reforms have been beneficial, and I touched on them, but some, such as the automatic guillotining of Bills, have most certainly not been.

There is to my mind a fatal flaw in the working of the Modernisation Committee, which sets the parameters for today's debate. That is that the Committee is chaired by a member of the Government, and not just any member of the Government, but the Leader of the House—the person appointed by the Prime Minister to drive the legislative programme through the House of Commons. It cannot be right that the Minister tasked by the Prime Minister with the task of getting the manifesto on to the statute book should also be the Chairman of the House of Commons Committee that decides how those Bills should be scrutinised by the House. It is a short circuit of the highest voltage possible in constitutional terms. There is a clear conflict of interest.

The House of Commons needs to regain control of its agenda and provide its own Chairman of the Modernisation Committee, which should probably be merged with the Procedure Committee, with which it has much in common. It should be chaired by a Back Bencher, like every other Select Committee. Until we get that right and until the House seizes control of the Committee that can give power to the Executive or take it away, there will be a serious imbalance in the terms of trade between Parliament and the Executive.

In the time available, I want to touch on one or two ways in which ministerial accountability might be enhanced and to build on some of the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean. One of the ways in which the Opposition hold Ministers to account is through Opposition days, when either a whole day or half a day is devoted to a subject chosen by the Opposition. When I was first elected, that was a useful way of holding Government to account. The debates were well attended and well reported, and quite often the Prime Minister came into the Chamber to listen to the winding-up speeches. Nowadays, one would be lucky to find any Ministers other than the one who is to respond to the debate on the Front Bench while a debate is taking place.

We need to answer the question that my hon. Friend posed. Is there a better way in which the Opposition can use their time to hold Ministers to account in the slightly different and faster-moving environment in which we work today? I think that there is. Building on what my hon. Friend said, we should swap part of the time allocated to Opposition days for the right to ask a topical question and have up to an hour of questioning Ministers on some topic of the day. As my hon. Friend said, urgent questions can be asked, but they have to clear a fairly high hurdle to get past the Speaker. There are often occasions when the Government face criticism on a matter of public interest and do not volunteer a statement, but the Speaker's threshold for urgent questions is not met. On such occasions, the Opposition should have the right to demand that a Minister come to the Dispatch Box and answer questions from Members of Parliament.

Such occasions might arise when the Government try to get away with a written statement on an issue, but the Opposition feel that more rigorous cross-examination is needed. The Government might make a policy-related announcement outside the House, and we might not get an opportunity to grill the Minister. In such cases, an opportunity for questions would be good for accountability and for the Chamber, as we get more Members in the House for a statement than we do for a debate. There would be more coverage of the proceedings of Parliament if we became slightly more topical in such a way.

Secondly, would the world come to an end if Lords Ministers answered debates in Westminster Hall? We have Ministers in the House of Lords who have departmental responsibilities. A Lords Minister has often been in charge of defence procurement, for example, and Baroness Hollis was in charge of the Child Support Agency for quite a long time. If we want to hold Ministers to account and they have a ministerial responsibility within a Department, why should they not answer debates in Westminster Hall? There are no votes in Westminster Hall.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): There is a reciprocal view, which might ask why we have Ministers in the House of Lords who are subject to double patronage in their appointment as both Members and as Ministers, and why can Ministers from the elected House not go to the House of Lords to introduce legislation?

Sir George Young: That is the other side of the coin. The hon. Gentleman might want to develop that point, but I would hesitate before poaching on the House of Lords and who their lordships believe should appear before their House. I feel slightly more comfortable suggesting who I would be prepared to see in Westminster Hall. Perhaps I am unduly sensitive, but I think that it would follow from what I have said that Ministers from the Commons should be able to go down the other end of the corridor.

My next point is that if the House is to hold Ministers to account we need enough MPs to do that task. There are now fewer Back-Bench MPs to hold Ministers to account and more Ministers: one third of the parliamentary Labour party are now on the payroll in one way or another. When I first became a Minister in 1979, there were 29 Parliamentary Private Secretaries; there are now 50 and they are out of play when it comes to holding the Government seriously to account. We need fewer Ministers and fewer PPSs to have a more balanced contest.

We also need—I am sorry that the Government Whip is no longer here—to prise the Whips' steely fingers from Select Committee nominations. One of the most regrettable incidents in the previous Parliament was when the late Robin Cook was betrayed by his party and the Modernisation Committee's recommendations on a different way of appointing Select Committees were voted down. We need a rerun of that vote because we cannot have Ministers choosing their inquisitors on Select Committees through the Committee of Selection, which is dominated by the Whips.

My hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean mentioned Prime Minister's questions, which I would reform. They are the highest-profile occasions on which Ministers are held to account, but possibly least productive. In one way, they are Parliament at its best, but they are also Parliament at its worst. For many people, Prime Minister's Question Time is the only impression they get of the House of Commons, but at times that impression is of a cross between a playgroup and a farmyard—no wonder that some people get switched off by politics. Things have got better since Parliament has been televised, because fewer MPs want to be seen to be misbehaving. Things have also got slightly better now that we have more women in Parliament—

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Hear, hear!

Sir George Young: With the exception of the Government Chief Whip, women MPs are slightly better behaved and act as a calming influence on the rest of us. After half an hour of Prime Minister's questions, however, one leaves the Chamber wondering whether one has learned anything. I simply wonder whether there is a better way of using half an hour with the Prime Minister than posing a random sequence of questions that vary from the over-aggressive to the over-submissive.

Mrs. May: I suggest that the problem with Prime Minister's questions is not the structure, but the fact that the present Prime Minister does not answer any of the questions that he is asked.

Sir George Young: I think that I am right in saying that in the 1997–2001 Parliament, our hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) analysed the Prime Minister's answers and juxtaposed those answers with the reality—I put it no more harshly than that. He produced a very good publication, which he might like to bring up to date. However, my right hon. Friend is right that our frustration is in part due to the fact that the Prime Minister is often reluctant to give a straight answer.

Of the two issues I want to touch on before I sit down, the first is the royal prerogative. The biggest Executive decision that any Government can make is to take the country to war. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) has proposed bringing the matter more within Parliament's remit. We need to explore that at some point.

The other point, which my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean touched on, is the code of conduct. Ministers are rightly accountable to the House of Commons, but they are also accountable to the Prime Minister through the code of conduct. There are two outstanding recommendations from the Committee on Standards in Public Life in that respect: one has been accepted but not implemented, while the other has been neither accepted nor implemented. Ministers would be more accountable if the ministerial code had some teeth and it was not left entirely to the Prime Minister to decide whether a Minister had transgressed. I remember making a complaint about a Foreign Office Minister who had, in my view, acted outside the code of conduct. I wrote to the Prime Minister, who sent my letter to Robin Cook, who was the Foreign Secretary. Surprise, surprise—he decided that the Minister had not breached the code of conduct. There was a circularity about that, which did not enhance ministerial accountability.

It might be in the public domain, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—the leader of my great party—has set up a democracy taskforce chaired by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). I am sure that that taskforce will want to reflect on the ideas produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean and other Members as we develop policy on an important matter that is driving itself fast up the political agenda.

10.4 am

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a great pleasure to speak under your chairmanship for the first time, Mr. Weir. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on securing this important debate. My right hon. Friend the

[Mr. Peter Bone]

Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made a number of points that are taken as read in my book, so I shall touch on other issues.

For a new Member of Parliament, coming into the Palace of Westminster is a thrill every day, and I cannot imagine that it will not still be a thrill if I survive a few more years here. This place is the mother of democracy, where the great issues of the day are debated and decided, and it is a real thrill to be here. I am sure that all new Members agree that the kindness that other Members have shown us is very encouraging. We have been welcomed, and our mistakes have been gently admonished. I should also mention the kindness of the Speaker, who has been very helpful to new Members, and I wish him well on his recovery from illness.

However, four problems have occurred to me that are within Ministers' power to put right if they so wish—there need be no change in the law. The first problem relates to media reports. I am getting a little fed up with phone calls at 8.30 am from some local radio station saying, "Mr. Bone, can we have your comments on the failure of the Child Support Agency and what the Minister has said?" I say, "Actually, the Minister is not making a statement until 3.30 pm." The local radio reporter then tells me—selectively—what the Minister is going to say. A press release might have been issued and embargoed to the media until after 3.30 pm, but if they have had it in advance and are therefore trustworthy enough to consider the matter, why do Members of Parliament not get the same press release, with the same embargo on it, so that we are as fully informed as the media? How am I supposed to comment to the media on something that they have seen, but I have not seen? That would seem to be a discourtesy to Parliament. It might be happening because the news media operate 24 hours a day and have to work that way, but if they can be trusted, why can Members of Parliament not be?

The second problem relates to parliamentary questions, and the Deputy Leader of the House will know the answer to what I am about to say. I assume that when a Minister is appointed, he is played tapes of "Yes Minister", particularly the episode in which Jim Hacker explains to Bernard how to answer questions. He tells Bernard, "If you get a question you don't like, don't answer it. Better still, totally ignore the question and make any statement you want on any matter." That seems to happen rather a lot at the Dispatch Box. Perhaps I am being a little unfair—not all Ministers do that.

Nigel Griffiths: The director general of the CBI told me some time ago, when I was a departmental Minister, that "Yes Minister" was not a comedy programme, but a training video.

Mr. Bone: I am grateful to the Deputy Leader of the House for confirming what I thought. I do not want to make a general accusation that all Ministers behave the same way, but certain Ministers tend to avoid the question that is put to them. Other Ministers, who try to tackle the question however difficult it is, have a high regard in this place and serve Parliament better. I remember asking the Leader of the House a question about a problem with waiting times—a lady had been waiting for treatment for more than a year. The Leader of the House referred to 1,500 extra nurses, 500 extra consultants and investment in my constituency, which did not address the question. I was also a little confused because I do not have a hospital in my constituency where those people might work. That is the sort of thing that frustrates Members in Parliament.

I am just a junior Back Bencher, and I thought that it is simply what happens. Last night, however, I happened to be listening to a debate in which there was an exchange between the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality and my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), which illustrated my point rather well. Hansard recorded it as follows. The Minister said:

> "In fact, I shall ignore his question too because, if he has not listened to the substance of the debate, it does not deserve a response."

My right hon. Friend then said:

> "On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would be grateful if you could confirm that my question was in order and it would be normal courtesy to answer it."

Mr. Deputy Speaker replied:

> "One thing that the Deputy Speaker does not have to do is get embroiled in the debate itself. Questions may be put and they may be answered in the way that hon. Members and Ministers decide."—[Official Report, 21 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 257.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker's ruling is obviously correct, but it would improve our democracy if we had a little more courtesy and more of an attempt to answer questions.

The third issue, and the one that has concerned me most recently, is accuracy. Before coming to the House of Commons, I always thought that whatever was said at the Dispatch Box was 100 per cent. accurate. However, I have been engaged in a little battle on hospital waiting times. The Prime Minister said in November that no one was waiting more than six months for an NHS operation. He repeated that two weeks ago, yet in November, December and January all the latest figures showed that there are people waiting more than six months for an NHS operation.

I have raised the issue in points of order and parliamentary questions. I have written to the relevant Minister and to the Prime Minister. I thought that that would be enough to end what I can only say has been the less than 100 per cent. accuracy on the issue, but only the day before yesterday the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), repeated the statement. I raised a point of order and this is how Hansard records it:

> "On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), said in respect of NHS operations
> 'no one waits more than six months' . . .
> Yet on 13 March, in reply to a parliamentary question, the same Minister stated that 74 people were waiting more than six months for their operations. Has the Minister of State given any indication that she will come to the House to make clear which statement is correct?"—[Official Report, 21 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 169.]

That may not be the most important issue in the world, but if Ministers are not absolutely in tune with the facts, the impression given to the outside world is that our democracy is not as good as it should be. My plea to the shadow Leader of the House—

Mr. Harper: Deputy Leader of the House.

Mr. Bone: Sorry, my plea to the Deputy Leader of the House, and probably to the shadow Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), as well, is for accuracy in comments and answers. That has been a problem with parliamentary questions. On the same issue as I mentioned, I received two answers to parliamentary questions from different Health Ministers saying completely contradictory things. I am pleading for more accuracy.

My fourth and final point is about meeting Ministers. That really is within their power. As hon. Members may have gathered, there is a real concern about health in my constituency and in the neighbouring constituency of Kettering. I have requested meetings with Ministers on only two occasions. On one occasion, we had a meeting almost straight away. The problem with the Secretary of State for Health was, first, that we could not get a meeting. Then Mr. Speaker said in the Chamber that Ministers really ought to meet Back-Bench MPs, and I was allocated a meeting at the beginning of December—several months after I first requested it. The meeting was cancelled two days before it was due to take place and rearranged for March. A few days before that date, it was cancelled and it has now been rearranged for the second half of April.

That is not good enough. Surely a Back-Bench MP should have the power to go to a Minister and say, "We have a real problem here. Let's address it; let's have a meeting." If we request meetings with Ministers only now and again, we are not abusing the system and we should be allowed to have the meetings. That is within the control of Ministers and needs to be examined.

I shall give another example to show that what I have described has happened to others. I understand that an hon. Member requested a meeting with a Minister who said, "Sorry—too busy. Can't see you." However, that hon. Member found that the same Minister was visiting his constituency only a couple of weeks later, so the Minister was too busy to see him, but not too busy to visit his constituency.

I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House accepts that none of my comments is in any way intended to be party political. I simply think that there has perhaps been a drift away from the highest levels of democracy and that the suggestions that I have made could improve the situation. The Deputy Leader of the House is very highly regarded. If he could address the points that I have raised, that would improve ministerial accountability to the House of Commons.

10.15 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Weir, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on initiating a most timely and well informed debate. I welcomed his thoughtful comments, those of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), as I always do, and those of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone). I hope that the latter always keeps that buzz on entering the Chamber and being able to do his job as a Member of Parliament, because it is a very precious thing and a huge privilege to be able to speak for our constituents.

I acknowledge that the Government have made advances during their term of office. However, they have gone backwards in some respects. The advances include the Westminster Hall debates, mentioned by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, which have provided a good opportunity for Back Benchers to stimulate the sort of debate in which we are engaged today. I also acknowledge, and it is important to place it on the record, that the way in which Ministers conduct themselves in relation to the House and to individual hon. Members varies enormously. Some exhibit extremely good practice; others do not. We should strive to bring all Ministers up to the standards of the best in their relations with other Members of the House.

What areas should we consider? Hon. Members have already said that a key responsibility for Ministers is to keep the House informed of what is happening. That happens in a number of ways, some of which work well and others less well. I shall inevitably concentrate on the areas in which the practice is not as good as it should be. Let me start with the written statement.

The written statement is an innovation and it has its place but, to be frank, it is being abused. It is being used for controversial statements when Ministers do not want proper scrutiny of the decisions that they have taken. We need a mechanism to convert a written statement to an oral statement to the House, because a written statement, although it can inform, does not give hon. Members an opportunity to ask questions and to scrutinise properly what is being put forward. It is not an appropriate way in which to deal with matters that can be of huge importance to individual constituencies throughout the country. Nor is it right that, regular as clockwork, on the last day before a recess or Prorogation, an enormous number of ministerial statements are issued in the certainty that neither the House nor the media will be able to consider them properly. I think that I am right in saying that more than 30 statements were issued on the last day before the Christmas recess. That is an abuse that the ministerial code says should not happen, but that seems to be ignored.

The hon. Members for Forest of Dean and for Wellingborough mentioned briefing of the media. It is not good enough that time after time we hear about important announcements from the Government on the morning news programmes—announcements are made through the media, rather than in the House. Mr. Speaker has deprecated that practice on a number of occasions, but still it happens regularly. I do not know how we are going to break the habit of always having the news before the news breaks, but it puts Members of Parliament at a huge disadvantage that prevents us from doing our job properly and it is a discourtesy to the House.

Another way of keeping the House informed that has been lost over the years is the non-legislative debate. Inevitably, an enormous amount of debating time is devoted to the legislative programme, which is always too big and always takes up too much time, but as a result we have lost the opportunity occasionally to scrutinise the work of Departments through non-legislative debates. There are huge omissions, which regularly get brought up at business questions as the Deputy Leader of the House well knows. It is extraordinary that we have not had a genuine debate on Iraq in the lifetime of this Parliament. There have been very regular statements from the Ministry of Defence—I do not fault Defence Ministers on that—but we have not had a debate on the foreign policy implications of our occupation of another country and a theatre of war, and I find that a truly extraordinary omission. Another issue that affects the hon. Member for Forest of Dean as well as me is agriculture. When did we last have a debate on agriculture in Government time and have the opportunity to talk about the plurality of rural affairs in the context of bringing Ministers to account for what has happened? Given recent events to do with single farm payments, a debate of that kind would be extremely opportune. We need more opportunities for non-legislative debates. Westminster Hall fills the gap only to a very limited extent. In addition, Select Committees often produce important reports on which they have done a tremendous amount of work and which the House ought to have the opportunity to debate, but there are very limited opportunities so to do.

One innovation made by the present Government, cross-cutting questions, has disappeared. Why? I have asked that question of the Leader of the House, but I have not had a reply. New Members may not have had any experience of cross-cutting questions, so let me describe them. There are areas of policy that cut across several Departments. In cross-cutting questions, the range of Ministers involved in a particular area would be available to answer questions from Members on that wider topic. One of the problems was that cross-cutting questions were not desperately well attended, but that was because they were held in Westminster Hall while the Chamber was sitting, so Members inevitably faced a dilemma: should they attend the debate in the Chamber or be at cross-cutting questions? My answer to that dilemma is simple: if cross-cutting questions are important enough to be asked, they should be taken in the Chamber and extra time should be found for them. They were a good innovation, but they have been lost.

I have already said how important Select Committees reports are. It should not be for Ministers to determine that they will not give evidence to a particular Select Committee on a particular point. I encountered an example of that when I was a member of the Select Committee on Science and Technology. We were debating the scientific aspects of the war on terrorism, a very important issue, but we were told by the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), that he was not prepared to give any evidence, or to allow any officials in his Department or officials of other Departments—the Department for Transport in that case—to give evidence to our Committee, because he did not feel that ours was the right Committee to investigate the subject. That is not a matter for Ministers; it is a matter for the House and the Committee, and Ministers need to be told that clearly.

A second aspect of ministerial responsibility is keeping individual Members informed. Some Ministers and Departments are very good at that. Let me give an example of good practice: when something is planned that will affect a defence establishment in a constituency, the Ministry of Defence will always write in advance to the relevant Member to tell them about it. It does that assiduously, and I welcome it. The Department for Transport is often very good at telling Members about road issues in their area. Other Departments, however, are very bad.

Oral questions are an effective form of scrutiny, but we get frustrated when Ministers do not answer questions properly. To be fair, sometimes we get frustrated simply because they do not give us the answer that we want, but at other times there is a deliberate attempt not to answer the question. Last week, I asked the Prime Minister a question about long-term care for the elderly; he gave me a reply about pensions. I did not feel that that was an adequate response to a question about long-term care for the elderly. The Prime Minister is more guilty than most in that respect. We must have the opportunity not only to ask questions but to get appropriate replies.

A real problem is developing with written questions. Sir Humphrey has always got in the way of written questions—let us not kid ourselves that it is a problem that arose with the present Government. Some Departments seem to treat obfuscation as their main objective, rather than answering questions. One example is the Treasury: when does the Treasury ever give a direct answer? If there is any way for it to avoid giving an answer, it will do that. It is some sort of game between the Member of Parliament asking the question and the officials in the Treasury preparing the response. That is not the right way to treat Parliament.

Delay in replying to written questions has become a problem. Nowadays, named day questions often get the reply, "I will answer the hon. Member in due course." That is not the answer to a named day question and Departments must be told that in no uncertain terms. Late transfer of questions, whereby the day before an oral question is due to be asked it suddenly appears as a written question to another Department, is also a problem. I understand that Departments have different responsibilities, but as a matter of courtesy the Member concerned should be advised in the first instance that the Department feels that the question should be transferred. That way, hon. Members have the opportunity to ask an alternative question. Simply to transfer the question at a late stage is a discourtesy. Finally, responses to correspondence are sometimes delayed.

We need timely scrutiny of matters of the day. So often, Members have to resort to artificial devices such as entirely bogus points of order, which does the House no credit at all. People stand up and say, "On a point of order, Mr. Speaker," and then ask a question about a matter of great importance to them, to which the only possible reply from the occupant of the Chair is that the matter is nothing to do with them. To whom does that do any good in reality? Surely we should have an opportunity to get timely responses to questions. Also, if early-day motions are supported by a large number of hon. Members, surely they should be a matter for debate. There must be a mechanism through which that can happen.

Prayers of annulment are becoming a farce. We table a prayer and, months later, if we are lucky, we get a Statutory Instrument Committee in which to debate the matter; meanwhile, the order has actually been in force—has been law—for three or four months. Very often, prayers of annulment have no effect whatever. They are simply never debated, and that is an abuse. That is one reason why many of us are so deeply suspicious of part 1 of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire mentioned and which drives a coach and horses through parliamentary scrutiny. It simply cannot stand in its present form.

My final point on ministerial responsibilities is that Ministers are often able to palm off responsibility when there are arm's length agencies involved. They do not answer questions even though, in my view, they still have responsibility for the function.

I cannot end my speech without mentioning probity and regularity. The worst possible news for the Labour party in this week of extremely bad news is that the fictional Alan B'Stard has crossed the Floor and joined the Labour party from the Conservative party. That says everything that we need to know about the reputation of the Government in the country. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire says, we need a proper way of policing the ministerial code; we do not have that at the moment. We gather that the Prime Minister is now at least partly, but apparently not completely, converted to the suggestions of the Committee on Standards in Public Life.

In light of the revelations of the past week, one more amendment is clearly needed—an amendment to the ministerial code so that no one can be a Minister of the Crown if they are a major creditor of the party of Government. It is simply unacceptable in constitutional terms that someone can lend the Government party a very large amount of money and then be appointed to ministerial office, however creditably they perform their functions as Minister. What happens when the Prime Minister turns around to say, "Oh, by the way, I am dispensing of your services," and that person says, "Well, in that case, I'll take my several million pounds back, thank you very much"? It is not an acceptable constitutional position.

My last point is that there is need for a rebalancing of the powers of the Executive against the powers of the legislature. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean mentioned the Power commission, which has proposed not a written constitution—something for which some of us have argued for a long time, but which we understand is a difficult concept to achieve—but for at least a partial move in that direction through a series of concordats. Concordats are not alien to the present Government: a concordat was arrived at between the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the judiciary about the latter's powers and independence. A similar concordat is needed to preserve and protect the rights of Parliament and to order Ministers' responsibilities to Parliament. It is time that we had that, time that it was made explicit, and time that Ministers adhered to the codes that are already in place.

10.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Mr. Weir, may I say what a pleasure it is to speak in a debate under your chairmanship for the first time? I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) for initiating a fascinating debate on ministerial accountability and wider matters, including the public perception of Parliament and public involvement in the political process and democracy.

It is only fair to the Deputy Leader of the House to remark on the fact that, whatever else we hear this morning, it is clearly true that, given the fact that he is sitting in splendid isolation on the Government Benches, this debate is an example of ministerial accountability, because he has nobody else to stand and support him in this debate. It is sad that no Government Member has been willing to enter into a debate that is not party political, but is a genuine one about the procedures and processes of the House and how we can ensure that Ministers are held more to account.

I agree that a number of the issues that my hon. Friend mentioned in his opening speech need to be addressed, including public engagement, the problem of falling turnout at elections, and the need to make Ministers more accountable to hon. Members in the House and, hence, to enhance Parliament's ability to fulfil its crucial role of holding the Government to account. A number of bodies have been considering those issues in recent months. My hon. Friend referred to the work of the Power commission and its report, the report by Lord Norton of Louth and work by Lord Puttnam. The Modernisation Committee is also considering how we can connect Parliament to the people and external involvement in the legislative process.

As a number of hon. Members have mentioned, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) to chair a democracy taskforce, which will look at such matters as strengthening Parliament, the role of Members of Parliament and Select Committees, the volume of legislation and regulation and scrutiny of national finances, ensuring the integrity and independence of the civil service, improving the workings of government, and addressing apathy with and alienation from the political process. That is quite a task and I can think of no better person to lead that taskforce than my right hon. and learned Friend.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), I want to comment on some of the good things that have happened. It is right to say that the Government have made some good innovations. Take the very existence of Westminster Hall debates: I will be honest and say that I was sceptical when they were first proposed, but I acknowledge that they have been a good development that gives hon. Members the opportunity to debate a wider range of issues than can be accommodated in the Chamber. Crucially, many debates that take place in Westminster Hall enable hon. Members to discuss topics not in such a party political way, but more generally, looking at the issues without trying to score party political points. I will deal with that later, in relation to further proposals. There have been other innovations, such as the Prime Minister appearing before the Liaison Committee. The Committee has, over time, been finding its feet in relation to its questioning of him—it was a little tentative in the first couple of outings—and the innovation has proved to be useful.

[Mrs. Theresa May]

Alongside those innovations, however, Parliament has all too often been sidelined by Ministers and by the present Government. A number of examples of that have been mentioned by hon. Members. The lack of statements is crucial. No only do Ministers announce things to the media before they are announced to the House, but sometimes they announce them to the media and do not announce them in the House—or they use a written ministerial statement, which means that hon. Members cannot question them. There are a number of examples of that, the most recent one that I have encountered being raised in business questions last week. Last Thursday morning, the replacement—we assume that that means the sacking—of the chief executive of the Rural Payments Agency was announced in a written statement after months in which the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs had been saying that everything was fine and rosy and going really well with the Rural Payments Agency. However, there has been no oral statement to the House, so hon. Members have not had an opportunity to question what led to that decision in relation to the chief executive of the agency and to question the Secretary of State on what farmers can expect from the agency and how it will operate in future. That is the most recent and obvious example of an oral statement being needed, but not being given so that Ministers cannot be questioned by Members of Parliament. Ministers may not like it, but part of their role is to be questioned by hon. Members. Ministers are accountable to the elected representatives through hon. Members and should be willing to come here and explain themselves.

I have another example of a slightly different kind. For several weeks in business questions, I asked the Leader of the House to tell us the date of the Budget. The Treasury Committee advised that it would be good practice to give the date of the Budget two months in advance. I asked for about a month for a date to be given, until we were well within two months of the likely time, but sadly the date was not given. I first heard of it on Sky News. That is yet another example of how the media, rather than the House, are all too often the main channel for ministerial announcements.

There are other ways in which the power of the House to hold the Government to account has been reduced. First, there is the increasing use of statutory instruments and secondary legislation. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) spoke about the problem with statutory instruments, which is that all too often the prayer for annulment is not debated until after the date when the statutory instrument comes into force, which makes the debate farcical, because there can be no real expectation that the Government will allow it to be overturned. However, I am most concerned by the fact that so much of the detail of primary legislation is left to statutory instruments—to regulations made by the Secretary of State—and does not appear on the face of the Bill. That means that so many issues do not have proper time for debate as a Bill goes through the House, but are left to one-and-a-half-hour Statutory Instrument Committee debates, which, as we have said, come all too often after the regulations have come into force. That is another way in which the Government avoid being held to account. Hon. Members have also mentioned the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which gives unbelievable and deeply worrying legislative powers to Secretaries of State. I sincerely hope that the Government will listen to the arguments being put forward on that Bill and will be willing to amend it in due course.

We need to address several issues when we are seeking solutions to the various problems. First, we need to talk about the public perception and understanding of the role of Parliament and what happens in the House. Secondly, we need to enhance Parliament's role in holding the Government to account. When considering those processes, we have a duty to ensure that good government can take place. It is not Parliament's job to provide good government, but we should make changes to procedures in Parliament that, in some sense, make it less likely that good government can take place.

A number of ideas have emerged from hon. Members' contributions to the debate and, in the spirit of open discussion, let me say that I agree with some, but not with others. However, the value of the debate is that it has raised a wide variety of suggestions that can be considered by the bodies looking at this matter. Despite my intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire, I support his view that, particularly given that PMQs is the main form in which most people see Parliament operating, it is important that they see not just gladiatorial combat, but serious questions being put to and answered by the Prime Minister.

I do not agree with the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean that every Minister should be here every day to answer questions, as that would probably get in the way of good government. However, I agree entirely that Ministers need to be here more often, particularly to make statements. We need Ministers to be more willing to make their policy announcements and their announcements of changes here in this House, and to do so in oral statements rather than hide behind written statements. Now, when Ministers say that a statement has been made, it has often been made only in writing and there has been no opportunity to question them about it.

We need to do other things as well. One area not mentioned by any other speaker today is the scrutiny of European legislation and ministerial accountability for it. In Europe, Ministers can take positions inside the Council of Ministers on potential legislation that has not been debated in this House. The timing of debates in this House, and how we manage such legislation, has to be considered.

The topicality of questions has improved thanks to suggestions made by the Modernisation Committee. We are able to table oral questions closer to the date on which they will be answered. However, there is still a need to find a mechanism to ensure that, when issues come up between the time of tabling and the date of oral questions, it is possible for hon. Members to raise those issues, rather than have to find ingenious ways of getting such topical issues into the subject of the question on the Order Paper.

It has been suggested that the Government want to curtail Members' opportunity to put written questions to Ministers. I am concerned about that. There are many issues around written questions. When I first came to the House, one of the things that surprised me was my sudden discovery that I could not table any written question that I wanted to a Minister; there were blocks on certain questions and certain things could not be put into them. I have always said that one of the greatest arts in this House is learning how to get a written question past the Table Office. I shall always remember one of my great successes during my very early days in Parliament: I tabled a question about spam, but at that stage the Table Office did not know what spam was—I should say for the benefit of Members that I was not referring to tinned meat. Somebody drew up a question, came back and said that an anorak somewhere who knew about IT had said that "spam" was a perfectly okay word to use in a written question.

We need to ensure that Members have the opportunity to table written questions and that it is not curtailed in any way by the Government. Ministers should not take so long to answer written questions. There are too many examples of hon. Members having to wait a considerable time for answers on information that should be readily available to Ministers and their Departments.

We need to find another way of holding Ministers to account for inaccurate, inadvertently misleading, or misleading statements made to the House. I shall give one example, which I have raised in business questions. In a written statement last December, the Secretary of State for Transport stated that the award of the Greater Western franchise to First Great Western would lead to improved services. In fact, it has led to significantly reduced services for my constituents, and, I say to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome—I shall not describe Somerset as "elsewhere" as I did previously—it has caused significant problems for stations beyond Berkshire. However, there is no mechanism for making the Secretary of State for Transport come to the House to change or explain that written statement, so that we can question him and point out that what he had said was—perhaps inadvertently—misleading to many people and to this House.

We need more debates on what I call general issues or themes and not to spend all our time simply debating legislation. There is far too much legislation in this country and this House spends too much time passing it. It seems to be a badge of honour for Ministers constantly to bring Bills to the House. We should debate issues. We have had criminal justice Bill after criminal justice Bill and measure after measure to deal with antisocial behaviour, but when have we ever had a debate on the causes of antisocial behaviour? People would see rather better that we were doing our jobs if they saw us debating the issues that affect them every day, rather than always debating legislation. We should also have fewer whipped votes. We should have an opportunity to have those sorts of debates, probably on a substantive motion, but without a whipped vote so that the genuine feeling of Members can be discovered.

We need an independent body to oversee the ministerial code, which a number of Members have mentioned. People regard with extreme scepticism the fact that Ministers are judged by the Prime Minister who appointed them in the first place.

The real issue for public confidence in this House and public willingness to engage in the democratic process is how we present ourselves as politicians. People need to be confident that we make a difference to their lives and are worth voting for. To show them that politicians are worth voting for, Ministers need to show that they are willing to be accountable to the very Members who have been elected by the public.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Weir; it is a pleasure to serve under you. I congratulate the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on raising the topic. After some early and perfectly legitimate partisan points, the debate was of high quality and I thank all Members who have taken part.

The hon. Member began by lamenting the lower turnout at general elections, and I entirely endorse his sentiments. I am sure that he sets a lot of store by ensuring that he gets the maximum turnout in his constituency, as I do in mine. Turnout in my constituency, at more than 70 per cent., is well above the national average, so we speak as kindred spirits on that issue. He made a number of useful suggestions. Not many had not been considered before, but that does not mean that they lack merit. I shall discuss one or two of the points that he made. Under our type of constitution, such issues will always be the subject of debate and can be amended from time to time. Nothing is fixed in stone.

On the frequency of Prime Minister's Question Time, I understand that the Prime Minister took advice from his immediate predecessors, who told him that he should not cut the amount of time, but maintain it and have Prime Minister's questions on Wednesdays so that affairs of state could be better conducted. In my view, that move has brought about certain improvements. In opposition, I worked tirelessly prepping people for Prime Minister's questions, and it was often felt that 15 minutes was just too short for that killer question. I am sure that that was a delusion on the part of the Back Benchers and others whom I was advising, but none the less there was a feeling of frustration. It is not surprising that the hon. Member feels that under the present set-up, the gap between Prime Minister's Question Times is too long to get into topical issues. However, I am not sure that any future Prime Minister, having consulted their predecessors, would want to change that process.

There is an issue of topicality in relation to statutory instruments. Under the Conservative Administration, there were more than 50,000 of them. To be fair, I should say that the single biggest number was for road closures; if we could get them off the list, we could get to grips with the statutory instruments and regulations that we can agree to dispatch from the statute book.

I am sorry that the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill has not met with favour. The Government have listened to some of the criticisms and accepted amendments in the light of what has been said.

Mr. Heath: No, they have not.

Mr. Harper: They have certainly not.

Nigel Griffiths: I think that they have. I am sure that at the end of the parliamentary process, the Bill will be much better than when it started out. However, I think we all agreed with the aims of the Bill.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) is right to be annoyed at hearing something on his local radio station before it has been announced to the House. I want to be as clear on this issue as the Leader of the House has been. We expect Ministers to observe the courtesy to Parliament of making their announcements to Parliament first. I think that the Treasury statement on the timing of the Budget statement was made at Treasury questions. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) might have seen it on Sky, but I think it took the details from there; I do not believe that I saw her at the Question Time when the Chancellor made the announcement.

On the more substantial aspects of the issue, the media now operate 24/7 and drive the pace. Parliament must ensure that it is not behind the media, although it is hard to see how it could be ahead in such times. Parliamentary reporting has been evolving to reflect that and to engage the public through websites and a good outreach scheme for citizenship in schools. That is also important.

The suggestion made by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean about presenting questions without notice has been considered by the House in the past. It is one of the reasons why, as the right hon. Member for Maidenhead said, the number of days of notice of questions has been cut from eight working days to three. However, I caution him about raising things on the day. I am a former departmental Minister, and a distinguished former Cabinet Minister, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), is present at this debate. I hope that the right hon. Member shares my view that it is good that where one has information from the Member, one has as many facts as possible. I fear that the criticism made of Prime Minister's questions, that it is hard to get an answer—I am not saying that I accept that criticism but I am sure that hon. Members feel it is valid—would only be replicated if, for instance, a Health Minister was given a question on an area about which he or she had no previous knowledge and was not able to use those three days to obtain information.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough is right, and the Prime Minister has made it clear—he does so on appointing Ministers—that requests to meet Members should be honoured as expeditiously as possible. I know that the hon. Member encountered a slight problem, but I think that it was compounded by an Opposition debate on health, which caused a further delay. I hope that he is now close to securing the meeting. It is only a matter of courtesy that a Secretary of State or other Minister should meet Members to hear their concerns.

There is no need for me to crow, because Opposition Members have been generous about the changes that we have seen. The Liaison Committee's twice-yearly meetings, which last for up to three hours, have been mentioned, but I think that it was the Prime Minister who suggested to the Chair that he might come along and might be willing to give evidence. I understand that those are useful meetings.

The chairmanship of the Modernisation Committee is an important matter. I was party to representations from Members from a number of parties about whether the Leader of the House should chair that Committee. I do not think that there is a political division on the matter. Some Members feel that it is important that the Committee is chaired by the Leader of the House in order to progress its agenda—my late friend Robin Cook certainly felt that way—but others feel that there is then an issue of impartiality. I think that the Leader of the House probably sees the sittings of that Committee as among the least party politicised meetings for which he is responsible in his role. Of course, if the House were to decide, as it could, that it wished to change the Committee structure or bring the Modernisation Committee and the Procedure Committee together, it has adequate opportunity to do just that.

The question of public petitions has been explored by other, now devolved, Parliaments and Assemblies. That seems to have brought about effective working relationships. Our Committees of the House of Commons may want to learn lessons from that once those arrangements have bedded down a bit more, and examine whether there are recommendations on how to handle things in this place.

I know that Members and Committees have made proposals to restrict in some way the number of questions. I do not support that. When I first became a Member of Parliament there were restrictions on the number of oral questions that could be tabled by a Member at any one time. That restriction has been lifted and it would be wrong to go back. The number of written questions reflects the various concerns of Members of Parliament, many of which are extremely serious; others would not be judged to be so serious, but it is up to the Member to justify to his or her electorate why they have tabled certain questions. I am happy to leave that to the good sense of electors, as I am sure all hon. Members are.

I do not think that any of the suggestions that are being made—not by Government but by the Committees of the House—to restrict the activities of Members in terms of tabling questions or the role of early-day motions will be allowed to pass without considerable debate in the House. For what it is worth, my opinion is that there is not a mood among the Back Benchers from all parties to whom I have spoken to make the sort of changes that I have heard floated in the Tea Room and elsewhere.

This debate has been good in terms of raising many of the issues. I do not think that the debate would have been different had it been held in a previous Parliament. I am sure that Members who are now on the Government Benches would have made several criticisms had they been sitting on the Opposition Benches. I treasure one exchange that took place before my time as an historic parliamentary moment. Under the Government led by the noble Baroness Thatcher, the Whips were accused of passing round set questions. The hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir Peter Tapsell) rose during Prime Minister's questions and said that he had not been given one of those questions circulated by the Whip and asked whether the Prime Minister would pander to his eccentricity. I think we have been pandering to his independence ever since.

The fact that today we have heard an updated version of the criticisms does not negate them. We want Parliament to operate effectively. The quality of the contributions to this debate shows that Members of the House are ever vigilant about the need to ensure that Ministers are held to account. I see it as my role as Deputy Leader of the House to reinforce that message. I do not give my colleagues a bad score—I think that they are doing well, but as with everything else, there are grounds for improvement. I thank the hon. Member for Forest of Dean for allowing me to respond to his excellent debate.

Western Balkans

11.1 am

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue of developments in the western Balkans. Despite the fact that it is part of Europe and it is still in a volatile state, there are few opportunities to discuss these important developments in the main Chamber. That is why I am particularly grateful to Mr. Speaker for allowing me to secure this short debate. However, I do not think that half an hour will be long enough to address all the issues. We will be able to touch on only certain parts of what I wish to concentrate on. We are discussing the western Balkans, but I will concentrate my comments on the area around Serbia, including Kosovo and Serbia and Montenegro, and also Macedonia.

However, before I start doing so, I shall make a plea to the Minister. There is an excellent organisation called the British Association for Central and Eastern Europe, which many Members have become involved with. Visiting groups of different sorts of people from central and eastern Europe, including the Balkans, have come over to this country and, similarly, delegations of British lawyers and so forth have travelled to countries in that area. That has been a worthwhile exercise, and I was disappointed recently to hear that the Government have decided to reduce the grant in aid for that association by a third, and then by two thirds for the next two financial years, and finally to end it in March 2008.

I understand that there is always a need for economies and for ensuring that money is well spent. However, I have been involved with some of the programmes—I have seen them in operation both in this country and elsewhere—and I feel that the association is doing important work. I urge the Minister to go back to his masters and plead its case. In respect of the area we are discussing, the sort of interaction the association provides is very important, not only in allowing other people to understand the complexities involved, but in trying somehow to work our way through what is a very tangled web in respect of the Balkan area.

Recent events have brought the area back into the headlines. The most notable of them was the death in custody of Slobodan Milosevic. I remember a debate of a few years ago with the then Member for Halifax, Alice Mahon, who, along with me, was a member of the all-party group on Serbia and Montenegro. We discussed the problems of The Hague tribunal, such as the fact that the process was going on for a long time and that Slobodan Milosevic's health meant that it might end with him dying in custody. Although his death might in many respects close a chapter in that area, unfortunately, if the circumstances are not handled correctly, it will lead to all sorts of new conspiracy theories in an area where conspiracy theories abound. In particular, it will raise new questions for the Serbs about how they have been treated.

In saying that, I am not making any judgments about the process. However, as I said at the time, we should look at what is happening in Iraq. The Iraqis are being allowed to deal with the case of Saddam Hussein. I still find it strange that Milosevic and others were taken off to The Hague, instead of Serbia being allowed to deal with things. I have a feeling that that might become a slight problem in the future. I hope not; I hope that the death of Milosevic will to some extent allow the area to move on, but I am slightly fearful.

The Minister knows that, and it will become clear from some of my comments during this debate. There are other trouble spots around the world—such as in Northern Ireland, which is not far from home—where history runs very deep. It is difficult to separate the history, the legends, the traditions and so forth from modern peace processes.

The most important issue for the area under discussion is probably the status of Kosovo, but there will also be a referendum in May in which Montenegro will decide whether it wants to carry on with co-existence—with Serbia and Montenegro as a country. It seems that the mood has changed somewhat; Montenegro may well opt for separation; I will not say secession, because they were two republics originally, and, going back further, two kingdoms.

That has been highlighted in a slightly trivial way by the problem the two areas have had over the Eurovision song contest; that has been reported in the newspapers. They could not even agree on who would represent them because national feelings were running so high. I believe that, in the end, they have pulled out of this year's contest, and that they will not be in for some time while they sort things out. That is not of the greatest import, but that no agreement can be found on something like that highlights the problems that the countries face, as well as those facing the diplomats of other nations who are trying to understand what is going on. These problems are incredibly deep-rooted.

I used to go around the Balkans a lot and at that time, strangely enough, Montenegro and Serbia regarded themselves very much as twins and were fiercely proud of each other. It is a great shame that things have now got to this stage. Montenegro uses the euro as its currency, and the dinar is still used in Serbia, so ostensibly they are one country using two different currencies. I think there are also still different customs tariffs.

I should like to know from the Minister what the Government's view is. I remember that when I used to go around that region a lot—even at the height of the problems, when Montenegro felt that it was being somewhat ostracised because of its associations with what was then seen as a pariah state—the Government's view was that they should try to stick together. Is that still the case? I would be interested to know. It is not for me to interfere in that, but we have to tackle that issue. Ultimately, if all the countries in that area achieve the status of membership of the European Union, that may solve the problem, but I am afraid that that is a long way off for a lot of them.

Bearing in mind the time, I shall now concentrate on the current talks and discussions on the final status of Kosovo. That is obviously a very emotional subject for all parties involved and if I thought there was an easy answer to the situation, I would be the first to offer it to Governments. The pendulum in Kosovo has swung the other way: now it is the Serbs who feel very much at the wrong end of an apartheid system.

The Serbs feel, perhaps as a result of the way that western Governments are talking, that there is a certain inevitability about Kosovo being granted independence. Mr. John Sawers, the political director of the Foreign Office, stated on 6 February that in the end Kosovo will be "independent". That was possibly not a wise thing to say and it rather prejudges the discussions. It might be an opinion but it is not a very sane thing to say at the moment. It tends only to inflame the situation.

Without giving a long history lesson, Kosovo to the Serbs and Serbia is rather like—some would say—Jerusalem is to Israel, but that would get us into a whole different ball game. In terms of England—I could think of somewhere in Scotland, but I shall stick to England if it is all right with you, Mr. Weir—it would be like Canterbury and Kent, having lost their English majority population in 300 or 400 years' time, becoming an independent area, with spiritual parts of the nation's soul such as Canterbury cathedral and the site of the battle of Hastings being taken away. I say that because we have to understand that the final resolution of the situation will be extremely delicate, to say the least.

The Serb minority in Kosovo are deeply concerned about what is happening to their heritage. Orthodox churches, monasteries and cemeteries are being destroyed. It is tragic; I have seen pictures of 15th and 16th century places that I visited 20 years ago that have been burnt down and destroyed in the terrible religious and nationalistic fury that has taken place. I have grave concerns that the perpetrators of those actions have not been caught. KFOR is seemingly powerless—although it represents the best diplomatic way to prevent a lot of what is happening—and that only stokes the fires.

If we do not have a fair and equitable solution, we will only make more problems for ourselves. We do not need a history lesson to remember what happened in Germany after the first world war, when there were feelings of injustice at the peace settlement. History is littered with such examples. Whatever might happen in the immediate aftermath, if we are not careful we will leave an open sore, so I urge the British Government and all the others to tread very carefully. They should not try to get rid of what is a very difficult situation. I do not think that the west helped by its intervention, but that is in the past and I am trying to move on. However, we have to be very careful; I have already given a couple of examples of how deep rooted the nationalism is.

If we are not careful, we shall store up more problems for ourselves, so I urge the British Government to ensure that the discussions going on are not prejudged. Statements should not come out that seem to favour one side or the other. Because there are precious few in this Parliament who understand the situation and it is sometimes difficult to be non-partisan on the matter, I hope that the Foreign Office will send a few MPs who do not know anything about the area, and are thus neutral and fresh to the subject, to talk to people in Belgrade, Pristina, Skopje and Tirana, in order to find out exactly what people think.

I have one final point, which will not have escaped the Foreign Office. If Kosovo became an independent state—I do not question whether that is right or wrong, or whether such a state is viable—a precedent for all sorts of other places will be set. President Putin already indicated earlier this year that the status of places such as Abkhazia and South Ossetia in the Caucasus area might have to be reviewed. Countries such as Macedonia, which are working incredibly hard and have done almost everything asked of them, are nervous because the boundaries have not been entirely defined. The Albanian Foreign Minister said recently that he could not guarantee that borders are fully defined. I do not know whether he has rowed back from that, or whether it was a misquote. I do not want to stir up the situation any more.

However, a whole load of problems are involved. In that area, we have Republika Srpska and what has gone on in Bosnia. If we start interfering with the boundaries, we shall open up an incredible problem, and return to both the problems of recent history and those that have existed for a longer time. I want to hear what the Minister says, so I conclude my remarks there.

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I would like to congratulate the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on securing this important debate and I commend him on his evident longstanding commitment to, and understanding of, the region. Indeed, although I am not in complete agreement with the points he raised, I have no doubt that our debates in this place are enriched by the sort of depth of knowledge and understanding exhibited during today's debate.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, there have been a number of recent, significant events that have affected the countries of the western Balkans, from the beginning of the process to determine Kosovo's final status, to the death of Milosevic, to the remarkable agreement in Bosnia on the first changes to their constitution since the end of the war in 1995. The latter is in part the legacy of Lord Ashdown, who departed Bosnia as high representative in January this year, and his tireless efforts to transform Bosnia into a functioning state with the prospects of EU and NATO integration within reach. I hope that we can find common accord in paying tribute to the efforts of Lord Ashdown and his successes in recent years in Bosnia.

Before moving on to some of the substantive points raised, I shall first deal with the issue of the British Association for Central and Eastern Europe, which was put to me directly by the hon. Gentleman at the beginning of his speech. I am very familiar with the subject, having had correspondence from BACEE on several occasions, not least from its chairman, Lord Radice, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that we support the continuing work of BACEE in this part of the world. Indeed, by a coincidence of timing, I understand that officials from the Foreign Office are briefing members of BACEE as we speak.

On the point of funding put to me by the hon. Gentleman, there will be a significant alteration to BACEE's funding in the years to come, but for the record, I emphasise that that in no way diminishes the importance of the work that BACEE can do through securing other income streams in the future, and that situation is not unique to BACEE. Other organisations that previously were directly funded through a block grant from the Foreign Office continue to do important work while the Foreign Office reallocates resources according to its strategic priorities. There is an ongoing dialogue between the Foreign Office and BACEE which I hope will continue as BACEE makes the important transition to being a different kind of organisation, but one that will be equally capable of meeting the important needs of that part of the world.

As the hon. Gentleman said at the conclusion of his remarks, we have limited time. Therefore, I shall not attempt to cover all the issues affecting the western Balkans in the time available today. Instead, I would like to concentrate on the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised: Kosovo and Montenegro, and the death of Milosevic and the wider impact on the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

To set the context for this discussion, 2005 was an extremely successful year for United Kingdom policy in the Balkans. A key objective of our European Union presidency was to ensure that the whole region embedded its relationship with the EU. Under our presidency in the second half of last year, the EU opened accession negotiations with Croatia on 3 October and declared Macedonia a candidate for membership of the EU. Bosnia and Serbia and Montenegro started negotiations for stabilisation and association agreements, and the Kosovo final status talks were launched in November.

Even more extraordinarily, after a full 10 years of failure by the Bosnian and Serbian authorities to transfer any war criminals to the tribunal, 22 indictees were delivered to The Hague in 2005, although Mladic and Karadzic, the two architects of Bosnia's policy of ethnic cleansing, remain at large. UK leadership in the contact group, the United Nations, NATO and the EU was vital to those achievements, as was the prominent role played by our diplomatic posts in the region—a group of individuals and institutions to whom I am happy to pay tribute this morning.

The process to determine Kosovo's final status as envisaged in UN Security Council resolution 1244 which ended the war in 1999 is now under way. This was one of the key issues in the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Martti Ahtisaari, the UN status envoy, is leading the process, and he enjoys the Government's fullest support. Settlement of Kosovo's status is one of the last pieces of unfinished business resulting from the violent break-up of the former Yugoslavia in the 1990s. The other is the tribunal, which I shall discuss in a moment. Any settlement must be sustainable and fair, and provide effective guarantees for Kosovo's minority communities.

The contact group remains strongly engaged in the final status discussions. The statement issued by the contact group Foreign Ministers at a meeting in London on 31 January injected renewed political support for Martti Ahtisaari. It made it clear that all possible efforts should be made to achieve a negotiated settlement in 2006. We will spare no effort to work towards that goal. However, such a settlement must take into account the views of the people of Kosovo, the overwhelming majority of which favour independence from Serbia and Montenegro. That reality cannot be ignored. The past disastrous policies in Serbia lie at the heart of the problems that we confront in Kosovo now.

Mr. Randall: I am interested in what the Minister is saying, and I do not want to stop him in mid-flow unnecessarily. What process is there to gauge the opinion of those inhabitants of Kosovo who now live outside its boundaries? I am thinking of the refugees and internally displaced persons who live in Serbia and, to some extent, in Montenegro.

Mr. Alexander: I had the opportunity to travel to Kosovo in September last year, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that internally displaced people feature prominently in the wider discussions that are taking place not just in Kosovo but beyond it. I would be happy to write to him and set out in some detail the process for the final status talks.

Let me return to the earlier substantive point that was made in respect of the remarks of the political director in the Foreign Office, and the UK policy towards Kosovo's final status. The UK continues to believe that independence is an option to be considered. Indeed, some commentators argue that it is the only option that can bring long-term peace and security to the region. However, the UK also believes that any settlement must actively promote multi-ethnicity in Kosovo, provide a safe and secure environment for all Kosovo's minorities, particularly the Kosovar Serbs, and promote reconciliation in the region. We believe that that kind of settlement can be made to work for the benefit of all.

In 2006, political leaders in Pristina and Belgrade have a genuine opportunity to reinforce the European perspective to which they ultimately aspire. For too long, the legacies of the past have hindered the prospects for stability and security in the western Balkans. Political courage and vision will be necessary to move the region forward, but the UK stands ready to support politicians who lead the effort. We are at an important stage in the final status process. The recent pronouncements of the contact group make clear the importance of continuing to make progress on the final status discussions, and I remain optimistic that, through that process, we can find a way forward.

Another key issue is the death of Milosevic and the wider implications for the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Milosevic's death is a blow to regional reconciliation, to the tribunal and to international justice. His trial was key to helping the region to understand and come to terms with the tragic events of the 1990s. With his death, the victims of the Balkan wars have been robbed of the chance to see him finally face justice. Now, more than ever, Serbia must deliver on their commitments to arrest Mladic and Karadzic.

Mr. Randall: I am interested in what the Minister is saying. If, as the Minister says, the death of Milosevic has robbed people of an opportunity, why did The Hague refuse proper medical attention for Mr. Milosevic? Presumably, that has not helped them.

Mr. Alexander: What certainly does not help the debate is some of the speculation that has followed the death of Milosevic. I believe that the hon. Gentleman will understand if I am cautious in my remarks. I assure him that Milosevic's health was monitored carefully by the tribunal. Milosevic received medical treatment at The Hague, and we are confident that the tribunal's decision was taken on the basis of medical evidence. I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place in the Library a copy of my letter, which will set out the UK Government's understanding of the treatment that was received. It ill serves the interests of reconciliation in the region if rumours take the place of truth.

We have full confidence in the work of the tribunal. It has tried 61 cases to date, and a similar number are still in the pipeline. The tribunal is independent and has judges from a variety of countries. Cases are brought and judged on the basis of evidence, and have been brought against all ethnic groups in the region. The President announced a judicial inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the death of Milosevic, the results of which will be known in due course.

The UK wants a strategic partnership with Serbia, but first Serbia needs to understand that there is no short cut to EU or NATO membership. Serbia must meet its obligations to the tribunal, notably by delivering Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic to The Hague, and adopt a constructive approach to Kosovo, Bosnia and a potentially independent Montenegro. I hope that the death of Milosevic will unlock Serbia's self-imposed isolation by helping it to come to terms with the past and to look forward to a future within the wider European community.

I recognise that Serbia has made real progress—after all, it was through public demonstrations that Milosevic fell from power—but Serbia's politicians now must lead their people by charting a political vision that will ultimately lead to integration into Euro-Atlantic structures. We remain ready to help the Serbian Government and people attain those goals.

On Montenegro, we are well served by outstanding diplomats in the Foreign Office, but I fear that I am able to shed little light on the Eurovision song contest, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The referendum on Montenegro's independence from Serbia is scheduled for 21 May. We welcome the agreement that was reached between the Government and the Opposition in Montenegro on the standards for the referendum, in particular in respect of the 55 per cent. qualified majority needed for Montenegro to become an independent state. We commend the work of High Representative Javier Solana and his personal envoy, Miroslav Lajcak, who played a key role in helping to broker that important agreement.

It is too early to say what might follow or how an independent Montenegro would develop, but its behaviour during and beyond the referendum process would naturally affect the international community's stance—

Post Office Card Accounts

2.30 pm

Mr. Mike Weir (in the Chair): I should say before we start that there are three clocks in this room, all showing different time. For the sake of clarity, we are working from the digital clock.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I am glad to have secured this debate on an important subject that has caused a lot of consternation in all our constituencies. There are two possible ways to approach the debate. One is to harangue the Minister endlessly, in the hope that constant haranguing for an hour and a half will beat him into a political pulp. The other is to try to seek explanation and genuinely pose questions—I have more questions today than answers. Pursuing the second approach is in the interests of all our constituents.

I know that the Minister will respond better to the latter approach, as long as he is allowed the time to respond. I followed with interest the previous debate on a similar subject only recently, in which, because of the number of passionate speeches, the Minister had only nine minutes at the end to wind up. Within that nine minutes he took 15 interventions and as such we did not learn a great deal. I want to hear the fullest possible answers for my constituents and do not want to miss this vital opportunity. As such, I shall tailor my comments and have regard to the interventions that I take.

The title of this debate focuses on Post Office card accounts and benefits, but the issue is far bigger and further reaching than that. The fundamental issue is financial inclusion. How do we ensure that everybody in our society—the elderly, the carers, those with mental or physical health challenges, the physically and socially isolated, those who are vulnerable to loan sharks and doorstep bully-boys and others whom we represent, even when others look away—is included and not financially isolated, when others can gain the rewards of rising prosperity? This debate is about financial inclusion and fairness—it is as simple as that.

Let me set out the backdrop to this debate on POCAs and why they have become so integral to financial inclusion. I shall speak of my constituency; others will speak of theirs. In the eyes of the Post Office my constituency is overwhelmingly rural. It consists in part of narrow strip settlements in former coal mining valleys. Only one of the many post offices in my constituency, which borders the M4, is deemed urban. All the communities in my constituency, under the definition of rural post offices, have fewer than 10,000 inhabitants. I therefore make no excuses for focusing on rural post offices.

There are now 8,000 rural post offices in the United Kingdom, but only 1,500 run at a profit. A network that the Post Office originally established as a cost-effective system of branch sub-post offices, typically running alongside small shops, has over decades been overtaken by trends towards car ownership, supermarket growth and centralised shopping. As we all know, there has been a commensurate decline in the vitality of village centres, as measured by the range and profitability of shops.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I come from a family that has run rural post offices for four generations, so I am pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman concentrating on rural post offices. The urban areas also have problems and feel that they are going to suffer a quadruple whammy. First, they are not given the rural protection that rural post offices receive. Secondly, they do not receive the POCA amount for each transaction. Thirdly, the money that POCA would have produced to be spent in the shop will not be there. Fourthly, and most importantly—this was put to me strongly by an urban sub-postmaster in his 60s just a few days ago—the value of the business is often the lump sum for a postmaster's retirement, but that will be hit significantly. The Minister is a decent and able man and does not deserve to be harassed, but I hope that he will respond to that.

Huw Irranca-Davies: My hon. Friend makes an important point on behalf of his constituents. As I said, I shall reserve my comments for my rural post offices, but the Minister will have heard what my hon. Friend said.

A submission from one of my postmasters shows the concern over the issue. He is a very good postmaster in the Garw valley, which is a settlement of around 5,500 people in a long, narrow strip, with one road in and the same road back out—it does not go anywhere else. People either live or work in the valley; they do not go through it to get anywhere. However, there is a lively town centre and we are struggling to keep hold of that. That postmaster wrote to me:

"Since the POCA was introduced I have seen quite a drop in Benefit Claimants using the Post Office. Under the old book system we would pay out, on average, £76,000 per week and now it is £45,000. We used to be paid on the Volume and Value of book payments made but now it is only on the Value. This is a drop of roughly 34 per cent. in income terms per month."

Before I continue, I should say that that postmaster is very good and has done a lot. He works the post office alongside a shop, which is bright and energetic. He has been fully part of the modernisation approach, but he is struggling. He continues:

"My overall annual income from the Post Office has seen a reduction of about 30 per cent. from what I was earning when I first started. But overheads have increased even though I now employ only 3 staff. (It used to be 7). The takings from the shop just cover staff wages and therefore we gain no income from it. That on top of the Post Office salary reduction means that we just stumble from one month to the next . . . one other thing"—

I shall return to this issue in a moment—

"is that the one and only bank in the Garw Valley is the HSBC."

I have previously mentioned to the Minister how important the pattern of bank closures is. The letter continues:

"They are not a partner bank with the Post Office and the majority of our customers are with them so if we were to lose the POCA we would have no chance of survival."

Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): I recently met enterprising small shopkeepers with post office counters in Maindy in my constituency, who expressed their concern at the removal of the POCA. Does my hon. Friend agree that the measure will deplete the customer base of local community shops, which are already trying hard to compete with large supermarkets, which are now diversifying into smaller convenience stores?

Huw Irranca-Davies: I would agree to the extent that we need to find satisfactory methods to put in place things that will keep the footfall for post offices. Let us not forget that this debate is not about post offices per se—we can become fixated on that—but about the customer and the groups that use the post offices. I agree with my hon. Friend to the extent that part of my intention in this debate is to focus on something that has not been greatly focused on, which is not only the need to revitalise and find a full sign-up with other banks—not just with the basic bank account, but other alternatives—but the idea that our post offices should have a future as a vital high street presence in all our small communities.

I am not convinced that Post Office Ltd has done enough, although it started doing a lot, nor am I convinced by any stretch of the imagination that the banks have done enough. They will talk about what they have done with the basic bank account and so on, but I am talking about the ones that do not support the post office and I am adamant that they include significant banks—I shall read the list out in a moment. I am in the fortunate position of having three different accounts. I have to make my own decision—I cannot say for my constituents—but I would be pulling away from the banks that did not support my post office.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The hon. Gentleman made the important point that this debate has to be about the customer. We should also recognise that it has to be about choice. More than 4 million customers took out a card account, fighting to overcome the Government's hurdles and resisting a lot of pressure not to do so. Surely the Government should now at least recognise that customer choice, and keep the card account available for those people and keep post offices open so that they can use it.

Huw Irranca-Davies: As the debate goes on I hope that I shall make clear my personal idea of where the Post Office should be going, focusing on the customer as well as the post office. The hon. Gentleman will remember, as many of us do, the immense reluctance of many people to move to the POCA. However, the POCA has served a useful purpose. I brought a delegation to the House to lobby the Minister's predecessor, because of the concerns about losing the pension books, moving to the electronic system and so on. Actually, experience of the POCA has proved that it has a point. The point of the POCA is that it is simple: money in, money out. People cannot go into overdraft and they do not face the dangers of a wider mechanism.

However, there are disadvantages with POCA and that is why I want us to move away, but to a Post Office product—to a POCA plus, say. Let us find something that does not involve just the high street banks offering the accounts, but a development of the POCA that will allow direct debit. While I can save on average around £230 a year by paying my gas and heating combined bills and other bills by direct debit, the most vulnerable in our communities—the ones who can least afford not to make those savings—are currently in POCAs and precluded from doing so.

We must agree across the Chamber that the argument is not simply, "We must have POCAs; POCAs are brilliant." When I brought the delegation here, POCAs were seen as the devil incarnate. They have a purpose, but we have to build a mechanism and—I argue strongly for this—a POCA plus Post Office product. If people want to use both bank accounts and the Post Office, good for them, but what about others?

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): The hon. Gentleman refers to the controversy surrounding the introduction of the card account, which other hon. Members and I well remember. Does he recall being aware that the card account was supposed to be an interim measure? I confess that I was not aware of it at the time.

Huw Irranca-Davies: As I am not a member of the Government, I find it difficult to answer that question; I am sure that the Minister will.

I say openly that I never regarded the POCA as a sufficient product. It was designed to meet a need at that time. We in the House have to be realistic and frank with the public that while the POCA has certain advantages, it also has significant disadvantages. If we want to keep the footfall coming through the post offices—indeed, to encourage more people to use them—and give them the benefits that come with having more than a basic POCA, we must be frank. We should not go out of here today and tell people that it is a disgrace that the POCA is going; let us argue the case for what will come after it.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman; he is generous in giving way.

May I phrase the previous question in a different way, which I hope that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to answer? Do not Post Office card account holders deserve some consistency? In a letter to me received this week, the Minister said of the card account:

"There was never any expectation that we should provide funding beyond"

"and there is no case for doing so."

But a letter from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, dated 3 February 2004, made it clear that there was no expectation that the accounts would be a temporary measure. In fact, the letter said that they intended that people should "continue to exercise real choice about opening post office card accounts."

Of course they should be developed and improved, but there was no mention then that the accounts were a temporary measure, which is what the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Department now claim.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am not here as a spokesperson for the Government, or to defend them. I am here to argue a case on behalf of my constituents.

Let me make something clear about the much disputed statement of Tricia Jenkins, which is part of a longer missive. This issue has come about not because of the transitory nature of POCAs, but because of the three pilots, to which I shall return in a moment. Last November or October, Tricia Jenkins, the National President of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, members of which I met when preparing for this debate, said:

"POca does indeed have a limited life. When it finishes, we hope to convert existing POca customers into using another POL"—

Post Office Ltd—

"service. It could be that because POca customers are used to banking, they might be prepared to switch to a bank account. And since we can offer a banking service, we would like to think we can keep those customers. So it is 'all change' in 2010, but it will not necessarily be all bad news."

I am worried about timing and planning and whether we will have appropriate products in place so that if people migrate from, or are migrated out of, POCAs there are suitable products for them to use that will retain the vitality of and footfall within post offices.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): My hon. Friend is right about timing. Customers might have been reassured that they have until 2010 to move from a POCA to something else, but I wonder whether any of my hon. Friends' constituents have received a letter that some of mine have received, which simply says:

"Those people who can use a bank . . . account should have their Incapacity Benefit paid into it, rather than into a Post Office card account . . . now is the time to make arrangements to pay your Incapacity Benefit into a bank (or building society) account."

That letter caused huge distress to my constituent, who thought that they had to move now. When they rang the number on the form, as they were requested to, they were even more distressed to be told, "You have to have a bank account; trot along to your nearest bank." My constituent lives five miles from a bank and has multiple sclerosis. As a result of that kind of thing, people are concluding that the DWP does not mean what it says. If that is not the case, the Minister is being let down by some of the staff in his office.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I have not received any such letters directly from customers, but that is because I am not in one of the pilot areas.

I have made this point about timing to the Minister before. I accept that there is a case for developing beyond the POCA—it is in the interests of our constituents, particularly the most vulnerable ones, to do that—but those products need to be there as we do it. There is a crucial time issue, not to do with 2010 per se, but earlier than that, so that people have time to change. It is also to do with 2008, which is when we consider the issue of the social network payment again.

To their credit, the Government have worked hard, with the European Union, to ensure that funding for rural support is extended to 2008. That is excellent, but we must then have another tranche of funding, which we will have to discuss with our European colleagues because of competition regulations and so on. At the moment, we are looking at 2008. That gives us a short window in which the Government, the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry, the DWP, Post Office Ltd, the NFSP and the banks should sit down and get in place a range of products that will genuinely address issues of financial exclusion.

Having said all that, let us not forget the commercial realities of sub-post office branches, and that post offices are independent businesses, not public sector organisations and employees. To the Government's credit, in 2003 they recognised the huge social value of post offices to many rural communities and rightly introduced the SNP—not the Scottish National party but the social network payment.

The SNP initially allocated £150 million a year to support the rural post office network in recognition of its inherent social value. That has now been extended to 2008 after negotiations. The SNP provides for three elements, including the annual fixed pay of around 6,000 sub-postmasters in rural post offices—those that would not be commercially viable—and the development of new economic approaches to providing services in rural areas. I shall return to that issue later if I have time, but it does not look as though I will.

The adoption of the policy that there should be no avoidable closures means that the number of rural branches has been relatively stable in the past four years. Roughly 10 per cent. of branches have exchanged hands—I have seen them do so in my own patch in the four years since I have been an MP—but the closure rate is only 2 per cent. There is a lot of flux and movement, but we are keeping branches open, partly through community involvement and, certainly in my area, partly through a proactive stance from Post Office Ltd, Postcomm and others, to ensure that if one branch closes, another opens down the street. That is important.

When he responds, will the Minister talk about the long-term future of the no-avoidable-closures programme? In this transition period, it is vital that while we try to find a new future for some post offices, we do not trip over one thing, lose that policy, and see hundreds of post offices close before we get the new lifelines in place. The sudden panic is to do with the pilots. Will the Minister address that issue in his response? I genuinely want to know the purpose of the pilots and, more importantly, what will happen as a result of them.

I keep returning to the issue of the timing. If the pilots are meant to show the best mechanisms to migrate people when we have the products in place, that is fine, but they have caused a lot of worry. I acknowledge what hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), have already said. If we intend to rush towards the pilots tomorrow and if they were to be rushed out in the Garw, in Ogmore Vale and in Gilfach Goch and Maesteg, it would be a nightmare because of the pattern of banking. Let me explain why.

In my constituency—I do not think that it is untypical—there has been a pattern of bank closures over many years. They have gone in a certain order, which is fairly typical. One of the last to go from Ogmore Vale, which has a population of 7,500 and is a narrow strip valley, was HSBC, a bank that I bank with. It was the last to pull out and so it spent the year before, when the other banks were closing, marketing aggressively. It said, "We are the last bank in town, so come and bank with us. We are the world's local bank." Last year, it shut its doors and went. There is no other bank in the whole valley system.

It is 25 or 30 minutes from Nantymoel to Bridgend town centre. They are areas of high deprivation, covered by the communities first programme, and are some of the areas with the highest deprivation in Wales. When

[Huw Irranca-Davies]

HSBC went, people transferred to the Post Office or to the one remaining other centre, the Halifax building society. Two weeks ago, the Halifax shut its doors. Neither organisation is fully signed up to the banking systems in the post office.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I agree wholeheartedly with what the hon. Gentleman has said about access to facilities, and I support his concept of a POCA plus. However, does he agree that one of the biggest problems that elderly people have, particularly with remote banking, is that it is inherently difficult to open a bank account and manage it remotely across a wireless telephone system? Older people, particularly in constituencies such as mine and that of the hon. Gentleman, find that difficult to undertake. The simplicity of POCA and POCA plus is what they are looking for as a consequence.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I would agree to the extent that undoubtedly those who have never had bank accounts before encounter difficulties with not only remote banking but normal banking. Citizens Advice has highlighted that, and I thank it for its briefing. I have the executive summary with me, rather than the 60-page briefing. The Minister might want to respond to that.

Citizens Advice is not against a successor to POCA. It is not against basic bank accounts. However, it recommends that all banks should review their existing basic bank accounts against several principles. There should be no use of credit scoring, because credit scoring is not a disincentive but a roadblock to some constituents when it comes to bank accounts. We tell them that if they want to move to the Post Office they should use a basic bank account, but credit rating makes that immensely difficult. Accounts should be opened on the spot, provided that the customer has acceptable forms of identification. One of the big problems with people who are not used to bank accounts is that, unlike us, they are not used to wandering in with two or three forms of identification. They might not even have the forms of identification that we take for granted. I recommend the briefing to hon. Members, because it gives the issues about banks and financial exclusion.

Twenty-six banks—I have been told 25, but there are 26 on my list—are currently signed up to the Post Office. Perhaps one has joined in the past few days. They provide 26 basic bank accounts. The interesting thing about basic bank accounts, from my understanding and my discussions with regional executive members of the NFSP, is that they can give some of those features like a POCA. However, if we consider facilities such as a balance inquiry, which is something that we take for granted when we are managing our money, Barclays, Cahoot, Barclays cash card account and HSBC do not offer that option.

Let us consider those that offer cash accounts, where one can pay money in as well as take it out. If we are genuine about financial inclusion, we should try to say to people that we do not want to give them unsatisfactory products and for them to be inundated with banks offering everything under the sun, but that we do want them, if they are able and willing, to be able to take advantage of the accounts.

Only 13 of those 26 accounts allow cash to be paid in. It is a disgrace. Nationwide building society, Abbey, Bank of Scotland Easycash, Barclays, First Trust bank, Halifax Easycash, HSBC, Nationwide FlexAccount, NatWest, Northern bank, Royal Bank of Scotland, Ulster bank and Yorkshire bank—none is signed up in the full way that they should be to keeping the Post Office going. If they were, it would mean that a person could go into a post office and not only take their benefits out or have them paid in but, when they wanted to, take that further.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): Is that not the crux of the whole debate? I know that my hon. Friend is speaking about financial inclusion, but we are faced with a situation where some of the major banks that have been referred to simply do not want to involve themselves. My hon. Friend talks about POCA plus being the next product; POCA plus would obviously be as close as it can get to a normal bank account, but the normal banks do not want to take part. There is a wider debate about competition in the financial services industry and whether the big banks want to be bothered with all such accounts.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I agree with my hon. Friend. I imagine, and I do not think that it is a futile hope, that post offices have a good future. However, it will only be achieved if we have full sign-up. That should come not only from the Government. The Government are trying, and pushing hard, but perhaps the Minister, along with his Treasury colleagues and the DTI, should be putting more pressure on the banks. I am more than happy to sign up here and now to a cross-party campaign to try to put pressure on the banks to sign up fully. When the banks withdraw from our communities, that gives a golden opportunity for our post offices, but not at the moment.

Surely some of the profits made in the banking system could be put in to provide the basics, such as keeping the vitality of the high street in Pontycymer, so that shopkeepers can go in and out—bring money in and keep that going so that the vulnerable and those who need access to money at the drop of a hat can have a free cashpoint and so on. Although we hear the arguments about the commercial imperatives of the banks withdrawing, there is no excuse for banks to stay away from the remaining outlet in many communities, which is the post office. Anything that the Minister, the Treasury, the DTI and we can do should be done to put pressure on the banks to play ball more fully than they are.

I must pay credit to those who have sent me so many briefings, but as hon. Members can see, I am inundated with them. I shall draw to a close, but before I do I want to touch on the issue of cash machines. The Post Office has been trying to increase massively its number of cash machines, but there are significant problems. I want to read from a courteous letter that I was sent from the Nationwide building society about cash machines. It has researched the number of cash machines in various constituencies; other hon. Members might have received such a letter. It states:

"In Ogmore 76 per cent. of machines charge a withdrawal fee. This is one of the ten highest figures in the country and compares to a national average of 43 per cent."

The Nationwide states:

"We believe fee-charging machines are hitting hardest those least able to pay for withdrawals and that this menace contributes to the problems of that element of society who are financially excluded. That is why"—

I applaud Nationwide for this and we should get behind it—

"Nationwide has written to the UK's bank and building society chief executives to ask them to agree to the following pledge:

All bank and building society ATMs should be free to use

Free ATMs should have a standard "free" green sign so that consumers can see at a glance whether or not they will be charged Banks and building societies should not sell off their free ATMs".

It is deplorable when, in communities such as Ogmore Vale, banks not only do a runner and explain it in commercial terms but then make no effort at all to ensure the "last bank standing" provision of a free access machine, or even to get behind the Post Office. That is deplorable.

I want to draw to a close. The Countryside Alliance sent briefings out as well. It talked about the subsidy that has been achieved until March 2008 but not beyond. It might seem odd to colleagues that I am quoting the Countryside Alliance, but its comment is particularly pertinent. It says that "the government needs to have a clear view of what it wants from the rural network and what measures need to be put in place now in preparation for 2008."

Quite reasonably, it adds:

"This will need . . . planning and mapping of requirements, and could mean closure of some offices where instead a service is offered by one of the new methods—for example a travelling Post Office."

I have not even touched on the alternative methods, but perhaps the Minister will.

In all this, my focus has been on trying to keep our post offices open—not because I have a romantic view of post offices, but because they frequently offer the last financial services available in communities such as mine and have a social role. I am not arguing for the retention of the POCA as it is, and that may be where I differ from other Members. Frankly, we need something better. I know that the Minister is genuine in his attempts to do that, but I urge him and the DTI to look not only at POCAs but at financial inclusion, to see how we can bang the heads of the various partner agencies together and work out what things will look like in a couple of years. That will not only sustain a good post office network for customers—whatever form that takes—but ensure that we do better on financial inclusion.

I shall not stand here today and defend every last post office on earth for the sake of it—that is not necessarily in my constituents' interests. However, we must ensure that post offices, credit unions and many other bodies form an umbrella organisation. That will ensure that elderly pensioners and lone parents—some of the most vulnerable people in our society, who may not own cars or have access to public transport—can access money in a post office setting and have the whistles and bells that we demand from our current accounts. That is what I ask the Minister to look at in his response today.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Mike Weir (in the Chair): Order. Several hon. Members are trying to catch my eye. I intend to call speakers making the winding-up speeches no later than 3.30 pm, so I appeal for brief speeches and interventions.

3.2 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing the debate and on the excellent way in which he presented his case.

Post offices are important in many of our communities, particularly rural communities and deprived urban areas. Such communities often lack big businesses, and the hon. Gentleman mentioned banks. The post office is very important and is often the core of the community. In villages, it will contain the sole shop or be surrounded by one or two other shops. The money that it pays out to pensioners and those collecting their benefits plays an important role in sustaining the post office shop or the shops round about. Post offices therefore play an important role in the community.

We must find a post office-based solution, not a bank-based solution. If we have a bank-based solution, customers will gradually be drawn away from post offices to the banks, with the post offices gradually losing business. Even though people might theoretically be able to collect their money from some bank accounts at the post office, the loss of business will mean that there is no post office. It is therefore important that we retain post offices and continue with POCA or an improved form of POCA that offers a post office-based solution. People have chosen to use the post office and had to fight their way through the customer conversion centre. Millions of them have put up a big fight to get their Post Office card account.

I want to engage constructively with the Government, but it is difficult to do so when the Minister with responsibility for post offices refers to them as "inefficient physical structures". It has also been difficult to engage with the Government because of the secrecy and the cover-up of the past few years. There has been a secret conspiracy and a deliberate cover-up within the Government in an effort to take people away from post offices. If Government policy remains unchanged—I make no bones about this, and Adam Crozier of the Post Office has made this clear—10,000 post offices will close, leaving only 4,000 in the country.

The Speaker forced the Government to release their secret agreement with the Post Office, and I shall quote a couple of items from it. The first states that the Post Office

"shall not, and shall procure that the PO Personnel and the Post Office Agent shall not, market or procure the generation of Publicity or Marketing for the POCA".

Post Office agents include sub-postmasters, so sub-postmasters are not allowed to market the Post Office card account to their customers—that is what the Government and the Post Office have decided. The secret agreement also states:

"The POCA is intended to be an interim step for Account Holders who will be encouraged by both Parties to migrate to Bank Accounts".

In other words, the Government and the Post Office have agreed that they and sub-postmasters should encourage customers to move to bank accounts.

[Mr. Alan Reid]

I tabled a question to the Minister to ask him about two issues. The first part of the question asked,

"when Parliament was first informed that . . . the Government's contract with the Post Office to pay pensions and benefits into Post Office card accounts lasted until 2010."

He answered by quoting Hansard from 4 February 2005, which was two years after the card account started. The other part of the question related to when the Government announced to Parliament that they "did not intend to renew this contract with the Post Office when it expired in 2010."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 13 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1849W.]

However, the Minister failed to answer that part of the question. It therefore appears that, until the last month or so, the Government never announced to Parliament that there was no intention to renew the contract in 2010.

I want to enter into constructive engagement and to hear what the Minister sees happening after 2010. With all these pilot schemes, the Government's present approach is moving people away from the Post Office now. The Government have obviously realised that the Post Office card account comes to an end in 2010. We cannot have a big bang in 2010, so there must be movement before then. With all these pilot schemes, the Government are moving people to the banks now. Why are the Government and the Post Office not working on producing an improved form of POCA for after 2010? All that they seem to be doing is moving people to the banks. The letters that they send people simply tell them that they must move to the banks and that they must phone up and give the Government bank account details.

The Government seem to be going down the track of moving people away from the Post Office, and the loss of custom will lead to the closure of post offices. The only legal protection for post offices is in the Royal Mail's universal service obligation, which states that "not less than 95 per cent. of users" must be within 10 km of a post office

"in all postcode areas"—

postcode area means the initial two letters of the postcode. That means that large tracts of the country will not need to be within 10 km of a post office. That is particularly the case in a postcode area such as mine—the PA postcode—where the vast bulk of residents are in the urban areas of Renfrewshire and Inverclyde, with my rural area added on. If the proposed policy is implemented, only a handful of post offices would be left in my constituency of the 100 or so that are there now. I therefore appeal to the Government to engage positively with pensions groups, sub-postmasters and other parties, to keep the Post Office card account for the moment and to produce a post office-based solution after 2010.

3.9 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid). I take his point that there seems to be a policy of running down the post office network, but I disagree that that is somewhat secret—it has been painfully obvious to everybody that the future of the sub-post office network is under threat.

This is an important debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on raising the issue once again, because the Minister needs time to explain the Government's position. I will therefore keep my remarks very brief. The debate is important because it relates to issues such as financial inclusion and the future of the sub-post office network. It raises questions such as whether the big banks are involved or want to be involved, whether there is over-provision in the financial services sector and whether the major banks simply do not want to be bothered with this type of account and would point to what my hon. Friend calls POCA plus as being like a normal bank account and say that people can now have mainstream bank accounts.

At the end of the day, however, the reason for the POCA was to maintain the post office network. Once we look towards mainstream bank accounts—current accounts with major banks—and moving away from POCA or POCA plus, there is no reason to have that facility in post offices. Once we remove the POCA, the sub-post office will die on its feet because of the lack of income, unless there is something to do with the finances of which we are not aware. What does the Post Office get out of this system and what does it cost the Government? When will we obtain the figures so that we can see for ourselves what the juxtaposition is?

Mr. Blizzard: In the context of what my hon. Friend is saying, one of the sub-postmistresses in my constituency said that it would make a huge difference if more banks had the LINK mechanism and if all the banks with the LINK mechanism signed up with the Post Office. At the moment, Nationwide is there—good for Nationwide. Why are the others not there?

Mr. Illsley: That is a fair point and it is part of the debate about financial services. An automated teller machine near my home is in the local garage, so when I fill my car with petrol, I can withdraw money. I need not go near a post office—or a bank, come to that. If the post office closes but the garage is still there—the chances are that garages will outlive post offices—people will be able to use that ATM, which does not charge for my account. That poses a threat to the sub-post office. Much of the argument is about the future of the sub-post office network.

I wanted to speak in the debate because I have received more than 40 letters this week about one sub-post office in what is an urban constituency, because the sub-postmaster has told the customers that the Government's withdrawal of the POCA from 2010 could pose a threat to the post office, and the customers have reacted. I cannot recall receiving so many letters in such a short time about one issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore talks about the Post Office and takes a romantic view. I am talking about people who have put pen to paper because they have a beef about the future of their post office. To many people, the future of the network is hugely important.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Is not the central point the fact that somehow or other the Government must ensure that after 2010 everyone can still withdraw their money, whether it is pension money or whatever, from a post office, not principally to keep post offices going but because that should be their basic right? The Government should have given people that guarantee. We hope that, whether or not it is called the Post Office card account, there will be that guarantee for everyone, whether they live in a rural constituency, a poor constituency or a semi-rural one such as mine.

Mr. Illsley: I agree, but whether we have a right to a sub-post office network is debatable. There is a school of thought that says that the Government are not committed to that network and would be quite happy to see it wither on the vine, the way things are going. However, something may be being negotiated between the Post Office and the Government so that there can be a future for what my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore calls POCA plus, which will slot in between the post offices and the banking network.

I return to the question of what a sub-postmaster gets from someone coming into his post office and using a high street bank card. Can sub-postmasters draw an income from that? If they can, what are sub-postmasters complaining about? Let us give everyone a bank account and let them go into the post office and use it as a branch of their bank.

Huw Irranca-Davies: One of the interesting discussions that I had with a Welsh executive member of the National Federation of Subpostmasters in Wales was on that very point. He pointed out that, with POCA, a person gets 15p for every £100 transaction. They have to have £100. However, for a banking transaction, regardless of its size, someone gets on average 13.5p. The average transaction involves about £50, so we are talking about 27p per £100. To return to what my hon. Friend was saying, the issue is the wider level of support. If it is not POCA, what will keep those post office branches going?

Mr. Illsley: Some revealing facts are coming out about the amount of money that post offices and banks get and whether we can achieve something in the middle. As we know, all manner of new banking products are introduced every day. There is huge competition in the banking sector. I am referring to direct debit banking, internet banking and so on. People are obviously sat in a room somewhere designing new products even as we speak, moving away from POCA plus towards accounts with all the bells and whistles to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore referred. The caravan is moving on in terms of what is available in the financial services sector. My hon. Friend made the good point that the profits made by high street banks these days are incredibly high—more than £1 billion for each bank that declares profits. Why are we talking about profits such as that and yet high street banks are not coming into this system? We are arguing for people who do not have a basic bank account.

I come to the question whether the POCA was meant to be permanent or temporary. I could not recall anyone saying when we debated the system initially that it would be temporary. I can see the point in including people in financial services and migrating them from the POCA to a mainstream bank account; that is about financial inclusion. However, I do not recall the argument that the POCA was to be temporary. The Government said in response to the Trade and Industry Committee that the contract would last until 2010. I think they said that it was too early to speculate beyond that point. They did not say that the system would end in 2010 and they would not renew it. The fact that it will be ended so soon has caused a lot of concern.

I take the Minister's point that, for 25 per cent. of the delivery of Government benefits, this system takes up 80 per cent. of the cost. It looks as though the Government set up the system in 2003 and have since realised that it is costing a hell of a lot of money for a small number of customers, hence they need to get out of it pretty quickly. It looks as though the Government are getting out of it sooner than 2010, given the pilots and the fact that people are being encouraged to move away from the account. The pilot schemes involving migration are causing the problem. The POCA is closed to new entrants; 35,000 individuals with Post Office card accounts have been told to open a bank account; and 2,500 accounts have simply been closed. Those are the reports that have reached me. It looks as though the Government are intent on closing the contract down even before 2010.

It would be interesting to hear from the Minister whether the cost to the Government is a factor in the midst of all this. It is important that we debate the sub-post office network, but an hour and a half in Westminster Hall does not do the subject justice. The Government should consider allowing extra time to debate the sub-post office network, perhaps on the Floor of the House, because it is a serious issue. The Government should also end the uncertainty and either agree to extend the contract for a couple of years beyond 2010 or make a statement of certainty on what will happen, so that people with the accounts know what will happen and we can advise our constituents for the future.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I will be brief both to save my voice and not have it jangle on your nerves, Mr. Weir, and to give the Minister time to respond to the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing the debate and on his speech. I, too, have received a postbag on this issue. Some of it has been prompted by the fact that post offices in my constituency are being closed or are potentially being closed and replaced by a van, which I am sure will provide a good service for the few hours during which it is available, but which in global terms will reduce the service available from local sub-post offices.

My constituents make two points when they write to me. Initially, they are concerned that the Post Office card account will probably disappear, but they also make a slightly more subtle point: they are concerned about the lack of consistency and security, particularly for those who are older or have a disability. That is a particular issue in my constituency and those of many hon. Members present who represent rural areas, where there is a higher than average percentage of older people, of people with disabilities and certainly of people who are financially excluded because of their income or employment record.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): I want to help the hon. Gentleman state his case. Does his postbag, like mine, reflect a deeper concern about the viability of post office shop businesses in his constituency? Does he recognise the character of one of my village post offices, Llanrhystud, where 130 Post Office card transactions take place each week? The viability of the shop associated with that business will be very much under threat if the uncertainty continues.

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, and I will refer to that issue now rather than later, as I had intended. There are great potential effects on local sub-post offices, and that is in contrast to the great efforts made in areas such as mine to support local shops. In my constituency a village co-op was set up specifically to buy the local post office-shop. The huge effort that went into that may now apparently be rewarded by a severe blow to the income of that business. We certainly must have concerns about footfall and the amount of other business attracted to shops by the Post Office card account facility. As has been noted by other hon. Members, the Prime Minister has said that he wants the network to thrive, and that wish is shared by all of us. However, given the points made by me and other hon. Members, how can it thrive?

I finish on a point that another hon. Member made about the service to the individual customer. There is a certain amount of pressure on card users to take advantage of a bank account. People in some parts of my constituency would say bitterly, "What bank account?" When one looks at deeply rural areas—some of my constituents have to travel eight or even 15 miles to access their bank accounts—one has to be sceptical to say the least.

I refer hon. Members to the report of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. In the previous Parliament, I had the opportunity to be a special adviser for its investigation into financial exclusion. One need only look at the response at the time of the large clearing blanks to the closure of branches, to which the hon. Member for Ogmore referred. I will give a particular example that Welsh Members will relish: a bank in the Rhondda was closed and the alternative service offered was in Pontypridd. That is but 3 miles away as the crow flies, but as the bus or train travels, it is a day's expedition to get to the nearest bank. That was the level of understanding demonstrated at the time.

Chris Bryant: As the hon. Gentleman mentioned my constituency, I thought it incumbent on me to comment. I am not particularly sure which part of the Rhondda he thinks is 3 miles from Pontypridd, but large parts of it are 12 miles away from it. One recent closure was in Treherbert, and that was very disturbing. Does the hon. Gentleman not think it ironic—worse than ironic, in fact—that many of the banks show no great interest in many such communities when it comes to providing banking services, except when they want to lend money to people? Then they are quite happy to provide them regularly—almost daily—with yet another free, pre-arranged, pre-guaranteed credit card, pre-guaranteed loan, or with credit card cheques? There is a great deal of hypocrisy going on with some of the banks.

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point. It strikes a very false note when credit facilities are pushed on people who cannot afford them, while they cannot access bank accounts. That is a particular issue in areas of high deprivation such as the hon. Gentleman's and mine.

I support the point that the hon. Member for Ogmore made about bringing in POCA plus, an improved Post Office account. That sort of account exists in many European countries and is very successful there, and I have no idea why we cannot replicate that in the UK.

3.25 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am aware of the need for brevity, and following the excellent contributions of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), who secured the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), and the hon. Members for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), I wish to make just three brief points.

First, it is clear to me that we all have to accept that, although we feel strongly about the issue and have communities who have depended on post offices for many years, any decisions on the future of Post Office Ltd and our post offices cannot be made purely on the basis of sentimentality, and we cannot plan the future of those services purely on that basis. However, we need to make sure that the decisions are made on the basis of giving Post Office customers genuine choice, not a lack of choice.

Many of us who followed the offer of a variety of methods of collecting pensions and other benefits feel that despite what the Government have said, a lot of the choices that we believe should be available to customers have been closed, denied or at least made extremely difficult. Large and significant obstacles were put in the way of customers, both in terms of the information put out in Government leaflets, and the complexity of the forms that people needed to complete to open a Post Office card account. For other reasons, those opportunities have been significantly restricted. Despite those obstacles, and the obstacle course that the Government have put in the way, the fact is that a larger number of people—4.7 million of them—opened Post Office card accounts than the Government anticipated.

Secondly, the Minister needs to address the issue of the honesty with which the Government are managing the next stage of the future of the Post Office card account, and their decision to close options beyond 2010. As I said earlier, I received a letter—sadly, the date on my copy is too faint, but I will provide it later—this week from the Minister. He says:

> "It was designed as a stepping stone to help people who had not used a bank account before get used to banking before moving on to an account offering more features. The Post Office card account contract runs up to 2010. There was never any expectation that we should provide funding beyond that date and there is no case for doing so."

Earlier, I also referred to another letter, signed by both the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the then Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. I shall quote from page 4 of that letter, which was circulated to all hon. Members, and I shall do so in full, to be fair. It says:

> "New banking services and the introduction of the Post Office card account are central to the future of the Post Office."

If it is central to the future of the Post Office, why is that option being closed down? Nothing in that five or six-page letter referred to the closure of the card account.

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): I have 50 post offices in my constituency. The largest single cause of closure of post offices is people reaching retirement and not being able to sell on their business. Would my hon. Friend agree that it is the uncertainty created by the lack of clarity over the future of the POCA, and indeed of the rural post office network grant, that causes those people not to be able to sell on?

Andrew George: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I hope that the Minister has taken that point on board and will consider it.

The third and final point that I wish to make is simply that the uncertainty is putting the most vulnerable in society at the mercy of the banks. I have taken up a large number of cases on behalf of constituents, and am also aware of other cases on which the Office of Fair Trading ruled in July. Some bank account customers find themselves with unauthorised—or, indeed, authorised—overdrafts with charges that the OFT has found against. It asked the high street banks to regularise and make more transparent their opaque charging mechanism, particularly for people on very low incomes, the people we are talking about when we talk about Post Office card account users. Given that those banks were given three months to respond and they have still not come up with any conclusion at all at this stage, I hope that the Minister accepts that, with this measure, he is throwing the most vulnerable in society at the mercy of an unacceptable situation.

3.30 pm

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing this debate and on his eloquent opening contribution. I strongly echo the remarks made by the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr Illsley) that although a debate in Westminster Hall is important, it does not give enough time to debate this matter in full. Reiterating a point made in a previous debate, we should have some Government time in the main Chamber to debate this matter more fully.

Hon. Members have been right to say that the news that the account was temporary came as a shock to many people. As my hon Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) said, it was a well-kept secret by Ministers during the crucial period when the card account was being rolled out. In a letter sent on 21 February this year, the DWP told one correspondent that "drawing attention to the end of the Post Office card account contract may have been seen in a negative light by critics. Therefore we made the decision not to refer to it."

That could not be more explicit. That is cynical spin and manipulation of an important issue.

Of course, a vast number of people are affected by this change. Some 4.7 million have opened Post Office card accounts and 6,500 make use of them every week in my constituency. Why have they proved so popular? Simply because they are based in the post office, an institution for which people have a great deal of trust and respect and which is simple to use.

The card account contract, as it has been said, was worth more than £1 billion over its term to post offices and without that income many of them could be forced to close. As Adam Crozier, the chief executive of the Royal Mail, has made clear up to 10,000 closures could be caused by the end of the Post Office card account and the removal of the social network payment, to which the hon. Member for Ogmore referred. Rural areas such as the highlands, and deprived urban areas with high concentrations of benefit recipients, would be worst affected if that were to take place.

I should be interested to know from the Minister whether the approach to this is based on joined-up government. We hear rhetoric about supporting post offices, but Departments seem to act contrarily. Have the Government made any estimate of how many post offices they would expect to close if the Post Office card account is withdrawn?

The pilots, which have already been mentioned, are over, thank goodness, but not without considerable distress being caused to some of the people affected, as has been said. In one case that I have been informed of, a letter was sent informing the person that their pension would be switched to a bank account, without their consent, three days after th[illegible]tter was received. No wonder the Government's approach to this matter has been seen in the poorest light possible so far.

Given that one of the main reasons for the popularity of the card account is that it is post office-based, surely it would have been better to allow the Post Office to develop its POCA product for 2010 onwards and include that option in the pilots. The risk is that the Government will come back from the pilots and say, "Ah yes, people are quite happy to switch from the POCA to a bank account, so there's no need to worry," especially because people in pilots were not informed of their right to keep a Post Office card account. I am concerned that the pilots are a hanging jury for the POCA, a test specifically set up for the Post Office to fail in order to justify cutting the support provided to post offices for receiving benefits and pensions.

Will the Minister commit today to making public the results of the evaluation of the pilot schemes in detail? Will he explain in his response the use that he intends to make of the pilots? Are there any plans for any further pilot schemes to be conducted? If so, have the Government learned the lessons from the lack of consultation on the pilots and the hostile reaction that they generated among many people?

If the Government are still determined to abandon the Post Office card account and its nearly 5 million users, how will its phasing out be conducted, if they wish to honour the contract in full? That point has been made by other hon. Members. Will people who do not already have other arrangements in place simply have their Post Office card account closed and payments cancelled overnight in 2010, or, in order to satisfy the need to end the contract in 2010, will the accounts be withdrawn before that? What is the plan for phasing out the card account, if it is not to be continued?

I concur with remarks made by other hon. Members in this debate. Why not build on the success of the Post Office card account, rather than remove it? After all, it has proved to be popular and attracted nearly 5 million users. What efforts have the Government made to work with the Post Office to develop and enhance the Post Office card account, perhaps in line with the POCA plus, as the hon. Member for Ogmore suggested, and perhaps by adding features to the card account in future?

It is worth pointing out, as the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) said in regard to debt, that one feature that most puts people off having a bank account, especially elderly people, is the idea of an overdraft and setting up a direct debit and running into debt. Of course, the banks make money by people getting into debt and paying interest, which is perhaps why the banks have shown less interest in this product. That will be a major concern, before adding too many new features to the Post Office card account plus.

Adding features would allow customers to stay with the Post Office, which they trust, maintain vital income for post offices, so the services can continue to be provided in rural communities, and allow customers to develop their use of banking-type services. If that happened, the nearly 5 million current card account users would not all have to go through the disruption and upset of changing accounts and there would be a smooth transition between the card account and the card account plus. Rather than the Government saying to people, "This ends now and you're going to have to make a choice about where you go from here", it is a much better way to proceed.

Is not the offer of using a bank account at the post office a pretty hollow one, given that, as Citizens Advice says, 60 per cent. of personal bank accounts are not accessible at the post office at the moment? For example, the Royal Bank of Scotland, HBOS and HSBC do not allow access to their main bank accounts at post offices. In that sense, as the hon. Member for Ogmore said, Post Office card accounts are good for financial inclusion.

Is not the real risk of abandoning the Post Office card account, rather than developing it, that, as Citizens Advice says, will be created? It is worth noting that 700,000 people currently still receive their benefits or pensions directly by giro payment. Is not the risk that that number could balloon even further, if the card account is ended without a suitable post office-based replacement being put in place well in advance?

"a new class of unbanked people"

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. In Dunfermline and West Fife, we have 18 rural post offices, many of which are under threat, including some in former mining communities, like Blairhall and Oakley. However, a lot of the post offices are failing to invest, because of the uncertainty about the future. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister should address this uncertainty?

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for that intervention. I certainly agree that the Minister should do that.

In conclusion, I urge the Government to think through more clearly the impact on benefit claimants and pensioners of the change—abandoning the Post Office card account—and the impact on post offices. I urge the Minister to look seriously at the option of a seamless continuation, with an enhanced Post Office card account after 2010, rather than a disruptive process of ending the card account and asking people to go hither and thither into bank accounts. That would be good for customers and post offices. Most of all, I urge him to be up front and straightforward about the process, rather than repeating the serial deception that we now know took place when the card account was introduced.

3.38 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), not just on securing this debate, but on a thoughtfully forensic contribution, which I think we all appreciated.

This is an important issue that will not go away. More than 350 signatories in this House have put their names to two early-day motions, marking out clear dissatisfaction with how the Department has handled this issue. The payment of benefits through POCAs is vital to any serious analysis of the future of the post office network.

Since the last POCA debate on 15 February, a rather important letter has been circulated to some hon. Members from the managing director of Post Office Ltd, Mr. Alan Cook, and I should like to read into the record some important points made by him.

"We were both surprised and disappointed to learn the Department for Work and Pensions had decided not to support the POCA after March 2010 . . . we were well aware, of course, that the contract—like any other—had an end date. But we expected all along that the contract would either be renewed or the POCA would be replaced with a similar product and would generate equivalent income for sub-postmasters and the network.

We are also disappointed that the DWP has launched a series of pilot schemes to test ways of moving existing customers away from the POCA to other payment channels for receipt of their pensions and benefits, as well as not making the POCA available as a payment option to some new customers. The effect is to begin now a rundown of the POCA before the Post Office has had time to develop and introduce an alternative product."

That has been the thrust of many Members' arguments today. The letter goes on:

"The withdrawal of the POCA would mean that after 2010, less than 10 per cent. of the network's revenue would come from Government departments, in contrast to the position a decade ago when the majority of business transacted in our branches was Government business."

Mr. Cook concludes:

"The Post Office network, which makes a loss of some £2 million a week on its operations, currently derives £200 million of revenue a year from the use of the card".

The managing director himself has given us some understanding of the massive contribution made by the POCA to the turnover of sub-post offices. That, I suggest, is revenue that they can ill afford to lose.

That letter leads me to the conclusion that Ministers have been guilty of at least leading on senior Post Office management for years. Ministers have created a sense of uncertainty among customers, many of whom, as we have heard, are old and vulnerable. Although Ministers have had plenty of opportunity to do so, they have not made clear what will replace the POCA.

What about the consumer and the customer? We all know that a key factor in people's decisions to opt for the POCA instead of a basic bank account has been the ability to withdraw benefit payments over the counter at the post office without any hassle. We know the problems with basic bank accounts. As the hon. Member for Ogmore described in some detail, of 26 basic bank account products, about half had serious restrictions in respect of balance inquiries and the rest. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) pointed out what we all know: a lot of banks are really not that interested in basic products. They will not extend a suite of options to users of basic bank accounts, even assuming that such accounts could be accessed at the sub-post office, whether in a village or an urban area.

In effect, Ministers are trying to kill off the POCA well before 2010. Without any real consultation, they have imposed three pilot schemes. We have heard about the unhappy situation of someone in the constituency of the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), in my county of Suffolk, who was put to trouble by the letter he received as a result of being on one of those schemes. I shall not rehearse the details of the scheme, but one fact is key. I asked the Minister in respect of the POCA about when the three pilot schemes would be completed. I asked him

"what plans he has to increase the number of people covered by these schemes."

The Minister, who is here today, replied:

"The pilots... will be concluded by mid-March. When they are completed we will evaluate the results and discuss the findings with the Post Office and other key stakeholders. I have no plans to increase the number of customers covered."—[Official Report; 14 March 2006, vol. 443, col. 2164W.]

It seems from that answer that he is not going to do any more pilots, and that this will be the last word on test driving new ways of migrating people from the POCA to basic accounts. However, nowhere in anything the Minister has said today or in any parliamentary answer that I have seen is there any clue about when an announcement will be made about an alternative to the POCA, how much that would cost, what functionality it would have and what kind of revenues it would be likely to deliver to the sub-postmaster network that so desperately needs something like the POCA, never mind to the customers who want a replacement card.

When the pilots have been properly evaluated, will the Minister have a public discussion, not just one with the Post Office behind closed doors? Will he publish all the results in respect of where he thinks the pilot leads us in the development and delivery of an alternative to the POCA, if that is what he has in mind? I also seek an assurance that he will not be doing any more piloting—that he will get on with it.

The interim nature of the card has come as a surprise to a lot of us in the past few months; the cat has been let rather belatedly out of the bag. Will the Minister end the worry and concern caused to sub-postmasters and users of the POCA, and tell us today what will replace the POCA and when? If he cannot tell us today, will he tell us why not?

3.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) on securing this important and instructive debate and on his excellent and thoughtful speech. The debate has been good, but will be a wee bit better if I can make a comprehensive response to all the points made by hon. Members. I say up front that I shall be rather less generous in giving way than last time. I want to give the reassurances that almost every hon. Member who has spoken has asked for, and I want to answer the questions that they have raised; I hope that that will be borne in mind as I proceed.

For the most part, the debate has rightly focused on the future. Now that the Post Office card account has been running for three years, we see that it fulfils the interim purpose for which it was designed—namely, providing a very basic form of account for collecting benefit payments via a post office. It has been taken up by those who did not have any form of bank account, as well as by others who do.

However, three years into its operation, we can also see its significant limitations. That, too, has been broadly expected. Let me remind hon. Members of the preamble to the card account contract between the Post Office and the Government. I make no apology for repeating it; it is extremely important. The contract states:

"Under the Government's present policy to combat social exclusion and in order to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of government and minimise fraud, Benefits recipients will receive Benefits by Direct Credit. A POCA will complement the range of Bank Accounts available to customers; in particular, to promote a service to those who do not have or cannot otherwise obtain a Bank Account.

The POCA is intended to be an interim step for Account Holders who will be encouraged by both Parties to migrate to Bank Accounts which provide services and opportunities not available through the POCA."

To fulfil the undertaking in that contract, we, with Post Office Ltd, need to start to plan the range of products to be available from 2010, based on customers' actual behaviour and requirements. That is the context into which the pilots fit; without doing the piloting work, we shall not know how to proceed with that migration in advance of 2010.

Let me reassure hon. Members who raised points, which I have been interested to hear, about the pilots. The pilots were discussed with the Post Office before they were commenced. The Post Office saw the letters that we sent out to customers in the pilots and raised no objections to them. As has been indicated already, the pilots have concluded; they finished on 10 March. We are now analysing their results. We shall discuss the results with the Post Office and, yes, I shall be more than happy to put those results into the public domain and report later to Parliament on them.

Andrew George: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Plaskitt: Yes, but I will not do so often.

Andrew George: Given the nature of the quote from the original POCA contract with the Post Office that the Minister has just read, will he, bearing in mind the six-page letter from both Secretaries of State that I read out earlier, apologise on behalf of the Government for having misled the House into believing that the Post Office card account was going to be a substantial contributor to the very future of the options available for post office users?

Mr. Plaskitt: No, no one has been misled about this matter. It was explicit in the contract right from the outset. Statements were made way back in 2003 at the launch—Labour Members referred to this in terms of the Select Committee—to the effect that it was too early to comment about what would succeed the POCA. In 2003, of course that was right, because it was just beginning its life. It has four more years to run and will last until 2010. That is why now is an appropriate time to start thinking about what will succeed it.

Some, who allow large balances to build up in their POCA, would be better off with a savings account, and the Post Office is developing one. It is currently being piloted in Scotland. Some customers could be equally well served by a bank account that they can use at the Post Office. That would still generate income and footfall for the sub-postmaster. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore pointed out, if there is a larger switch from card account to post office-accessible bank account, the revenue stream for sub-postmasters might be higher than it is under a POCA. The migration is particularly important for them as well.

Clearly, some people will still need a product like a POCA because they cannot manage, or perhaps do not wish to have, a bank account. Even in that area, we could do more for financial inclusion if the replacement products were better targeted on the unbanked and perhaps offered some services that the POCA does not, such as the ability to pay in cash and cheques. None of that will happen overnight. The POCA still has several years to run, but the responsible thing to do now is to start planning for the world of 2010 and beyond. That is exactly what we, and the Post Office, should be doing, and are doing; it is what we are jointly contracted to do.

There is no doubt that the post office network faces real challenges. We want to work with the Post Office to help it meet those challenges and seize the opportunities available to it. The world of financial services has changed dramatically in the past decade alone and is continuing to evolve. The expectations of customers and the way that they want to do their business have changed enormously and will continue to change. There is a trend towards a cashless society, including the increased use of direct debit, the internet and e-mail, which means that we also need to respond to the service requirements of increasingly sophisticated customers in a changing world.

Technological and other improvements are opening up completely new ways of doing business and leading to a further transformation in lifestyles and customer preferences. As hon. Members have said in this debate, that has already had a very significant impact on the Post Office. Post offices are no longer places where people just cash their benefits or pensions; they buy lottery tickets, insurance and foreign currency, top up their mobile phones and take out loans in post offices. Responding to that, the Post Office continues to develop and actively promote new products, in competition with other providers.

The challenge for the Post Office is to provide a range of high-quality services that people want to use, and to do so in the context of that rapidly evolving customer base, and in the context of a crowded field of financial service providers. We would like every Department for Work and Pensions customer who has a POCA to continue to do their banking at the Post Office if that is what they want.

We want to work with the Post Office to plan how we can best manage the change and ensure that we are delivering services that will match evolving customer demand. The Government's commitment to the Post Office—every single one of us understands its importance in our communities—is clearly confirmed by our record of support. We have invested more than £2 billion since 1999 to help the Post Office develop its services and have made available £750 million to support the rural network, as a result of which the rate of rural closures has slowed dramatically.

The Government have also provided £500 million to help computerise the entire network, which enables the Post Office to tap into new markets and open up its counters to those 20 million bank customers. I understand why in the context of this debate there is a heavy concentration on the 4 million or so POCA users. We should bear in mind, as the Post Office should, that 20 million bank customers have accounts that are potentially accessible at post offices. That is an even bigger market to go after. Many of those customers are probably unaware that their bank account could be accessed through a post office. That represents a campaign to be taken up by the Post Office in addition to the current issue about the POCA.

The Government want a post office network that can prosper on the basis of today and tomorrow's needs.

Mr. Blizzard: Will the Minister say how many of the 4 million POCA customers were involved in the pilots? Were those involved spread across the whole country or were they concentrated in certain areas?

Mr. Plaskitt: Some 30,000 POCA customers were involved in the pilots; geographically, they were spread across the entire country. I wanted to let my hon. Friend come back in on this matter, because I wanted specifically to reply to the point he made in an earlier intervention. He talked about the way in which a constituent was spoken to by an official. As far as I am concerned, that should not have happened and I am grateful that he has drawn my attention to the matter.

The Post Office is already developing new banking and savings products that will be suitable for some existing POCA customers. In addition, appropriate products must be in place for vulnerable customers when the POCA contract ends in 2010. We will work with Post Office Ltd to ensure that such accounts are available. The Post Office's own research shows that POCA customers are far from a homogenous group. They range from some vulnerable groups to those who do not depend on their pension or child benefit but who still let large balances build up in their card accounts, despite the fact that they pay no interest.

It is likely, therefore, that as we look to 2010 and beyond there will be a range of accounts. For some people, using an existing bank account might well be the right answer. Most of the big banks offer basic bank accounts, as has been mentioned, which are very similar in their day-to-day operation to a POCA, and all with post office accessibility.

I have explained how the Government support the Post Office. I have also tried to stress that this debate is not taking place against a static background. If the Post Office stands still in the range of financial products that it offers, it will be left behind. If the Government and the Post Office work together to honour the contract to which we were joint signatories in 2003 and to develop further products, that would be the correct response. If we do not do so, it will pitch post offices into a far worse position in 2010, than if we were to start working now in anticipation of the contract's expiry.

I repeat that there is opportunity for the Post Office. That has not just been recognised by me, as a Minister in the DWP, but by Tricia Jenkins, who is the National President of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. At its conference last year, she said:

"POCA does indeed have a limited life. When it finishes, we hope to convert existing POCA customers into using another Post Office Ltd service . . . and, since we"—

the Post Office—

"can offer a banking service, we would like to think we can keep those customers. So it is 'all change' in 2010, but it will not necessarily be . . . bad news."

Undue pessimism and scare stories suggesting that, as a consequence of the current POCA contract ending in 2010, thousands of post offices will close and that customers will no longer be able to collect their benefit or pension at the post office, are not only totally misleading but, by spreading unfounded fears, are not in the Post Office's interests. We want to work with the Post Office and in the best interests of our joint customers, but it is important that the Post Office makes rapid progress in developing its own new products so that they are in place, and established, when customers need them.

We are ending the Government funding for the POCA in March 2010, as was always planned. People will still be able to collect their benefit or pension at the post office, as was always promised. If customers continue to use post offices, that will help them to stay open. Crucial to achieving all of that is having the right products in place at the right time. That is why we are working with the Post Office to bring that about.

MOD Llangennech

4 pm

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): I have asked for this debate because there is still a good deal of confusion about exactly what is happening at MOD Llangennech, and staff at Llangennech have a number of concerns.

First, we need to understand that there are several different sections at Llangennech: forms and publications, commodity management; forms and publications, storage and distribution; civilian records; the print facility; and timber and metals.

We then need to understand what has happened so far. In the process of the future defence supply chain initiative, two private consortia—BAE Systems and DML—bid for the parts of the defence supply chain and lost against a bid from the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency, or DSDA. DSDA therefore retained the work, but, as part of the bid, it planned on outsourcing "non-core" activity. Most of Llangennech's work is non-core as, in the main, the centre stores, distributes and commodity-manages paper. The forms and publications section employs the largest number of staff—it employs the majority of the staff at Llangennech.

As part of the FDSCI process, bids were originally put in for this work by consortia such as BAE and partners. It was won by an in-house bid that proposed closing the Llangennech site and transferring the work to other Ministry of Defence sites. As part of the bid, DSDA also planned on outsourcing non-core activity.

The MOD has enabling contracts with the private sector—with Astron to carry out print tasks, and with TNT for records storage. The print contract is being re-let and has been extended to include forms and publications storage, including the commodity management thereof. Astron has in the past done single tasks for the MOD. It now appears that, by means of an extended contract, it is being given the opportunity to take over the work of the print unit. That is happening without any formal bidding procedure. Furthermore, Astron is also now being given the opportunity to take over the forms and publications section. Again, that is being done by means of an extended contract.

The Minister has stated that

"our consideration will examine the cost-effectiveness of retaining the work at Llangennech".

If the work is now being given to the private company Astron—rather than just being kept in-house—the work force at Llangennech would like to know if they could also put in a bid to do the work. To create a level playing field, it is not sufficient that the charges Astron is proposing for the work should be compared with the existing costs at Llangennech. The work force should have the opportunity to look into potential savings and then put together a professional, competitive bid.

In the original bidding process, the bidders—BAE and DML—headed up consortia which included distribution companies. Realistically, they had to be consortia in order to provide the full coverage of the service. Astron is being given the work as a single company. It subcontracts its work. However, it is unclear whether Astron is either able or entitled to undertake the distribution of the MOD's printed matter. The MOD's in-house distribution network covers all parts of the globe. Moreover, the distribution element was included in the bidding process under the FDSCI. Therefore, I should be grateful if the Minister could clarify whether the cost to the MOD of the work carried out by Astron includes distribution to all theatres—the Falklands, Afghanistan, and the middle east. As the Minister will be aware, initial plans by Westland to undertake distribution were hastily abandoned when it realised the scale, the complexity, the cost and the legal difficulties of distributing to destinations such as foreign embassies. Given that for legal reasons—customs law—Westland was unable to distribute outside the UK, I should be grateful if the Minister would clarify whether Astron is in a position to undertake distribution.

A further issue arises: by handing the work over to one firm with no competitive bidding procedure, is the MOD really getting value for money? What happens if one of the unsuccessful bidders, such as BAE, complains that the work is now being given to a private company that did not bid for it in the first place? Although both DML and BAE lost out on the FDSCI, both Astron and TNT—but especially Astron—stand to benefit from its outcome without having to bid directly. It is difficult to see how DSDA can win an in-house bid on the one hand, thereby demonstrating value for money, and yet not represent the value for money option in terms of forms and publications storage, commodity management, print and the storage of civilian records. How can DSDA store other material more cheaply than the private sector and yet not the material stored at Llangennech?

The process may well be perfectly legal, but it still does not seem to be very transparent. Effectively, DSDA, with an in-house bid, is giving work to a private company without any bidding process. What the staff at Llangennech are saying is this: "As the work is now going out to private tender, we would like the opportunity to bid for it; we would like to know exactly what the specification is, and we would like to use our expertise to put in a bid that will offer value for money to the MOD." Staff at Llangennech are more than willing to look into ways to effect cost savings and to put together a competitive bid. The staff at Llangennech have already been directly involved in making their work more efficient. They have been piloting the use of IT, which, with proper support services provided by skilled personnel, could lead to further savings for the MOD. This is going out to the private sector. It is not therefore contributing to the consolidation of services at Bicester or Donnington, which was one reason given for the move to close Llangennech.

On the print unit, past experience does not suggest that a private company would be any cheaper than an in-house bid from Llangennech. For example, I understand that Astron charged £800,000 for an initial distribution—an initial distribution without the differentiated follow-up of items, equalling less than 1 per cent. of the total inventory. It may be that, in an initial contract with a private provider, the MOD does not want the full capacity of the current print unit at Llangennech, which has recently enlarged to cope with the extra work from Keynsham, notably the production of defence instruction notices.

The MOD may only want a specified volume of work as a core contract, with the option to buy in extra. The print unit in Llangennech needs to know that if it is to work out a comparable business plan; it needs to know what the core volume of work is and have some indication as to the likelihood of additional work. It has a service that could be marketed commercially to make up for any shortfall in the work coming from the MOD, but it needs time to draw up a business plan and do the necessary marketing, if it is to retain its current capacity through bringing in work from sources other than a potential MOD contract. Currently staffing levels at the print unit have been inflated by the appointment last August of five extra temporary staff to cover the work brought over from Keynsham. Just calculating the current cost of the print unit with the price that a private company produces to a specification is not comparing like with like.

To ensure that the MOD, and ultimately the taxpayer, is getting the best value for money, if the intention is to outsource the print unit work, then it would be foolish not to look at an in-house bid from Llangennech, as that bid could provide the best value for money. Otherwise, the MOD would be missing a bargain, and the taxpayer would be paying the price.

Nine staff work in civilian records. It appears that DSDA intends to put that work out to contract to TNT, despite the fact that it was out of the scope of the FDSCI. There is a precedent in outsourcing here, as TNT has had a contract for outsourcing military records. Staff at Llangennech need to know if civilian records are being outsourced, and they need to know what the specification is—whether the same level of service is required as the current levels provide, or whether the MOD is looking for a slimmed down service with less access to records. What is unacceptable to staff at Llangennech, and should be unacceptable to the taxpayer, is to find that the work has just been given to a private company with no transparency about what that company bid for, and no opportunity for any other company or the staff themselves to bid.

As we understand it, the classified section would not be a candidate for privatisation, for reasons of national security. I would be grateful if the Minister could confirm that.

The timbers and metals section takes up a large proportion of the ground space at Llangennech; it is what many people think of when they think of Llangennech. However, the actual number of employees in the section—16—is a small proportion of the total work force. There seem to be some very confused messages about what exactly is happening to this section. There seems to be a lot of coming and going. It has just been announced that all air metals from Stafford are to be moved to Llangennech. However, if Llangennech is to close, how long will they be staying there? Is that the best use of taxpayers' money? Propellers left Llangennech the other day and went to Bicester, but when they arrived at Bicester there was no room so they had to go to Donnington.

There is a unique lifting capacity at Llangennech: what might be called a very large crane. I understand that the plan is to move it to a shed at Bicester. It will fit into the shed, but only as long as it does not try to lift anything. Quite how useful that will be, I do not know. The former chief executive of DSDA had high hopes for the 20-ton crane at ABRO, Donnington. However, it was announced today that ABRO is to continue for another four years, so it will need to keep its crane for its work. That means that the only heavy-lift facility defence storage has left is at Llangennech, where there is a 40-ton crane and a 20-ton crane. Staff would like to be reassured that a thorough assessment has been made of the capacity at the various sites and that there is a clear, comprehensive plan for all the storage needed. We do not want to see propellers whizzing around the country only to find, like some surreal but expensive game of musical chairs, that there is no space left for a propeller at the end.

I understand that consideration has been given to opening up the mothballed site B at Bicester. Opening up a site that has not been used for some time will obviously be costly with regard to health and safety, in ensuring that all appliances are working properly and in terms of maintenance, such as minor repairs. The issue is whether that provides the best value for money when we have a working site in Llangennech.

I would like to thank the Minister for his assurances about support for staff and their families in the event of closure at Llangennech. There may be some staff whose age and personal circumstances mean that they would be very interested in finishing and taking severance pay. However, for many the severance pay, although it might initially look tempting, would be no substitute for a regular income. What would be really galling would be to see the Ministry of Defence paying large sums of money to the private sector for the work currently done at Llangennech, when the staff know that they could have provided the same service or a better service more cheaply.

The staff would have a strong vested interest in ensuring that the work is done superbly well in order to keep the contracts for the future because they would have written the bids themselves, and because their private companies would have been formed specifically to do MOD work. A private company for which an MOD contract was just one small section of its operation might have much less motivation in ensuring that the job was done well. It might end up subcontracting the work with little quality control, with possible embarrassing consequences for the MOD.

If the MOD decides to reduce the Llangennech site to a trailer drop point and get rid of the land, serious consideration should be given to what price the land would fetch. Would it not be better for the MOD to sell off land in parts of southern England where it would fetch a much better price and help to alleviate the shortage of brownfield sites available for much-needed housing? Perhaps the MOD would prefer to rent out the space at Llangennech, but the income generated would be limited. There is already a large amount of warehousing space only a few hundred yards away from Llangennech that has been lying empty for ages. If the MOD is to provide the taxpayer with value for money, it makes better sense to rent out facilities for income generation in southern England where the returns are much greater.

In an ideal world, we would not need to go through the upheaval of change and there are many who would prefer not to be talking about privatising our defence supply chain. However, given that change is necessary and that the chosen way forward involves outsourcing, to ensure that we get value for money for the MOD and the taxpayer, the existing work force should be given every opportunity to compete on a level playing field for the work. That is the only way that we can ensure fair play for all concerned: the work force, the MOD and the taxpayer.

4.14 pm

Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) on securing this important debate and I thank her for giving up a couple of minutes to allow me to support the powerful case she made.

A number of my constituents are also employed at MOD Llangennech. When Llangennech representatives invited me to visit the site, I walked round it and met the people on the ground, and I was enormously impressed by the dedication of staff and what they told me. The people there said exactly what my hon. Friend said in the last few minutes: the proposal to transfer the various sections of work out of Llangennech is wrong, because we will end up with work being done less efficiently, less effectively and probably at far greater cost.

The people at Llangennech and the units of the armed forces that they serve—their customers, if you like—have not been involved in or even properly consulted about the proposal. That is just plain wrong. We should remember that Llangennech has an excellent performance record throughout its sections. It has led the way in employment of information technology, as my hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli mentioned. It has a wealth of staff expertise that the MOD really should not be prepared to lose. It has always been extremely economical to run and in 2003 it was the only site to meet its financial targets for three consecutive years. My hon. Friend is right: there is a compelling case in economic and organisational terms to allow the staff to bid for the work that they already do so well. There is also a case on the basis of natural justice.

4.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) on securing the debate. I know that she and my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) have championed the interests of the work force of Llangennech quite vigorously and this is a further expression of their support for and solidarity with the work force there.

It may be helpful if I start by setting out the background to the decision to close the defence storage and distribution centre at Llangennech. It is critical that our armed forces receive the support they need to do the jobs we ask of them. Our servicemen are among the best equipped and supported in the world and the measures and programmes that the Government have put in place will ensure that they remain so in the future. One such measure is the future defence supply chain initiative, which was launched in 2002 with the aim of assessing a range of options for managing and operating the defence supply chain to reduce costs of ownership, while maintaining or improving service levels and enhancing operational capability.

Alternative models of in-house provision were compared with a potential partnered solution for which proposals were sought from industry. In July 2005, the

[Mr. Don Touhig]

Secretary of State for Defence announced that one of the in-house options, known as "do different", had been selected. That option was chosen as it offered the best balance between delivering improved logistic support to operations and achieving better value for money for taxpayers. The solution, together with the improvements that are being introduced across the supply chain, including monitoring and tracking the movements of military supplies, will result in the United Kingdom having a world-class military supply chain, dedicated to ensuring that the support provided to soldiers, sailors and aircrew operating on the front line is second to none, which must be our prime objective.

Examples of improvements include: the ability to increase outputs rapidly in support of operations; providing a single, accountable point of contact for MOD storage and distribution customers; and delivering changes to process that will increase confidence at the front line that requirements will be met on time and in full. Overall, implementation of the initiative is expected to make savings of over £50 million per year by 2010 and more than £441 million over the next 10 years. As my hon. Friends will recognise, those are precious resources that we need to free up for use elsewhere.

Under the "do different" proposal, three storage and distribution centres are expected to close: Stafford by 2007, Llangennech by mid-2008 and Longtown by mid-2009. There will be further streamlining at other establishments. In addition, the defence regional distribution centres, including the one at Llangennech, will convert to trailer drop points by 2009–10. That means that when goods arrive at the distribution centres, they will no longer be unloaded and placed in a warehouse. Instead the trailer body will be removed and swapped to another trailer before being transported to its final destination, which will minimise double handling in the majority of cases, improve transit times and result in a more effective use of MOD's estate and vehicles.

The closure at Llangennech alone will bring savings of more than £5 million per annum, and closure will affect all of the activities carried out at Llangennech. I can confirm that a project team has been assembled to look into the print, storage and distribution of forms, civilian personnel records, metal stockholding and wood, bar and tube cutting activities. The project team will look at outsourcing the functions, or moving the business to an alternative DSDA site or another MOD department. It is not true, as I believe has been rumoured, that decisions have already been taken to outsource those services. The review process is at a comparatively early stage. Indeed, detailed planning and reporting dates have yet to be agreed. I can assure my hon. Friends that the trade unions are being given every opportunity to participate in that work. My hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli has made a number of proposals for involving the trade unions in more detail, and possibly involving them in the future operation of the site. Those proposals, if put to us, will be considered. We are considering all issues.

The value for money issue is crucial to us, and there will be full consultation with the trade unions. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will keep all interested parties informed. Should my hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli seek a meeting to develop any of her arguments with him directly, I have no doubt that having read the Hansard record of today's proceedings, he would agree to meet her.

Turning back to the implications of the future defence supply chain initiative, I fully understand the consequences of those changes for the future employment of MOD staff. The decision to move to the implementation of that important initiative is in no way a reflection of the contribution that the work force in the supply chain have made. I know that there is some uncertainty among them, but I also acknowledge the loyal and dedicated service our people have given to the Ministry of Defence over the years.

In overall terms, the new supply chain organisation will require around 2,000 fewer posts, the majority of which are occupied by civilians. We estimate that about half those reductions will be achieved through natural wastage and the majority of the remainder will come through voluntary early release. Some compulsory redundancies will be necessary, but the intention is to keep them to a minimum.

There may be some opportunities for staff to transfer to other MOD sites or other Departments. A staff preference exercise will be undertaken and the MOD will liaise with Jobcentre Plus in the lead up to the closure. Team Wales has done fantastic work in circumstances like those that we face at Llangennech. The trades unions were kept fully informed and consulted throughout the planning phase of the future defence supply chain initiative, and they continue to be involved during its implementation. We would want that.

Looking more specifically at Llangennech, as the rundown progresses there will be a gradual transfer of inventory and stock within existing sites, with a corresponding gradual reduction in staff numbers. It is anticipated that natural wastage will account for some reductions, and there may be opportunities for relocation to other MOD sites. However, some redundancies will be unavoidable. At present the number is estimated to be 120 from both the defence storage and distribution centre and the defence regional distribution centre.

The MOD outplacement service will be available to support staff and spouses affected by the reductions at the site, offering support with relocation, financial advice and preparation for alternative employment. Training will be available to assist staff with transition to life in the private sector, and the services of the MOD welfare organisation will be available also to help staff with their personal circumstances. Redundancy payments and pension entitlements will be in accordance with the civil service compensation scheme and the principal civil service pension schemes.

It has been decided that the transformation can be achieved by the DSDA remaining an Executive agency, but with a revised framework document. That document will give the appropriate freedoms and delegations to the agency's management team, allowing it to complete the transformation plan. In the third year, "do different" will be reviewed, as the plan is to have completed the bulk of the transformation by that point.

Changes will include reinforcing the senior management team. In addition the DSDA work force will receive significant amounts of training with the subsequent multi-skilling, providing greater flexibility and effectiveness. With improvements in processing, such as selecting for destination from the warehouse, much less double handling and, hence, fewer process costs will be incurred.

I want to pay tribute to the contribution that the staff at Llangennech have made and continue to make to the work of their agency and to defence. These are very difficult, trying and uncertain times for them, and I fully recognise the very powerful case argued by my hon. Friends the Members for Llanelli and for Gower in defence of the work force. My hon. Friends are doing what is perfectly proper, and they championed their constituents in an exemplary way. However, I must emphasise once more that the changes taking place at Llangennech are in no way a commentary on the expertise or effectiveness of the staff. They have been fantastic. I should like to underline the fact that we are doing all we can to support them at this time when their future is uncertain.

It is always a difficult decision to implement staff reductions and site closures. But we must do what is right for defence as a whole, and we remain convinced that the implementation of future defence supply chain initiatives, and the benefits that they will bring, are firmly in the national interest. Having said that, I shall certainly read the Hansard record of today's proceedings and take into account the comments of my hon. Friends. I have no doubt that if they were to seek a meeting with our right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, he would meet them to explore the issues that they have raised and, perhaps, give them further reassurance that, as we take the agenda forward, we are trying to involve everybody—the trade unions in particular—in discussions.

It is not an easy time for us, and it is certainly not an easy time for the people involved. I fully appreciate that. However, I want my hon. Friends to know that we shall do everything possible to make this difficult decision effective in the interests of defence, while being sensitive to its consequences for the people whom my hon. Friends have represented so well this afternoon.

Child Support Agency (Holly Mackintosh)

4.26 pm

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): It is a pleasure to return to the Chamber so soon after the last occasion on which the Minister and I were here. I hope that this debate will allow me to speak a little more slowly, because I have more time this time.

I am grateful for being granted this debate about the important issue of my constituent Holly Mackintosh. It is an opportunity to raise an unfair situation that affects a constituent through the operation of the Child Support Agency enforcement process. Although I have been an MP for less than a year, I have had the opportunity to discuss this case with colleagues and it seems to be unique. It is causing distress to my constituent, with whom I have had several discussions about it, and it is also damaging the welfare of her eight-year-old daughter. It raises issues about natural justice, to which I shall return.

It may be helpful if I set out the circumstances of the case. Holly Mackintosh is of good character. She is a very hard-working mother, struggling to make ends meet to support her family. She has a daughter—Joanna, who is now eight years old—with her former partner, Mr. Neil Hampson. They purchased a house in Harbour street in Nairn in October 1995. In 2002, they separated and Mr. Hampson stopped residing at the Harbour street residence. Up to then, Mrs. Mackintosh had paid all mortgage repayments and the deposit on the house. She has the documents to confirm that, and she has been in correspondence with the CSA about that matter.

In April 2003, an inhibition order was registered on the house by the CSA, as Mr. Hampson was in arrears to the CSA for £25,890 of maintenance payments. They were owed to his ex-wife, Mrs. Macpherson, for the two sons that he had from that relationship.

In 2004, the title of the property was transferred solely to Mrs. Mackintosh. That should have been done earlier, since it merely formalised the position that had obtained since their separation in 2002. It was only after the process was complete that she learned that an inhibition order was in place. At the time of separation, several issues were at play which caused the delay, not least the shortage of cash for paying lawyers' bills and so on. Indeed, as part of the agreement to transfer the property to her name, she also took sole responsibility for the £247 of monthly repayments on a joint loan that she and Mr. Hampson had taken to help repay debts that he owed to the Inland Revenue. That was done, as it were, in lieu of buying out his share of the property; although given that she had paid both the deposit and the mortgage repayments throughout the time that they owned the property, any interest that he had in it was not financial, but purely on paper.

Miss Mackintosh has now been served with a disposition order seeking to maintain the CSA's claim on part of the value of the property to recover Mr. Hampson's maintenance arrears. His arrears now stand at £55,093, according to a phone call that my office made to the CSA MP hotline today. The inhibition order seeks to recover the £25,890, plus legal costs.

[Danny Alexander]

The case gets more complicated. In January 2005, Miss Mackintosh submitted a claim to the CSA to recover maintenance payments from Mr. Hampson—the same man—for their daughter. The Government try to encourage private agreements between partners before going to the CSA, but a private agreement that he made with Miss Mackintosh at the time of their separation in 2002 to pay £20 a week had not been honoured. As I discovered from a call to the CSA MP hotline today, Miss Mackintosh's claim has still not even been assessed, more than a year after it was first made. She delayed the claim, perhaps quite understandably given what has happened since, because she simply had no faith in the CSA process. Any MP will know that that perception is by no means unique among our constituents.

To complicate matters further, Mr. Hampson recently left the United Kingdom and moved to New Zealand. Notice of the disposition order has not been served on Mr. Hampson, because he is resident overseas—for the moment, at least. That adds a further complication to the CSA's quite legitimate work to recover maintenance from Mr. Hampson.

The situation has had a quite devastating impact on my constituent, Holly Mackintosh. As she wrote in a letter to the chairman of the CSA shortly before she contacted me:

"I have a very hectic life and the situation you have put me in is causing serious distress. I am employed by British Airways as cabin crew. I have two daughters aged 16 and 7 years. I am a single parent and have always provided for my children and honoured my bills. I thought the CSA were in place to protect women like myself, but now I find my home in jeopardy, everything I've worked for being in vain and yet again being responsible for my ex partner's debt."

The situation impacts not only on Miss Mackintosh, but on her daughters—her elder daughter, whom she will be supporting as a student, and her eight-year-old daughter from her previous relationship with Mr. Hampson. When the CSA's enforcement action lets the absent parent off scot-free after he has left the country and damages the welfare of a child for whom the CSA has failed to collect maintenance, something has gone very wrong indeed.

I undertook correspondence with the CSA following a parliamentary question that I tabled on its use of inhibition orders. The deputy chief executive of the CSA wrote to me on 22 July 2005:

"As a bill of inhibition is registered against an individual, we are unable to provide any figures as to whether the individual's property is owned partially, or wholly, by another party. However, it follows that a bill of inhibition registered against a non-resident parent whose home is wholly owned by another party would be ineffective."

In a subsequent letter he clarified that his comment would not apply to Miss Mackintosh's case, as the inhibition order was in place before she took full possession of the property. I have explained the circumstances under which that took place. In all justice, she should be considered the complete owner of the property throughout.

However, given that Miss Mackintosh separated from Mr. Hampson in 2002, a year before the inhibition order was registered, it was only an accident of timing that has left her in her current position. It is understandable, given the circumstances of the breakdown of the relationship, that other matters would have been a priority.

It is not for me simply to come here and set out the facts of the case; I am interested in the Minister's view on it. There are several matters that he might consider in relation to it. I appreciate that my constituent will have the Minister's sympathy, but one or two things could be done in addition to giving sympathy.

Section 42 of the Child Support Act 1991 makes allowances for special cases to be addressed. Subsection (1) states:

"The Secretary of State may by regulations provide that in prescribed circumstances a case is to be treated as a special case for the purposes of this Act."

Subsection (2) states:

"Those regulations may, for example, provide for the following to be special cases".

Subsection (2)(d) gives one such special case:

"a person is an absent parent in relation to more than one child and the other parent of . . . those children is not the same person".

This case is so unusual that I urge the Minister to consider using that power in relation to this case. It would be unfair of me to expect him to respond to that now. I do not expect him to promise to use it, as I understand that the matter requires some investigation and consideration, but I ask for his assurance that he will consider the case closely and thoroughly investigate the possibility of using that power. Assuming that he is willing to do that—I look forward to his response—I would be grateful if he kept me informed. He may certainly call on me to provide whatever assistance he requires to ensure that he has all the necessary information regarding the situation faced by Holly Mackintosh.

The Minister might be able to help in another way. I hope that he will clarify this point. The Secretary of State is named as the pursuer of the inhibition order. Is the Secretary of State required by the Act to take that form of enforcement action or does he have discretion to use that power? If the latter is the case, I request that he should proceed by other means and remove the inhibition order on Holly Mackintosh's home.

Now that there is a review going on of the CSA and the broader question of its reform—the Minister and I have debated that issue in previous circumstances, and I do not intend to go into that debate now—the Secretary of State has suggested that a substantial amount of the debt owed to the CSA will inevitably have to be written off. I understand the reasons for that, given the broader debate on reform of the CSA, but if that is to be the case, the most unfair debt and unjust consequences, such as those faced by Holly Mackintosh, should be amongst the first to be addressed.

Having said that, I want to make it clear that it is neither my intention nor that of Holly Mackintosh that Mr. Hampson should escape his maintenance liabilities or his responsibilities. Indeed, the main purpose of the whole debate on the CSA and its reform is to make it more effective in dealing with absent parents and making them live up to their responsibilities and pay out for their children. My purpose is to ensure fairness for Holly Mackintosh and, most importantly, her daughter.

If the inhibition order can be removed, Holly Mackintosh and I—and, I am sure, the Minister—would like Mr. Hampson to be vigorously pursued to pay his debts and discharge his responsibilities. That option might be harder for the CSA, but expecting the mother of a child to pay the debts of the absent father seems to me exactly the opposite of what the Child Support Agency was set up to do. It goes against justice in this case, against the spirit of the legislation and, indeed, against the spirit of what Parliament would wish to do to see the reformed CSA, or whatever may follow it, continue in its work. I would be grateful for the Minister's response and, I hope, persistence in seeking a fairer outcome for Holly Mackintosh.

4.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): Mr. Weir, it is a pleasure to appear before you a second time this afternoon and to continue to debate with the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander). I congratulate him on securing this debate on a subject of obvious importance to his constituent, who is fortunate to have such an assiduous local Member who will pursue her case to such a degree and bring it to the attention of Ministers in the House of Commons.

The agency has fully briefed me on the particular case, which is indeed very complex, as the hon. Gentleman has rightly set out this afternoon. I am more than happy to discuss it with him, but I am sure that he will appreciate that I am subject to some constraints on how far I can go. I also welcome the opportunity to debate child support issues more broadly, and to draw on the problems that Holly's case illustrates and to discuss, in the context of that, how we plan to take further steps towards improving the agency's operation.

As the case illustrates, the CSA often finds itself trying to deal with the complex and changeable personal circumstances of its clients—both parents with care and non-resident parents. In some cases, such as this one, we have to strike a balance between the competing needs of children from two or more families, which can be quite difficult. Ms Mackintosh is rightly concerned about making sure that her ex-partner meets his financial responsibility to her family. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman emphasised that point. She is also caught up in the consequences of her ex-partner not meeting his responsibilities to his children from a previous relationship.

Ms Mackintosh's ex-partner had children from a previous relationship but failed to pay the maintenance for those children that had been assessed by the CSA. The agency attempted to recover the money owed and eventually, as part of the enforcement action, a bill of inhibition was gained against any property that her ex-partner owned, including the property he jointly owned with Ms Mackintosh. A bill of inhibition stops the future sale or transfer of any heritable property. Heritable property includes houses, garages, business premises and land. The non-resident parent cannot sell or transfer the heritable property until they pay the debt.

Such a method of collecting debt is not exclusive to the agency. Many other financial institutions use the method to ensure that people meet their obligations. The measure is clearly not the first that anyone would use to recover outstanding debts but it is an important tool in getting people finally to face up to what they owe.

As the hon. Gentleman anticipated, I do have sympathy with Ms Mackintosh as the bill of inhibition on the property where she lives does not relate to anything she has done wrong. I believe that Ms Mackintosh contacted the agency through her solicitors both before and after the transfer of the property into her sole name to ask if the bill of inhibition could be removed. On both occasions she was informed that the bill of inhibition would still stand. Our legal advice was clear: transferring the property was against the terms of the bill of inhibition. So, even though she has my sympathy, I believe that the agency took the only realistic action. We have to balance the interests of Ms Mackintosh with those of the children of the earlier relationship.

The reason we use a bill of inhibition in Scotland, or a charging order in England and Wales, is to recover money that is owed for child support. Non-resident parents, such as Ms Mackintosh's ex-partner, should not be allowed to avoid their responsibilities to their children simply by transferring assets to someone else. If we allowed that, it would be even more difficult for the CSA to collect money owed and, consequently, even less money would be provided to support children.

The hon. Gentleman may want me to deal with the section 42 points. I am coming to those. In my view, the agency is not doing anything wrong in this case. It is using the same methods as other financial institutions in trying to recover an outstanding debt.

The hon. Gentleman referred to section 42 of the Child Support Act 1991, which allows the Secretary of State to make regulations in prescribed circumstances for special cases. That section applies to cases in which a non-resident parent has more than one child and those children live in different households, so I can understand why the hon. Gentleman was interested in it. However, section 42 is used in the ongoing assessment of child maintenance payments—that is, when there are concurrent claims for maintenance. Therefore, the section would not apply to arrears of maintenance built up by Ms Mackintosh's ex-partner before he was living with her. Section 42 would be used only to assess the ongoing maintenance entitlements of Ms Mackintosh's children and those of her ex-partner's former family.

I understand that Ms Mackintosh has a child support application of her own outstanding and that there has been delay in getting that assessment under way. I believe that the delay is due to the fact that it links with existing claims in respect of Mr. Hampson and his former wife. Added to that is the question of jurisdiction, because the non-resident parent is located in New Zealand. Furthermore, no address is held by the agency for Mr. Hampson, who has failed to provide more details despite express requests made to him before his relocation to New Zealand.

Danny Alexander: Clearly, this is a very unusual and distressing case, but I am disappointed by what the Minister said about section 42 and by his analysis—perhaps he will address this point later—of Mr. Hampson's interest in the property, given the evidence that Ms Mackintosh has provided that she paid the mortgage payments throughout and that she paid the deposit on the property. There was a time difference between her separation from Mr. Hampson and the change in ownership. It seems to me that she is being made to pay an incredibly high price for what is perhaps only a relatively small oversight.

When I last spoke to Miss Mackintosh, she put it something like this. What is the point of someone such as her continuing to work and to try to bring up and support their children when the system that is supposed to protect them lets them down? Would she not be better off going on to benefits and allowing the state to support her?

Mr. Plaskitt: As I tried to say to the hon. Gentleman earlier, this is a question of striking a very difficult balance. As he acknowledged, it would be inappropriate for either him or me in any way to condone an attempt by a non-resident parent to evade, in this case, his responsibilities to support his children from a previous relationship simply because he had the device for transferring ownership of an asset. That is why the agency has taken the action that it has.

I shall give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking. I have already looked at the scope in section 42 for doing something exceptional in these circumstances to see whether we can help his constituent. The conclusion that I have reached to date is that section 42 does not offer us such a route, for the reasons that I set out. However, I do undertake to have a further look at it in the light of what he has said this afternoon and to write to him. I do not want to offer false hope, however. I am simply saying that I am more than prepared to study the potential for opportunity under section 42. I am not making any promises, but I certainly undertake to look at it.

In respect of the point that the hon. Gentleman now raises, the critical issue is the ownership of the property and not, alas, who bore responsibility for meeting any particular costs associated with that property. The critical question is ownership; that is what was transferred, and that transfer was in conflict with the bill of inhibition.

I understand that the agency is considering the permanence of the non-resident parent's absence from the United Kingdom. If he is found to be no longer habitually resident in the United Kingdom, he is outside the jurisdiction of the Child Support Agency. However, there are still arrangements in place to help Ms Mackintosh recover maintenance payments. Reciprocal enforcement of maintenance orders are international claims for family maintenance, handled by UK courts. The UK has arrangements with more than 100 countries and territories—including New Zealand, where we understand the non-resident parent lives—to allow a person living in one jurisdiction to claim maintenance from an ex-partner living in the other.

If, as in the case before us, there is no existing Scottish court order for maintenance, a solicitor can help to prepare the appropriate papers for a provisional order. Those papers are then forwarded through the courts group to the appropriate foreign country to begin the recovery of maintenance. If Ms Mackintosh has not already taken up that option and wishes to find out more, she should contact her local sheriff clerk's office or courts group. Details of that process are also available on the Scottish Executive's website. There is a broadly similar process for England and Wales, which is managed by the Department for Constitutional Affairs.

Enforcing maintenance has always been a crucial issue in child support. Although it is true that the real problem is parents not facing up to their responsibilities, I would not attempt to claim that the agency has always been the most effective organisation in securing debt. The question is what should be done to improve the situation. As I said yesterday in a similar Westminster Hall debate, last year we asked the new chief executive of the agency, Stephen Geraghty, to conduct a root-and-branch review of the agency's operations. From his findings, we concluded that the current system was incapable of delivering the outcomes that we all desire from the Child Support Agency. The problems are not just with how the agency operates but with the policy and legislative framework that is supposed to support it. Therefore, we have also asked Sir David Henshaw to consider a complete redesign of the whole child support system. The terms of reference for his redesign have been drawn as widely as possible to allow all options for reform to be fully considered.

I know that the hon. Gentleman's party has also put forward its own proposals for a child support system, and that Sir David Henshaw has met the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws). However, I am bound to say that I have not seen anything in the Liberal Democrats' proposals that would have made any difference to the case that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey raised today.

Some have said that by asking for a redesign we are just putting off taking any action, and so children are continuing to suffer from a poorly performing agency. That would only be a fair criticism if it were true, but it is not. Mr. Geraghty's review identified a number of areas where improvements could be made in the short and medium term. That formed the basis of our operational improvement plan, which sets out how the agency's performance will be improved over the next three years. The £90 million investment for the next three years will support the recruitment and deployment of more staff to processing work and, particularly, enforcement. Over the period of the plan, we will quadruple the number of staff dedicated to enforcement activity from 500 to 2,000. We aim to increase levels of compliance from 65 per cent. to 80 per cent. by March 2009.

Danny Alexander: I appreciate that the Minister wishes to move on to make more general points about Child Support Agency reform, and indeed to make some partisan remarks about the Liberal Democrat position on the subject, but that is not a debate that I particularly wish to get into today. The nub of his response to my constituent's inquiry is effectively that the transfer of ownership was a device on the part of the non-resident parent to avoid his responsibility. I think that I have made it quite clear that my understanding, from my contact with my constituent, is that it was not such a device; it was, as it were, a tidying-up exercise from a separation that occurred much earlier. To argue that my constituent is trying to get round the rules on behalf of the non-resident parent is not right.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to interpret private decisions taken by his constituent and her former partner and will receive their interpretation of the situation. It is not for me to get involved in that. What I have to do—and what the agency has to do—is consider the facts of ownership and operate, as we must, in the interests of collecting maintenance owed to children.

In that context, the agency is bound to look at a non-resident parent's assets and what may or may not have happened to them. It will not want to accept a situation where assets are transferred, for whatever reason, when that has the effect of taking them beyond the reach of the agency and removing their value in circumstances where they could contribute towards a debt owed to children. That is and always has been the dominant factor; it is enshrined in the original legislation that brought the agency about and I am sure that that would be the principal objective of any successor organisation.

I recall, from reading the hon. Gentleman's party's document on this matter, that it too enshrines as a founding principle that the purpose is to pursue maintenance for children. It is in that context that the current law is drafted and why the agency has taken the decisions in respect of his constituents' case. Having said that, I am more than willing, once again, to look at all the existing powers that we have at our disposal, and options for discretion, to see if we can do anything differently in this case. I will write to the hon. Gentleman about that.

Returning to how we are trying to solve problems in the longer term, such as the ones that this case illustrates, we will also be considering the use of data from credit reference agencies and HM Revenue and Customs. In addition to the £90 million investment that I have already mentioned, a further £30 million will be invested in using private debt collection agencies to recover the £100 million of historic debt over the three years of the plan. Work has already begun on introducing these improvements and this will continue while Sir David is producing his redesign.

In conclusion, I believe that we all continue to support the original objectives of the Child Support Agency to make sure that parents who did not live with their children still face up to their responsibilities to support them. As we have often said, relationships may end, but responsibilities do not.

Although I understand that Miss Mackintosh finds herself in an unenviable situation, I think that the actions of the agency in this case have been correct. The ultimate aim must be to make sure that non-resident parents cannot avoid paying the money that they owe to their children.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Five o'clock.

Young People and Democracy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): I am pleased to be opening today's debate. The Order Paper said that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs would be opening the debate, but obviously it has not caught up with the—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. It was the bench note, not the Order Paper.

Bridget Prentice: I am sorry, Mr. O'Hara. The bench note said that my right hon. and learned Friend would open the debate. Obviously, we have not yet managed to spread far and wide the fact that we have changed portfolios in the Department. She now deals with justice issues, such as legal aid and family issues, while I deal with democracy issues, including electoral reform and the House of Lords.

The debate deals with the participation of young people in democracy—an issue that is incredibly important, as well as pertinent, for us all. Young people are an influential group in society because they are the future of our country and our democracy. It is therefore vital that we capture their ideas, energy and enthusiasm in respect of democratic issues. That means involving them as early as possible in discussions about what politics and democracy mean to them.

This week, the Government and other political parties have come under criticism over party funding. We are now legislating to make it compulsory for all political parties to disclose all the loans that they receive. We acknowledge that what is needed is a more transparent process, which is more in the spirit of fair democracy. A healthy representative democracy is the key to a healthy Government.

People of all ages and backgrounds should have the opportunity to debate issues that matter to them. Young people often have different views from other groups in society. It is therefore important to find a forum in which they can voice their views and those in power can listen to them. If we do not listen and respond appropriately now, there is a risk that young people will not connect with democracy now or in future.

The Electoral Commission's third audit of political engagement showed that young people have significantly lower levels of political knowledge than the rest of the population and a lower propensity to vote. The Department will be considering the report and its findings and will continue to explore the best ways to address those issues.

What, then, do we mean by the participation of young people in democracy? We can measure participation by looking at how many young people turn out to vote in elections, and the figures are pretty stark. In the 2005 general election, only 37 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds voted, and the figure was only marginally better in 2001, at 39 per cent. That compares quite dramatically with 1997, when 68 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds voted.

We need to address the startling decline in engagement and seek ways of re-engaging young people in the political process. We need to find the reasons for that decline. There are big and growing inequalities in our democracy. Evidence suggests that the young, the poor and black and other ethnic minority groups are far less likely than older, wealthier, white people to be on the electoral register, so are unable to vote. Those who fall into more than one of those categories are obviously particularly likely to be excluded from our democratic process. That is a serious problem, which must be addressed because it could undermine the legitimacy of our democracy and pose a threat to social cohesion and social inclusion.

In it's report "Understanding electoral registration", the Electoral Commission has estimated that 16 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds are not on the electoral register, compared with just 2 per cent. of over-55s. It also found that 37 per cent. of black Africans are not registered to vote, compared with just 6 per cent. of white Britons. The evidence indicates that young people are disengaged and/or apathetic, but that is not a fair reflection. Young people are not disengaged and/or apathetic, and my experience as a constituency MP shows that when an issue matters to them, those who have the opportunity to make a difference get involved and want their voices heard.

In my own borough, the local authority has been doing fantastic, innovative work with young people to engage them in the democratic process. Ours is the only borough that is doing that, and once I have told hon. Members about some of the things that are going on, I hope that they will take them back to their areas and persuade their local authorities to do something similar.

Last October, for example, Lewisham saw the election of its second young mayor. The election is a way for young people in the borough to have a real say in its future and to make a real difference. Unfortunately, the young mayor could not be in Parliament today, because he also has to attend school from time to time. We had 33 candidates at the election, which is a healthy indication of our young people's democratic engagement and their healthy appetite for involvement. Polling stations were set up in every school in the borough to allow students to elect their second young mayor. Throughout the day, 11 to 17-year-olds were offered registration forms to complete and return. Wilf Petherbridge from Forest Hill school won the election and was declared the young mayor after a hard-fought campaign. He will be in office for a year and has been given a budget of £25,000 to spend on issues that really matter to young people in Lewisham. Last year, in addition to the money given by the local authority, the borough's first young major raised an equivalent amount to set up a music studio for young people in the borough.

It will perhaps be of even more interest to hon. Members to know that the turnout for the young mayor election in October was 46.9 per cent., which was 21.4 per cent. higher than the turnout for the election of the borough's mayor. The enthusiasm of the candidates, students, parents, teachers and the general public was overwhelming. Clearly when it matters to them, young people can be engaged and will turn out to vote, and there may be a lesson there for us all.

[Bridget Prentice]

In Lewisham and other areas of England and Wales we also have the young citizens panel, which is an extension of the citizens panel. A group of about 300 young people can be called on to work with the council, the young mayor, health services, the police and others to help address issues that affect young people. Recent issues that have affected young people in Lewisham include teenage pregnancy and drugs. I see that the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) is here, and he will have great sympathy on those issues. As the MP for a neighbouring constituency, he will know that young people in his area face much the same issues.

Another event, which took place in the borough this week, was "My Voice, My Vote, My Community", which was organised by the Economic and Social Research Council. It was an opportunity for questions to be taken from an audience of all ages, including young people from south London schools. It was part of the national social science week and its aim was to give people an insight into some of the country's leading research and the influence that it has, and will have, on our social, economic and political lives.

Those are some examples of what is happening in my local area. They could be reproduced in other areas throughout the country. They show that young people will happily engage in the democratic process if they are given the opportunity. I am delighted to say that as a result of some of that work, Lewisham council has been justly rewarded with a beacon award for positive youth engagement.

Black and ethnic minority communities are young communities in many ways, and we must do more to engage those under-represented groups. This morning, with politicians from all parties, I attended the launch in Parliament of Operation Black Vote, a project initiated by the Electoral Commission. I have taken part in the scheme before and I was delighted to take part today in my new ministerial role. I commend the scheme to any Member who has not been involved with it. The aim is to improve the political representation of black and minority ethnic communities in local and national politics, and we should do what we can to further that aim.

From those examples, I am not persuaded that the levels of disengagement are based on apathy. In fact, research by MORI in 2003 into attitudes of the group it calls disaffected youth suggests that the issue is more about disaffection. It concludes that young people do not make the connection between their personal dissatisfaction with a particular issue and the use of traditional political processes as a way of expressing that dissatisfaction or of seeking a solution to those problems.

Our challenge is to find ways to bridge the disconnection between young people's civic interests and activities, and the formal processes of democracy. I shall give the House a couple of examples of how we might do that. The Electoral Administration Bill is going through the House, and to help tackle under-registration, we have included key measures in the Bill. We have also made available £2.5 million to support a new power to encourage electoral participation. It is intended that that money will enable returning officers and electoral registration officers in England and Wales to undertake promotional activity, such as posters, leaflets and outreach work, to encourage registration and participation in elections locally. We are also legislating to let parents take children into the polling booth, so that children can see their parents vote and how the voting process works.

The Electoral Commission's research after the 2005 general election found that younger age groups were much less likely to turn out to vote. It also highlighted lower turnout in urban areas and among the most socially deprived. The 1824 Collective campaign in London, which has just finished, was aimed at getting more of the capital's young people registered to vote. The campaign involved collaborative work with the Greater London Assembly, the Mayor's office, the Electoral Commission, Operation Black Vote, the Commission for Racial Equality and London Electoral Administration, and it received support through association with young musicians from the city. The success of this campaign is being evaluated. It involved going to the places where people are, rather than using the traditional ways of getting the message across. It used the radio media that young people listen to and it went into the organisations in which they are involved.

My Department is also funding the Hansard Society's Heads Up website, which targets young people and hosts consultations on a variety of topics. It encourages, supports and enables young people to participate in democratic processes, such as the development of Government policy and Acts of Parliament.

The local democracy campaign, launched last month, aims to make councils more relevant and useful to young people by encouraging them to "Take Part Take Power". It will be expanded into a year-round campaign to increase young people's awareness of their power to shape their community.

Following the low election turnout at the 2001 general election, the YVote?/YNot? project was launched. Its aim was to seek young people's views on the reasons behind the increase in youth disengagement from democratic processes. It consulted 60 young people from diverse backgrounds throughout England and concluded that young people wanted politicians to address them in a language that they could understand, not surprisingly, and to be kept informed at all times. They wanted to make citizenship education a priority on the curriculum, and for schools and colleges to receive the support they needed to deliver it. They wanted politicians to talk to them directly, regularly and in their own environment—not just at election times.

I was pleased when those young people said that they wanted citizenship to be a much more important part of the curriculum. We must address whether we are giving teachers all the resources that they need to do so. I thought that the message was beginning to get across, because—possibly unlike other Members present—I am an avid fan of "Coronation Street". If I cannot see it because I am in Parliament, I tape it so I can watch it later in the week.

If Members have not watched "Coronation Street", they might get lost at this point, but they should bear with me. A few weeks ago, David and Gail Platt were having a mother and son teenage argument. She was concerned, because she thought that he was getting involved in drugs. He was being a sulky teenager in response, but he turned to his mother and said: "You're in no position to tell me about drugs. Look at the alcohol you drink." He proceeded to tell her just how many brain cells she was losing each day by drinking copious amounts of alcohol, and the effect that different drugs—not only cannabis, but smoking—had on different people. When she looked at him in astonishment because he had all those facts at his fingertips, he said: "But I learn this in citizenship classes." The message is getting out.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for raising the issue of "Coronation Street". Does she agree that Gail's lifestyle has also contributed to David's potential use of drugs? It has hardly been the most stable over the past few years.

Bridget Prentice: Much as I would enjoy analysing the different events in "Coronation Street", I agree with the hon. Lady: Gail's lifestyle may well have had a direct impact on David's attitude. Nevertheless, the point that I wanted to emphasise was that citizenship classes engage young people, and we need to work harder at promoting them and ensuring that they have all available resources.

That brings me neatly to the Government's citizenship education programme, encouraging pupils' understanding of citizenship through active participation in community projects and discussions about controversial issues. It is important that we do more to prepare school children for their life beyond the classroom and for the role that they will have to play as citizens of this country.

One main outcome of the YVote?/YNot? project was the encouragement of MPs to visit local schools and youth groups. Last month, my right hon. and learned Friend visited Southwark college to encourage students to register in time to vote in May's council elections. She informed them that unless more young people register to vote, Parliament risks neglecting their concerns in favour of those who do register. We would be in danger of going down the road of those who shout loudest getting what they want. Democratic engagement is crucial for everyone.

During voter registration week in October each year in my constituency, the electoral services team visits the sixth form colleges and schools throughout the borough, makes a short presentation on the importance of registering, and provides information on how politics affects young people. The students are then offered an application form to complete and their names are added to the register effective from 1 December that year. We need to encourage and promote more such initiatives to ensure that young people get involved and stay involved in our democracy.

Another example is the UK Youth Parliament, which helps young people to develop into active citizens and is a valuable route through which local and national decision makers can hear young people's voices. Participation in the YVote? mock elections run by the Hansard Society encourages greater interest and engagement in the process by young people. Pupils are encouraged to stand as candidates, form election teams and run election campaigns that mirror the real election process. Members are given the opportunity to vote and therefore experience what I like to think is the excitement of participating in an election.

Another initiative, led by the Home Office, is the cross-Government "Together We Can" action plan, which is about giving people more control over their lives and communities. One strand of that is aimed at ensuring that young people are given the opportunity to participate in and influence decision making as confident and responsible citizens in a range of policy areas.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): I recently discovered that the Government had allocated more than half a million pounds to Wandsworth council to spend on young people's activities. How does my hon. Friend the Minister envisage a council such as Wandsworth engaging with young people in Tooting, for example, to find out the facilities on which they would like that money to be spent?

Bridget Prentice: I am delighted that the Government have made that money available. I am not entirely sure how a council such as Wandsworth might go about using it. I suggest that it does some of the things that Labour-led Lewisham has been doing to engage young people. The one thing that will ensure disengagement is a patronising attitude and a council not engaging directly with the young people for whom the money has been made available. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan), being involved himself in the democratic process, would be a good ambassador for the council to use to ensure that young people in Tooting get the decision-making opportunity that they deserve.

The Power inquiry has received a fair amount of publicity recently. It was set up by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation to investigate how political participation and involvement might be increased and deepened. It explored some of the causes of disillusionment and examined new approaches to political participation. The report was launched a couple of weeks ago and we very much welcome its contribution to the debate. It makes a wide range of recommendations and tries to deal with a number of cultural and structural issues. Some recommendations relate directly to young people. For example, the Power inquiry suggests that the voting and candidacy ages should be reduced to 16. The Government, in the context of our wish to boost voter registration and participation, are keeping that matter under consideration.

I should be upfront at this point and say that I was at Southwark college—the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey may have been there at the time—just before the last election. I said that I personally—I emphasise "personally"—see an argument for votes at 16. Good heavens, does that mean that I am not being controversial? I do not know. Anyway, the Government are keeping an open mind on the issue. Of course we have moved some way towards that because the Electoral Administration Bill going through Parliament reduces the candidacy age from 21 to 18, so we have made a start.

Mr. Khan: Before my hon. Friend finishes dealing with the report by the Power commission, may I ask her whether she was as relieved and reassured as I was when it talked about red herrings and said:

"Disengagement is NOT caused by ... the supposedly low calibre and probity of politicians"?

Bridget Prentice: We can all be delighted that the Power inquiry came to that conclusion. Sometimes when people see politicians at close quarters and some of the things that we are engaged in, they realise that we are not nearly as bad as we are sometimes painted.

We have made a start with the Electoral Administration Bill, the 1824 Collective campaign, the analysis and recommendations by the Power inquiry and the local democracy campaign, but more can and must be done. Politicians and political parties obviously have a vital role to play in our democracy. The Electoral Commission emphasised, even in the discussions about the controversy over funding of political parties, that political parties are an essential element of our democratic process. It is also important to remember that the political and democratic engagement of young people in our society is an issue for all of us to tackle on a non-partisan basis. This morning's launch of Operation Black Vote was a good example of that. We will deal with the problem properly only by working together.

I am delighted to have opened this debate and I look forward to hearing contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. I assure them that all contributions will be received positively and the Government will do what we can to use them to help us engage young people more in future.

2.57 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate the Minister on some of the activities in her constituency, which are quite well publicised, especially those involving the young mayor. I hope that that model can be spread throughout the country.

Whenever we talk about participation in democracy by young people, I always think it useful to examine briefly the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. We can often look at those rights in terms of the three "Ps": protection, provision and participation. We have done a lot of work on protection and provision but, in the past, we have neglected participation. Now, we are coming up with more and more projects to increase participation. It is important that we have young people's participation to ensure service delivery to our young people, who are important consumers of those services. The important area of protection also has to be addressed.

The Minister mentioned the 2003 MORI focus group report, which clearly identified that young people were not disaffected in the widest sense of the word. They had strong opinions and wanted to express them. However, there is a lack of a link between that and participating in the way that we are probably talking about primarily this afternoon.

In the previous Parliament, I was privileged to attend the launch of a Barnardo's project entitled, "Give us a chance". It involved a lot of information gathering and talking about issues of service delivery and participation by young people. One of my favourite quotes from that project illustrates the problem a little. It rather summarises what we in Parliament are here to do. A 14-year-old from Northern Ireland said:

"There have to be rules. If there were no rules then the whole place would go nuts. If there were no rules, there would be people getting murdered and everything. I know it is crap, but you have to have the law."

That is a great challenge to us to get right to the heart of the matter, get the rules right for young people and get their full engagement in determining those rules in the first place. It is the very directness of young people that we should value when trying to improve participation in our communities.

A great deal has happened through youth councils and youth forums, probably in almost every constituency, but that is still only the tip of the iceberg. A particular initiative in my local area is that when there is any consultation on a council matter, buddies work through the youth forum, and young people can communicate their views through one of those buddies. Their views are then translated so that there is full participation during any consultation undertaken by the council, which is helpful because the language we use in Parliament or in council might be a barrier to the way in which young people would like to express themselves directly. I can only emphasise that we need to go much further and continue to think outside the box about how we can fully engage young people.

Unsurprisingly, I am in favour of votes at 16 and a commitment to introduce that would be a real catalyst for change. I was heartened just now to hear the Minister say that the matter is continually under review; there was not a definitive "no", which I take to be encouraging. This is a pleasant debate to take part in because we have a number of people who share the same views. I welcome the call for cross-party co-operation.

Why is it so important to work towards votes at 16? There are many obvious examples of what else one can do at 16. For instance, why should young people not be able to vote at that age if they are expected to pay taxes? It is important to capture young people when they are young and have an interest. We have a real bedrock of citizenship education running all the way through a young person's education; it is the critical time, which is why we need to start planning for votes at 16.

I rather regret the fact that citizenship classes—we used to call them something else—have disappeared. During the Thatcher years, they were not seen as a good thing to have in the curriculum. Many years ago, there used to be a lot of political debate and discussion, but somehow it got squeezed out and it has been important for the Government to take a lead on the issue.

Mr. Khan: After the campaign, such as Make Poverty History or the anti-war campaign, is it fair to say that there is not discussion and debate among young people? Is that not a bit patronising?

Annette Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, but I do not think that I made a patronising comment. I did not say that there was a lack of interest among young people. However, citizenship education makes a link with the formal processes, which is a foundation. The hon. Gentleman's point about the participation in Make Poverty History is relevant; it was incredibly moving to see young people right at the forefront of that.

Moving fairly quickly to the formal processes involved, although I accept the informal side of the matter and how much there is to galvanise young people already, voting early is all important. An interesting piece of research was carried out by the Social Market Foundation, which reflects something we probably all know from canvassing and voting data that we have. The research shows that there is a "birth effect" in voting, with those who turned 18 just before a general election being much more likely to vote than those who have to wait another four or five years.

I am sure that we are all aware of that because it becomes harder, the more time that has passed, to persuade someone to vote. It is interesting what a physical barrier the fear of going into a polling station or acquiring a postal vote is, even among some adults. We are looking to remove barriers, rather than suggesting that young people are not interested. They are interested because so many issues directly affect them. Capturing them early is all important.

The Minister made many important points, specifically about the generic term "young people"; there are differing rates of participation for all sorts of reasons among different groups of young people. That clearly requires detailed analysis, and appropriate measures and projects must be targeted in those areas. We all need to be conscious of that. If we are to have a truly socially cohesive society, it is important to consider this topic right across the board.

I am sure that we are aware of projects in school such as mock elections. We can see the political engagement involved, but outside of the relatively few young people who participate, there is a big gap, which it is our duty as politicians to fill locally by giving whatever support we can, but also by giving a clear lead nationally. It is a question not just of listening to young people, but of acting to show that their views are taken on board, however they are expressed. Knowing that something makes a difference is half the battle. It is our responsibility to ensure that we show respect and that people can see we are here for positive reasons.

3.7 pm

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate. I am even more pleased that I was able to be present at this morning's Operation Black Vote and Electoral Commission shadowing scheme event, which the Minister talked about in her introduction. I congratulate her on the widening of her portfolio to include electoral reform, House of Lords reform and party funding, as of the close of business yesterday. I am not sure what they will be by the close of business today. That portfolio is challenging, but I am sure that she agrees it is an exciting one at this juncture in the development of our democracy.

There clearly is a huge problem with young people's participation in democracy. When the Minister kicked off the debate, she mentioned that in the last general election only 37 per cent. of those aged between 18 and 24 bothered to vote. That is a slight decrease from 39 per cent. in 2001, and she mentioned that 68 per cent. of young people voted in 1997. That is a cause for huge concern to all of us, and it is one of the reasons why it is apt to have this important debate today..

However, work has been done on the decrease in young people's participation in mainstream policy. For example, the presentation given by the Electoral Commission touched on two reports of recent times. Its report of 2003 considered political engagement in ethnic minority communities, and in 2004 there was an update, looking at political engagement among young people. The writing has been on the wall for some time. The main point that seems to be coming from the commission's work is that we wish political parties looked a bit more like us, and that reflects issues of both gender and age.

I was pleased—the Minister touched on this at the presentation—that there was a sea change in 1997, which meant that for the first time the number of women MPs reached three digits. To a large extent, that was thanks to the all-women shortlist policy imposed by my party in the lead-up to 1997. We see the fruits of that in any Question Time in the Chamber, where women on the Government Front Bench are taking part in important decisions for our democracy.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is also wonderful to see so many women MPs from all parties in the House and on both Front Benches? Does he also agree that although the Labour party pursued one way of increasing women's representation, there are other ways of doing that, such as the participatory methods that he outlined and which Operation Black Vote launched today? I brought my shadow with me to observe the debate and I am sure that she will find it interesting.

Mr. Khan: I welcome that intervention by the youngest Member of Parliament. The hon. Lady is right. OBV and the Electoral Commission want to encourage, in a mature and non-patronising way, young people and those from disadvantaged backgrounds to take part in democracy. That is what the programme is about.

Post 2005, we saw the highest number of ethnic minority parliamentarians in the House—13 on the Labour Benches and two on the Conservative Benches—and we all welcome that. It is slightly unfortunate that the Liberal Democrats lost their one ethnic minority MP, but progress is being made, albeit slowly.

A question that is worth asking is one that I posed in an intervention in a slightly more discourteous way than I intended: are young people really as apathetic as they are alleged to be? The answer is clearly no. There is no evidence of that, but there is clear evidence from statistics that they fail to engage in the party political system by voting in general elections. The Power commission report is interesting, but I am reluctant to quote from it because it is against politicians cherry-picking parts of its report. It said that cherry-picking is "a folly repeated time and time again by our political masters" and will not work. However, I will quote from it because I quite like some parts of it, but not other parts, which is life.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The hon. Gentleman may not want to do so now, but I hope he will later reveal which progressive ideas that he as a progressive Member of Parliament has not yet signed up to. I would be very surprised if there was anything in the report that he opposes in his heart of hearts.

Mr. Khan: I agree with the report's point that it is a red herring to say that politicians are of low calibre and lack probity. As a progressive politician, I passionately agree with that. However, I disagree with its comment that an overtly negative news media is not to blame for some of the disillusionment of young people and people generally. The media have a large role to play and I sometimes wonder whether their sole motive is to portray all politicians as being sinister rather than as people who seek to serve the public by going into politics because they believe in a certain ethos, value and vision of society.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Is it not politicians who bring down other politicians in people's eyes? The press report only what we say about each other. Is that not the big issue?

Mr. Khan: I wish that that was the case. I feel like a greybeard after nine months in Parliament, but the suggestion that the media simply report what we do is, frankly, disingenuous and not the case, although it pains me to say so.

The Power commission accepted that the British public are not apathetic and referred to clear evidence of involvement in pressure politics. For example, the number of people signing petitions, supporting consumer boycotts and joining campaign groups has grown significantly in recent years. I mentioned the Make Poverty History campaign because the report gave an example of the mass public, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister coming together on an issue that is dear to the hearts of many people.

Since I was 15, I have been knocking on doors for the party that I have been a member of since then and never before has making poverty history been the sort of issue that it was during the last general election. That is a testament to the public and young people in particular getting involved in politics, but not necessarily party politics. The fact that the Conservative party now talks about Africa in terms other than how much money we can make out of it is a testament to young people changing the way in which we discuss politics, poverty and development.

The Power commission also referred to the reasons for the decline in formal politics and the fact that it began in earnest after the 1997 general election. The report is worthy of reading because it made an international comparison and the reality is that it is a problem for most of the western developed world. It is not unique to this country. We can learn lessons and teach other western countries about participation of young people in politics and try to use that as a way of levering them into party politics and democracy.

The Power commission discussed voting at 16 and received publicity on that. There were murmurings from my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) when the Minister referred to her personal view that voting at 16 may not be a bad thing. My concern about that is that there is a danger that it may be a gimmick to get out of the bigger problem that many people over 18 do not vote. The debate is about engaging young people in democracy, but there is a crisis with those over 18 who do not take part in mainstream politics.

One reason for that is that politics is not accessible to the general public. Our language—I cannot say Ed Miliband and must say my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North—is one reason why the public do not understand what we are talking about. The fact that we must refer to people in the third person is a source of concern. Most people in my constituency of Tooting, which is less than five miles away, have not been to the Palace of Westminster and do not realise how accessible it is. That is also a source of concern.

I shall give an example of the problem. Recently, I was approached by an organisation that wanted to organise a promotion by a young music band for young people taking part in democracy. I rang the Serjeant at Arms to find out whether the band could use a room to promote the CD and was told that music is not allowed on the Estate, which meant that the event could not be held in the Palace of Westminster. I then thought of the wheeze of holding it in College gardens across the road, where there would be a backdrop of Parliament. I rang the Director of the Estate and was told, after to-ing and fro-ing, that it could happen if there were fewer than 12 people, if props were not used on the grass and so on, and that there would be a charge of £250 per hour for the promo to get people to vote. I was then told to contact Victoria park gardens.

The matter went on and on and eventually the organisation that wanted to hold the event to persuade people to vote at elections decided to pull the plug and not to hold it. It is a sad story. I tease the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), whenever I see him by saying that one reason why I became involved in politics was that he managed to get Alicia Keys to Parliament to perform. I suspect that that is why there is now a ban on music. I thought that if I could meet lots of pop stars by being an MP, I should become one. The point is that Alicia Keys and musicians are able to access an audience that we cannot. I am not suggesting that all of us or any of us should go on "Big Brother" or "The Games", although one hon. Member is involved in "The Games" and I wish her luck in her competition, but that may not be the best way of making politics more accessible. There are problems with the place where democracy is seen to take place, because it is not accessible to a significant number of our constituents.

Simon Hughes: We can debate which programmes advance the cause of politicians. I have not seen any previous episodes of "The Games" but, having watched it last night and seen my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) take part in the curling competition and ending up in second place overall, I thought the good news was that it regularly reported her as having taken part in the Budget debate. It linked her day job and that activity in a positive and useful way.

Mr. Khan: I agree. The programme also mentioned the special helicopter laid on to take her from London to Sheffield and back, but I will not go into that.

Before we leave the point about politics not engaging young people—the Heineken dilemma—it is worth mentioning that we need to find a way of reaching those parts of our community that we have hitherto not been able to reach, including the hip-hop generation, people in our mosques, those who follow football and sports teams, and so on.

My hon. Friend the Minister talked about the citizenship curriculum and how we could use that as a way of getting people involved, and engaging and teaching them about politics and the community. For me, the reason it is so important to do that was compounded by what happened on 7 July 2005. Not only did those four people kill themselves and 52 Londoners, and injure 700 people, but they were born and raised in this country. They went to our schools and, to all intents and purposes, were integrated, but they thought that the only recourse that they had was to commit an act of terror against their fellow citizens.

When I was involved in the task force, going around the country speaking to people, I discovered how disengaged they felt from the process. They thought that their Government and politicians were not engaging with them on simple issues to do with foreign policy, why we do certain things, why certain things happen and their knowledge of the political process. That is an example of the extreme end of the spectrum of what can happen when politics is completely disengaged from the lives of ordinary people.

I conclude with two points, the first of which is the routes to becoming a politician, MP or councillor. As things are structured—they have been like this for a while—politics is a profession that someone can get into only if they are a person of means. When people have applied to me to become an intern, I have been surprised that unless they are the son or daughter of a middle-class parent or have other means, it is impossible for them to do the work of shadowing a parliamentarian and learning about the trade, although that is perhaps not surprising when one considers that interns work for free.

The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) referred to the OBV scheme. One of the beauties of that scheme and the Electoral Commission scheme is that they involve people of low means who would otherwise not have a chance to shadow MPs. Standing as a parliamentary candidate for a political party is an arduous process, requiring people to give up their jobs for 12 to 14 weeks. The challenge is this: how many working-class politicians will be standing for political parties in winnable seats in four or five years' time? I am concerned that the number will fall.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Minister talked about those who shout the loudest having their voices heard. That is a concern, but the real travesty—all three parties deserve blame for this and should take responsibility for it—is that, in our quest to get the vote in marginal seats in middle England, we may have neglected those parts of the country that our party thought formed our core support. That has led to the rise of the British National party and the 19 councillors that we now have from a far-right party. People have lost all respect for their politicians and are disengaged.

The reason the debate is so important is that an opportunity has been opened up to us by the citizenship classes in our schools and via a new generation of young MPs who were elected in 2005 and who are engaged in their communities—I see evidence of that from all three parties represented in the Chamber today. The challenge for us is to ensure that our young communities get more engaged in politics in the lead-up to the next general election than they have been in the last two.

3.23 pm

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): It is often still asked, "Where were you when Kennedy was assassinated?"—I do not mean the local events among the Liberal Democrats, but back in 1963. I know where I was: at the town hall in Hastings, speaking as a member of the youth council. Some people think it a bit sad that one should be so engaged, and that young people today are very different and do not behave in that way. I am not so sure. Young people today are just as keen to get involved in politics, but they are not so keen to get involved in party politics. They certainly have an opinion and if given the opportunity, they will express it.

The trouble is that young people are put off by we oldies. We say that they do not have experience, but the truth is that all young people have experiences that we do not have. They know what it is like to live as a young person in 2006. They know what it is like to be on the street. They know about drugs. Many of us are simply unaware of that sort of activity. They know how they feel about the police and sometimes they know what it is like to be looking for accommodation, so we should celebrate it when young people get involved.

Rather like the Minister, I want to talk about what has been going on in my constituency and why it is important to encourage the participation of young people in the political process. We have had an excellent youth council in Hastings and Rye—it has not run since 1963 until today, but come and gone, although today we have an excellent council once again. The schools and the youth organisations choose their representatives and, most importantly, have a formal link with Hastings borough council. The issue is therefore not just about young people's concerns, but the wider concerns that they discuss and which might be thought of as adult.

My hon. Friend the Minister gave Lewisham a plug, so I want to give a plug to the Labour Hastings borough council, under the leadership of Jeremy Birch. The council should be applauded for its work with the youth council. It provides the youth council with a full-time worker and a budget of £16,000—not as much as in Lewisham—but with £6,000 for the young people to decide how it is spent. They make those decisions and they spend the money wisely.

Just recently the youth council conducted a survey involving the bus service, although they did not do that just by themselves, but linked with the seniors forum to produce their report. It was discovered—oddly, some would say—that young people and older people often had common interests. They had the same concerns about the buses not running late enough and about the safety of standing around at a bus stop late at night. The survey was a great example of young people's experience helping to form a policy and perhaps making some changes in the decisions that were subsequently made.

The young people's council also has regular two-monthly meetings in session with the borough council. There is an exchange of views, in which the members meet up, talk and discuss the various issues. In fact, last month the young people's council went in for speed dating with Hastings borough council. That was not something that I would expect to happen, but each youth councillor and each member of the borough council spent three minutes together, exchanging views. Actually getting a view over in three minutes is a lesson for politicians, and that is the point: young people are impatient to express their views. They want to express them, but often the way in which we engage with them prevents that from happening.

The youth council's next project, again in conjunction with the seniors forum, is a crime and safety film, which is to be produced by a local TV station. The lesson is clear. If young people are offered opportunities, they will get involved and come up with conclusions that can help the wider community too.

Likewise, I recently attended the hustings for members of the Youth Parliament. The Youth Parliament has been mentioned, but it does not receive the publicity that it deserves. It was launched in the House of Commons as long ago as 1999 and there are now 300 elected MYPs, aged between 11 and 18. They represent young men and women across the nation, and they tend to be a heck of a lot more representative than we are. There is a goodly number from ethnic minorities, and some members have physical or even learning difficulties, yet still they become MYPs. How come we cannot learn from that?

The year before last, the MYP for Hastings and Rother was a chap called Phil Carey. I mention his name because I was surprised and pleased to note that the Power report was published last week with his name on it, as one of the youth representatives on the commission playing a part in advancing engagement in the political process. He was able to achieve that position through the Youth Parliament.

The week before last, I was invited to attend the declaration of poll for this year's MYP for Hastings and Rother. The campaign was impressive, resulting in a victory for Luke Springthorpe, a 16-year-old from St. Leonards, followed closely by his deputy MYP Nicole Pavitt, a 14-year-old from the Grove school in Hastings. Incidentally, it might not be a bad idea for us to have deputies. It is a heck of a job this MP business, but MYPs share it. They allow a deputy to take over when exams or other things get in the way.

What impressed me about the campaign was the dedication of the candidates to the issues in hand. Anti-bullying, which we hardly talk about in the House, was a key issue in the campaign materials of almost every young person in the campaign. One might expect some of the other issues that were addressed to arise, such as the environment, but another issue that came up was asylum seekers—not Daily Mail front-page issues, but how young people really feel about people who come to this country. They wanted to engage in a—I do not like to use the word liberal—progressive way in meeting people from overseas.

Those are adult issues, not kids' issues. I believe that when young people are given the opportunity to do so, they will engage in that way. We should therefore encourage groups such as the UK Youth Parliament to play a fuller part in our democratic process. Perhaps we should invite them here to the Houses of Parliament more often. Three or four years ago, when I suggested in the main Chamber that perhaps at the weekends or in the evenings when we were not using the green Benches, the UK Youth Parliament might do so, there were cries of horror. One Member said, "It would be treason to allow young people to sit on the green Benches if they have not been elected." They have been elected, but to a different Parliament. That sort of initiative might be just a gesture, but it is important that we make gestures to show young people that adult politicians in this Parliament care about what they say.

I have found it useful, in my work as an MP, to work with my MYP. I think that they have found it useful too. I have conducted joint surgeries and question-and-answer sessions with their peers. They enjoy being part of that process and finding that we have methods to bring about outcomes that they would not be able to effect in isolation.

I mention those experiences because it is important to appreciate that people such as Phil Carey, Luke Springthorp, Nicole Pavitt and others will one day be making decisions for us. It is not just about them; it is about us too. I rather like the amusing little sign that goes in the back of cars that says, "Be kind to your children, they'll be choosing your nursing home." Young people will choose our future as well as theirs, so it is important that we do not have a disengaged group of young people who find our values alien. We respect their values, of course, but it would be nice to feel that we have common values. We have to engage them, respect their opinions and, to some extent at least, take note of what they say.

It has been mentioned that back in the 2001 election, just 39 per cent. of young people aged between 18 and 24 voted. That number dropped to 37 per cent. in 2005. Some young people were asked why they were uninterested and did not vote. The survey suggested that it was simply party politics that they were not interested in. They were interested in the issues, but did not see party politics as the answer. Obviously, the parties have failed to make party politics relevant to meeting young people's genuine concerns. Engagement could be the starting point. We should welcome young people's contributions, experience and, perhaps, wisdom, but, above all, for sure, treating them with respect is a good starting point.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I call the Lib Dem spokesperson to speak out of order because he has to attend a meeting with the Lord Chancellor shortly.

3.33 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am grateful, Mr. O'Hara, to you for calling me now. I hope hon. Members understand that we sometimes have conflicting duties, but my colleagues will be here and I hope to be back by the end.

I am grateful to have this opportunity and for the measured, helpful and constructive way in which the Minister introduced the debate. I formally welcome her to her new responsibilities, and ask her formally to pass on—I will do it informally when I can—our thanks to my neighbour, the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman), the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, who took her responsibilities in that job extremely seriously and performed them energetically, for which I, and others, are grateful. I was particularly happy to participate with her in the efforts to build up the number of young people who participate in the London local authority elections this May, and the initiatives that the Department and the right hon. and learned Lady took to try to reach the 18 to 24 age group. I hope that they will bear some fruit. It is in all our interests to have more young people voting.

The Minister was right to say that in 40 years, the participation of groups such as young people, black people, people from ethnic minority communities and poor people has gone from being high to being low. As the right hon. and learned Lady regularly says, our duty is to try to engage them all in the process. The debate is a small part of that discussion.

My next point follows exactly from the point that the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster) made at the end of his speech. The more respect that we give to young people, the more they will treat democracy with respect. I am troubled by a series of adverts that I have seen—I have not taken this up with the authorities yet—about safer communities. I do not know whether other hon. Members have seen them, but they ask, "Can you spot the difference," and have two almost identical pictures and make the point that one community is safer than the other. I was troubled that the implication was that the safer community picture was the one that did not have three youngsters with hoods on sitting on a bench in a park. That sends completely the wrong message. There is nothing to suggest that they were not sitting there entirely innocently, passing the time of day with other people in the park. We must get those messages right. Perhaps with other colleagues, across the House, we can ensure that such mistakes are not made.

I have a list of tributes to give, because many people have done a lot of work on this subject. It would be wrong not to acknowledge, as the Minister did, a whole litany of people, which I shall do briefly. Over the years, Governments have worked hard on this. I have a friend who worked in government for a while, dealing with young people's affairs, who tried hard to ensure that government kept thinking of imaginative ways to approach the problem. It is a frustrating, difficult system to move, and government moves quite slowly, but many people in it work hard.

Political parties try hard. We are challenged all the time and respond in different ways, but it is not for lack of trying to recruit, engage and involve young people. My hon. Friend the Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) might be able to add a more topical, up-to-date word on that from her recent experiences. In that context, I pay tribute to our youth and student movement, which is an active, energetic, engaged and effective group of people in our party, who sometimes cause the leadership difficulty, and sometimes not, but that is their role, which is important.

In this building, the parliamentary education unit regularly arranges events. Not many weeks ago, I sat where you are, Mr. O'Hara, chairing a debate that it organised among schools from all over the country, to which many of us were invited to participate. The unit perpetually seeks to educate people, and does a good job.

There is a list of organisations to which I want to pay tribute, such as the British Youth Council and the UK Youth Parliament, which is increasingly strong and effective. Like the Minister, I was at the British Museum recently with many Ministers and spokespeople from the main parties engaging with people from all over the UK. They were positive and lively sessions. The Citizens Foundation national Youth Parliament has done good work, and the Hansard Society perpetually challenges. It holds huge events in Westminster Hall with thousands of people who are really positive and engaged. I am sure that you, Mr. O'Hara, and many others, will have participated in such events.

Other organisations that I want to mention are: the Children's Rights Alliance, which lobbied us today; the YMCA and YWCA, which have recently been much more active with such things; and the Electoral Reform Society, which is based in my constituency and always seeks to ensure that people are engaged.

I join others in paying tribute to the Commission for Racial Equality, Operation Black Vote, and the Hindu Forum of Britain, all of which have set up mentoring schemes. I have mentored two young people through the CRE-OBV scheme, one of whom would, I hope, say that the experience was positive enough to put him seriously back on course to do the career that he planned. He is a young, Mancunian of Pakistani background, who had dropped out of university, but who has now got into Cambridge. Hopefully, he will come back into the political process.

The other person I mentored was a young Chinese guy from north London, who is very involved in community activities. I have just agreed to take on a young woman who has an interesting new job to do with the 2012 bid—she is a black woman who is originally from Birmingham, or the west midlands, but has settled in London—and a young Hindu woman.

It is important that we do our job here. If we are to change the gender balance of Parliament and to have a Parliament that looks like Britain, we need to take positive steps, not just passive steps. The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) is right. I would predict that applications to work here, which we all receive, are largely from males rather than females and disproportionately from white, middle-class males. I take active steps to ensure that the outcome is not like the input, otherwise we would have a very unrepresentative succession.

Work experience is another good opportunity. We all probably offer work experience to schools in our constituencies and to others. Sometimes the photocopying gets a bit tedious, and other tasks can be as well, but for those interested in politics it can be useful. A young lad at the Hindu Forum launch yesterday said, "I'm really keen to come and do some work experience." That has now been fixed up and he will come later in the year.

I pay tribute to local councils, many of which do a good job. Lewisham is one of the leaders and I pay tribute to it. I did not know about Hastings borough council. I know that my borough, Southwark, which is next to the Minister's borough of Lewisham, has increasingly done more. As well as having a youth forum and such things, which are important for engaging young people, it has made efforts that I hope are evidence of political commitment. It is difficult to check such statistics, but I think that when the current administration in Southwark took control four years ago—they happen to be colleagues of mine—it was the youngest administration in the country, with an average age in their early 30s. When I say that to many of our colleagues who run local councils around the country, they recoil in horror. They often have no members in their early 30s, let alone have it as their average age. It is important that we ensure that people in that energetic period of their life can participate in the running of our local authorities; I pay tribute to those authorities for that. Stockport is another that has been positive.

There are also individuals around this room, and others who may have gone before. The hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) has taken on the role of chair of the all-party group on youth affairs, which is important. My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has been active over the years. I include my hon. Friends the Members for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) and for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Leech), a new MP who now speaks on youth affairs and sadly could not be with us today.

I pay tribute to my three hon. Friends who are the youngest MPs in Britain—in Wales, Scotland and England. They are young women, importantly, and are my hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, Central (Jenny Willott), for East Dunbartonshire and for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy). They are all—in spite of the helicopter, which I am told was the only way that my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne could make it to the Budget from Sheffield, where they were filming—trying to do what young colleagues in all parties want, which is to show that they are real people with interests. They are not abnormal, and they have interests in sport and activity just like everyone else. That is one of the messages we need to get out. People here or in councils are not abnormal or different; they are normal. Everyone looking in should have equal access and should be able to think that they could be equally at home here and play their part.

Mr. Khan: I said that I disagreed with the Power commission on the role of the media. The media's intrusion on the private lives of parliamentarians shocks me as a new parliamentarian. Does the hon. Gentleman not think that that is a deterrent to young people who might want to be involved in politics as a full-time vocation?

Simon Hughes: I do not know whether that was meant to be a topical question for me, but I agree. I look forward to having a debate later with the hon. Gentleman, outside the Chamber, about the Power commission. I agree with his reservations about some of its comments, but I hope that we might agree broadly about its recommendations, which are the crucial part. It is interesting that the Power commission was set up by the Joseph Rowntree Reform Trust and the Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust, which have always been part of that progressive social group that seeks always to make democracy more participatory. I thank them for putting up the money so that that body could do its work and report to us. Everyone is taking that seriously.

I want to pay one last tribute. The hon. Member for Tooting referred to one of the difficulties of being elected, whether as a local councillor, a member of the London assembly or as a Member of Parliament. In spite of those difficulties, be they the loss of privacy or of personal time and space, with people knocking at the door or ringing up all the time, some people stand for election as young as they can. One member of our party, a woman called Hannah Hedges, was the youngest parliamentary candidate in the country and stood at the age of 21. It was important that she did that. She was selected through the proper process and stood for a parliamentary seat.

A friend of mine, Niko Baar, became the youngest councillor in the country in Southwark some years ago, at the age of 21. He did a good eight years as a councillor and then went off to do other things, which was reasonable after eight years of such intensive work. There are other things in life. That is another important message: people do not have to go into politics to stay. Politics needs people who come in and go out, or who do other things and then come in. It is important that people do not think that they will get locked in for life. There is a lot of pressure, once one says yes. My friend Richard Allan, the former MP for Sheffield, Hallam, stood down for no other reason than that he had other things to do with his life at the end of his 30s and in his early 40s.

I will be quick and make three substantive points. There are ways in which homes, schools and the media can do more to ensure that the political engagement with young people happens better. Parents have that responsibility. Families often have strong political debates, even in this country—I know that the French have much more politicised meal times than we do. The children with the most encouragement often become much more politically engaged. Baroness Williams tells the story of being brought up in a political household. Of course it makes one more politicised. Parents have a duty.

I agree with the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye that visits here and to council chambers, and the use of the Chamber and the council chamber, are important. However, it must not be seen as theatre. There is a danger sometimes that it is seen as theatre, not reality. People dress up and it is a game. The important thing is that there should be real discussion, real debate and a real exchange of views.

I have just come from the Globe theatre, which is holding a schools spring event. Lots of schools are doing "As You Like It". Theatre can often engage people in politics. The great Shakespearian plays, as well as others, contain some big political issues. There are a lot of ways to enable young people to emerge with strong feelings. We need to encourage them at all times.

We need to keep on encouraging our radio, television, video and other providers to do the job better. That is why it is a good thing when the BBC do "Question Time" and "Any Questions" for young people. That may give us a lesson.: those programmes move around the country. Last time I was on "Question Time" it was in Harlow, I think. We could do better as a Parliament not to move ourselves round lock, stock and barrel but to do a bit of what the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly do, and to take what we do more visibly from this place to the boroughs, to the counties and around Britain.

We need to think about how we take politics to people. It is exactly the point that the Minister made about going to register people rather than expecting them to come to us.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): May I make the obvious point that we have permitted Select Committees to go around the country, and they often do so?

Simon Hughes: That is a good thing. We should think about how we can engage those who vote least in that process.

I have had a view for a long time about the right age at which people should be able to vote. However, whatever view we reach, at that age, UK-born and bred citizens should have a citizenship ceremony like the one for new arrivals. To make a reality of citizenship education, which can be good, although it is sometimes dull, we should have a process of moving on from training and learning to life, like the Americans do. The course tells people not only about voting, but about jury trial, magistracy and the things that come with adulthood and are part of the opportunities on the other side of the door. We should consider that to be a regular process of the formal education period before people choose whether to stay on or to go to college, sixth form or school.

My party has been clear about the agenda. I want to set out what I think and where I hope the Minister and Government can be encouraged further. I recognise the good work that has been done. We have to improve registration and participation; it has to be easier to register. I like the Power commission's idea that at 16, if that is the age, there should be automatic registration and a national insurance number should be issued automatically, so that it is made easy. Young people move around more quickly and often than older people, so a way that allows people to register more easily is vital. Also, people need to be able to register much nearer an election, because often people's minds do not focus. We are still too slow; in the modern age, a week or two before the election—once the campaign has started—there really ought to be a week's window in which people can still register. We have just had the last registration for the May elections, but a lot of people will not really think about them until after Easter. We must change that.

We have to make it easier for people to vote where they are. We should be able to vote wherever there is a voting place, and before too long I hope that we can vote by other methods, whether online or whatever. I realise the technical difficulties and the security issues involved, but it is nonsense to tell someone that they have to go to Aylwin girls' school—good though that school is—and cannot vote at a place near where they live, work or move around.

Bridget Prentice: I am conscious that the hon. Gentleman has another meeting to go to, but on people being able to vote where they are, if we could move to more technological forms of voting, would it not be possible for the voting booth to go out to community centres, care homes and even schools, so that we could actually take the vote to the people, rather than the other way around?

Simon Hughes: And above all to the bus stops, the bus and railway stations, and—in London—the tube stations, where there are real numbers of people, and where we can catch people as they go about. We could also take voting to the supermarkets, I guess, and other places.

All of us are probably very good at involving young people in the political process as we go about our weekly lives; that is why we are here. We should be taking young people to surgeries, and when we knock on doors, we should not say to the young person who answers, "Can you find your dad or your mum?", but should talk to them first about why we are at the door. We should let them come out with us if they want to, as they often might in school holidays. They might ask, "Where are you going? What are you doing? Can I canvass with you?" If they came with us, they could see the process; we have a duty to engage them, and for kids it is often very exciting and interesting. A bit of a competition is always a good thing, and they normally enjoy it.

We all have a duty to do the best we can to ensure that our parties are properly representative. I am trying hard to make sure that ours is, as are my colleagues who are present. I know that we are all trying to do that but, bluntly, we have to work harder. None of us has got there, yet.

I support votes at 16, as does my party. The key reason is that if we allow people to leave school at that age, but they cannot vote until a period afterwards, there is a disconnection in their learning, between the preparation and the opportunity. As young people have shorter attention spans, any interest that has been cultivated may well be lost by distractions. That, for me, is the overwhelming reason, quite apart from the reason to do with the civic age of responsibility. The other day, my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams) made a persuasive case for votes at 16 under a ten-minute Bill downstairs; it failed by only eight votes, I think. I had the figures somewhere, but I have mislaid them.

The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye asked the important question of what young people are interested in: issues or parties? It is issues, of course. Parties are only methods of getting issues changed. Political parties are only the means, not the ends, and young people are interested in the ends—in peace not war, justice not injustice, equality not inequality, and no discrimination rather than discrimination. They are really engaged. I particularly pay tribute to minority ethnic community young people; in my experience, they are often much more politically alert than those born and brought up here, and whose families have been here for generations. That is because at home there is a combination of an international experience and a national experience, so they probably understand international affairs much better than people who have links with no other countries.

The youth services and local authorities have a duty to be always helpful. To end, I give an example of one thing that we might do. Young people's interest is often cultivated by seeing the political process deliver. Kids might knock on my door and ask, "Simon, can we have a football cage on our estate?" If there is a process whereby in a short period their interest in getting something done can deliver them through the consultation and the outcome, and if they can then see that cage there, they are far more likely to trust in the process. If the process takes power away from them and says, "Leave it to us," they will not be engaged. If the process says, "Okay, let's get on with it," and nothing ever happens, they will say, "When we asked, nothing was delivered." For most young people, the important thing is seeing that they have the ability to influence something through to a conclusion. That, more than anything, would make them feel more engaged. We are going in the right direction, but there is real urgency for us to do better and go faster. If we do that well, we can ensure really healthy politics; if we do not, we are in for trouble in the years ahead.

3.55 pm

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): I am grateful to you for calling me to speak, Mr. O'Hara. I apologise to the House, because I shall have to leave a bit later, but I hope to come back for the winding-up speeches.

This debate is timely, because there is a crisis with young people's participation in politics. Other speakers have spoken eloquently about the shockingly low percentage of young people who participated in the general election. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) is right: there is a general problem with engagement and disengagement, but it is particularly acute among young people, and disproportionately so.

There are three things that we need to talk about in this debate in terms of making a difference to young people's participation. The first has to do with how we talk about young people, both in politics and in the media. The second is about the way in which we engage young people on issues that directly affect their lives, and I will say a little about what I mean by that later. The third has to do with the democratic process.

On the first issue—how we talk about young people—part of the problem is that we tend to see young people either as problems and people who cause trouble, or as bearers of potential and people on whom the future of our country depends. We rarely talk about them as citizens in themselves, who have legitimate voices. That is partly why such debates are important; they start to change that dynamic.

The reality of young people today is that 98 per cent. of 10 to 17-year-olds are neither cautioned for, nor convicted of, a criminal offence in any given year, but one certainly would not know that from listening to some debates in the House or in the media. I cite one example in the media. MORI carried out a poll in 2004 that showed that 70 per cent. of press articles about young people were negative. It said that young people are quoted in only 8 per cent. of stories about them. Two thirds of 11 to 18-year-olds would not trust a journalist to tell them the truth and perhaps that is not surprising given the nature of the stories written about young people.

That is not to deny the issues of antisocial behaviour and so on in all our communities, but it is the responsibility of both the media and us politicians to give a more rounded picture of young people. Put it this way: if, on 49 out of 50 occasions when we talked about young people, we did so in positive terms, they might regard our political proceedings somewhat differently. If we were doing that, we would be representing young people fairly.

In a way, my second point echoes the words of the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), who has talked about such issues over a long period and who has done incredibly important work on the subject. We have to start to engage young people on the issues that affect their lives which are simply unaddressed. I am thinking particularly of services for young people in their own communities, and of spaces and places for young people to go. I care a lot about that. For a long time, that has been a neglected area of Government policy. I am not making a party political point; I think that that has happened under Governments of both parties.

I much welcome the fact that the Government have started to redress the balance with the youth Green Paper and the youth funds, which are now starting to become available. Over the next two years, more than £100 million will be available for giving young people a say about the kind of services that they want in their communities. That is important as young people care about a whole range of things beyond the issues that directly affect them, such as youth clubs and so on. However, if we in politics do not engage with and listen to them on those issues, what hope can we have that they will believe that we take them seriously on the whole range of issues?

The democratic process is at the core of this debate. I am sympathetic to—and, it is fair to say, a convert to—the idea of votes at 16, partly because of the issues of principle involved. At 16, young people have the right to get married and join the military, although only with parental consent, it is true. They can also leave compulsory schooling and go out to work. Those issues of principle are important. I do not mean that they are overwhelming and should automatically mean that people of 16 should have the vote, but they are a compelling case to begin with.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) mentioned that the younger people get involved in the possibility of voting, the more likely they are to vote. I also cite a report from the Social Market Foundation on that subject. It may seem counter-intuitive, but where the date of a general election falls, relative to the 18th birthday of a young person, makes a big difference to whether they will vote. That may be to do with their going to college or university or their excitement about gaining the vote and having the chance to exercise it immediately. It is also an important part of the case for lowering the voting age.

The voting age was changed to 18 in 1969 and I have looked back at the House of Commons debates of 1968 on the issue. They are interesting because they reflect the same sorts of arguments that we hear today about voting at 16. For the interest—I shall not say amusement—of Members, I cite a speech made by the late Quintin Hogg, who spoke in one of them, although not, I think, for the Conservative Front Bench. He stated that his belief that the voting age should not be lowered to 18 was based on "the conviction that there is a case for a period of time after maturity, of which three years is prima facie not a bad period, in which to go about the world getting experience before one is held to one's contracts, before one makes an irreparable mistake in marriage and even before one has what I still regard as the privilege, as well as the right, of the parliamentary franchise."—[Official Report, 18 November 1968; Vol. 773, c. 1015.]

Some of the arguments today about whether people are ready for votes at 16 are based on similar convictions. Obviously, we have to draw the line somewhere; no one proposes that we should lower the voting age to below 16, but hon. Members who doubt the proposal should bear those debates of 1968 in mind. A lot of the 16-year-olds whom I meet are either ready for the vote or would be, with the right sort of citizenship education and other things.

Lowering the voting age is not a panacea and no one should pretend that it is. That takes me to a wider point about the democratic process. We need to think across the piece about how to show that mainstream politics is more open to young people. Citizenship education is important and working out how it can be strengthened is part of this issue. My sense is that the teaching of citizenship is great in some places, but not so great in others. In some places, the subject seems to be more about institutions than live and controversial political issues. One of the ways in which to engage people in politics is to make them think that they are exciting and about their lives.

I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster), who says that we need to find ways of opening up Parliament. I am struck by the fact that, to my knowledge, the UK Youth Parliament has been sitting for four or five years, but never in this place.

Simon Hughes: As you may know better than me, Mr. O'Hara, the Youth Parliament has certainly met in this Chamber or in a Committee Room on this corridor, although not yet in either of the Chambers downstairs.

Edward Miliband: I am grateful for that, and stand corrected. I suppose I meant that the Youth Parliament has never had its big annual meeting in this House; that would be a welcome development. The House authorities and others should consider that.

Local elections and engaging people on a local level are important. I, too, have met the young mayor of Lewisham. Last week I was with him at a question time with young people. I got a rough ride—members of the governing party, even humble Back Benchers, can expect that. The mayor is an impressive person. He has a group of advisers and a budget. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, he was elected with a reasonable turnout. All those things are important. In Doncaster, we have a youth council that is going strong and there was a high turnout at its elections. All those issues across the piece can make a difference to the engagement of young people.

I end by making a final point that takes in all of the issues. One of my political heroes is the American Senator Robert Kennedy. Forty years ago, he gave a speech in South Africa to a group of young people, and one of the things in politics that he warned most against was the danger of a sense of futility, the sense that nothing can change. If I had to sum up the one biggest problem of our proceedings and politics today, I would say that it was the sense among many people that intervening in or trying to affect the political process is futile, because they think that things will not change and they cannot have a voice. That is what we need to change—both generally, and specifically in respect of young people.

I welcome this debate. I welcome the Minister's positive comments, in a personal capacity, about votes at 16, and I look forward to Members, here and elsewhere, continuing to make the case for the engagement of young people in politics in the months and years ahead.

4.7 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I apologise for arriving late; I was at a sitting of a statutory instrument Committee. I shall have to leave about half an hour before the end of the debate to catch my flight to my constituency, although I would very much like to hear the summing up. I am sure I shall read the Hansard report.

I want to share my experience as the youngest MP in the House. People often talk to me—in party political contexts, at conferences or at events in the wider community—about the issue of young people and democracy. They ask, "How do we get more young people interested in politics?" I often think, "Are you not asking the wrong person?" Given that I have stood for election and been elected, I am clearly a young person who is very interested in politics. It is the wrong question to ask because as we have heard today, young people are interested in politics.

Last July, I was at the Make Poverty History march in Edinburgh and it was stuffed full of young people from all around the country making their voices heard. I am sure that hon. Members who attended the Stop Climate Chaos lobby a few weeks ago will have noted the number of young people there who were campaigning on that issue.

Young people are generally engaged in the issues, but how do we turn that engagement towards the political process? That is the challenge for us all. Members have talked today about different options and other things that are happening in their constituencies to engage young people. We all go to speak in schools in our constituencies and answer pupils' questions about our work as MPs and how the parliamentary system works. I, for one, always find such events incredibly enjoyable.

[Jo Swinson]

It does not matter whether I have been wading through the intricacies of a Bill and its legislative jargon or finding piles of correspondence in my office—when I go to a school, I forget all that.

Usually, there is a group of several dozen young people who start off slightly sceptical and think that the meeting will be dull and dry. However, starting to ask questions acts as a catalyst; more and more questions keep coming and they get incredibly engaged. The brilliant thing about school pupils is that there is no politeness or faffing around not being direct—they get straight to the point, asking how much I earn or whatever is on their minds. I always come away from such meetings feeling inspired about the next generation of people coming through the system.

We have also heard about the Youth Parliament, which does a huge amount of good work. I lend my voice to the calls for it to be able to use the Commons Chamber when it meets. That would be excellent. Many schools have debating societies. I got involved when my school ran parliamentary debates, which sparked my first interest in politics back in the early 1990s. Last Friday I went to a meeting of the European Youth Parliament, west of Scotland division, which was being held in my constituency and where people were debating European issues. In addition, there is also an extremely successful BBC schools question time event.

There are many projects or organisations set up to involve young people in politics. Often, they are all siphoned off as a separate section: we say to ourselves, "This is the young people being involved in politics bit. The other politics bit is in the House of Commons or the council chambers, or in groups up and down the country".

We must also promote direct engagement with the political process. Currently, young people cannot vote until they are 18. My view is clear; whenever I meet young people, whether it be in schools or at any community events, I am their Member of Parliament. Whether or not they can vote does not matter. If they are concerned about issues, they should write to me, e-mail me, check on my website to see what I have said or listen to my podcast. They should use whichever means they can access to find out about politics. I want them to get in touch. Sometimes when I say that to a young person it is a bit of a new idea to them. As they cannot vote, they have not thought that they can have that voice. I am pleased to say that I have received more letters and e-mails from young people as a result of that approach.

It is also important to encourage young people to go further than just having their view. They might like to get involved in many ways. For example, they might want to join a pressure group and get involved in the organisation of campaigns. If they have a particular affiliation to a political party, they should go further and join the political party. They should find out more about standing, be it for a local town, parish or community council, the local authority, Parliament, one of the Assemblies or the European Parliament.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) mentioned that the youngest candidate at the previous election was a Liberal Democrat. At the one before that, in 2001, I was one of the youngest candidates in the country. I found it an incredibly valuable and interesting experience. We should encourage young people, not just to tell us their views, but to get involved and be part of the system. That must be the way forward.

Many hon. Members have signed early-day motion 1218 on the 2009 Project. There is an excellent website associated with that: www.the2009project.com. It aims to get young people—it extends the definition to everyone who will be under 35 at the next election—to sign up to pledge that they will vote. Irrespective of who they vote for, the aim is to get them to pledge that they will vote and use their voice. As has been mentioned, young people care about many issues—anti-bullying was one that came up and, recently, issues about the minimum wage were raised. It took a long time for 16 and 17-year-olds to be enfranchised within that. Tuition fees affect younger people in particular. If the voice of young people is not heard at the voting booth, those issues are less likely to be taken seriously in this House. Apparently, 13 million under-35s will be eligible to vote at the next general election. Politicians should be taking account of that huge number of voters. I hope that hon. Members have used that opportunity to encourage young people in their constituencies to sign up to vote.

The issues about how young people vote are also important. I remember the first time I was able to vote. Very frustratingly, I could not vote in the 1997 election, although by a cruel accident of birth many of my best friends were able to do so—they were several months older than me. I restricted myself to lobbying them and trying to convince them to vote Liberal Democrat.

My first vote was in council elections, when I was a student living in Southwark and studying in London. I was keen to vote as I was interested in politics. I received my polling card and it mentioned a certain primary school. I had been living in London for eight months and I had no idea where it was. As I was walking out of the halls of residence to try to work out where to go, my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey came up—

Simon Hughes: I did not pay my hon. Friend to say this.

Jo Swinson: I do not think that I have shared this story with my hon. Friend. He might not remember the occasion, because I was just some student in Butlers Wharf hall of residence. He said, "Get into my car and I will give you a lift to the polling station". I said to myself, "Fine, that's great". The polling station was about 200 m away; it was so close to where I had been living for eight months yet I had no idea where it was. Students move into their halls of residence and work out how to get to their university classes and where the nearest bar is. Other than doing that, they might not be very integrated into their local community. That is a big problem, because if it is not easy for people to work out where to go to vote, they are far less likely to do so.

I got back from the polling station, got a sheet of A4 paper and, using a marker pen, drew a little map that said, "You are here. Go there, turn right, and take the second on the left. There is the polling station. Voting is today". I stuck it by the entrance to the hall of residence. According to the marked registers for that year, many more of the students voted. Simple things such as that can make a difference. It is about both ensuring that people are on the register and that the polling stations are accessible. For halls of residence in particular, how difficult would it be for the local authority to issue a map with the polling card?

Simon Hughes: Have a ballot box in halls of residence.

Jo Swinson: Indeed, there could be a ballot box in halls of residence or in universities.

We need to examine such barriers. I agree with many of the comments about voting at 16. In response to the proposition made by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan), it is not the be all and end all. It is not the only thing to do. It will not be the magic solution, but it is part of it because it is part of ensuring that people can participate. While people need their parents' consent to get married at 16 in England and Wales, if people are really determined they can pop across the border to Gretna where that is not required. That gives another reason why people should be able to cast their vote at 16.

On a slightly controversial note, I welcome candidacy at 18, which is coming forward, but I would go one step further. I hope that if the issue of voting at 16 is reconsidered, we will also reconsider the age of candidacy and perhaps it could also be lowered to 16. It makes sense to have the age of candidacy the same as the age at which people can cast their vote. I have heard people say, "This would be dreadful. We would have 16-year-old MPs." Frankly, as someone once said, "If you are good enough, you are old enough." Anyone who gets elected has had to convince a constituency that they are the right person for the job.

People look at this House and they do not see it as being representative. Currently, people can stand for Parliament at 21 and, as I mentioned, I did so. It is uncommon for people to win at their first attempt. As a result, while the age at which people can stand for Parliament is 21, we do not have any 21-year-old MPs, nor have we had since Bernadette Devlin was elected back in the 1960s. There is no guarantee that there will be MPs of the age at which people can stand for Parliament. Despite the fact that about 40 per cent. of the population is under 30, only two out of 646 Members in this House are under 30. That is not good enough in terms of representing this country.

I would go further. Much as people might turn to me, as the youngest MP, to be the voice for youth, I do not necessarily have my finger on the pulse. I could not tell people what was No. 1 in the charts.

Simon Hughes: It changed last week.

Jo Swinson: My hon. Friend is clearly more on the ball than I am.

I think the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster) made the point that the range of life experiences is important. Even as the youngest MP, I went to university before tuition fees came in, so I do not know what it is like to have to handle the additional burden of tuition fees and top-up fees. We should ensure that such experiences are represented in the House. Many other issues are also not being represented.

We need more young MPs. We all have a responsibility to encourage young people to stand for Parliament, much as there are advantages to the current system. I do not think I need any anti-wrinkle cream because if the good people of East Dunbartonshire continue to return me as their MP, by current standards I will be a young MP for the next 15 years. We have all heard the descriptions of somebody being a young MP at 40, which in any other walk of life would be approaching middle age.

Finally, for as long as people turn on the television, look at the House of Commons Chamber and see something totally unrepresentative of our society, be it in terms of age, gender, disability or the colour of people's skin, we will not manage to solve the problem of better participation. Addressing that must be a key part of the solution. Young people are passionate about political issues and we all have a responsibility to nurture their enthusiasm and open the doors for their participation.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Before I call the next speaker, I should say that it is desirable for reasons of equity that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesperson has the same length of time in which to speak as the Liberal Democrat. By my calculations, that means that she must be called not later than 4.58 pm.

4.20 pm

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): It is a great privilege to be able to speak on young people's participation in democracy. There are a number of reasons why it is so difficult to engage young people in the democratic process, but I do not believe that apathy is one of them.

In a recent survey, nine out of 10 young people identified three or more of what could be considered political issues that really mattered to them and that they wanted the Government to address. That is hardly apathetic. The same survey found that 72 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds would vote if they believed a politician would listen to their priorities and keep their promises about those priorities. By contrast, only 20 per cent. said they were too apathetic to vote. Nearly double—almost 40 per cent.—said they did not vote because in their opinion the parties' policies were too alike. I think we all agree that young people are not apathetic; they just do not always understand how politics impacts on their life and how they can make a difference in political terms—to particular policies—just by voting.

The majority of young people do not vote. Therefore, older people have a greater impact on elections. As a consequence, politicians tend to work for older voters, and younger voters become less committed, so even fewer of them vote; the situation is like ever-decreasing circles. Young people do not vote because they feel they are not listened to. That is a circular argument, because if more young people voted, their positions would become much more important to politicians and Governments. When less than 40 per cent. of young people vote in a general election, compared with voter turnout of almost 70 per cent. for those over 55, it is hardly surprising that older voters' concerns are prioritised. I will come on to the issue of whether the voting age should be 16 later, because I think that that is one way in which we could address the issue of making politicians take more notice of the concerns of young people.

A lack of engagement and a low voting turnout among young people is a particular problem in the north-east, such as in my constituency. During the last general election, the north-east had the second lowest turnout of that category of voters. The lack of young people's participation in democracy is compounded in the north-east by the fact that those in the poorest sections of our society are less engaged. Young people from such backgrounds are even less likely to vote and to be engaged than those from other sections of society; 15 per cent. fewer young people from the poorest sections vote, compared with those from the wealthiest sections.

What are the solutions? Young people need to be shown that one person—namely, they—can make a difference if they try. Everyone in this room believes that; that is why we all entered politics. As has been said, young people are involved in activism outside the normal party spectrum, but it is our responsibility, as their representatives, to show them that their concerns matter to us.

I recently met a student from Sunderland university who was campaigning to retain the student discounts on public transport, which are currently under threat because of a transport funding shortfall to pay for free bus travel for pensioners. That is an unintended consequence. On Monday night, I went to see the Prime Minister about it as part of a delegation of Tyne and Wear MPs, and we hope that it will be rectified. That young female student came to see me, as her MP, to put her views across on a one-to-one basis. It could be said that she was already engaged to an extent because she was at college, but, none the less, she came on her own, and I have a lot of respect for her for doing that.

We need to focus on the issues that matter to young people and to ask what they are. We cannot assume that we remember what they are because we were once young, because even if we remember what they were then, it is very likely that the main issues are different now. As the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) said, even though she is the youngest Member in the House she does not have experience of paying tuition fees. That is just one example of the changing issues.

We need to ask young people what the important issues are. They might mention their employment prospects, the costs and benefits of higher education, or how they can afford to buy their first home. It is difficult to engage with young people, but I believe that the way to do so is to hold youth surgeries. When we knock on people's doors, it is usually the parents who come to speak to us. Even if a younger person answers the door, they do not want to stay standing there for a second; they quickly go away saying, "I'll get me mam," or, "I'll get me dad."

I find that visiting young people in schools is the best way to engage with them. However, there might be between 10 and 30 of them, depending on whether the situation involves a group or a whole class, and some of them will not engage. The usual suspects will ask all the questions and want to know things and, because of the nature of situations like that, others will stay quiet. Therefore, there can only be real engagement on a one-to-one basis, and surgeries offer a way to do that. I have started working to set that up with a national organisation called Changemakers. It has a regional office in Newcastle.

With regard to the citizenship education agenda, can I recommend to all Members in the House the "Democracy Cookbook" from the Electoral Commission? It is excellent. I do not know if any Members have come across the publication, but I commend the Electoral Commission for the time, money and effort it invested in producing it. Whoever was behind it obviously had their finger on the pulse, because it is very good. I was so enthused by it that I sent off for a number of copies. I was told that I could be sent only 12, but that any school that wanted some could apply to the Electoral Commission directly and it would send up to 30 per school. I received 12 copies and as I have five secondary schools and one college on my patch, I had the brilliant idea on Friday to drive around with my researcher and drop them all off. I thought I would have a quick five-minute chat and drop all the cookbooks in and explain the benefit of them.

Not long after I was elected, I wrote to all the secondary and primary schools on my patch offering to go along and take part in any discussions on democracy, citizenship lessons or question and answer sessions on a Friday or any day during September when we are in recess. I said, "You just plan it, ring my office and organise it." However, nothing happened; none of them approached me. Therefore, I decided to go along and meet them in person and say, "I come bearing gifts and I am a normal person, so please invite me in." It did not take just five minutes per school, especially as it was the week immediately after the Education and Inspections Bill debate. My researcher was saying, "Sharon, are you sure this is a good idea?" I said, "It's a fantastic idea." It took every minute of an entire day. The schools were shutting and the children were leaving when I was running into the last school. The offer I made still stands.

I will send all those schools a copy of this debate and I would be happy to go along and engage with their young people. I want the young people themselves to organise these youth surgeries in their schools and I will go along and have 10-minute appointments. A group of pupils could organise the youth surgeries; that is what I envisage. I hope very much that that happens.

We also need to think about new ways to vote and, as the Chancellor recently suggested, we should also consider lowering the voting age to 16. I support that. It would build excitement about voting if it were linked with citizenship education in the right way. Children in schools are being taught about citizenship, voting, what it means and how they can impact on the process. There is engagement with local politicians, councillors and MPs. The relevance is there and lowering the age would build up impetus and excitement as children turn 16 and elections take place. Some children would be eligible to vote in the May election and others would not, but it would be something that everyone would want to do. I hope that it would stay with them and develop into a good habit when they left school. They say that voting habits come with age. Hence, more people over 55 vote. It becomes habit forming.

If all children stayed on at school until 18, they would still not develop the habit. It must be linked to citizenship education. Even if children receive the education and become enthused by voting, there is still a two-year gap for a large number of young people, because not all children stay on at school until 18. I support voting at 16.

The YMCA worked with hard-to-reach young people, and Alison Dean, from YMCA England's working with young people unit, gave oral evidence to the Power commission. She highlighted the skills gap:

> "Those who are hardest-to-reach may have difficulties around literacy, communications and expressing their own opinions, so they would not be able to engage in any formal kind of communication or dialogue that would demonstrate that they had an interest in politics."

Young people fear being out of their depth or making a fool of themselves. They have a high level of self-consciousness, which is detrimental to their finding out information. Once they have left school, if they have had a couple of years thinking, "I don't understand and it's too late to ask now," they get to 18, 19 or 20 and they do not want to be embarrassed and ask, "How do I go about voting?" So, 16 is probably a good age at which to catch them before they become too self-conscious. It just becomes a habit: they go along to the polling station with their parents and they have mock polling stations in school. They understand what to do when they go into that little box with the pencil on a string, and they understand how it all works.

Evidence from Germany and Austria has shown that youth turnout greatly increases when the voting age is reduced. In Vienna, the youth participation rate was 90 per cent.—a very interesting statistic.

Justine Greening: I just want to clarify whether Austria has voting at 16. I think it is at 18, but if I am wrong perhaps the hon. Lady will correct me. I thought that the age was reduced to 18, and that is my query.

Mrs. Hodgson: The hon. Lady may be correct. However, my notes say "votes at 16". I shall have to ask the YMCA for clarification, because when it mentions Vienna, it does not actually say "at 16", so the paragraph could be misleading.

We must make voter registration easier, but we do not need to introduce individual registration as the Opposition have suggested. The YMCA and others believe that household registration is a barrier to young people who move frequently. I disagree, because any individual can register at any time when they move. One does not have to wait for the form. Again, it is an awareness issue. The vast majority of disengaged young people still live at home and they benefit from household registration, as their parents complete the form on behalf of the whole household. I am opposed to individual registration for that reason.

I agree that reducing the candidacy age to 18 would be positive and help to attract younger candidates. However, I realise that just because somebody can stand at 18, does not mean that there will be any 18-year-old MPs. It is about sending out the right message. Although reducing the candidacy age would be a positive move, life experience is important in this House. An 18-year-old MP would have only a limited amount of life experience. At 21, one has a bit more.

Jo Swinson: Does not the hon. Lady accept that if enough voters in a particular constituency feel that a candidate, of whatever age, has enough life experience to represent them, the final decision should lie with them?

Mrs. Hodgson: That is right. It may explain why even though the candidacy age is 21, there have been no 21-year-old MPs for a long time. The hon. Lady alludes to the fact that the choice should rest with the electorate.

Justine Greening: We are getting into a conundrum: on the one hand, getting more people involved at a younger age is to be welcomed; on the other hand, people very much dislike politicians who have spent their career in Parliament, never having worked in the real world, paid a mortgage, gone home, got up, gone to work, gone to the office, come home, paid the mortgage and so on. There is a contradiction, but as the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) says, it is up to voters to decide what they prioritise.

Mrs. Hodgson: Again, that is a valid point. We could probably debate that point alone for some time. When I came into politics and decided to stand for public life, it was because I believed that I had a lifetime's worth of relatable experience to offer. Owing to my 20 years of work before I came to Parliament, I have qualities and skills from a long background in many different sectors. It will always provide a balance. However, I take the point made by the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire: it is up to the electorate to decide.

The Government should consult regularly with young people on a range of issues, as they did with the Green Paper, "Youth Matters", on which there were 19,000 submissions. It showed that young people want to be heard. One good thing that came out of it was the youth opportunities card. I do not know how many pilots there will be, but I am pleased that the card is being piloted in my constituency. I shall follow it with great interest.

Both local authorities in my constituency will receive money from the youth opportunity fund. Perhaps the Minister will clarify whether it is a national scheme. The guidance for local authorities says that they are to consult with young people on how the fund is spent. From the figures I received, they have about £400,000 to spend from the fund. I have raised the matter with both authorities and I shall follow with great interest the ways in which they decide to spend the money. I hope that they will follow the guidance and consult young people.

I commend the work that organisations such as the YMCA and Changemakers do with young people. In particular, I commend the YMCA for offering training, campaigning and lobbying skills through the "Changing Your World" programme. It brings young people, often YMCA residents, to London to learn about Parliament and the possibilities that political action offers. Changemakers works on a wide range of programmes, including YSpeak. That programme encourages young people to be advocates for one another and to take up issues and campaigns. I visited the office of that organisation in Newcastle and met a number of the young people involved. It impressed me how much they had benefited, both socially and educationally, from involvement with such an organisation.

Political engagement is a natural progression from that. When young people get involved with such an organisation or activity, they realise that politics matters and impacts on everything. There were clever television adverts from the Electoral Commission encouraging engagement, but it is often when people see for themselves the impact of politics that they get involved. The Minister said that often when young people meet politicians and realise that we are real people, their opinions of us change. The media have much to answer for. Their portrayal of politicians involves lots of stereotypes, most of which are untrue. Sadly, some of them are true.

One reason why I wanted to get into politics was that I did not feel that there was anyone like me in politics. I do not know whether people in this Chamber would agree with that. I am a working-class woman from Gateshead. In the north-east, there are not many women MPs. I am the only woman MP in Tyne and Wear, which has 13 seats. The north-east probably has 60 or 70 seats in total and the number of women MPs has increased from four to six. The north-east has been a bastion of male dominance over the years. It was an industrial area and I suppose that male dominance in that respect followed through into politics.

The women who broke through were amazing. We can see how Mo Mowlam got here. Hilary Armstrong is our Chief Whip. Vera Baird broke through in 2001. She followed—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Lady should refer to hon. Members by their constituency.

Mrs. Hodgson: I apologise, Mr. O'Hara. Women who have become MPs in the north-east have been quite memorable and are still active in their roles. However, I could see no one like me in politics, especially in the north-east. That encouraged me to get into politics. I believe that MPs should be representative, in many ways, of the people they represent. I am referring to ethnic and cultural background and so on. I strove to provide that representation and, lo and behold, I am here, which I am very pleased about.

Today I received a delegation from the Gateshead young women's outreach project. I met six women and two youth workers. They came down to Parliament and sat in the Gallery for questions to my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality, which they found fascinating. Indeed, the whole experience has been great for them. They are mothers of school age but are not in school for various reasons, but usually because they have been bullied. They receive support relating to education, being healthy and safe, achieving and contributing and, eventually, becoming economically independent. Those 16 and 17-year-old girls said to me, "When you were our age, did you know you wanted to be an MP? Did you know this is what you wanted to do?" The answer was no—far from it. Life experience led me to want to become an MP. I hope that I can be a role model for those women and other women throughout the country. I hope that they will see that people do not have to be in a certain mould or of a certain type to follow a certain path. Life is what you make it. People can do anything they want to if they put their mind to it.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): I ask hon. Members to bear in mind the need to allow ample time for the closing speeches.

4.45 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I shall remember your words, Mr. O'Hara, and I promise to be brief. I apologise for missing the beginning of the debate and the speeches by my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke). I was next door in a Standing Committee making an important contribution, I thought, to trying to save lives on the roads by reducing the drink-driving limit. I mention that only because it is endlessly fascinating to me how politics invades every aspect of public life. For me, that is the driving passion about politics and I would like to instil it in every young person I meet.

Since I was elected in 1997, I have visited schools in the Stafford constituency regularly. Everywhere I go I see positive, happy learning environments and youngsters who are bursting with ideas and able to express themselves. Every time I come away from those places, I cannot help feeling a great optimism that when I retire, whether by choice or because I am compulsorily retired by the electorate of Stafford, excellent MPs will follow me in Stafford who went to schools in that constituency.

I repeat the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) that that positive view of youngsters is so perverted in media reporting about young people that most of the public have a very poor view of youth of today. He gave the statistic that 70 per cent. of news reporting about youngsters is negative, with headlines about "Yobs" and so on. I heard the Children's Commissioner for England, Al Aynsley-Green, cite that in a lecture, in which he made an impassioned plea for the media to be fair in their reporting and give youngsters a chance. I hope that the media will listen to that plea from politicians and people such as Al Aynsley-Green.

I shall say a little about the support for young people to participate in democracy. Many hon. Members have mentioned the citizenship curriculum, which became compulsory in our secondary schools in September 2002, with its three main themes of social and moral responsibility, community involvement and political literacy.

In the previous Parliament, I was so excited by the opportunity presented by citizenship education that off my own bat, with no prompting from anyone, I devised a pack that I sent to every Member of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords. I did so because I felt that teachers throughout the country would be anxiously contacting their local politician to ask for their assistance in delivering citizenship teachin[illegible] schools. I wanted MPs to know, when they were contacted, what that was all about and how they could respond positively. It was only a little pack—nothing very exciting—but it had basic information about the traps and pitfalls, the other sources of information available to them and how they could conduct themselves if they went into schools.

As a result of putting together that pack, I have taken a close interest in citizenship teaching and I am convinced that it is very variable, as has been said. That is understandable given that many of the teachers had no previous training in the subject and perhaps have no history of an interest in politics, for example. The time has come to review the effectiveness of the citizenship curriculum to see whether there are things that we need to do to make it more effective.

My other point in this connection relates to the role of Parliament as an institution aiding the teaching of the citizenship curriculum. As the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) said, we have a brilliant parliamentary education unit. That unit is superb and does fantastic work. When I was on the Modernisation Committee in the previous Parliament, we interviewed members of the unit, who told us about the service that they provided and about sending information packs to schools. Quite a lot of the members of the Committee around the table did not know about that, and they all sent off requests to the unit the next day to get the packs for their local schools. There was a bit of a run on the unit's material as a result, but perhaps even today many MPs do not appreciate the work that it does. It not only provides and sends out material, but gets youngsters to come into this place, whether for the sort of debates that the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned or for other events.

I have sat in your place, Mr. O'Hara, and acted as Mr. Speaker during a debate among young people, and it is a very entertaining thing to do. The unit also arranges for tours of Parliament, showing a video, and a question and answer session with a leading politician—perhaps I should just say "a politician", because it is often me—or sometimes an Officer of the House. Those ways of introducing young people to the teaching of the citizenship curriculum through the institution of Parliament to develop political literacy are very important. However, it is obvious that not every youngster can get to Parliament to have that experience, so a link is missing.

The Modernisation Committee produced a report called "Connecting Parliament with the Public", its first report of the 2003–04 Session, in which it made recommendations about turning things round by taking Parliament to where young people are. I suggested a partnership with local government so that every youngster can go to their local town hall and access a virtual Parliament on their doorstep, with links to this place. We have television, videoconferencing and so on these days—I liked the earlier reference to iPods—and we could make the process much more accessible, so that every youngster in the country was able to have a direct experience of Parliament in their community. I am pleased to say that Parliament has given extra resources to the unit to employ outreach workers who are engaged in the process of making contact with schools and local authorities in order to make that happen. That is a welcome development.

I have missed out a lot of what I was going to say, but I have two more points. In addition to the unit, we have a website, which these days is an important means of communication, but it is not as good as it could be and work is still ongoing with the Parliament website to make it a resource for young people as well. That is coming along and we need to encourage it. Other organisations have been mentioned that can give assistance in this regard, such as the Citizenship Foundation, the Hansard Society and the Electoral Commission, with its "Democracy Cookbook", which is a marvellous document, although it is big and heavy.

My final point concerns the support youngsters should have from political parties. I ask the other hon. Members in the room to be honest. Are their local parties like mine in that they are uninteresting for young people? I have real difficulty in attracting young people to join my local party because we do not offer the right things. I have spoken to the Duke of Edinburgh award co-ordinator in my area and asked whether activities that young people can do as members of a political party count towards awards from the Duke of Edinburgh. In a guarded way, I was told, "Yes". I am trying to persuade my party to make a step change in the way in which we offer activities to young people to make ourselves more attractive to them.

At the national level, people are attracted to the issues raised by political parties, but they are also attracted to values. Sometimes we get autocratic in the way that we offer ourselves in what is called the middle ground of politics as being competent, by offering to do something similar to the other lot, but better. We forget to talk about our values. If we can offer people exciting visions about why we are in politics and what we want to achieve, we can attract people to follow in our footsteps. I very much hope that we can achieve that.

I came prepared to say a lot more, but I arrived late, which is my fault. I shall now stop so that the Front Bench spokesmen can have the time to which they are entitled.

4.54 pm

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I am pleased to contribute to the debate. Some really interesting and good ideas have come out of it concerning how we engage young people in democracy. It is a subject particularly close to my heart for lots of reasons. Like the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson), I very much believe in public service, and I think that everyone has something to say and a voice that needs to be heard. Whatever people think of politicians, that is a very important role. I never planned to become an MP, so when I was 21 or 22 I was getting on with what I thought was going to be a career, which would lead to who knows what. If someone had told me at that stage in my life that I would end up as a Member of Parliament, I would not have paid much attention to them.

Another reason why the debate is so important for me concerns my constituency. In Putney, Roehampton and Southfields, the average age of the voter is 34. We had a bit of theorising about how to engage young people in democracy, but it is an absolute necessity on a daily basis for me. If I did not, I would not be able to represent my constituents. I shall briefly give my views on the symptoms that we see of the malaise regarding young people's involvement in democracy, then dig beneath that a bit more to consider the underlying reasons, because symptoms can be misleading. I shall sum up by talking about how I hope those reasons might lead us to solutions.

What is the state of the nation in 2006 as far as youth democracy is concerned? The picture of political engagement of young voters and young people seems rather bleak. That is also true across the board, but, as the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) said, it is particularly acute for younger voters and those approaching voting age. The British social attitudes survey of 2004 said that young people have less interest in politics now than they did in 1994. Worryingly, a significant proportion of young people do not feel what might be called a civic duty to vote. The Electoral Commission did a survey on the general election of 2005, and when voters across the board were asked whether they felt that voting was a civic duty, 73 per cent. of 35 to 44-year-olds said yes, but only 56 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds agreed.

Non-voting since 1992 in the 18 to 24 group has increased. In 1992, only 24 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds claimed to be non-voters. By 2005, worryingly, that figure had risen to 55 per cent. Similarly, in 1992 only 13 per cent. of the generation above them of 25 to 34-year-olds said that they were non-voters. By 2005, that figure had risen to 47 per cent. That suggests that non-voting can become habit forming, as was mooted earlier.

That non-voting data backs up what we have heard about the lack of younger voters who took the opportunity to vote in last year's election. As has been said, just 37 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds and just 49 per cent. of 25 to 34-year-olds voted at that time. I am pleased that in Putney at least, we were able to engage voters from across the political spectrum because our turnout was about 61 per cent., although I would have loved it if it had been a lot higher. Even there, we can see that there is a long way to go before we get back up to the average voting levels of the 70 per cent. level we used to see in the 1980s and before.

There clearly is a problem, but although that information paints a bleak picture, it is only half the picture, and perhaps it is the bad half. The Russell commission supplies good facts about young people and their engagement in the political process and democracy. It found that 41 per cent. of young people are already involved in some form of volunteering work. I recently spoke at the UK Youth conference and met a lot of organisations there that work every day with tens of thousands of young people who are involved with their local communities. Some inspiring stories came out of that conference about how successful engaging young people can be at the local level.

The Power report pointed to the recent citizens audit of Britain, which said that 62 per cent. of people donate money to particular campaigning organisations of one form or another. As has been mentioned, we have seen that already: whether as part of the Countryside Alliance, the anti-war protests, Make Poverty History or Live 8, young people played a pivotal role. A disproportionate number of those in the crowds at Live 8, the Countryside Alliance, or Make Poverty History were young people. Clearly, as has been said, there seems to be a disconnect because young people are interested in issues.

It is interesting to me to reflect on my own experience. If anyone had asked me, when I was 21, whether I was interested in politics, I would have said no. If they had asked me whether I was interested in current affairs, I would have said yes absolutely. The challenge is to link the two together. Changing things around people can be done by a political route. The two are symbiotically related and do not have to be separate.

If those are the symptoms, we must move on and talk about why they exist. Young people are interested in the world around them and have broader horizons in terms of issues such as the Make Poverty History campaign and climate change than generations before them. At the same time, they do not make use of the political process to change things.

I have a hypothesis. We have talked about many great initiatives and I have no doubt that many of them have real value, but the debate is not just about quantity. The bigger challenge for all of us is quality in our democratic system. It is not about more democracy, but about having a better democracy that works for everyone and especially younger voters.

I shall give an analogy of an experience I had when I stayed in a hotel. I had a terrible weekend there because the service was appalling, the room was dirty and the TV did not work. When I got home I did something that I rarely do outside of being an MP: I wrote to the hotel chain and complained. What happened? I received a voucher for a free stay. That was exactly the wrong solution to my problem. I did not want to go there again because I had had a terrible experience. We must look at the experience that our young people have in engaging with the political process and democracy. If we understand what their experience is, perhaps we will see that they want quality and a process that really works and represents them rather than having just more processes.

The Power inquiry gave some incredibly valuable insight into the more general malaise of people and the democratic process. I shall go through the main points that it mentioned. It referred to people's engagement with, and alienation from, politicians. A MORI poll found that 75 per cent. of people agreed with the statement, "I do not trust politicians as a class." That is a huge barrier for all of us to get over.

Mr. Kidney: There is a lot of panic about that. When people are asked about politicians as a class, they put us down with journalists, estate agents and lawyers. When they are asked about their own MP, they put us up with teachers, doctors and police officers.

Justine Greening: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Perhaps the heart of people's frustration lies with party politics rather than individual good constituency MPs. I shall come to that. Party politics often switches people off more than any other thing.

The Power inquiry talked about engagement, or a lack of engagement with, and alienation from, politicians. What often comes across to me on the doorstep, particularly at the moment, while we are out campaigning for the local elections, is a sense of Westminster being full of a political elite. People do not feel that politicians have any real understanding of the day-to-day lives of most people in the country, especially younger voters.

As a London MP with a young constituency, perhaps I am better placed than many MPs to stay outside the Westminster bubble because I can go home every night. On a personal level and also on a pragmatic level, I find it helpful to be able to escape from the bubble that the Westminster village can sometimes be.

The Power report said that there is a weak dialogue between politicians and people, and I agree. I shall mention the classic example of something in which I tried to get people in my constituency engaged. They did become engaged, but they came out of it with a worse impression of politics. I do not want to go into too much detail, but it involved the recent consultation on night flights at Heathrow. Thousands of people and councils representing 2.5 million residents wrote in during the consultation process to say that they were very concerned about night flights. Many of them said that they wanted no night flights. When I went to the Department for Transport and looked through all the submissions that could be shown to the public—more than 1,000—I found just three from people who had asked for more night flights. Yet during the second phase of consultation more night flights were proposed. It is an example—I am sure that similar examples could be found from Governments past and present—of people engaging in an issue and having their engagement thrown back in their face. Such experience, perhaps more than anything else, switches people off. We must ensure that when we have removed the barriers to voting and people take steps to vote or become involved in a local issue, they feel that they have at least been listened to or, even better, genuinely had their views taken on board and represented.

Finally, I shall not cherry-pick from the Power report, but will go through the points that it made. It talked about a quiet authoritarianism that people feel comes from the Westminster centre. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) talked about the autocratic style and made a valid point. The more approachable MPs are here and in their constituencies, the better it is for breaking down those barriers.

To summarise the problems, there is a lack of trust between younger voters and politicians, which is partly born out of the political process, spin and the way in which politics has become more refined in the past decade. Spin has not been helpful in engaging young people in particular.

I come originally from Yorkshire and the north where people tell it like they see it. Young people are the same. They like to know what their politicians think. They like to see that their MP has recognised that there are always two sides to a debate and that they have come to a balanced view.

A lack of delivery is often behind the lack of trust, whether at local or national level. Younger voters and those coming up to voting age want to be able to see that if they bother to cast their vote it will make a difference to promises being kept at a later date. "Making a difference" is a common phrase throughout all the research and when talking to young people. It is about politics being relevant to them and being a mechanism by which they can really make a difference, not just to their own lives but to the broader community and world in which they live.

There is also a pragmatic issue with education. There is no doubt that many young people do not know who to vote for. Perhaps we are in a political cycle when political debates are increasingly on the centre ground. That is a pragmatic problem, and educators and political parties should perhaps work harder to set out where politicians stand on issues. It is genuinely an issue for all of us.

What is the solution? I have made my diagnosis, so what is the antidote? For me, it is most important that if there is to be a wholesale change we must improve the quality of our political process so that when people speak their voices are heard and make a difference. There is no doubt that relationships of trust are built up over time. The Power report and the Russell commission show that many young people in particular feel that a four-week election campaign is a cursory way of trying to get them engaged in issues. Clearly, we need to start much earlier with an ongoing discussion with younger voters to build their trust. Parliament needs to be more accessible and the Hansard Society has come up with a number of great suggestions of how to do that.

I do know where the parliamentary education unit is. I used to think that my office on the fifth floor of Norman Shaw North was the fringe of the parliamentary estate, because it seemed that nobody passed on the way to anywhere, but people do go past it on their way to the unit, which is on the sixth floor. I have a good working relationship with the unit and have been able to get some of my local colleges and schools to come and do trips. I am particularly pleased that the Paddock school, which is one of the special needs schools in Putney, will hopefully be able to bring some of its students to look around the House over the next couple of months.

Some particularly good points were made about remote access to Parliament. I grew up in Rotherham, and I do not think that I ever had the chance to come to Parliament until I lived in London. There is nothing like the sensory experience of going round an amazing building like the one in which we are all privileged enough to work every day and seeing the tradition to bring home what happens in this place. That is particularly important and we need to get over the barriers. Even if people are a few hundred miles away we somehow need to make Parliament just as accessible. Perhaps technology today gives us the opportunity to do that in a way that was just not possible when I was growing up.

I will not reprise all the arguments about schools, but we should strengthen citizenship classes. It was mentioned that we did not have them in the '80s, but voting in the '80s was vibrant. Perhaps one of the reasons for that was that the politics was more clear-cut and principle-based, so there were more arguments that people found accessible. They could take a clear stance on whether they were for capitalism or socialism, or for or against nuclear weapons. Politics in the '80s was black and white, in a way that meant that even younger voters could grab hold of the issues and talk about them. Growing up, I certainly had no problems understanding the "either/or" debates that we all had back then. Today the situation is more challenging, so helping people to understand the process and the issues through citizenship classes is valuable.

I thoroughly support groups such as the Youth Parliament and the British Youth Council. They play an incredibly valuable role and have gone from strength to strength. I read the manifesto in the previous election to the Youth Parliament, which was an incredibly balanced, well argued, articulate and impressive document. It covered a wide range of subjects and showed a depth of understanding that was a credit to the people who pulled it together. In my role as a spokesman on youth, I am looking forward to working more closely with the Youth Parliament.

We need to engage young people in the community far more. The Russell commission has focused on volunteering, which is absolutely the right direction in which to go. Our new leader, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), has talked about a youth community action programme, which is about getting people to put something back into their community and in so doing linking them to it in a way that they perhaps did not think was possible. All those things must surely be good in making people feel part of their society and, as a result, making them want to vote to change the direction of that society.

We should also recognise achievement more. The Duke of Edinburgh awards have been mentioned, and I know that some of the charities and social enterprises that work with volunteering projects up and down the country give awards to children and younger people who are involved in volunteering. I should like those schemes to be developed more and formalised, so that perhaps more disadvantaged children who come out of education with few qualifications can still turn to their skills and say, "These are worth something too", and they would be absolutely right.

We need to move to a more a positive style of politics, so that we do not just throw stones at one another at every opportunity or complain about problems, but talk about solutions. That is what we tried to do in the general election campaign and for the three years before that in Putney. We talked about what we wanted, rather than about what we did not like. For more than any other section of our community, a positive debate is vital with young people. We can have all the initiatives we like, but if people switch on the TV and see a yah-boo politics, in which people throw stones at one another just because they are on the other side of the Chamber, many younger voters have every right to turn around to us and say, "Don't talk to us about being young voters. When are you lot going to grow up?" Those are our challenges.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) talked about Wandsworth and its youth policy. I will forward him the well developed draft of the youth strategy that I have seen—I wanted to find out what my council was doing, so I called it. I am sure that he will be suitably impressed with that detail as it is developed.

Finally, at its heart, democracy is about giving people an informed choice, so that when they vote they know what will change, how it will change and when it will change. Too often, politics in Britain boils down to what I would call Politics, with capital "P". It is almost game playing—something that we all switch on when we get home, in the same way as we switch on "Match of the Day" and watch, say, Chelsea play Portsmouth. The challenge to us all is never to forget that politics is about the people out there. If we always keep people in the forefront of our mind and focus on who they are and what their concerns are, we will do much better.

We will do our bit on the Conservative side of the House to set out what we have to offer people and what our agenda is, which we hope will reflect theirs at the next election, so that if nothing else, they will know what voting for us means. If the other parties do that as well, we will make a huge step forward, with younger people feeling that they know what voting means and what it can deliver. With those two things in prospect, I hope that we will see voting rise for the right reasons. I therefore welcome the debate and am grateful for hon. Members' patience in listening to me set out the Opposition's case.

5.17 pm

Bridget Prentice: With the leave of the House, I shall be brief, as I spoke at some length earlier.

I thank all hon. Members who participated in the debate. I know that we always say at the end of debates, "This was a very good debate", but this was an excellent opportunity to hear the different ideas and initiatives. So much so, in fact, that I got quite excited in the middle of it and thought, "Look, all these people all think the same things. This is relatively straightforward and we ought to have no problem at all in achieving some of the aims that have been described."

Sadly, of course, things are not always as simple as that. The merry band in here this afternoon have come because they feel passionately about engaging young people in our political system. Therefore, we all have a job of work to do in going out and getting that message across elsewhere. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) raised that issue right at the beginning, when she talked about directness and going to young people. I agree with her wholeheartedly that we should do that. The Hansard Society has rightly been mentioned a number of times in a very positive fashion. It has an excellent pack to help MPs going into schools on the kind of things that we should be saying and doing to engage with young people.

I should also make it clear fairly early on in my summing-up that the Government are neutral on voting at 16, but we are keeping the issue under active consideration. Nevertheless, the Chamber now knows my personal views on the subject. I should probably say no more about it, except that I found it interesting that when people were analysing the reasons for and against voting at 16, and whether it would mean people becoming MPs at 16 or would just be a gesture, they had a much more sensible approach to the subject. Just because one is able to vote, it does not mean that one will automatically take on the role of being a candidate. It is not as scary a proposition as some have found it in the past.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster) made several good points. Much as I would like Lewisham council to be held up as a beacon for the many things that it does to engage young people, it is heartening to know that similar activities are taking place elsewhere in the country. He made an important point about the Youth Parliament, which has been highly praised throughout the debate. I think that the Modernisation Committee suggested that the Youth Parliament should be allowed to use the main Chamber, but that was not taken up by the House of Commons Commission. All I can say on that to him and others who agreed that it would be a good idea is that I shall take it up, through the Department, to see if we can make something like that happen. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

As we are short of time, I shall pick up on only a few of the points made by hon. Members in their full and detailed contributions. Frankly, given what is happening elsewhere in the House today, few people are around, and I was afraid that there might be only me and perhaps one other person in the debate. The turnout shows that Members on both sides of the House take the debate seriously and recognise what issues are involved.

In response to the hon. Members for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) and for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), I assure the House that we are making registration easier under the Electoral Administration Bill, because people will have a bit longer to register to vote after an election has been called. We are also giving returning officers the power to put more information on polling cards. I certainly remember seeing polling cards with maps on the back. That is one way of informing people where their polling stations are, and I understand that many authorities do that. We are also piloting mobile voting. I will dare to mention Lewisham again, and tell hon. Members that we are having voting in supermarkets and early voting. Elsewhere in the country, voting in town centres is being piloted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) made an interesting point about young people and services. It made me think that the Chancellor's announcement yesterday about the very welcome money for young people and sport in the run-up to the Olympics is another opportunity to engage young people in the things on which they are keen to engage. Winning the 2012 Olympics for London was a big political operation, and we now have an opportunity to join those elements together and show young people that some of the things that they are actively involved in have a big political impact.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson) made several excellent points. I understand entirely what she means when she talks about going into schools and thinking, "I can get through half a dozen in a day", but finding that one cannot. Once we engage with young people and discuss issues that affect them, we want to stay with that group for as long as possible, and time moves on. She also talked about people voting at 16 in Austria. I understand that they can do so in local elections in some cities and states. There is a dual voting system whereby 16-year-olds can vote in local elections in some areas.

I very much agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) said about the citizenship curriculum. We are encouraging teachers to make use of experts from elsewhere to add to and expand on the information that teachers give on that.

In her contribution on behalf of the official Opposition, the hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening) talked about the number of young people who are involved in volunteering. She is quite right: a huge proportion of our young people are involved. In his Budget speech yesterday, the Chancellor talked about more funding being available for that. Her point reminded me that a number of young people are involved in caring, and some very young people are involved in serious and quite onerous caring for adults who live in their households.

We should remember that the services for young people which my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West talked about go way beyond the fact that they might want a youth club. They have to deal with serious issues and take on responsibilities. We should not underestimate the ability of young people to behave in an adult and responsible fashion. We should be a bit more confident about what many of our teenagers can achieve.

My hon. Friend also talked about perception, which is largely down to the negative media response to politicians in general. As was said earlier, when individuals meet their MPs, they often do not have such a negative view of them, so there is an onus to get out and about as much as possible to undermine the negative perception that can come across through the way we are described in the media.

I very much agree with what my hon. Friend said about engagement and trust. We have all had a constituent who fundamentally disagrees with our point of view write to us about a particular subject. That is life. Politics would be really boring if we all agreed on everything. Sometimes, we have to say to such constituents, "These are my arguments, and this is why I think this. I am sorry, but we will just have to agree to disagree." More often than not, the constituent will write back and say thank you. They much prefer to hear a robust argument than a bland, "Well, I'd like to think about it", and an attempt to assuage their opinion, especially when we know in our heart of hearts that we disagree with them. We should continue to show that kind of honesty, engagement and communication to constituents of any age.

I want also to put on record my thanks to the parliamentary education unit, which a number of hon. Members mentioned. It is a fantastically well run organisation that engages young people in Parliament on the few occasions when they come into this fantastic building. I still get a little leap of joy and inspiration just walking into it. During the recess, when the unit takes a large number of young people into the building, I enjoy coming in and chatting with them about what being an MP is all about.

Finally, I want to reiterate the importance of democratic engagement in this country. I also want to say that I feel uplifted by the debate. I would like to use what has been said, and also to engage with hon. Members who participated and those who were unable to come along, to feed in all the ideas, initiatives and things that are going on up and down the country and to see whether we can put together a coherent programme of work, so that we can share the good ideas.

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 28 March 2006

[MISS ANNE BEGG in the Chair]

Rail Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Derek Twigg.]

9.30 am

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): I am pleased to open a debate on a subject that affects millions of commuters throughout the country. The future of our rail services is vital not only to my constituents but to the constituents of many hon. Members. The train is the great connector. It connects workers to their offices, children to their schools and families to each other. After placing the railways in an historical context, I shall raise several matters of concern for my constituents, and conclude by asking the Minister some direct questions.

The world's first public railway was built in Britain on 23 May 1823. It was the Stockton and Darlington railway, and it received Royal Assent in that year. With railways came the promise of economic prosperity and the realisation that people could transport themselves to where jobs were without having to relocate. Trains supported the industrial revolution, transporting coal, manufactured goods and working people the length and breadth of Britain in record time. Naturally, safety became an important concern, especially when a Member of Parliament for Liverpool was fatally injured by Stephenson's Rocket, the first steam locomotive, in 1832.

In the 1960s, the future of rail came into sharp focus with Dr. Beeching's drastic programme of reforms, which closed many lines and hundreds of stations.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Those reforms closed 5,000 miles of track and 2,000 stations in this very month—two years before the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) was born. The only passenger rail service in North-West Leicestershire—Swannington and Leicester, which also carried coal to that city and was the third line after Stockton and Darlington and Liverpool and Manchester—was lost as part of the Beeching cuts. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the lesson for the Minister from that period is that we have been fighting for the restoration of passenger services almost ever since, and that once lost, it is enormously difficult to restore such desperately needed services?

Adam Afriyie: The hon. Gentleman makes a precise and good point. If people choose to change their behaviour, perhaps by taking a job elsewhere or by organising their lives differently, once they have done so, it is difficult to reopen lines because by the time closure is reconsidered, the demand has vanished.

More recently, transport and the railways were placed at the heart of new Labour policy, when in 1997 the Deputy Prime Minister announced that he would have failed in five years' time if "there are not . . . far fewer journeys made by car".

If that were not enough, he went on to say:

"It is a tall order, but I urge you to hold me to it."

The reality is far from the fantastical ideal envisaged by the Government.

I quote again, this time some passengers, who said:

"at the station, all the people were talking at once; they were telling the fat director what a bad railway it was".

Of course, I quote from "Thomas the Tank Engine", a seminal work by the Rev. W. Awdry. Hon. Members and users of the railway services recognise that the Government's railway ambitions were more like a children's story, given the reality of rail today. The Government have a strange logic when it comes to rail services. On the one hand, they demand that we give up our cars; on the other hand, in the Windsor and Thames Valley region in particular, they make it difficult for us to take the train.

I shall move on to matters of concern to Windsor constituents. I have a letter written in August 2005 by Vivien of College crescent. She says:

"I started work in London in February 2005 based on the fact that I could make my journey, door-to-door, in a journey time of approximately 75 minutes . . . I've paid £810 to park at Slough station."

Commuters from Windsor need to get to Slough first in order to get to Paddington and central London. Her letter continues:

"This allows me to catch the fast trains to London Paddington and provides the shortest journey time."

She points out that before December 2004, the journey time was 30 minutes on average, and that now, based on the new timetabling arrangements, it will be approximately 39 minutes. She concludes:

"Additionally, I will certainly no longer feel that the current season ticket and the parking prices are acceptable to receive a slow stopping service into and from London."

The point is clear. A small increase in journey times from areas such as Windsor, which are closer to London, will have a big impact on how commuters choose to travel. People have a choice. They can drive their car, take the train or make some other arrangements. If one's journey time is 45 minutes door to door using the train and 55 minutes using the car, even a five or 10-minute delay to the train or a change in scheduling will almost certainly result in someone driving to work.

I have another letter, which is from the Windsor and Slough Passenger Association. Its members are representative of the hundreds of commuters throughout Windsor, and they raise several concerns. Overcrowding often means that commuters, many of whom may have health issues, are forced to stand for their entire journey. Even at my age I find it hard to stand for more than 30 or 45 minutes without some inconvenience. The Minister knows the train services we are talking about.

A lack of ventilation and air conditioning means that passengers travel in conditions that are often worse than those for cattle going to market. In addition, working ticket machines are scarce, and ticket office opening hours are erratic to say the least. As if that were not bad enough, security at stations is often poor, with inadequate staffing, and the elderly and the young often feel threatened either late at night or during less busy times of the day.

The Windsor and Slough Passenger Association made the effort to respond to the Strategic Rail Authority's consultation on rail franchises. In the association's response, it pointed out that the journey time from Windsor to Paddington was approximately 30 minutes before 2004, whereas after the implementation of the new franchise and its new timetabling and schedules, the journey times will increase to 39 minutes. It says:

"This demonstrates a 30 per cent. deterioration overall and is evidence of a continual process of deceleration."

That is not exactly a ringing endorsement.

Sadly, although services have deteriorated by 30 per cent., passengers have not seen an equivalent decrease in fares. When taken together, all those factors erect sizable barriers to choosing to use the train.

In conclusion, I have four direct questions for the Minister. First, does he acknowledge that a small increase in journey time for commuters closer to London will encourage them to use their cars? Secondly, how does he intend to supply enough parking spaces close to stations? Thirdly, what steps is he taking to improve the security of stations? Fourthly, is he confident that the Government will deliver on their promise to move millions of people from their cars to the railways? I am not so sure.

9.38 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): It is a pleasure to attend an Adjournment debate under your chairmanship, Miss Begg. It is the first time that I have done so. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) on securing the debate, which is a matter of considerable concern to my constituents, who predominantly use Maidenhead and Twyford stations, and also use the branch line stations of Wargrave, Furze Platt and Cookham.

I also congratulate the Minister. I attended an Adjournment debate last week in which no Labour Back Benchers were present—there was only the Minister. At least this Minister has a Labour Back Bencher present, although whether he will take as a positive the presence of the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) is an entirely different matter.

David Taylor: I can reassure the Minister. He knows of my admiration for him, and he has an outstanding invitation to visit the route of the national forest line, where we are trying to restore passenger rail services. It was created by George Stephenson, to whom the hon. Member for Windsor referred.

Mrs. May: I think that the Minister has received invitations from some of my constituents to go and wait on Maidenhead or Twyford station for the 7.27, to understand the impact that cutting that service will have.

In his intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor, the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire made the point that once services were cut, it was very difficult to restore them, which is indeed the case. The sad fact for my constituents is that when Thames Trains was given the franchise for the local services, it increased the number of services and improved the services available to my constituents, but since the decision was taken to merge the franchise between Thames Trains and First Great Western, services have been cut year on year.

I have a sense of déjà vu about the debate, because I have been fighting cuts in services since December 2003, when it was first suggested that the timetable should be changed and there should be cuts as a result of the merged franchise. To that extent, I feel sorry for the Minister, because he has been saddled with the impact of the decision to merge the franchise, which was taken by the Government and by Richard Bowker when he was chairman of the Strategic Rail Authority.

I want to talk about issues that relate specifically to services for my constituency and I shall start with the timetable. We fought long and hard for a restoration of good fast services to Paddington from Maidenhead and Twyford, and my constituents were very pleased when changes were made to two services. The situation is a little complicated because both services leave at 7.27, although they go from two different stations. One train is the 7.27 from Twyford; the other is the 7.27 from Maidenhead. Extra carriages were put on the 7.27 from Twyford to accommodate the large numbers of people wanting to use that service, and a similar thing happened with the service from Maidenhead. That was a real victory for local passengers and commuters, whose voices were heard.

What will happen under the new timetable in December 2006? Those two trains, which are already overcrowded, will be scrapped and replaced by a single train. That means fewer spaces on the train for my constituents, and the service will be going later, which will cause my constituents considerable problems. Many of them will not get into Paddington early enough.

One problem that we have with the approach taken by First Great Western and the Department for Transport on the timetable is the failure to understand two things. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor said, for people commuting from stations close to London, the time that the journey takes is crucial. On a good day, it takes someone who lives in Maidenhead about 45 minutes to drive to London in their car. If a train service is available that takes 20 or 25 minutes, they get on the train. If they are now told that their train service will take 35, 40 or 45 minutes, it is a toss-up, but they will probably get in the car, because the train is so overcrowded that it is unpleasant. The Department needs to understand the crucial importance of journey time for local commuters.

Secondly, the Department needs to recognise the importance that the services have for local people in enabling the economy of the Thames valley to thrive by allowing easy access into London. Obviously, many of my constituents boost the London economy by coming into London to work. Setting aside for a moment the impact on people's lives, which is crucial, cuts in services will also have a major impact on local businesses.

My constituents are, rightly, up in arms about the proposals. They are not quite sure whether to blame First Great Western or the Department for Transport.

First Great Western tells me clearly that the Department for Transport is responsible. However, the message that I am now getting from the Department for Transport is that perhaps the situation is not quite as easy as that and there are some issues to do with First Great Western. Frankly, for my constituents, in a sense it does not matter who is at fault. There is a problem that needs to be fixed. The ultimate decision lies with the Government, so my constituents will ultimately say that the Government have to fix the problem.

Adam Afriyie: The problems do not exist only in our neck of the woods, in the Thames valley region; they stretch much further. I have been in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), who is sadly away on military training today and cannot participate in the debate. He points out that commuters living in Didcot face the loss of the 5.46 and 6.12 morning services and of the 5 and 5.18 evening services. They are at 80 per cent. of capacity, and the station is one of the 10 busiest stations on the First Great Western line, so my hon. Friend has similar concerns. People in other places are having to make similar judgments to those that have been described, so the problems that we are considering are widespread throughout the country.

Mrs. May: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention; he is absolutely right. Many of our hon. Friends cannot attend this Adjournment debate, but they are also affected by what we are discussing. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) presented a petition at the same time as I did in the House of Commons with the signatures of more than 900 of his constituents, who were concerned about cuts to local services. The petition that I presented contained more than 1,700 signatures, and we have now had well over 2,000 signatures from people who are against the proposed cuts. Similarly, my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) has concerns about his local services being damaged, and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is concerned about the branch line through to Bourne End.

We are talking about damaging changes to the timetable, which will have a significant impact on people throughout the country. I say to the Minister that for those of us with constituencies from which people commute to London and to which people commute from London to work, as is the case in Maidenhead, the Government need to take into account the time that that journey takes and the frequency of the service.

The Government also need to recognise that working life is no longer nine-to-five. My constituents do not aim to be in the office by 9 am; many of them, particularly those who commute to the City of London, have to be in the office by 8 or 8.30 am. Should Crossrail ever arrive, it may improve things, but in its absence, commuters have tube journeys to make after they get to Paddington. They do not leave the office at 5 pm; many leave at 6, 6.30 or 7 pm, or even later. The timetable needs to reflect the fact that working life today is not nine-to-five. Sadly, neither the Department nor First Great Western seems to have understood that.

The time that journeys take is crucial. Fast services at peak times to Paddington from both Maidenhead and Twyford and from Paddington to Maidenhead and Twyford need to be reinstated in the timetable to accommodate the needs of my constituents.

Adam Afriyie: It strikes me that for people who live in the parts of the Thames valley region that are closer to London, five or 10 minutes one way or another make an enormous difference to their choice of travel. If, for example, someone has to consider child care, a 10-minute difference in arrival back home makes a huge difference to their life. However, someone who has a two-hour or two-and-a-half-hour journey into London is less likely to be susceptible to a small change in the timetable of five or 10 minutes. It would therefore make much more sense to have fast trains stopping perhaps in just two or three locations to pick up more local commuters to London.

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and I am grateful to him, because he brings me to the next point that I wanted to discuss. There is a fundamental misunderstanding by those who are taking the decisions in the Department and at Network Rail—which I also consider has some responsibility in this regard—in that they are focusing on trying to improve the reliability and journey time of long-distance services, even though it is commuters on local services who are most affected by a change in journey time, who most care about that length of time and who are most likely to get out of the train and into their cars if their journey time is lengthened.

The crucial thing for my constituents is fast and semi-fast services at peak times. If we are to reinstate the decent services that we used to have with Thames Trains, the local services need to be allowed to go on the main fast line. The one thing that has caused most problems for my constituents and others is that, now, most of our services have to go on the slow line. That does not mean only that they take longer; they are often held up by slow, stopping trains. The Government's emphasis on long-distance services only is misplaced, partly because that contradicts other Government policies to try to get people out of their cars and on to public transport. That is the first key issue.

The second issue relates to branch lines. We fought long and hard to ensure that the Henley branch line and the Marlow-Bourne End branch line were not included as community railways. I believe that if that were to happen, the services would deteriorate. They are part of the mainline service. They are commuter services. The Henley branch line runs from Twyford, Wargrave, Shiplake and Henley, but under the new timetable, for no accountable reason, a number of trains will run from Twyford to Henley without stopping at Wargrave and Shiplake. When I challenged First Great Western about that, its response was that the Department had asked it to run some trains on the branch line but did not say that they had to stop at the stations. For goodness sake, what is the purpose of running trains on a branch line if they do not stop at the stations to allow passengers to get on and off? Will the Minister consider the specific issue of stops at Wargrave and Shiplake stations? If the trains do not stop there, people will get in their cars to drive to the nearest station to access trains.

[Mrs. May]

It was interesting to see the table in the Evening Standard and other newspapers recently showing the most overcrowded trains on the rail network throughout the country. The 18.06 from Paddington to Maidenhead and Twyford was the sixth most overcrowded train in the country, despite the fact that the Government keep telling us they do not have any measurements for overcrowding and that no safety limits are set for the number of passengers allowed on trains, and that First Great Western keeps saying, "No, no, no, we do not want overcrowding; we are doing everything we can to stop it." That is just one example. I have already mentioned the morning trains and how overcrowded they are. There are safety issues and the new timetable will exacerbate those safety issues by merging trains. Hundreds of people get on the early morning trains at Maidenhead and Twyford. In future, those hundreds of people will get on one train instead of two at around 7.27. There will be real safety issues.

The key issue is that people's lives will be severely damaged as a result of the proposals. I already know of people who have had to change jobs because of the timetable. Henley further education college had to change its timetable for lectures to enable people to get there on time. The last timetable changes had an impact on the ability of my constituents to get to Henley on time. That FE college had to change its entire morning timetable to accommodate a change in the branch line timetable. Heaven alone knows what will happen if trains on the branch line do not stop at the stations en route to Henley.

People have had to change their jobs and the FE college has had to change its timetable. People have been getting off the trains and into their cars because there are so many problems with the timetable. Businesses have come to my constituency because it is a good place to locate and has good transport connections, particularly to Paddington. I fear that if those connections go, the economy of my constituency will be affected. I urge the Minister to listen to those thousands of people who are telling him that the new timetable will cause a significant problem in their lives. They are fed up with the cuts in services during the past few years under this Government. We need those fast and semi-fast services and we need reinstatement of the sort of timetable that we had until recently and preferably the sort of timetable that we had under Thames Trains. We need our trains back on the main line. If a service is provided more people, not fewer, will use public transport. I urge the Minister to listen to the thousands of commuters whose voices are raised against him.

9.53 am

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): It is great pleasure to take part in this debate this morning and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) on securing it.

On 15 March, I met the Minister with a number of my constituents to discuss primarily the Bristol to Waterloo line and I am grateful for the way in which he conducted that meeting and for his thoughtfulness on what was said.

I suppose that we are about half way through the 10-year transport plan and it is appropriate for us to ask whether that has been successful in the context of rail travel. The answer is a resounding no. That is a tragedy for our constituents, particularly people in places such as the one I represent who rely heavily on transport of one sort or another and would prefer to rely on public transport, particularly trains, but find increasingly that that is difficult.

David Taylor: The hon. Gentleman referred to the preference of many people for public transport. Ten years on, is he still attracted to the privatisation that his party pushed through—he was not in this place at the time—or, with the daily, weekly and monthly evidence, is he now as attracted to the idea of a publicly owned, publicly run national rail network as I and many Labour Back Benchers are?

Dr. Murrison: I think I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He makes a point that he knows full well I do not agree with. If I were to point to a success in public transport during the past few years since privatisation, I would say that volume of freight and people carried has increased. I would also point to the investment in public transport, particularly the railways. It is difficult to conceive how that increased volume might have been achieved given the economic circumstances prevailing at the time without the increased investment.

In retrospect, we can all look for improvements in the way in which things might have been done and only an extremely foolish politician would stand here and say that everything went swimmingly.

Mrs. May: As my hon. Friend is looking for examples of what happened under privatisation and the advantages following it, he might like to think about the changes at stations in the Thames valley. When Thames Trains took over the franchise, it provided improved services for my commuters at no cost to the Government because it did not require a subsidy. Under this Government, services have been cut during the past few years.

Dr. Murrison: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely good point, which illustrates the point I was trying to make in response to the intervention from the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor).

My principal concerns are about my rural services. There have been cuts on First Great Western's Cardiff to Portsmouth line. I received a letter this morning from a constituent in the village of Dilton Marsh who is concerned about the effect of the new timetable on that community. There have been cuts to the mainline Paddington service which affect the town of Westbury and there is a proposal that the direct service from Bristol to London Waterloo, which stops at towns in west Wiltshire, should be removed. I know that the Minister is considering the invitation to tender. I have not yet heard his decision, but I hope that he has relied on the new figures that have been provided for him by the west Wiltshire rail users group. They seem to conflict starkly with those produced by his Department. He will recall that during our meeting we cast some doubt on the methodology used by the Department for Transport when compiling those figures. There were software problems and a number of other issues.

Essentially, the west Wiltshire rail users group believes that the authorities have grossly underestimated passenger usage. I can tell the Minister that, from my personal observation, the figures on which his Department is relying are well wide of the mark. I hope that when making his determination he pays proper attention to the new data that have been gathered.

Although my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) believe that timetable changes particularly affect those who live close to London and commute, we must appreciate that connectivity is an important part of people's decisions to travel by train or use the convenience of their own car. I am not sure that the Minister has yet considered the importance of direct services, albeit stopping services, which the Bristol to London Waterloo service necessarily is because it stops at towns in west Wiltshire. It is important psychologically that people can latch on to a direct service that will take them all the way from their town in west Wiltshire to London Waterloo. That is important to them and if they have to change at Salisbury they will think twice, especially as that connection is sometimes unreliable. They will either not travel or they will take their car, with the obvious impact on road congestion.

I am concerned about a suggestion in the Evening Standard on 16 January that the Government were reducing services on rural lines to provide scope for investment on overcrowded services in the south-east. I am not sure about the veracity of that report. Generally speaking, I rely on what I read in the Evening Standard, but it would be useful to know what assessment the Minister made of that report and whether there was any truth in it, as it would be a great shame were that to happen.

We know very well that the Department controls, in fairly minute detail, what happens on our train services. The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire railed against privatisation. We must appreciate that the level of control that this Government have over the railways is extraordinary. Therefore, I suspect that to some extent his concerns about privatisation and the rustication of control of public transport have been assuaged somewhat by the Government's recent attempts to command and control the rail network. That being the case, the Minister must accept responsibility for what happens.

David Taylor: I was not necessarily railing against privatisation. I was trying to avoid the Government's being sidetracked into rural closures.

Dr. Murrison: I am sorry, but I did not catch the hon. Gentleman's last point. I assume that it was a statement rather than something to which he wanted me to respond. I thought that he was railing against privatisation, so I am glad that he corrected the record.

My point is that we must recognise that Ministers control the rail network to an enormous extent and therefore must take responsibility. In making decisions—some of which will be popular and some of which will not—about invitations to tender and new franchises, I hope that the Minister will not try to foist responsibility on to train operating companies. The TOCs will say that the Department is to blame, and the Department has a tendency to say that it is all up to the TOCs to make decisions as to whether they can run a service commercially and so on, but given the extraordinary level of control that Ministers now have over everything that happens on the railway, that is disingenuous. My constituents will look to the Minister, not the TOC, to make a favourable decision on our service to London Waterloo.

That is all that I wanted to say. Again, I thank the Minister for his courtesy in the meeting that we had a few days ago. I hope very much that he will pay close attention to the passenger data that the West Wiltshire rail users group presented to him at that time, and, in so doing, make the right decision for rail services in west Wiltshire.

10.3 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) has done the Chamber a service in initiating this debate on community rail, which is what I shall focus on this morning. I wish to direct the attention of the Chamber and the Minister to the future.

I do not believe that there will be any significant new road building in counties such as Oxfordshire in the next 10 to 20 years. There will not be any widening of the M40 motorway, although there may be some marginal improvements to the A34, which is the road from Oxford to Newbury. The county's road network will probably be the same in 10 or 20 years as it is now.

However, Oxfordshire is a fast-growing county. Banbury and Bicester, the two main towns in my constituency, are growing at an exponential rate. I suspect that Bicester is one of the fastest growing towns in the country. Planning permission was granted only last week for new housing estates in Banbury, and new estates have been proposed for Bicester. Oxford is now set to grow as well. That simply means more and more cars on the roads, and, given that there will be little extra road capacity, more and more congestion.

On Friday, it took me an hour to drive from Banbury to the county hall in Oxford—an hour there and an hour back—and that was not during the rush hour but in the middle of the day. As our roads get more and more congested, travelling time will increase. Yet within that equation, the local railways are under-utilised and undervalued. The two lines, one from Oxford to Banbury and one from Oxford to Bicester, have, in a sense, become branch lines. There used to be a line from Oxford to Stratford-upon-Avon, but the Government in their wisdom moved that franchise to Chiltern Railways. That was excellent news for that company, which has done an excellent job on the whole of its franchise from Marylebone to Birmingham, but it now means, in effect, that the only trains from Oxford to Banbury run between Oxford and Banbury—[Interruption.]

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): The building has to be evacuated because of the fire alarm. Members of the public, would you follow the security staff? I suspend the sitting, which will resume as soon as people are able to reassemble here.

10.6 am

Sitting suspended.

10.26 am

On resuming—

Tony Baldry: I understand that we get no injury time, Miss Begg, so I shall be as brief as I can. I hope that Front-Bench Members will not mind if I eat slightly into their time. Clearly, the Front-Bench Liberal spokesman lost the will to live in my speech; he has not yet managed to return.

I was talking about community rail. In Oxfordshire, the roads are becoming more and more congested, and there is an opportunity for rail to take people from Banbury and Bicester to Oxford for study. Many people go to Oxford for the college of further education, and many go for shopping, leisure, recreation and work. With the current system, community rail services get completely lost in the franchise that has been given to First Great Western. I make no particular criticism of First Great Western, but it is really a long-distance train operator. Its skill is operating trains from Exeter and Bristol to London. I do not say that it is not interested in community rail, but it sees it as a contractual obligation to the Government. It is not desperately concerned about the long-term transport needs of counties such as Oxford.

The system is not integrated. The county council looks at roads and bus services. It is able statutorily to subsidise loss-making bus services and to consult with people, but it has no involvement with rail services. At a local community level, we do not have an integrated community transport strategy, because rail is left in limbo.

What First Great Western and other train operators do depends largely on the contractual obligations placed on them by the Government. There are huge demands on the Government's rail budget for subsidies, so they are not particularly interested in subsidising loss-making and community lines in counties such as Oxfordshire. Therefore, there is spiralling decline. The Government say, "The Oxford to Bicester railway line needs only a few services each day, so that is all we will provide money for,"; First Great Western says, "We are not going to run any services for which there is no subsidy" and the service goes further into decline. Commuters and other passengers from Bicester to Oxford then find the service less and less reliable, and find other ways of travelling from Bicester to Oxford—often by bus or coach. Although buses and coaches carry large numbers of people, journey times are often much longer than on trains because of road congestion going into Oxford.

The Government think that they have got around the problem by introducing community rail partnerships. I can see that they might be of value in areas with a high number of tourists, where a branch line might be on the verge of closing and the Government, working with community groups and the tourism industry, might manage to preserve it, but that is not the situation in Oxfordshire.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) that community rail partnerships have been for many the beginning of the end. It is not community rail partnerships that we require, but an integrated transport strategy for counties such as Oxfordshire that looks at the next 10 to 20 years and asks where rail fits in. Rail will not fit in if we have, as we do at the moment, an ever-declining service on the rail lines from Oxford to Banbury and Oxford to Bicester.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor mentioned the Beeching cuts. I suspect that, if what we know now had been known in the mid-1950s, many of the lines cut during the Beeching period would not have been cut. Many of those could have provided good rail services today. My concern is that, if we do not focus on the potential for the use of rail in areas where the roads will become increasingly congested, by the time that we wake up and recognise the value of the railways as a means of getting people around not only long distances but locally from one town to another, they will have become run down to such an extent that they will not be revivable.

I have a couple of requests for the Minister. Can he and his officials have another look at community rail? They should not just say, "Okay, we will shove off that bit that is too difficult on to community rail partnerships." Instead, they should ask how, in counties such as Oxfordshire—my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) makes the same point about Wiltshire—we can ensure that rail services help people with journeys of often no more than 20 or 30 miles to the nearest university city, major town or connecting town. How can we do that and how can we integrate the system more with county councils?

Subsidies are clearly an issue. I asked the same question in the House. There is considerable subsidy in the rail network, but my constituents are no less worthy of rail subsidy to go to work, study or school than long-distance commuters who come from Exeter or Bristol to London. There has to be some transparency about the subsidies given out on the railways.

Can we please find ways in which to work out how to optimise the opportunities that rail transport and the railway network offer us? Otherwise, I can see that each year First Great Western will apologetically come and talk to the Cherwell rail users group and others and say, "We are terribly sorry. This is the requirement that has been placed on us by the Government. We are fulfilling that contract but we have to meet other obligations and we have that difficulty."

My other point is by way of parenthesis but it follows on from what my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead and my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor said. A number of commuters use the local services as connecting services via Oxford to London. There is a broad difficulty. To everyone in areas such as Oxfordshire and the Thames valley, its seems that First Great Western has either taken the decision or been told by the Government that the stretch of rail from Reading to Paddington must be as high speed as possible to enable long-distance trains to get through more quickly. The irony is that many local services are being held back. Not only are the number of trains from Islip, Tackley and Heyford fewer during the day, but the time of running is considerably longer, as is the time that those people have to wait for connections at Oxford. That is simply because of how the stretch of line between Reading and Paddington is used.

That must be considered, otherwise the irony will be that those living nearer to London will find their services becoming more and more disrupted. Apart from anything else, I cannot see that that makes good economic sense for First Great Western. All that will happen is that those nearer to London will take other options, not least getting in their cars and going up the M4 or the M40. That will mean a considerable loss of revenue for First Great Western. There has to be fairer access to the stretch of rail between Reading and Paddington, so that the people who live nearest to London and others are not penalised.

My concern is that we do not seem to have an integrated transport plan and local plan for how to use rail to the best effect as a community asset in areas in the south and south-east of England in particular. Housing numbers in those areas are growing exponentially and as a consequence car and road usage will grow. We are bound to see greater road congestion. Railways provide a wonderful, unique way of relieving that congestion cost-effectively. However, people will use them only if services are adequate and reliable. Services will not be adequate on the present system, with the Government giving minimal subsidy to the rail operators. The rail operators do not see an opportunity but a duty that they have to fulfil. We are missing an opportunity, which is sad. I hope the Minister can address it.

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): I appeal to the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen to keep their remarks to about seven minutes, as that will give the Minister time to sum up.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) on initiating the debate. The long-suffering commuter will be grateful to him and his colleagues for raising some of the issues.

Britain has the largest rail network in Europe, which has a key role to play in easing traffic congestion. In his introductory remarks, the hon. Gentleman gave us a short potted history of how the railways in the country began. I feel that he missed a bit from when the Conservatives were in power: privatisation, the effects of the introduction of Railtrack, and the doubling of costs. To be fair to the Government, the problems that we are dealing with now come from the underfunding in the Conservative years and the subsequent privatisation that, it seems, increased costs.

Adam Afriyie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Paul Rowen: To be fair, I only have seven minutes.

Adam Afriyie: It is only a quick point. The hon. Gentleman makes the slight that the Conservatives' cost-cutting, or whatever it was, caused the problem. After nine years of Labour Government, surely he cannot still be making the same old point that we are totally tired of.

Paul Rowen: I am not here to defend the Government, but long-term underinvestment cannot be addressed overnight.

Five issues need to be addressed. Although the debate this morning has concentrated on London and the south, as I represent a northern constituency, I want to make it clear that some of the issues that have been mentioned affect the rail network and commuters as a whole, and are not merely London-centric.

The first issue is the rail franchising system and the unprecedented power of the Secretary of State under the Railways Act 2005. The second is overcrowding on commuter services. The third is the age and suitability of much of the rolling stock. The fourth is the cost per mile. The fifth is the issue of capacity and bottlenecks, which have a major effect on future development and expansion not only in London but in the big cities, including Birmingham and Manchester.

The Railways Act gave the Secretary of State unprecedented powers. He stipulates and controls the franchise and can set the timetable within that. If we consider the issues that have been referred to, it is clear that many of those problems have come about as a result of setting the franchises so tightly. Although the Secretary of State sought to deny responsibility for such issues in the House last week, in my view he cannot escape that fact. Those powers exist and they have clearly been exercised. He can also require a review of rail services—we saw two published last week—and close unpopular routes.

If we look at the new franchises, and particularly the west country franchise, which was let to First earlier this year, we see that train numbers have been reduced despite unprecedented increases in passenger numbers. On the St. Ives Bay line, for example, passenger numbers are up 25 per cent., but the number of trains has been reduced from 26 to 23 each way in the summer and to 16 in the winter. On the Maritime line, passenger numbers are up 21 per cent, but the number of trains has been reduced from 13 to eight each way. It is the same on the Looe Valley line, where passenger numbers are up 16 per cent., but the number of trains has been reduced from 13 to eight each way. That is the direct result of a franchise that will deliver £1.13 billion to the Treasury over the next 10 years. In the past, many people would have expected the more profitable lines, such as the Bristol to London line, to help to subsidise some of the rural and branch commuter services, but that has not happened.

If we look elsewhere, we will see the same process beginning as each franchise is let. In my area, for example, the operator of the northern franchise wanted to introduce new services and an improved timetable, but the new franchise system has prevented them from doing so. That has had the consequence of continuing overcrowding, but the issue has not been addressed on lines such as that from Huddersfield to Manchester, which has only two carriageways. The review that was published last week contained no plans whatever to increase capacity on such lines.

[Paul Rowen]

As for overcrowding, the numbers of excess passengers are quoted for London, and the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) asked a telling question last week about commuter services in London, but similar figures are not available for elsewhere in the country. Overcrowding affects commuters who travel into not only London, but Manchester, Birmingham and our other big cities, and the House needs all the figures to be made available when we debate the development of services. The review that was published last week is meaningless for the northern franchise because it gives no information to back up some of the points that it makes.

I turn now to the age and suitability of the rolling stock. A few weeks ago, I asked a question about the plans for each franchise and what would be done to improve the age of the rolling stock. Of course, the average age, which the Government quote, has improved, but if we look at services other than those on inner-city lines or serving London, we see that things are different. The average age of northern franchise rolling stock is 19 years, and there are no plans to renew it. That is totally unacceptable. We have inefficient, old rolling stock that costs a fortune to run, but we are not dealing with the issue.

On the cost per mile, we are sometimes quoted figures for some rural lines that show that such lines are inordinately inexpensive and cost too much per mile. However, we do not see the figures. If we are to have an honest discussion about which services should be provided, we need the figures to be produced. It has now been decided to axe certain services in the west country, but such decisions should not be made just by the Department for Transport—they should involve local people. A key point about the Railways Act is that it removed control from passenger transport authorities and councils, which no longer have a proper say in the letting of franchises.

To sum up, I would like to see four things. As the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said, we need the network to be looked at as a whole, and there should not be this piecemeal letting of franchises. Secondly, we need more profitable lines to subsidise less profitable lines. Thirdly, we need long-term investment. The original plan talked about having franchises of 15 and 20 years, so that improvements could be made, but that is not happening, and all the franchises that have been let are for shorter periods. Finally, we need passenger transport authorities and local councils to play a greater role in setting priorities as part of an integrated transport plan. In short, we do not need the greater centralisation of the rail network that we are currently seeing. We need the Minister to be open about what is happening and we need to have an honest debate about the problems that we face.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under you in this curtailed debate, Miss Begg. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) on bringing this important subject before us. I shall keep my remarks brief and try to give the Minister as long as possible, because he will have much to say.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) needs to understand that 10 years have passed since privatisation. The Government have totally restructured the railways since then and could have taken back control of all the franchises had they chosen to do so. It is no good, therefore, fighting the battles of 10 years ago; we need to move on and to deal with the problems of today and tomorrow. That, however, is where the Government are letting people down. The truth is that, all round the country, lines are under threat of closure or service reductions and stations are in jeopardy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): Can the hon. Gentleman tell me which lines are under threat of closure?

Chris Grayling: I will happily do that if the Minister will wait for my remarks.

What the Government are doing is repeating what happened all too often in the days of British Rail. BR would decide that it no longer wanted to maintain or pay for a line, so it would dramatically scale back the services on it. Similarly, we now have lines in the west country, for example, where the number of trains a day has been cut by 50, 60 or 70 per cent. Not surprisingly, ridership on those lines will fall dramatically, and I would be prepared to bet that, in a short time, people in the industry and the Department will say, "These lines are no longer affordable. We need to close them." We are at the start of a slippery slope. Of course, there are no closures on the table today, but the Minister must surely realise that the cuts that he is making are creating the climate for closure.

I visited Dunbridge station, in Hampshire—in this case, one station is affected, not the whole line—where the number of services is falling from more than 20 to about five or six a day. The first morning train into Salisbury will now be at 10 o'clock in the morning, and anybody who goes into Salisbury will not be able to return until 7 o'clock in the evening. The morning train that children from the villages take to school is also being axed. That station will be in jeopardy because usership will fall, and somebody will turn round and say, "The station is not economical. We will get rid of it." The Government are starting rail services down a slippery slope in Cornwall, Hampshire and Oxfordshire.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) did not mention the way in which the Department has intervened directly to say that weekend services to stations in Oxfordshire should go. That is a completely new development on our railways. Today, civil servants and Ministers are working together as part of a team directly to control what happens on our railways. Timetabling is now decided in broad terms, although not to the exact minute past the hour, because Ministers do not decide whether a service will come at three minutes or 16 minutes past. However, they do decide how many trains there are from Twyford to Henley and how many pass through Bicester or use Westbury station on a typical day.

Derek Twigg: I do not want to eat into the hon. Gentleman's time and this is the last time that I will impose on his generosity. Is he saying that a Conservative Government would make no changes at all to services in what is a multibillion-pound business?

Is he saying that the timetables and the specification of any franchise should be left wide open and that there should be no base specification and no indication of what the Government want?

Chris Grayling: In those comments, the Minister highlights the amazing contradiction in what the Government are doing. He says that this is a multimillion-pound business and asks whether the Conservatives would intervene to decide things. It is not the job of politicians to decide what trains run at which times on the railways and where they stop—that is surely the job of rail professionals. That is where the Government are going wrong.

The reason why these changes are taking place is that the Government have set themselves a goal of realising significant savings from the railways. The changes and the reductions in specifications on rural railway lines are all part of an attempt by the Government to extract as much money as they can from the railways, to counterbalance a big jump in public subsidy in the past few years. On the one hand, the Treasury is trying to squeeze the new franchisees and get as much money out of them as it can; on the other hand, it is trying to reduce the specification for those franchises as far as possible, so that services to stations such as Westbury are removed from the equation. That means that Dunbridge in Hampshire gets fewer trains every day and that the Looe branch in Cornwall and all the other affected areas in Cornwall get fewer services. The changes are all about cost saving.

The Government are looking in the wrong place for efficiencies in our rail network. There are still huge issues around how Network Rail works. We still spend far more on rail maintenance and rail renewal than other countries. The hon. Member for Rochdale referred to Network Rail, and to maintenance and the level of investment in the railways. It is true that, for the past few years, the Government have been investing huge amounts of money and borrowing huge amounts through Network Rail to spend on infrastructure. In the end, however, we must surely catch up and start spending money on the real challenge in our rail network, which is to improve capacity.

Over the past few years, the Government have dramatically increased the amount of public money that they are spending on the railways. The Minister will no doubt tell us about the £87 million a week that is spent on the railways, and yet at the end of that time, with all that money being spent, where are we today? Most of the major rail projects in the 10-year plan have been scrapped. The modernisation of the Great Western route was part of the plan. Platform extensions, Thameslink 2000, Crossrail and the modernisation of the east coast main line were all promised by his predecessors by 2010, yet most will simply not happen.

At the same time, having spent all that money on the railways and increased public subsidy to such an extent, the Government are now cutting services in many parts of the country. If we cut rail services, fewer people are likely to use the railways. More people will get their car out of the garage and drive instead. When there is no train, the families in Dunbridge in Hampshire who have to get their kids to school in Salisbury every morning will get their cars out of the garage and drive them to school. That is surely the opposite of what the Government intended when they set out in office.

At the end of nine years, the Government have talked grand talk about transport and spent a lot of money—in the same way that they have spent a lot of money on the health service and education—yet we see the same picture in terms of delivery. There have been few improvements to capacity, although the network has succeeded despite the Government's efforts, because the private rail companies have managed to boost passenger ridership enormously in the past few years. Large amounts of money are being spent, but capacity problems are not being addressed and projects that could deal with them are being kicked into the long grass. The Government's only solution is apparently to go back to the old-fashioned route of Dr. Beeching: to cut services and downscale the number of trains serving stations, with the inevitable consequence that in the end they will close.

The result is that the railways are weaker. In many parts of the country, public transport services are disappearing, as a result of which more people will get out on to the roads. That is not where the Government started nine years ago and it is not what I believe they intended to do, but it is what is happening. It is time that we took a new direction and got better value for the public money being spent, rather than just chopping services in areas where the amount of money saved is, in fact, small. Having a train stop five times a day instead of 20 times a day saves a small amount of money and makes little difference to cost.

It is time that the Government got to grips with the real cost issues on the railways, addressed the capacity problems and came up with a proper strategy for the future of our railways, instead of meddling in detailed jobs such as timetabling and services, which are properly left to rail professionals.

10.54 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): In the short time available, I should like to do deal with as many issues as I can, but it will not be possible to deal with all of them. I congratulate the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) on securing this important debate. I note that his reading was "Thomas the Tank Engine". He may want to read through the "National Rail Timetable", from which he might get more information. He might also notice that it is a lot thicker than it was 10 years ago. In other words, there has been an increase of around 20 per cent. in services on our railways since his party was in government.

All hon. Members who spoke in this debate care passionately about their local rail services. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who is not here now, mentioned the Ashby and Coalville services in Leicestershire. I am sure that he will realise that we will need to engage the local authorities and Network Rail to develop a business case for that.

I note that when I asked the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) to name all the lines that were being closed down, he could not do so. It is ridiculous to suggest that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or I are an incarnation of Dr. Beeching, who reduced the number of stations from 5,000 to 2,700. We currently have about 2,500, so on that basis we would have no stations left at all. I do not honestly think that the hon. Gentleman thinks that that we intend to cut hundreds or thousands of stations.

It is important to look logically and clearly at where we are with today's railways. Of course, there will be changes and, of course, we have to look for value for money. As has been mentioned a number of times, there is demand where there are particular crowding and capacity issues, which is a big challenge that we will have to address and that we are addressing. I shall explain in the few minutes available what we are doing.

We are spending £87 million a week on the railways, with record investment in rolling stock and the youngest rolling stock for years. Overall passenger satisfaction is up—I am not pretending that there can be no more improvements, but it is improving. We have 20 per cent. more services than in the mid-1990s. On public performance measures, we are now above the 85 per cent. target for reliability of trains, and the target for this year may be exceeded, although we shall have to see what the latest figures say. The trains are more reliable, which is important to commuters, as well as rural rail travellers. A number of our train operating companies now achieve more than 90 per cent. reliability. We have been working with the industry to bring about those improvements.

Let me give some examples of what has been happening with the railways. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) mentioned the northern franchise, but the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell suggested on the radio a few weeks ago that we were going to cut the northern service. Well, we have not done so and we have no intention of doing so. He will probably be aware that TransPennine express will get new rolling stock, so investment in trains is taking place there—the northern rail services are obviously heavily subsidised. I announced 17 new trains for South West only a few weeks ago, so it is nonsense to suggest that no improvements are taking place.

Of course, we have—through longer trains and platforms, better timetabling and route utilisation strategies—to get better capacity out of the network. More than 1 billion passengers will use the railways this year, which is the greatest number since the early 1960s, but on a much smaller network. We have got more passengers on to the network. There are challenges, but people are using the network because they see investment going in and an improved service that is an alternative to using their cars.

Dr. Murrison: The Minister talked about rail utilisation strategies. Why does the rail utilisation strategy of 2003, which recommended an enhancement of the Bristol to Waterloo service, appear to have been ignored?

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman may want to read the latest rail utilisation strategy on South West, which Network Rail announced last week. I listened to his arguments about that service. We are considering the issue and will announce something shortly. Some £7.6 billion has been invested in the west coast main line and, with the channel tunnel rail link and the Thameslink box station, investment is taking place all the time.

On First Great Western, I have had a number of meetings with hon. Members, as has been made clear. We have listened and our officials are talking with First Great Western to consider what improvements we can make as part of that franchise process. However, as I have already made clear, the franchise is very large and we have to consider how to get the best benefit for the most passengers, and the best value for money, ensuring that the resources are best used rather than used on services that hardly anyone or no one uses.

Mrs. May: Does the Minister not understand that, in terms of benefits for sheer numbers of passengers, he needs to focus on the commuter services, not the long-distance services?

Derek Twigg: I can understand the right hon. Lady making a strong case for her constituents, but as I made clear, we look at the franchise as a whole and at how we can get the best benefit for the majority of passengers. She has made her points to me both in this debate and in a separate meeting, and will do so again in correspondence that we shall have shortly. We are looking at the issues and at how we can address the concerns that have been raised.

Housing (Overcrowding)

11 am

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to serve for the first time under your chairmanship, Miss Begg.

Overcrowded housing is an important issue, both in my London constituency and nationally. I shall talk about the reasons for that and then consider some of the solutions that the Government could consider more firmly. As a Hackney and London MP, I view these matters from the perspective of a city that is rapidly growing. London's population is set to grow by the equivalent of a city the size of Leeds by 2016. Indeed, we are already in the middle of that growth and are seeing the pressures put on all services in London, particularly housing. London is also a young city. In Hackney, 22.1 per cent. of the population is under the age of 16. Children and families need homes to live in—and they need them now.

Overcrowding may be concentrated in London, but it is not just a London issue. London and the south-east are widely acknowledged as the powerhouse of the British economy, and we need to create housing stock for our workers. The cost of not tackling overcrowding is high.

I shall highlight some of the problems in my constituency. Hackney is the third most overcrowded borough in London, with one person in 10—8,000 families—living in overcrowded accommodation. The number of households in this one London borough who live in overcrowded conditions is greater than can be found in whole cities. Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool and Bradford also suffer from overcrowding, but each of those cities has fewer such households than Hackney. In Greater London, 174,200 households, including 261,000 children—one fifth of London's children—live in overcrowded conditions. That figure rises to 30 per cent. among those who live in social housing.

The debate about overcrowding often has to deal with technical definitions and financial models. However, as I know only too well as a constituency Member, there is a human side. It is the people who are suffering from living in overcrowded conditions—the children who miss out and the families who suffer stress.

According to a survey of English housing conducted by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, 500,000 households nationally—900,000 children—live in overcrowded conditions. The problem has grown in London since 1991, and severe overcrowding has risen by almost 50 per cent. Black and minority ethnic families are six times more likely to live in overcrowded conditions than white British families, and overcrowding is particularly prevalent among Bangladeshi and African communities. That is why three east London boroughs top the unenviable overcrowding league.

The Mayor of London's involvement in housing has helped to sharpen the political focus on the issue, which is too big a problem for individual boroughs to deal with alone. Later, I shall touch on some of the funding problems of London boroughs. Nationally, the Minister of Communities and Local Government and his colleagues are debating the question of city regional government. I may not always see eye to eye with the Mayor of London—

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): Hear, hear.

Meg Hillier: That may be a moment of agreement with the Opposition.

The creation of strategic London government was an important and helpful step towards seeing the wider picture on housing, including overcrowding. Under this Government, we have seen a welcome growth in the number of affordable homes, but the balance of the various types of home is not right. The pressure for unit numbers—whichever party is in government will always exert political pressure to increase quantity—is often at the cost of a greater balance that would allow people to move within their communities rather than having to move out of London. I have much aneedotal evidence showing that those of my constituents who have the wherewithal to move from inner London to outer London or even outside London are doing just that in order to find the housing that they need. Over-focusing on one and two-bedroom properties in private and social housing stock is either driving families out or condemning them to live in cramped and unhealthy conditions, and many of their neighbours are in the same position, which often creates near ghettos of overpopulated areas.

The problems of imbalanced communities and affordable housing are not unique to cities, but they are acute in London, which is why I shall focus on their impact on the city. We need a greater supply of larger affordable housing, but other mechanisms are also needed in order to adjust the playing field so that, for example, it can become more cost-effective to upgrade older, larger homes than selling them to pay for smaller units.

Another issue that impacts on housing supply in London is under-occupancy. According to the ODPM's survey of English housing, 9 per cent. of London's social rented sector is under-occupied. Freeing up those larger homes will not solve overcrowding, but it could help, and many councils are at the forefront of initiatives to encourage tenants with spare bedrooms to move to smaller properties. For example, Hackney is adjusting its lettings policy to give more priority to overcrowded families. It is also increasing financial support for under-occupying tenants to cover the cost of moving to smaller properties—a simple thing that is often the brake on people's desire to move. It is also encouraging under-occupying tenants to move by offering them not only what they need, but a second bedroom, so that relatives who visit can use the spare room. That is one reason why people do not want to move from larger properties. I am delighted that Shelter, the housing charity, has highlighted Hackney's approach as good practice.

Even if all tenants with spare rooms moved to smaller properties, however, it would not solve the problem. I want to move on to some bigger solutions and issues. The main solution is a greater supply of housing, and altering the financial incentives for housing associations that are developing new social housing would help provide the right size and mix of units. I shall highlight supply and size of housing and consider some definitions of overcrowding, as well as mentioning the effects of not acting. I am not a technical expert on housing matters, but I worked in the housing field for more than a decade. I hope that the Minister is listening hard, because the stark fact is that the current definition has been extant since 1935. It is rather out of date. I see him nodding; he may like to comment in his winding-up speech.

The Housing Act 2004 allows the Government to modernise housing standards—a provision that I welcome. However, the Housing Act 1985 contains two legal definitions of overcrowding. I shall not go into detail, but I want to highlight the room and space standards. The room standard allows a large kitchen to be counted as a sleeping room. It puts no limit on the number of same-sex cohabitants in such rooms, and it does not include children under the age of 10. Under that definition, children under 10 are wiped out.

Under the space standard, children under the age of one do not count at all. A room is counted if it is a bedroom or living room, as are kitchens and dining rooms. Families can live in severely overcrowded conditions without hitting the Government's radar. Applying those definitions to the reality shows that it is probably a great deal worse than was suggested by the figures that that I cited earlier. I remind the House—I hope that the Minister will hear what I have to say—that, in theory, four children under the age of 10 could share a living room as a bedroom without being technically severely overcrowded.

I was delighted in 2003 when my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) promoted a private Member's Bill that recommended not counting living rooms or kitchens and giving every occupant of the household equal worth. A change is certainly needed, and I am pleased with the Government's recent announcement that they will consult on the statutory overcrowding standard. It is a step forward, but it is long overdue.

The Government have rightly highlighted the importance of education, on which debate is raging further down the Committee corridor today. Overcrowding has a big educational impact. A Shelter survey carried out at the end of last year showed that 80 per cent. of families felt that living in overcrowded conditions was damaging their children's educational prospects, That is self-evident. Overcrowding prevents children from having a quiet space to read, do their homework and study for exams. In my constituency, we have a number of homework clubs. Indeed, a local vicar in Haggerston in south Hackney, the Rev. Rose Hudson-Wilkin, has opened her home to local schoolchildren to provide them with space and peace to do their homework. I applaud her philanthropy, but the Government need to tackle the problem more systematically.

There are also international examples of the impact of overcrowding on education. Research entitled "The Urban Prospect", published in 2001 by New York's citizens housing and planning council, showed a link between overcrowding and lower levels of educational attainment. The study found that overcrowding reduces the probability of boys completing secondary school by almost 11 per cent., and that of girls by about 6 per cent. I do not doubt the Government's commitment to improving educational standards, but we need to do that across the piece. A home with the space to study must come high up the list.

The links between overcrowding and health are well documented. When I entered politics, the then director of public health stressed to me that the provision of better-quality housing for families living in poor, overcrowded homes would have one of the best impacts on local health. We have come on a bit during the past 12 years or so. However, I cite the Shelter survey again: 90 per cent. of families felt that overcrowding was damaging their children's health; asthma was the condition mentioned most often. It will not surprise hon. Members to hear that 86 per cent. of those surveyed felt that depression, anxiety and stress resulted from living in cramped quarters; every week, we see in our surgeries the impact of overcrowding.

Research also shows links between overcrowding and respiratory and infectious diseases. British Medical Association research shows that overcrowding in childhood significantly affects stature, rates of disease and rates of early mortality in adulthood. If we do not tackle overcrowding, we will condemn today's children to a life of health inequality. Tuberculosis is another problem that is particularly prevalent in London, and it is directly linked to overcrowding. I commend work done by the London assembly on the impacts and causes of TB, which is on the increase. In Hackney, TB rates are similar to those in China. In 2001, all but three of the 15 London boroughs with above-average overcrowding had an above-average incidence of TB. We know from research that overcrowding plays a larger role in the incidence of TB than do migration or ethnicity.

The critical argument is about the shortage of housing supply. The Government have done much good work to tackle the problem, but the concentration on one and two-bedroom properties has meant that the problems have not been entirely addressed. On 8 March, the Minister for Housing and Planning announced that in London the proportion of new housing built with three bedrooms or more would increase from 27 per cent. in 2004–06 to 35 per cent. from 2006–08. That was very welcome. In Hackney, the fruits of that policy are eagerly awaited, especially by the tenants of Haggerston West and Kingsland estate, who await a determination about their estate transfer, which has been discussed, in particular, because of the need to include larger family properties on the estate.

Supply is one part of overcrowding, but we need other ways of tackling the problem in the short term. I commend the 10-point plan drawn up by the Association of London Government, with the support of the National Housing Federation. The key points include a call for a national target to reduce overcrowding, which I support. People often mock nationally set targets, but all types of professionals on the ground tell me that Government targets have a beneficial impact because they focus local delivery, so a national target would be a good step forward. I also support the ALG's calls for the Government to have an overcrowding unit; perhaps it is time we had an overcrowding tsar. The Minister is smiling at the idea; perhaps he could have the job.

I should also like grant funding to be re-jigged to make the building of family-sized units easier and more affordable. Local housing associations in Hackney tell me that although we need more family-sized units locally, they do not provide the rent return that comes from building more one and two-bedroom properties. That is a perverse situation, which we need to change by considering the cost per person of building a home, rather than the cost per home. It is a typical clash between the Treasury and the delivery arm of the Government. The common-sense argument is there, but we need to make sure that it is translated. I am not sure whether the Minister can make pledges about what the Treasury can do, but perhaps he can comment on any discussions between the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Treasury on this issue.

I turn to the need for one small but important measure in London. A number of housing associations have been selling their larger properties, particularly street properties and older properties. We need a brake on the sale of such properties, incentives to do them up and more support for tenants who want to move out of larger social homes and into other properties. Perhaps we could collate the existing funding mechanisms and provide extra support.

One of the bizarre aspects of current policy is that Housing Corporation funding rules reduce, pound for pound, the money that housing associations receive from local funding. I am a great believer in decentralisation and in local government having a role strategically, and in some cases in delivery terms, in tackling the detailed needs of an area. It seems an emasculation of local government, however, to say, "Fine, you can fund housing associations to provide more housing", but then to remove money from the national pot.

In the 2004 spending review, an extra 10,000 new socially rented homes were promised by 2007–08, and a total of 75,000 homes over three years. That has been very welcome and I do not underplay the step change the Government have made in focusing on housing. However, I am looking to the next comprehensive spending review, as no doubt the Minister is, although perhaps he cannot commit at this point. I should like the Government to commit to the recommendations of the Barker review and ensure that the resources are available to deliver on those pledges.

The Government have done a great deal and recent announcements give me great hope, but I urge the Minister to start acting now to ensure that the benefits accrue for this generation of our children, as well as the next.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I am delighted to serve under your chairmanship, Miss Begg. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing this debate on an issue that, as she rightly points out, affects Members of the House weekly at our surgeries and in our post bags, although it particularly affects those experiencing the effects of overcrowding. We have already heard that 500,000 households suffer from overcrowding. Each of those could tell us a story about how overcrowding has affected a group of people.

The definitions of overcrowding were set a long time ago, when ways of living and working were very different. Those definitions need to be reviewed and we need to change how overcrowding is handled in respect of the provision of new social housing. We have heard how overcrowding can damage not only physical but mental health; depression is becoming a bigger element of the burden on local GPs' surgeries. Overcrowded housing must be a significant factor among those that cause people such distress that they need to go to GPs' surgeries.

We have heard about the effects of overcrowding on young people's educational opportunities—the chance to study, read and do homework. It also affects their opportunity to play, however, which as we all know is an important part of a young person's life. Why should some young people not have the chance to play and enjoy life as their classmates can?

A family who live in a housing association property in my constituency came to see me recently. They do not have the resources to move on to the private sector, so they went to the housing association and said that they could put together the funding to add a little extension or conservatory to their house. That would have given their children, who had to share a bedroom, a place to play. That suggestion was constructive; the family had obviously explored all the avenues. The housing association considered the proposal and was supportive, but the plan did not stack up for the planning department and the family were unable to carry it out. People in such situations are thinking constructively and trying to work with the authorities to overcome their situations. At the end of the day, however, if the housing stock is not there, we shall find that such situations are ongoing.

We have heard a great deal about the situation in Hackney and across London, but the problem also exists in rural areas. Colleagues who represent urban areas would doubtless echo the comments made about the situation in Hackney, but village communities in North Cornwall face a significant problem because the number of second homes has reached an unsustainable level. Young families cannot afford to stay on in the area where their parents grew up and are being forced to look further afield for accommodation. They find that because they are all being driven into the towns, no accommodation is available in urban centres either.

In essence, the problem is caused by a lack of new social housing. The right to buy has meant that many council houses have passed out of the social rented sector. The comparison between the number of council houses that have been sold and the number of people who are on waiting lists for social rented accommodation shows quite a correlation. We need more action from the Government to replace housing stock that has moved out of the social rented sector.

We can also consider the problem of overcrowding not just in terms of small homes—one or two-bedroom properties. The problem of homelessness at home also exists. Some families who would otherwise have moved out of their parents' accommodation are unable to do so because there is no alternative accommodation for them. It is not just that the accommodation is not large enough, but that it does not exist.

Again, I can give an example from my constituency. A young single mother had to return to her parents' home, a one-bedroom council property, because of a relationship breakdown. She and her child were applying for council properties but stayed with her parents in that one-bedroom council property—there were three adults and one child—for a year until she was able to move out. That represents a year out of that child's life and education. That distressing problem for the whole family was caused not by the size of the property, but by the lack of affordable property for her to move on to, full stop.

We need larger homes to be available. I am interested as to whether the Minister will come forward with any proposals about how the Government plan to address that issue and to examine standards, to which the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch referred. She also mentioned that moving towards a target for tackling overcrowding might be helpful. That is worth examining, particularly if it is linked to powers for those in local areas to address the problem. We would hate a target to involve no extra funding or powers enabling local housing associations and local councils to act to meet it.

The hon. Lady was getting to the nub of the problem when she spoke about how housing associations can set their rent levels in terms of the number of people in the property. There is an incentive to build denser, newer developments of smaller properties, as opposed to larger properties that would meet the need that we are discussing today.

My party believes that the way to address some of the problems is, first, to free up councils and housing associations to take every opportunity to provide more housing and to give them more flexibility to consider its nature. Some councils are working hard to explore every opportunity to provide housing. South Shropshire district council has, in some village developments, sought to ensure that every new development of two houses or more must have an affordable home. That is a step forward. It has had to sell that proposal to the local communities involved, but the response has been good and it has been able to provide more affordable homes as a result.

We would also like mutual housing associations—associations that would give their tenants, as their shareholders, more say in future development. All parties support greater investment in shared equity, and mine is keen to promote a golden share option, to ensure that those properties remain locally available for renting in the longer term.

I also want a right to invest, so that people can build up equity in their council housing or housing association property in order to give them the opportunity to move on into the private sector. That would help them, and it would also help to release the properties for future generations. Moving on in terms of shared equity also needs careful consideration; there should be an option for people to move up in the scale of property where required and for them then to be given incentives to move down again. We have heard that that is happening in Hackney.

For those reasons, I hope that the Government will come forward with proposals over the coming months and years to increase investment in the provision of affordable housing and to ensure that some of the new ideas being piloted in councils around the country can be explored and perhaps pushed forward. Overcrowding is a serious problem for those in urban areas and a serious and growing problem for those in rural areas. We need more affordable housing, and we need to ensure that the affordable housing that is provided meets the needs of the communities that it is there to serve.

11.26 am

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship this morning, Miss Begg.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing this debate. I know that she has spent more than a decade taking an interest in housing issues, and her speech did her great credit. She reflected both on the problems in her constituency and on the broader issue that we face in tackling overcrowding in housing. Her speech was a model of clarity and exposition, and I congratulate her on it.

I believe that the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Rogerson) was making his Front-Bench debut, and I thank him for laying out the issues from a rural perspective with particular clarity and for contributing to what I hope will be a broad consensus on the need to tackle this issue. Westminster Hall is not usually an arena for vicious partisanship, and I hope that it will not be so today. In sharing a commitment to tackle the problem, I hope that we can establish a degree of consensus across the Front Benches.

I also want to thank Shelter, the campaigning housing charity, not only for its sustained campaigning effort for many years, but for its poster in Westminster station. Those of us who regularly use the Jubilee line will be familiar with that striking and effective poster. It shows a number of children in the House of Commons, crawling over the Dispatch Box and so on, and vividly and graphically brings home to parliamentarians and others what the reality of overcrowding might mean. The picture paints a thousand words—words that are conveyed more effectively than the thousand words of mine that the Hansard reporters are recording today.

The scale of the problem was outlined with particular authority by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch. She reminded us that about 500,000 households in Britain today experience overcrowding. As we know, that means that almost 1 million children are growing up in circumstances that are an affront to social justice. She reminded us of the particular problems that she encounters in her constituency. Across London, 175,000 households experience overcrowding, which means that about 261,000 children are growing up in circumstances that they should not have to face. The Minister represents a seat that covers the London boroughs of Newham and Tower Hamlets—the two local authorities in London that have the most severe overcrowding problem—so he will know the scale of the problem from his constituency postbag.

As both speakers have spelled out, the consequences of the problem are particularly severe for children. The consequences in health terms have been graphically spelled out. As the hon. Lady pointed out, respiratory problems, particularly tuberculosis, are on the increase, and overcrowding is a crucial factor. The hon. Member for North Cornwall said that when it comes to mental health and well-being, overcrowding contributes to stress and anxiety, and in the worst cases to depression.

There are compelling reasons for dealing with overcrowding in terms of both public health and educational outcomes. As both speakers pointed out, it is increasingly difficult for children and teenagers living in overcrowded housing to get the space that they need to devote themselves to the study that will allow themselves to make the most of their lives and their potential.

Nearly a century ago, Virginia Woolf wrote a book entitled "A Room of One's Own". Part of the burden of that book was the difficulty that women had faced in the past, overwhelmed as they were by crippling domestic duties, in managing to clear both the time and the space for creative endeavour. Her plea then—an explicitly feminist plea—is one that should be made on behalf of our children and teenagers today. They need a room of their own—their own space in which they can not only grow and develop psychologically, but study and make the most of their homework. Such a space would help young people's schooling and ensure that they become all that they can be.

We recognise that this problem has a direct effect on health and educational outcomes for our young people and that we need to address it, and I suspect that there is a consensus throughout the House on that. How should we go about addressing it? As the hon. Lady pointed out, her colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) tried to introduce a private Member's Bill to modernise the definition of statutory overcrowding. The last time we had a statutory definition was in 1935, when there was a national Government and Ramsay MacDonald was the Prime Minister; some of us, I suspect, are nostalgic for those days, while others perhaps are not. In 1935, the definition was accepted simply as a working definition; it was seen not as the ideal, but simply as a means to an end—a staging post on the road to improvement.

I suspect that there is broad consensus at present that the time is long overdue for revisiting the definition of statutory overcrowding. Indeed, that has certainly been hinted at by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. As the hon. Lady also pointed out, both the room standard and the space standard in that definition are outdated. We cannot have a situation in our country in which living rooms are counted as bedrooms in working out whether individuals are suffering from overcrowding, and in which four children sleeping in one room does not count as overcrowding. That offends against common sense.

Legislation on its own is not enough, however. We can legislate to deal with this problem, but that is not a magic wand. It is helpful in setting a benchmark and in governing our direction of travel, but it will not in itself resolve the problem. What can we do? As both hon. Members who have spoken have pointed out, we need to address the issue of supply and to ensure that, as we increase and free up supply, we have the right mix of houses.

When we examine supply, we discover that there have been melancholy trends in the statistics since the early 1990s. Again, I make my comments in a spirit of bipartisanship, and although some of my remarks may be construed as critical of the Government—and, indeed, they are—some of them are also critical of the Conservatives towards the end of our time in government, when our contribution to and investment in social housing started to fall. There has been a fall in housing supply since the very early 1990s. According to the ODPM's own figures, that reduction meant that over the period broadly from 1991 to the beginning of the 21st century we had an excess in the growth of households over the amount of new homes of about 500,000. Therefore, 500,000 households did not get the houses they deserved.

Since the beginning of the current century there has been a welcome increase in housing supply, but it is still the case that household growth outstrips the supply of new housing, and the most recent ODPM figures on household growth emphasise that households are growing at an even faster rate than we envisaged. It is therefore incumbent on all of us to do everything we can to free up supply further.

The point has been made, not least by the hon. Member for North Cornwall, that the constrictions in housing supply have been particularly acute in the social housing sector. Even though there has been a welcome increase in the amount of new development in the private sector, there is still not enough of it and there has not been a matching increase in the supply of social housing.

Meg Hillier: What is the current policy of the hon. Gentleman's party on right-to-buy sales, which in London in particular have caused a significant loss of social housing—and especially of housing units of the size that we have been talking about?

Michael Gove: I thank the hon. Lady for mentioning the right to buy, because I believe that it was a hugely successful policy in its time and that it still has some relevance. I think that most people now agree that when the right to buy was introduced, the proportion of people living in social housing was too large to allow true pluralism in housing supply and mix of tenure. There was an unmet need for ownership, which the right to buy succeeded in meeting.

Inevitably, however, as more individuals who want to own have moved towards ownership the demand for the right to buy has dropped. We have certain concerns about the way in which that demand for ownership among people in social housing has been constricted by some of the restrictions on the right-to-buy policy that this Government have introduced, but I do not want to labour that point at present. None the less, the amount that people are offered as a discount has fallen, and as a result, fewer people than might have wanted to take up that right have done so.

One of the key points about the right to buy is that it contributes to a net increase in housing supply. When individuals buy, the money that the local authority or housing association—or other registered social landlords—get from the sale can contribute to new capital investment. I acknowledge that there is a net reduction in social housing as a result of the right to buy, but there is a net increase in housing supply overall, and that is my party's aim.

Part of that increase has to be an increase in the supply of social housing. As the hon. Lady pointed out, we can help local authorities that are encouraging more efficient use of their own housing stock and tackling the issue of houses where individuals have surplus bedrooms by encouraging them to move and providing the right incentives for them to do so. I applaud local authorities of all parties that have tried to do that.

As the hon. Lady hinted, however, we should explore new and innovative ways of supporting RSLs and private developers in supplying an increased level of social housing. I learned last week from Inside Housing magazine that the ODPM is looking afresh at the extent of the involvement of private developers in the supply of social and affordable housing. If that is indeed the direction of travel in which the Minister and his team wish to move, we would like to encourage them.

The hon. Lady also pointed out that the current way in which housing associations receive their funding does not encourage exactly the right mix of housing stock. Specifically, it encourages using houses or flats that are too small for current needs. This is an area in which the Treasury is perhaps not on the side of the angels; if so, this is not the first occasion on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been a roadblock to reform. However, I hope that the Minister and his colleagues in the ODPM will bring their considerable weight to bear in encouraging him to move out of the way on this issue.

Meg Hillier: I would be interested if the hon. Gentleman could outline his party's policy on funding larger social units.

Michael Gove: I am attracted by what the hon. Lady has said about the need to change the funding mechanism in order to help create larger social housing units, because what we need to do overall is ensure that we move away from the constricted spaces that we are offering people both in the social housing sector and in private sector developments. I will address shortly the question of constricted space and what we need to do to encourage the right sort of development.

In talking about housing supply overall, however, I want to touch briefly on the contribution that the private rented sector can make. Although there will always be a valuable role for RSLs to play—in my view, it will be an increasingly important role over the coming few years—we also need to recognise that private landlords can play a significant part in meeting housing need. My only specific comment on this issue will be to ask a question of the Minister: has the ODPM fully considered the consequences of the level of regulation, following on from the Housing Act 2004, that has been placed on private landlords? Some of that regulation was welcome in that it increased the standards of private rented accommodation, but Conservative Members have received representations from private landlords that some aspects of that regulation might create a constriction of supply. I would be interested to hear his views about the likely future supply of private rented housing.

One way in which we can increase housing supply overall is by encouraging private development. I was fortunate enough yesterday to spend some time with my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) in Hammersmith and Fulham, looking at a new housing development there, which has been welcomed by many residents in that area. It is striking that that development has been welcomed, because one of the things my right hon. Friend pointed out in a recent article in The Independent on Sunday is that in order to deal with the pressing need to increase the supply of housing in this country, we have to tackle the resistance to development that is a feature of life in Britain today.

We are all familiar with the "not in my backyard" culture. We all know that there is resistance to development, but rather than simply deprecating it, we should try to understand it. Rather than condemning a little more, we should try to understand a little more. If we try to understand why there is resistance to development, we find that local people often feel that they are not consulted properly about the nature of development. They feel that distant planning decisions are taken at the level of the ODPM, which often overrides local authorities' opinions. New development is often not of an aesthetic standard that they would welcome. Also, new development often comes without the infrastructure for which local people feel a need, so greater strain will inevitably be placed on existing infrastructure as a result of individuals coming into an area.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney made another point: in an increasingly environmentally conscious age, it may be appropriate to ensure that any new developments make their contribution to the battle against climate change. Many people would be more inclined to welcome development if they saw that developers took that into consideration when supplying new housing.

If we are to tackle resistance to development, we must ensure that local people are given a greater say; work with developers and perhaps use urban design codes to ensure that new housing is of the right aesthetic standards; and ensure that local authorities are properly funded in terms of the infrastructure that they need, and so can welcome development. At the Invermead development, which we visited yesterday, all three considerations were taken into account. People in Hammersmith and Fulham were consulted before the development proceeded. The building is of a high aesthetic standard and is, as far as possible, in keeping with the existing architectural standards. Also, infrastructure has been respected. The development is on the site of the old Queen Charlotte's maternity hospital, but it includes a brand new community health centre. That way, an emotional and practical link with the original site is maintained, and people can see that a key additional infrastructure benefit comes along with the housing. We believe that if we tackle all three concerns, we can build consensus across the country in favour of the development that is needed in order to meet demand for new housing.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall made an interesting point about the situation in south Shropshire, where the local district council, which I think is Liberal Democrat at the moment, has a particularly tight target for affordable housing when it comes to new developments. An interesting proposition put forward by a number of Members from all parties is that under current regulations that govern when new developers have to build affordable housing into a development, the level is set too high. The trigger point of 15 homes for new housing developments may need revisiting for two reasons: first, we may not be getting the supply of affordable and social housing that we need; secondly, that target encourages dense, flatted developments of 10 to 12 flats on sites of existing family homes, rather than the imaginative sort of developments that we might wish for.

If local authorities could set their own target, as South Shropshire district council has sought to do, they could decide that a development of five new private houses would trigger the need to provide affordable housing. That would have a double benefit: it would potentially increase the supply of affordable housing, while reducing the transformation of multi-bedroom family homes into flatted developments.

Meg Hillier: The hon. Gentleman may find that he agrees on that point with the Mayor of London, who has sought to introduce a lower threshold in exactly the way that the hon. Gentleman describes.

Michael Gove: It is a rare moment when I find myself in agreement with the Mayor of London, but I am not sure that I actually do in this case. I believe in the devolution of power, as the Mayor does, and I believe that it is worth exploring whether local authorities should have that power, but the Mayor has sought to introduce mechanisms that we fear have constrained developers in some respects. However, I shall not devote my remaining time to criticising the Mayor of London; I will leave that to other members of the hon. Lady's party, who can do it with greater authority.

The hon. Lady congratulated the Minister for Housing and Planning on her commitment to increasing the size of new social housing in London. Having talked about the need to free up supply overall, I want to touch on the type of homes that we want, because the Minister for Housing and Planning makes an important point. Unfortunately, only 6 per cent. of new social housing in London has four or more bedrooms. That is part of a broader pattern in this country. In 1990, only one eighth of new homes were flats. By 2004, just under 50 per cent. were flats. We need to address the reasons why we are producing dwellings that are smaller than we need.

It is a melancholy fact that Britain has not only some of the oldest, but some of the pokiest, housing stock in Europe. In particular, we are bottom of the European league for the size of new houses. We have not only the smallest new houses in Europe, but the smallest rooms in the smallest houses in Europe. Why? Well, the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch touched on one reason: Government funding and the way in which it affects our housing associations and other registered social landlords who supply social housing. However, there is another reason, too—one on which there is a divide between the Front Benchers—and that is the way in which the Government operate planning policy.

Under planning policy guidance note 3, or planning policy statement 3, the Government have encouraged density. Increasingly, they have made our urban areas the site of dense, flatted development. Family homes have been replaced with new dwellings under the "pile 'em high, sell 'em cheap" principle. We need to recognise that the current definition of gardens as brownfield land is wrong; gardens are green lungs in our cities, sources of biodiversity and—for families that are growing up—valuable space in which children can have the freedom to develop and, as the hon. Member for North Cornwall pointed out, play and grow. We believe that we should look more broadly into how communities can grow organically, so that the need for more family homes can be addressed and so that the relative oversupply of flats, as compared with houses, can be corrected. Most people in this country want to live in family homes with or near green space, and we should go with the grain of that aspiration.

Meg Hillier: I fear that the hon. Gentleman, in his erudite and typically well researched speech, is confusing density with types of property; there can be dense housing with gardens, and high-rise blocks are not necessarily any denser than street properties. I would like him to outline his party's policy on where the 1 million extra people in London will go if we do not develop homes in the inner city.

Michael Gove: The hon. Lady sets two challenges. The first is that density need not mean constriction or high-rise developments. That is certainly true. We know from Edinburgh, Bath and indeed Islington that housing can be both dense and attractive. Unfortunately, the melancholy trend at the moment is towards densification through the replacement of family houses that have green spaces with flatted developments in which the green space is built over, and with smaller dwellings.

Unfortunately, as I pointed out earlier, not only are our new homes smaller than those in other European countries, but the rooms in them are smaller. That contributes to the broad problem of overcrowding and the lack of supply of the types of houses that we need. The hon. Lady and I agree about the scale of housing need in London. As I have pointed out, there are a number of things that we can do to encourage the right sort of development in London, but we also need to recognise that communities across the country need to grow.

One of our differences with the ODPM is that its approach to allowing communities to grow under the sustainable communities plan means that some are perhaps growing at too fast a rate, in the way set out under central plans. We would like local communities to be given a greater say in how development occurs, and we would like organic growth. I do not believe that there is a hamlet in this country that cannot afford a few extra houses, a village that cannot afford significantly more than that, or a town that cannot afford, and would not welcome, significantly more again. I would like a spread of housing development across the country, with local people persuaded and encouraged to accept development—provided, that is, that their voice was respected, that the aesthetic standard of those new houses was high, and that infrastructure proceeded hand in hand with the new housing development.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for arriving late for this important debate, Miss Begg. It was the attractions of Bill Clinton that kept me away for so long.

[Mr. Andrew Love]

I want to press the hon. Gentleman on the phenomenon of the expected increase in the number of households containing single people or childless couples. Although I accept his argument that there is a need for family accommodation in social housing, I point out that we will need more small-scale accommodation to house the rapidly increasing numbers of childless couples and single people.

Michael Gove: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his point, and I entirely understand why he was absent. Bill Clinton is a bigger attraction than any of us. At the beginning of my speech, I said that the Opposition recognise that the scale of future household growth requires significant additional housing. Like the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, I paid tribute to the hon. Gentleman's private Member's Bill and his crusade to deal with the definition of statutory overcrowding. I am delighted to see him in the Chamber.

This country has become more prosperous during the past 30 years. One key thing about countries that become more prosperous is that people generally like to live in more spacious homes with access to green space. It is an entirely worthy aspiration. I do not think that just because individuals no longer live in large or extended families, we should automatically say, "You're condemned to live in this type of housing." Flatted developments and sheltered housing will be appropriate for certain people towards the end of their lives, when they want to live in a smaller space because larger space becomes unmanageable. As the hon. Lady said, enlightened local authorities are providing incentives for people to move out of social housing that may be too big for them. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation made this discovery:

"People's least favourite type of development in their community is the high rise block."

Only 28 per cent. of people say that their preferred form of living is high-density city-centre living. There is clear evidence that the popular demand is for more space in greener cities and greener communities. That is the direction of travel in which housing should go.

Finally, because I have taken up far too much time, I have just a few questions for the Minister. First, we should all like to know where we are on progress towards a new statutory definition of overcrowding. Secondly, what new initiatives might we see from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to increase the supply of social housing and to ensure that it is of the right kind? Thirdly, as a general indication, has he considered the effect of regulation on the private rented supply?

Finally and perhaps most importantly, what will be done in the next few years to encourage development and to free up supply? In particular, does the Minister accept that when it comes to tackling the resistance to development in our country, it is not enough to belabour those who resist it? We must take them with us by understanding their concerns, so that we can address the pressing need, which I think everyone agrees we have, to deal with the problem of overcrowding, the health and education challenges that it poses us, and in particular, the challenge it poses us to ensure that our society is socially just and inclusive.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): Miss Begg, it is a pleasure to see you in the chair presiding over this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) on securing this important debate. As a fellow east London MP, she knows that I share the type of casework that she receives. I have close, first-hand knowledge of the serious problems that she raises, as the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) acknowledged. I also associate myself with his generous tribute to my hon. Friend, as well as the welcome that he extended to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Rogerson).

I welcome the characteristically thoughtful, well crafted and constructive contribution of the hon. Member for Surrey Heath. I hope to continue the debate in that spirit. However, the consensus seemed to break down towards the end, particularly when the hon. Gentleman was tested by some of my hon. Friend's questions about his party's financial commitment to the house-build programme that I shall outline. I believe from the Sunday newspapers that his leader is about to make a pronouncement about the new-build programme, so perhaps that was the reason why the hon. Gentleman was unable to supply as much information as might have been helpful. None the less, I am conscious that both Opposition parties have made a constructive contribution to the debate, and I welcome it.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch said, the statutory overcrowding standards have been with us for a considerable time—indeed, they have remained unchanged since 1935. Back in 1935, those provisions were considered very much reforming measures. The key motivation was to promote better health. Given the other social advances since 1935, overcrowding is now much less likely to indicate grossly insanitary conditions or a high risk of the spread of life-threatening diseases, notwithstanding the qualification of tuberculosis, as my hon. Friend mentioned. However, I recognise that overcrowding can still raise health concerns, bringing on stress, making the spread of infection easier, and increasing the risk of accidents in the home.

The Government do not defend the current overcrowding standards. They are very out of date. They discount sleeping in rooms other than bedrooms and they tolerate unacceptable degrees of sharing by children who, by any modern standard, are old enough to need their own space. That is why we took powers in the Housing Act 2004 to amend the standards, and undertook to consult on how the powers might be used. Some hon. Members feel that we have taken rather too long to consult, but we needed to consider the statutory standards in the context of our housing policies, and I shall explain how we are doing that.

Information on overcrowding under the 1935 standards is not collected systematically, but we believe that about 20,000 households are statutorily overcrowded. That is roughly 0.1 per cent. of households. The other measure is the bedroom standard, a long-standing statistical measure that is used in the English housing condition survey and represents the main source of data on overcrowding. We know that 2.5 per cent. of households—just over 500,000 households—are overcrowded by that measure.

Both of those percentages are small, but I do not underestimate the impact on overcrowding upon those families, nor do I seek to diminish the wide variations that the figures conceal. For instance, overcrowding is more of a problem in London, where 150,000 households are overcrowded, of which 29,000 are severely overcrowded in the social rented sector. Overcrowding throughout the whole of London is 6.3 per cent. by the bedroom standard. Specifically in the social sector in London, it is calculated at 11.8 per cent.

Ethnicity, as mentioned by hon. Members, is also a significant issue. Within London's social rented sector, for instance, the rate of overcrowding is 7.8 per cent. for white households, but 17.8 per cent. for black and minority ethnic households. The highest rate of overcrowding by ethnic group in London's social rented sector is 29 per cent. among Bangladeshi households. They account for just 3 per cent. of all households but 10 per cent. of all overcrowded households in London's social rented sector.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch raised the question of the Association of Local Government's 10-point plan on overcrowding, which has been welcomed by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Love: Before my hon. Friend reels off the estimates about overcrowding, may I inform the Chamber that according to the English house condition survey, more than 900,000 children are affected by overcrowding—about 260,000 of them in Greater London? Does he accept that if the Government are to achieve their ambition of halving child poverty by 2010 and eliminating it by 2020, action has to be taken on overcrowding?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. The whole House knows the work that he has undertaken on this subject over many years. He brings a great deal of expertise to bear on our proceedings. I fully accept his point about children and child poverty. The tone of this morning's debate and the constructive comments from all Members who have contributed reflect the all-party support for dealing with the matter as seriously, positively and constructively as possible.

I was talking about the ALG's 10-point plan. We understand that the ALG will finalise the report and publish its action plan in June. Obviously, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will consider it carefully.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch referred to relations between the ODPM and the Treasury. She will know that we have doubled investment in social housing since 1997. Substantial progress has been made on cutting rough sleeping, getting families out of bed-and-breakfast accommodation, dealing with the repairs backlog that we inherited in 1997 and tackling the 2 million homes below the decency threshold. In addition, the numbers of new homeless are falling. Given all that, our priorities are to help people out of temporary accommodation and to deal with overcrowding, especially in London.

Over the next two years, the Government are investing nearly £4 billion in the Housing Corporation's national affordable housing programme to deliver 84,000 new homes—21,000 more than in the past two years. Of those, 49,000 will be new build social rented homes. That constitutes a significant increase in the annual supply of new social housing to help those who cannot afford to rent privately.

I heard what the hon. Member for Surrey Heath said and I shall return in a moment to the issue of the private rented sector. In particular, I heard what he said about people who oppose the rate of house building and our plans and about the need to take people with us. There is support for many of the Barker proposals, but there is also a lot of resistance in a variety of areas. The hon. Gentleman may have to accept ultimately that some people simply will not want to see development in their area. Obviously, a balance needs to be struck. We hope that we can take people with us because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch said, the number of extra homes that we will need, not only in London but throughout the country, is considerable—it is estimated at 4 million. Given the lack of new build in the past 30 years, we are having to catch up in a very short time.

Mr. Love: I join my hon. Friend the Minister in welcoming the new approach taken by Her Majesty's Opposition in recognising the difficulties that we face in delivering the housing required and in meeting the strict environmental standards that people want to be applied in their communities.

I want to press the Minister a little on the Barker proposals. As he outlined, the Government are increasing the supply of affordable rented accommodation, which is very welcome. According to the official statistics, about 10,000 additional units will be completed, yet the targets in the Barker report were for 17,000 to 23,000 additional units of affordable accommodation. I recognise that, under the current spending review, that will not be achieved, but I hope that the Minister will take back to the Department the fact that Parliament would like those Barker proposals to be implemented, as the Government have already indicated, under the next spending review.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I think, Miss Begg—I apologise, Mr. Hood; I did not see your arrival. May I, on behalf of all colleagues present, welcome you to the Chair?

My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) makes a pitch for the Barker proposals. I hope to return to some of the Government's commitments later in my speech. If I do not cover the figures, I will write to my hon. Friend, but I think that they are included in my speech. As he suggests, the Barker report is fundamental to the Government's direction of travel. There is a commitment. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch raised the relationship between the ODPM and the Treasury. That relationship clearly involves dynamism. We are clear that we have to address the question that has been raised, and I will provide some reassurance shortly in respect of numbers and the immediate future.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning recently announced a new programme of work to deal with overcrowding and its impact on children.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

We are increasing the proportion of new social housing with three or more bedrooms to be built in London from 27 to 34 per cent. in the 2006–08 affordable housing programme. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch welcomed that in her opening speech. We are building on the preventive measures that have been successful in reducing the number of new homeless families in London by 25 per cent. in the past year. We are encouraging London boroughs to make better use of cash incentive schemes and tailored support to help single people wanting to move out of larger accommodation and to help families to move to other areas where they can find larger homes. Against that background of specific measures, we shall consult in the next few months on the statutory definition of overcrowding.

As my hon. Friend said, there are examples of good practice. Hackney and Tower Hamlets are two of the local authorities that are hardest pressed in respect of overcrowding and they are seeking innovative solutions to assist their communities to have better housing conditions. I recognise that overcrowding is seen as a neglected problem, but it would be wrong to think that authorities have not been considering the issue or not reporting the contribution that overcrowding makes to the totality of housing need in their areas. All local authorities have carried out housing needs surveys, which included assessments of overcrowding. Those surveys, along with other data on housing needs, inform the assessment of the need for new affordable housing set out in authorities' housing strategies.

Part 7 of the Local Government Act 2003 puts the strategies on a statutory footing for the first time, because the Government believe that a robust strategy is essential to the delivery of local authorities' housing functions. Our guidance stresses the importance of addressing all relevant issues in housing strategies. One element of the strategy in respect of which the hon. Member for Surrey Heath requested information was private landlords' role and regulation in that regard. The Government agree that private landlords have a vital role. There are many good landlords, but there is also a lot of poor stock and bad management, as hon. Members know. The package of measures in the Housing Act 2004 addresses that. Responsible landlords and their associations recognise the need to raise standards.

The provisions may look like over-regulation, but we need to protect tenants as well as encouraging existing and new landlords. We think that our policies strike that balance, but we are always open to representations from any associations that believe that more can be done. I would also welcome anything that the hon. Gentleman for Surrey Heath might wish to contribute to the discussion and the solution or partial solution.

I return to overcrowding as a health and safety issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch may want to bear in mind that the new housing health and safety rating system, which will come into operation on 6 April, will enable local authorities to assess overcrowding as a potential health and safety hazard. The principle of the system is that authorities will consider what action to take to deal with health and safety hazards in dwellings on the basis of statutory powers and duties, supported by regulations and guidance. Authorities will have a number of options to deal with the hazards identified under the new system. Those options will range from mere notification of minor remote hazards up to prohibition or closure where justified.

That does not mean that overcrowding will disappear. It will not always be possible to establish serious health and safety risks from overcrowding, and the system will not deal with gender separation. None the less, it will bring crowding and space into the mainstream of health and safety issues relating to housing. Where overcrowding aggravates other hazards such as fire risk, strong action will be possible. In addition, the provisions in the 2004 Act for the licensing of higher-risk houses in multiple occupation, which will also come into operation on 6 April, will play an important part in ensuring safe conditions and adequate amenities in properties that, by definition, contain more than one household.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall raised the issue of the right to buy. I know of the suggestions that right-to-buy sales are eroding the stock of local authority homes, and the argument that the Government should reduce the maximum right-to-buy discounts available to tenants to reduce sales. The Government support the principle of the right to buy. It has helped many thousands of families to realise their aspiration to own their own home and it has helped to create many stable mixed-tenure communities. However, we were concerned about its impact on the availability of affordable housing in some areas and about exploitation of the rules. We therefore lowered maximum right-to-buy discounts in 41 areas under housing market pressure. We also changed the rules in the Housing Act 2004 to restore the scheme's focus on long-term home ownership and the building of sustainable communities, and to tackle exploitation.

We are keeping right-to-buy discounts under review and do not rule out further changes, but they must be targeted and proportionate.

Mr. Love: I thank my hon. Friend for being so generous in giving way during his speech.

The critical issue about continuing right-to-buy sales is that capital receipts should be reinvested in local housing to provide further accommodation. Will the Minister consider that and ensure that we continue to reinvest those receipts to provide more housing?

Jim Fitzpatrick: As a regular attender at ODPM questions in the Chamber, my hon. Friend knows that that matter has arisen a number of times during parliamentary questions and that a number of debates have been based on it. The assurance from the ODPM is that a number of initiatives are under review on how best to stimulate the housing market, including the new social homebuy and shared equity schemes, in addition to the new money that the Government are putting in and the building programme. The matter is very much to the forefront of the Government's consideration and I am sure that it will feature strongly in the 2007 comprehensive spending review.

On the educational impact, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch referred specifically to the impact of overcrowding on educational attainment. The ODPM commissioned a review of the evidence and literature on the impact of overcrowding on education and health in 2004. That review, which was carried out by De Montfort university, identified only a few previous studies of the relationship between overcrowding and educational attainment and was thus unable to draw conclusions. However, the review concluded that such a relationship existed for both health and education and drew attention to a study carried out in Paris in 2003 which pointed to a strong relationship with education. It is worth noting that no single definition of overcrowding was used in the studies, but the review tells us clearly that the need to safeguard children's educational attainment should be in the front of our mind as we tackle overcrowding.

In conclusion, I do not believe for a second that I have satisfactorily responded to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch or to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath in that I do not have a magic wand to provide a solution to the problem that we all agree is clearly desperate for many thousands of families. However, I hope that I have reassured my hon. Friend that the Government are determined to bring overcrowding to the front of our mind in taking our housing policies forward.

Nursing Homes (Funding)

12.30 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): It is the first time I have spoken in a debate with you in the Chair, Mr. Hood, and I am looking forward to it. This week, three independent health watchdogs have highlighted concerns about the treatment of the elderly in our country. This topic is rather current so it is appropriate for us to debate it in the House today.

The objective of any civilised society is to treat the elderly with dignity and respect, but there are examples of the elderly being neglected and patronised in all parts of the country. This represents an ongoing battle that we must pursue and win. The Labour Government have done a great deal to help senior citizens during the last eight or nine years, and this is not an opportunity for me to have a go at the Administration. Rather, it is an opportunity to ask some questions that constituents have put to me because they feel strongly about the issue.

The Government, the national health service, local government and care homes are inextricably linked. They are all interdependent. I shall be interested to hear from the Minister what studies have been done of that link and how greater efficiency and care can be guaranteed. If we provide good care in nursing homes and care homes that gives peace of mind to senior citizens, how much will the NHS save in the long term? Many medical friends of mine confirm that stress can have a great impact on senior citizens and the illnesses that they can have. Providing them with a guarantee of long-term care in a nursing home would go a long way to preventing other illnesses.

I represent Shrewsbury, and many owners of nursing homes and care homes in Shropshire want the Government to listen to them more. They do a very good job of looking after people in Shrewsbury, but believe that the huge amount of regulations and red tape that have been foisted on them are having a major impact on the cost of running their establishments. They have to pass their costs on to their clients. I understand that the Government have a responsibility to set uniform standards across the country, but if the Minister were to come to any care home or nursing home in Shrewsbury, she would find that the standards were extremely high. I wish that we could give the owners and managers of care homes fewer targets and less red tape and allow them to get on with the job of running their establishments. The resulting costs are passed on to their clients, which is part of the problem.

I would like tax breaks for private companies to allow them to develop new care homes and for the training of their staff. Another of their major problems is that they cannot find enough staff to look after patients, so they have to spend a great deal of money on finding people and training them.

Constituents in Shrewsbury have been coming to my surgery in growing numbers to tell me of the financial headaches that they have in relation to this issue. Many of them, such as Mr. Cartwright of Shrewsbury, have had to sell their parents' homes in order to pay for long-term care. Once they have sold their homes, they then have to manage the assets, which are eked out over a certain amount of time to pay for the costs. Many constituents feel that such care should be entirely or partly funded by the NHS. This generation feels that the state—the NHS—is responsible and the Government should help.

People genuinely feel that they have paid taxes all their lives and that long-term care should be either partly or totally paid for by the state. That is a frame of mind that many people have and it is difficult to change it in the short term because people have high expectations. Later on, I shall talk about my generation of citizens and how we shall have to deal with the problem, but many of my constituents in Shrewsbury resent selling their homes at the moment.

Many people have worked hard and saved up in order to pass an inheritance on to their children. They come from an era after the war when many worked extremely hard and made huge sacrifices in order to make investments and buy homes that they could then pass on to their children. I am about to become a father for the first time, but I am not thinking about passing on my wealth to my children; I want to enjoy myself while I am still alive. However, the generation before us certainly felt that it wanted to save up and pass on money to the next generation. That is not possible if people have to sell their homes to pay for care.

Rural areas such as Shropshire are underfunded. I pore over all the funding statistics for the police, children in schools and social services. In every single funding table, Shropshire is right at the bottom. I know that it is a long way away from London and that it is a rural area, but as the MP for Shrewsbury, it really concerns me when I see Shropshire at the bottom of all the funding league tables. Ultimately, when there is a lack of funding, the emphasis on looking after the elderly falls on local authorities that simply cannot sustain such levels of expenditure.

I now come to my generation. We have to get people ready to deal with the situation. As a 34-year-old, I cannot totally rely on the state to look after my mother in 20 years' time if she needs care. I very much hope to be able to look after her in my own home, but not everyone can afford to look after their elderly relatives in their home as part of the family. My generation will experience this problem in 20 years' time, when our parents, who are now in their late 50s or early 60s, will be in their 80s. Taxation is going up significantly and young people are not saving as a result; they are also burdened by the high cost of buying their first home. From talking to young people in Shrewsbury, it seems that very few of them are saving at all. They are making little provision for looking after their elderly relatives. When I say this to people of my age, they look at me with a blank expression; it has not even registered that they should be taking out insurance or saving up to look after their parents in the future.

In the House, we tend to look at things as they are now, because we deal with problems that face us today, but I hope that the Government will consider the problem in relation to the future, because it is important that my generation should start to be more accountable.

The Government's role is to incentivise people of my generation to make provision for their parents, who will live much longer than people do now. Some of them will live to be 90 or even 100, by which time many will have eked out their savings and downsized their homes. My parents, who have retired, are going to sell their family home and move further away from London in order to release capital to pay for their retirement. When they are older, they will have even less to look after themselves than people do now.

The Government should look to partner people of my age in preparing themselves and their families for the future. I hope that the Minister can tell us what steps the Government are taking to provide tax incentives for people to make such provision. Various insurance companies are starting to do work in this field and to introduce proposals to protect people in the future.

The Government have introduced other major initiatives such as baby bonds. People might ask, "Why is a Tory trying to interfere in this aspect of society? Surely you should leave market forces to deal with it," but I say no. I feel passionately and compassionately about this matter. It is our responsibility to ensure that our parents and other people are looked after, particularly in 20 or 30 years' time, and that there is some form of private insurance in place, or that the state has looked into this matter with a view to providing a solution.

The most important point that I make today is about my constituents, many of whom have come to see me, such as Mr. Cartwright. Many of them—I am going back from my generation to the generation of today—are arguing with the Shropshire and Staffordshire strategic health authority and the ombudsman about who is responsible for paying for their relatives.

Mr. Cartwright's mother died two years ago, but he is, unfortunately, still going through the protracted and painful process of interacting with the local health authority and the ombudsman because he is convinced that his mother should have received free care in her nursing home. She did not. Everything had to be sold; all of her assets went and she was left, on the day she died, with about £250 in her account. Fortunately for her—I hate to say this—she died at the right time, because there was no money left to look after her. I would like the Minister to look into the case of Mr. Cartwright of Telford estate, Monkmoor, Shrewsbury, because he has suffered greatly.

Our fellow citizens—they are more than constituents—are going through an extremely traumatic battle of ping-pong between the ombudsman and their health authority, and they are not getting satisfactory answers to their genuine concerns. I know that the Government have to deal with hundreds of thousands of cases, but one reason why I asked for this debate is because one thing that a Member of Parliament can do is focus the spotlight on constituents who have faced trauma.

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I am pleased to take part in this Adjournment debate with you, Mr. Hood, and the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski), whom I congratulate on securing it.

The hon. Gentleman made several interesting points. He is right to draw attention to the shifting issues over a number of generations. When the national health service was introduced by a Labour Government—I am afraid that the Conservative party voted against its creation—the health issues faced by politicians and health professionals were different to those faced today. People died a lot younger in 1945 and the following decades than they do in the 21st century. We welcome that, but it brings challenges regarding people planning for their future and the sort of care that they want and need.

The hon. Gentleman will know from his constituency work, as I do from mine, that the needs of older people vary enormously. The other week, I met a woman in her 80s who was active and fit, and lived independently in her own home, but I have also met people in their 70s who do not have her level of fitness and need a variety of care. There is no one-size-fits-all solution.

There has also been a change in the expectations of different generations as they get older. I was a little perturbed to hear someone on the radio use the term "elderly" to describe people aged over 50. That was somewhat ridiculous. The issue of what people expect is important. The expectations of my grandmother—she was born in the first part of the 20th century—and of my mother, who was born at the end of world war two, in relation to their lifestyles, perceptions and needs in their 50s, 60s and 70s, are very different to what I expect for myself and my children.

A good change is that people are less deferent and do not simply accept what they are offered. They now have some say in how services are provided. That is one reason why the Government have tried since 1997 to not only to look at nursing care homes—that very phrase conjures up a particular picture of older people living in those facilities—but to consider how services can be provided nearer to home by health services working with local authorities, and enabling people who choose to do so to live as independently as possible in their own homes or in family homes with others.

There have been dynamic changes in the provision of supported or sheltered housing. Technology has moved on to such an extent that older people can run their own lives knowing that there is someone catering for their needs. I pay tribute to what has been done in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) with Housing Hartlepool. I recently visited Richard court, which has a 24/7 service whereby a resident can call a number and someone will be ready to answer their call and assist them with health-related needs, repairs or concerns about intruders or people causing problems in the area. Clearly, steps are being taken to provide various types of assistance such as supported housing and care within a home setting, and to use technology to meet people's needs as they grow older. That is absolutely right.

An estimated one in three women in Britain, and one in five men, will eventually need some form of long-term care. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the funding of such care is an issue that will touch many people's lives at some point. We have to deal with people who are in that situation, and with people and their families who are approaching such decisions. We must also consider younger people, who might not think about this issue, and what their needs will be 30, 40 or 50 years down the road.

It would be helpful at this stage to draw out some of the distinctions between nursing care and other support. Nursing care is care by a registered nurse, who provides, plans and supervises a person's health care.

In 2001, we delivered on the commitment set out in the NHS plan to remove the anomaly that residents of care homes did not automatically receive free nursing care as they would in other care settings. That was an important, positive and progressive decision by the Government and it ensured that 42,000 people now get nursing care free of charge from the NHS, when they would previously have had to fund it themselves. That is a clear change. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's recognition of the positive changes since 1997.

Charging for care is not new. People have always had to pay for or contribute towards the cost of social care. The National Assistance Act 1948 sets out the framework within which local authorities decide what people can afford to contribute. Capital assets and income, including the former home, have always been taken into account in making that assessment. That is nothing new; it was there at the start of the NHS and has influenced policy ever since. However, no one should be forced to sell their home.

Working with local authorities, the Government have recognised the opportunity and local authorities provide an interest-free loan secured against the property. That means that where the arrangements are appropriate, someone can keep their house even if they are in some form of residential care. However, as and when they die the council or the local authority has a claim against the cost of that individual's social care. That is a step forward.

Local authorities means-test whether people have to make a contribution. They have to give a direction of choice, with a variety of providers. When someone chooses not to opt for the local authority choice, there is also provision for them to consider something that suits their needs elsewhere. If they are eligible, the local authority will pay its part of the cost with the option of the person topping up the payments if they want a choice other than those it provides. Efforts have been made to consider how we deliver that.

I am pleased to say that in 2005 Shropshire county council moved from a two-star to a three-star rating for its services for children and adults. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that it is working to improve its services.

The other support available includes personal care—help to carry out personal activities such as bathing, dressing and undressing, eating and using the lavatory—and continuing health care for people who require the highest degree of support, where the NHS pays the entire cost of care, as it would if their care was being provided in an NHS hospital.

The past two decades have witnessed significant changes. In many respects, there used to be no choice. Care was provided in a long-stay hospital ward or not at all. Now, increasingly, people get intensive support that enables them to live independently in their own home. I think we would all agree that many people would like to have that choice, if it is appropriate.

The shift away from the acute sector has in many respects been positive, not least because it has enabled care to be delivered more appropriately and effectively. It is interesting how different practices are used in different parts of the country. Care has been delivered in a more homely environment, allowing people to maintain their independence.

[Caroline Flint]

As I said before, people have always had to pay for or contribute towards the cost of social care. Removing means-testing for care services would have profound and long-lasting implications. Personal care alone would cost an additional £1.5 billion a year, rising to an estimated £3 billion a year by 2020. Board and lodging would cost many more billions a year. There is a balance to be struck between providing nursing care free, as it would be in an NHS setting, and coming to an arrangement to pay for the personal care towards which someone in a different setting has to contribute. We have tried to consider systems that deal with that as smoothly as possible.

Provision of free personal care could divert resources from services that benefit all older and disabled people. The announcements made in the past year and in the Budget of free transport for older people, for example, have a cost, as does the winter fuel allowance. We have to come up with a package in which the Government play their role and take their responsibilities, but within that there is a challenge for individuals and their families to look at their own lives and plan for their futures.

I cannot answer all the hon. Gentleman's questions about tax incentives, but I shall be happy to pass them on to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), who is the Minister responsible. I hope that he will be able to write back to the hon. Gentleman.

Eligibility for NHS-funded continuing care has in recent years been the subject of much debate. NHS continuing care eligibility criteria were designed to identify those who have a primary need for ongoing health care, as distinct from help with the daily activities of personal care. That has proved to be problematic, not least for individuals and their families—I think Mr. Cartwright probably falls into this category—who could not understand why similar types of care were sometimes free and sometimes means- tested.

We are aware of the difficulties around the interpretation and application of the criteria and concerns about whether they have been too restrictive in practice. Individual court judgments of which the hon. Gentleman might be aware have provided some clarification of the responsibilities of the NHS and social services for long-term care, including the Coughlan judgment in 1999 and the recent Grogan judgment. We acknowledge that mistaken decisions about individuals' eligibility have been made in the past and we have asked strategic health authorities to review their eligibility criteria again following the Grogan case and to ensure that their eligibility and decision-making processes are lawful in the light of that judgment.

We have already announced plans to develop a national framework for NHS continuing health care to achieve greater clarity, transparency and consistency in making decisions. I will ensure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is aware of the comments raised in relation to Mr. Cartwright's case. I cannot say that he will be able to intervene, but I will ask him to consider the case. It is clear from what the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said that Mr. Cartwright is pursuing his case through the channels that the Government have set up.

We plan to consult publicly on the national framework soon. It will sit alongside a broader range of measures to improve the quality of care and provide a fairer system. We take the care of our older people seriously and, as the hon. Gentleman will know, this Government published the national service framework for older people in 2001.

One of the central pillars of the framework is the single assessment process, which is meant to ensure that the needs, wishes and perceptions of older people are placed at the heart of the assessment process and that the subsequent planning and delivery of services are informed by that. Linked to the assessment process is the fair access to care services guidance, which was issued to councils in May 2002 and implemented in April 2003. It provides councils with an eligibility framework for adult social care to use when setting and applying their eligibility criteria.

Extra care housing offers independence and choice to individuals to own or rent self-contained flats yet also have access to 24-hour support of the type that is provided in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool, as well as other services such as meals, domestic help, and onsite leisure and recreational facilities.

We have also introduced £185 million each year for the carers grant, which provides local authorities with the means to provide respite breaks and services for carers in England. We have introduced a performance indicator, which ensures that councils recognise that support for carers continues to be a priority for the Government. We need to build on that to improve health and well-being so that more people can remain independent in their homes, where appropriate. At the same time, we have to ensure that where that is not possible people in residential care settings are treated with dignity and respect. Not only the individuals but their families should feel fully supported by the care plans.

Such developments are leading to a more flexible pattern of provision of care, which can better respond to the needs and wishes of patients and their families. A record number of people are being supported to live independently and are being offered a choice of care and support when they leave hospital.

The steps that we are taking are improving the situation. We must continue to provide wider choices. This is not a debate that starts and finishes with a general election—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order.

Renewable Energy

1 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to have secured this debate on my twin passions of manufacturing industry and renewable energy. It is a particular pleasure to have secured a debate under you, Mr. Hood, and to have the opportunity to speak to my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy on this important issue.

This has been an auspicious seven days for microgeneration. The Chancellor's announcement in last week's Budget of an additional £50 million in investment for microgeneration has been widely welcomed, even by Greenpeace, which said:

"The measures on energy efficiency and microgeneration are very positive and will help bring forward low-carbon buildings and a decentralised energy system."

That is high praise indeed from an organisation that has been one of the Government's most vociferous critics, and I am pleased that the Government have taken such positive steps.

At the outset, I should declare that I have a substantial constituency interest in microgeneration. Sharp, in my constituency, is one of the few United Kingdom plants manufacturing photovoltaic solar cells. It had been in Wrexham for about 20 years before it began manufacturing cells there in July 2004. Since its decision to invest in Wrexham and to show confidence in the work force there, it has been rewarded by the work force with a tripling of photovoltaic solar cell production at the factory. The site has therefore expanded and there has been real development in the renewable energy sector in north Wales. Indeed, north Wales is developing a reputation as something of a renewable energy hub. We have the North Hoyle offshore wind farm, and the planning stage has begun for Gwynt-y-Mor wind farm, which will produce energy on a much larger scale. I enthusiastically support that project.

In north-east Wales, we also have a strong tradition in manufacturing industry. That is very important in my constituency, where a quarter of the work force is employed in manufacturing. There are also historic energy links because the north-east Wales coalfield produced energy for many years and was part of the powerhouse that the UK economy was in the past. I want that energy production to continue in the new century, with microgeneration and manufacturing developing together to create new jobs and new potential in the north-east Wales economy. In the renewable energy industry, we have a huge opportunity to develop the UK's manufacturing base and we must seize it.

I am presently engaged in discussions with Wrexham county borough council and the Welsh Assembly to develop the use of renewable energies in Wrexham. We must use the fact that the town now has a reputation for producing manufacturing goods in microgeneration to ensure that the development that is taking place in the town uses renewable energy as far as possible. In that way, the town will become a showcase for the potential of renewables and demonstrate how the difficulties of global warming can be addressed.

As I mentioned, production of photovoltaic solar cells in Wrexham has tripled in less than two years, and there is huge and increasing demand for them, but they are largely being exported. As the Minister is aware, the biggest market for them in Europe is in Germany. For some years, the German Government have pursued an active strategy of promoting solar energy, and their successful 100,000 roofs programme is recognised to have caught the German public's imagination, encouraging individual householders to take steps to produce their own energy, rather than see it as something that is always produced far away by a large power station.

What is perhaps less well known is that the solar industry in Germany has been successful in promoting employment. Against the backcloth of the difficult employment situation in Germany over the past five years, photovoltaics have been a manufacturing success story. According to the Bundesverband Solarindustrie, 30,000 people are now employed in Germany in the production, distribution and installation of solar systems, with 20,000 employed in photovoltaic technology and 10,000 employed in solar heat technology. In the past year alone, 5,000 new jobs have been created in the booming photovoltaic sector, and it is predicted that as many people will shortly be employed in solar energy as in heavy coal mining. Over the past five years, turnover in the German solar power sector has increased by an average of 43 per cent. per annum and turnover for 2005 is predicted to be €2.7 billion.

Solar energy and microgeneration are therefore big business, and I am pleased to say that the United Kingdom is benefiting from the development of photovoltaics not only in Germany, but in other European economies, such as Spain and the Netherlands. The factory in Wrexham, for example, is exporting to those countries on a huge and increasing scale as their domestic markets develop. However, those who work in the UK microgeneration industry have been frustrated by the fact that development in our domestic market has been rather slow in comparison, and that is where the Chancellor's announcement last week can be so important. The energy White Paper set out the goals for energy policy, including renewables, but there has been confusion over the successor to the clear skies programme in the past two years. The announcement of the low-carbon buildings programme, coupled with the Chancellor's commitment to provide an additional £50 million in investment, is a real opportunity to get the development of microgeneration back on track.

I make a plea that the central focus of the strategy to take microgeneration forward should be not simply on the UK domestic market, but on the individual domestic consumer. Indeed, I sense that we are on the cusp of a large increase in demand for individuals to make their own contribution to the fight against global warming. In that respect, I must pay tribute to the excellent work of my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Colin Challen), who has done so much to take forward the concept of individuals taking responsibility for their own carbon footprint. In my constituency, Sharp recognises that more work needs to be done on education and has committed itself to developing an education centre on the Wrexham site. It is encouraging local schools and local industry to visit the plant and become much more aware of the potential of photovoltaics and of the way in which the industry can develop to provide a renewable base in the fight against global warming.

However, the Government must play a central role. In designing the new low-carbon buildings programme, they must commit to a real expansion of stream 1 funding to help make microgeneration accessible to the domestic consumer. The present proposed funding is £3.5 million, falling to £2 million in year two of the project and £1 million in year three. However, public demand is much greater and was about £4.5 million last year so, even at the present stage, public demand exceeds the fund's capacity to deliver. Given the Chancellor's announcement this week, it is important that we increase stream 1 funding to at least the level that is required to meet current demand. Indeed, I hope that we can increase it above that level so that future demand can also be met.

I also make a plea for simplifying the process of securing the benefit of grants for consumers. I confess that I speak as someone who downloaded the application forms for the clear skies programme around 18 months ago. Confronted with those long forms, which have sat on the corner of my desk since, I never got past the first page, which asked for the square metreage of my roof. I did not undertake to investigate that—I thought of sending my son up to check, but thought that somewhat reminiscent of chimney-sweeps in the 19th century. The forms are seriously intimidating to someone who is keen to invest in microgeneration. A straightforward system for individuals would be much more effective, so that they could ensure that they had easy access to microgeneration.

The cause is very noble. We are all committed to addressing the problems of global warming. We have heard the news on climate change in the past three days, which is of some concern. We need to establish that individuals have a responsibility to make a contribution. The Government need to put in place a system that will facilitate that. In addition, we can develop our own manufacturing sector in the industry. There is a real demand across Europe for microgeneration, which a company based in Britain is now meeting, although that demand is less within the UK.

Given the investment that the Government have put in place, we have an opportunity to create domestic demand in the UK. We have can demonstration projects but, even more importantly, individuals need to decide to join the fight against global warming. If they do so and if we create a strong domestic market, that will mean more employment in the UK in both microgeneration and manufacturing. I suggest that we should work firmly towards that worthy goal over the next few months. I hope that the Minister will be able to give me that commitment.

1.12 pm

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) should be congratulated on his sense of timing. Not only was there a useful Budget announcement on microgeneration, but today sees the publication of the climate change strategy and of our microgeneration strategy. His sense of timing should be commended to the England manager—I do not know whether my hon. Friend is a footballer, but we need more of that timing.

My hon. Friend raised important and interesting points about micro renewable energy in the UK, and the contribution of the photovoltaic sector in particular. We remain committed to micro renewable energy and to the development of a sustainable market for such technologies. We have demonstrated that commitment in support of the clear skies and PV programmes, which have made a considerable contribution to the development of markets for those technologies. However, we want to go further and create sustainable markets for technologies of that sort.

These programmes are due to finish at the end of this month, but they will be superseded, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, by the low-carbon buildings programme, which is due to start in a few days' time, at the beginning of April 2006. Although the current programmes have gone some way towards raising awareness of the potential of renewable energy, we still have some way to go. In November 2005, I announced a £30 million budget over three years, and the Chancellor added a further £50 million in his Budget statement, as has been said.

The low-carbon buildings programme was designed following a review of the UK's potential renewable energy resources that was conducted in 2004, the renewables innovation review. The review recommended that we continue to support the installation of photovoltaics and other small-scale renewables through a low-carbon building programme. The new programme will mark a significant change to current grant programmes as it aims to take a more holistic approach to reducing carbon emissions, by using innovative combinations of microgeneration technologies and energy efficiency measures.

Although there will be continued support for individual installations, there will be a shift in emphasis to large-scale developments. The focus on larger developments is designed to engage the construction sector more widely and to increase the take-up of microgeneration products in new build and refurbished developments. It is hoped that the change in focus will go some way towards constructing standard low-carbon buildings that can be more easily replicated.

The Department of Trade and Industry will be working closely with the Carbon Trust to develop that aspect of the programme, which will be important to ensure that projects deliver the low-carbon developments that we want. We aim to promote those developments in ways that clearly communicate the replicability, cost-effectiveness and appeal of low-carbon technologies. We also need to engage the wider construction industry in understanding the potential of microgeneration technologies and how to use such technologies, combined with energy efficiency measures, to develop buildings with low-carbon footprints.

We believe that the low-carbon buildings programme and the microgeneration strategy will provide a great stimulus to the microgeneration industry, building on what has been achieved over the past few years. The microgeneration strategy will aim to tackle the non-grant barriers that have been hindering the development of sustainable markets for microgeneration technologies. One of the barriers has been acknowledged by my hon. Friend and, as by-elections are expensive, we need to prevent MPs from clambering on their roofs to measure square metreage. I am slightly shocked that my hon. Friend did not know the square metreage of his roof, but there we go. That is the sort of planning barrier that we need to overcome, and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is working hard with us on that strategy.

The need for improved information provision at all levels and the importance of a trusted accreditation programme for products and installers that can build confidence in the industry are some of the measures that we aim to take to raise awareness of such technologies and to build a sustainable market. Other areas that the microgeneration strategy will address are regulations and planning, and how they affect the development of the policy. The strategy will also look at the physical infrastructure, in terms of technical issues that need to be resolved with metering and the connection of microgenerators to the distribution network. My hon. Friend may have noted that the Chancellor has provided moneys in the Budget for the development of smart metering, so that people will be able to see the contribution that microgeneration is making to their electricity supply. Other issues that we need to consider are relevant to the photovoltaic and other sectors, and I commend the strategy to my hon. Friend.

Sharp contributes to the economic development of Wrexham. I understand my hon. Friend's point that we can now develop renewables as a major manufacturing industry or industries. I also take his points about the comparison with Germany. Under the PV programme, I understand that Sharp modules have been used on grant-funded work to the tune of more than £790,000 on household projects and more than £2.4 million on larger-scale projects. Let us be clear that Sharp and other companies will continue to benefit under the new programme and the wider measures that the strategy will seek to introduce.

I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that the new measures are good news for the PV industry. Although the new programme will not be a dedicated programme for PV—I know some have argued for it, and there has been some disappointment—the more holistic approach is important as it will provide ongoing support for the development of the market for PV.

That change of approach in the Government's support for the microgeneration industry builds on our past commitment to PV. We have committed £41 million to the major PV demonstration programme and the PV field trials since 2001, and we expect photovoltaics to be a significant technology in the new programme. We want to see the full potential of all microgeneration technologies being developed in the United Kingdom.

The photovoltaics sector also benefits from Government support for industry-led research and development through the technology programme. Research and development into PV technology is important on a global scale in order to reduce the cost of the technology—my hon. Friend will acknowledge, I think, that it is still relatively expensive—and we want the UK to play a full part in that. The most advanced microgeneration technologies and the emerging ones both have a part to play.

Ian Lucas: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reassuring me about the commitment to microgeneration and photovoltaics. Will he consider the points that I raised on stream 1 funding, as I am a little concerned about engaging individual consumers? I note the shift of emphasis to which he refers; will announcements be made on the future funding of the different streams?

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, of course they will. My hon. Friend will realise that the £50 million has only just been announced. Some of that money will be for social-sector housing, and some of it will be for school programmes.

It is particularly important that we find ways to ensure that more schools have something to do with renewables, because although we still need to talk about technologies, we need also to win over hearts and minds. We want more of our children to work in schools where teachers can demonstrate how renewable technologies are working; it will help with the school's role in teaching them about the planet, geography, science and civics. Among other things, that will produce more potential customers for renewables in their own homes. We must not forget that among the greatest teachers of parents are the children themselves. We will be making further announcements about that.

I thank my hon. Friend for raising this important subject on a such a significant day for micropower and microgeneration.

Deaf-blind People (Technology Access)

1.30 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): It is difficult for those of us who enjoy the gifts of sight and hearing to imagine life without either, and impossible to imagine how we would cope. Today's short debate is about confronting the issues surrounding deaf-blindness and what society, the Government and Parliament can do to support deaf-blind people.

I pay tribute to Sense, the charity that supports deaf-blind people, and its 2005 report "Make Technology Work", which brought this key issue to the attention of the public and Parliament. I also recognise the contribution of many private sector companies in supporting deaf-blind people with technology. British Telecom has a long-standing tradition of providing assistance and assistive products to people with sensory impairments. I should also mention Ofcom: following the introduction of the Communications Act 2003, it did a great deal of work to encourage accessible electronic communications equipment.

Thankfully, relatively few people are deaf and blind; 23,000 people—fewer than 25 per constituency—are registered for both disabilities in the UK. That figure is small compared with the 378,000 registered as blind or partially sighted and the 8.9 million registered as deaf or hard of hearing.

Of course, very few people are completely deaf and blind; most have some residual sight or hearing. Some people are born deaf-blind as a result of maternal rubella, although thanks to vaccination that is very rare. Some genetic conditions such as Usher syndrome lead to deaf-blindness from late adolescence and people can become deaf-blind at any time through meningitis or accident. However, increasingly, age-related conditions result in sight and hearing loss, and those who already have a sight or hearing problem are particularly susceptible to dual loss later in life. It is therefore important that in responding, the Minister recognises the importance of supporting measures that can assist a wide spectrum of people with hearing and sight difficulties, and not simply the 23,000 registered as deaf-blind.

Remarkable breakthroughs in medical science have helped prevent deaf-blindness, and they will continue. Last week, the Chancellor announced that the Medical Research Council and the NHS research initiative will combine. That will make huge inroads into some of that work. However, today's generations of sufferers look to technology for support.

All of us—certainly those in this Chamber—use technology every day. For deaf-blind people, access to technology can be a matter of life and death. Research by Sense has shown that most deaf-blind people use assistive equipment, although sadly, about half of those surveyed have difficulties using the very technology that is there to help them. Many such problems are caused by manufacturers' lack of understanding of the needs of people with sensory impairments, and some of the difficulties could have been avoided if such needs had been considered carefully at the design stage.

Deaf-blindness is a low-incidence disability, meaning that there is low demand for some types of assistive equipment. That causes two problems: there is limited incentive for manufacturers to make such equipment, and it can be expensive to produce. Some of the equipment that deaf-blind people rely on, such as Braille clocks, vibrating light probes and sound monitors, is no longer available. That means that users who have got used to that technology often cannot get their equipment repaired or replace it if it stops working.

Low demand means that the market alone will never deliver accessible technology to this vulnerable group; intervention is needed. However, the legal situation is complicated. For instance, manufactured goods are excluded from the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 because they are regulated in Europe and not in the UK. It is ironic that someone with a sensory impairment can sue a retailer under the 2005 Act for refusing to serve them in a shop, but has no redress if none of the equipment on sale in the shop is accessible to them. That cannot be right.

Even when equipment is accessible to deaf-blind people, manufacturers are not obliged to produce instructions in accessible formats. Even the simplest equipment can cause huge difficulties for deaf-blind people. Hearing aids are vital for most such people; however, having a visual impairment makes hearing aids more difficult to use. Changing the battery in a hearing aid can be problematic for a person with low vision, because the battery and its chamber are so small; if the battery rolls away, it can be almost impossible to find. The hearing aid itself can be dropped, and for a person with hearing loss and poor vision, dropping a hearing aid on a patterned carpet can ruin a whole day. They would not be able to see the aid, nor hear where it fell. How on earth would they find it?

Television is a vital source of information and entertainment for most deaf-blind people and subtitling and audio descriptions are making an increasing proportion of programmes accessible. However, remote controls with rows and rows of small buttons with tiny writing can be difficult to operate. I confess that I—let alone somebody with sight and hearing problems—find them difficult to use. The on-screen menus used to operate some set-top boxes, video recorders and DVD players are inaccessible to many deaf-blind people. The colour scheme and fonts used can make them difficult to read, and there is no sound output.

Technology is of greatest use to deaf-blind people if it helps them to be independent when they are out and about. Take the case of Jim Hines, who is totally blind and has severe hearing loss. Last year, he had been away from London for a few days and was returning on the evening of Thursday 7 July; he knew nothing about the bombings. On arrival in London, he discovered that there were no tubes, buses or taxis at the station. Jim said:

> "I didn't know what to do. Because I don't have a mobile phone, I couldn't call for a taxi or for a friend to pick me up. I ended up standing on the pavement outside the station all night, wondering what was going on. It was one of the most confusing and frightening situations I've ever been in."

Jim finally got the tube home on Friday morning. Only after arriving home did he learn what had happened. His friends and family had been trying to contact him. They had rung the casualty bureau, but he was not listed; one can imagine what they thought. Had Jim had a Braille mobile phone with SMS, he could have saved himself and his family huge anxiety, but such phones cost £3,000 and such technology is out of the reach of most deaf-blind people.

What can the Government do? First, let me acknowledge that the Government are doing some innovative work. I particularly compliment them for the initiative to provide tactile internet access for deaf-blind people and the £500,000 research programme that was led by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. Ability to use the internet can bring significant benefits for people with sensory impairments, and the translation of palm signing into internet communication through an interactive mouse may well revolutionise communication for deaf-blind people.

It would be interesting to hear from the Minister what other areas of research are planned by his Department. I acknowledge that it would be difficult for the Government to intervene in the commercial technology marketplace, but they have the chance to intervene through public procurement. That would have the twin effect of setting high standards for quality and accessibility and bringing costs down. For example, 700,000 people have now received digital hearing aids through the NHS, at a cost to the public purse of £65 to £75 per aid. Before the aids were available through the health service, people were paying up to £2,000 per aid privately. However, the excellent procurement arrangements organised by the Government need to be supported by reducing the unacceptable waiting times experienced in many areas of the country.

Perhaps the Minister will make a commitment today to include audiology, from GP referrals to the fitting of digital hearing devices, in the 18-week target for PCTs. If it is not included, we may well see that crucial service slip down the priority list as other funding pressures emerge. Perhaps he will go a step further, by reassuring the audiology service that recurring funding for service and replacement will be built into baseline budgets this year. Some £38 million was expected to go into routine audiology, but as yet there has been no commitment by the Department of Health.

The success of the Government's public procurement of digital hearing aids will hopefully give them confidence to seize other important opportunities on behalf of deaf-blind people. The mass distribution of set-top boxes to older and disabled people for the purposes of digital switchover is such an opportunity; it is a key one. That must not be a project just for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport but one in which the Department of Health plays a crucial role at the design stage. Digital broadcasting will open up huge opportunities for deaf-blind people, but if accessible technology is not built into the set-top boxes they will be lost. Will the Minister say what steps his Department is taking to influence the design of set-top boxes for the digital switchover?

Another opportunity for the Government to help stimulate demand for accessible technology is the new public sector duty to promote disability equality. Public sector bodies that are procuring equipment should undertake a disability equality impact assessment. Will the Minister tell us how the Government are monitoring that new public sector duty and what steps he intends to take to ensure that deaf-blind people receive appropriate assessment for, and advice about, technological aids by appropriately trained staff? That should be happening under his Department's guidance, but clearly it is not. The Sense survey found that 30 different types of professionals carried out assessments, ranging from therapists to social services staff. A simple step would be for the Minister to issue guidance on what qualifications assessors should have.

Sadly, the Government do not have direct responsibility for the regulation of manufactured goods and the issue of accessible technology; it is the responsibility of our friends in the European Parliament. However, I hope that the Government will make clear their representations in that key area. After all, a misunderstanding of the controls on a cooker can have disastrous effects for any of us, but for a deaf-blind person the problem is acute. Relatively simple universal tactile instructions on appliances such as cookers, ovens, washing machines and mobile phones would solve a great many of the problems, as would a legal requirement to make instruction booklets available in a format that could be used by deaf-blind people.

Despite the concerns of many deaf-blind people about the suitability of existing technology, many responded to the Sense survey in a positive way; whether we are talking about the use of Mobile Magnifier for mobile phones, the cordless telephone or the easier to read flat-screen TV, it is clear that where manufacturers design products with the deaf-blind in mind there is a great deal of satisfaction. Those products can be used by a wide range of other people. There was even praise for some manufacturers. Zanussi offers a simple Braille replacement for the front of its washing machines. It is a simple piece of technology that enables the machines to be used by a wide range of people.

Technology is improving all the time, but the fast pace of change also means that some deaf-blind people fear being left behind. The trend is for smaller pieces of equipment with more functions, and for more and smaller controls. Deaf-blind people are worried that the assistive equipment they own will quickly become out of date and that they will be unable to afford the high price of new equipment. Technology is vital for deaf-blind people, as it is for many of us. Our role as parliamentarians is to ensure that we work with the Government to ensure that their voice is heard.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): It is pleasure to serve under your chairmanship again, Mr. Hood; I did so previously on the European Scrutiny Committee.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) on securing this important debate. I know that he has taken a keen interest in the subject of inclusive education for children. His commitment to ensuring that children with disabilities—particularly those with severe learning disabilities—have the chance to enjoy mainstream education is well known and much appreciated by Labour Members. I join him in paying tribute to Sense, which during my short time in Government has provided tremendous support and advice to me. I have much appreciated that.

Before I address the specific issue of this debate, I shall make a few opening remarks about the changing nature of this country's population. Tremendous advances have been made in the health service over the past six or seven years, which is not an accident; such advances have occurred because we have doubled the amount of money that has gone into it. As a result of the extra 100,000 staff who have been hired and the falling waiting lists, life expectancy has increased and infant mortality rates have decreased. This year, England has the lowest infant mortality rate in its history. Those medical advances and the advances in care and the national health service mean that more children will survive for longer, including many with severe learning disabilities.

Although the hon. Gentleman is right to say that advances in medical science mean that conditions such as deaf-blindness may in future be on the decrease, the number of children with complex disabilities surviving into adulthood may increase. The health and the care systems need to change to take account of that.

There are great opportunities to use technology to ensure that those individuals are able to live life to the full in future. I think that it was Albert Einstein who, at the beginning of the cold war, said:

"It has become appallingly obvious that our technology has exceeded our humanity."

Over the next few years we have the chance to reverse that aphorism, because technology will enable many people to fulfil the full potential of their humanity. For that to happen, it is vital that public services are reformed so that public servants who are responsible for delivering them have the freedom and flexibility to combine together in new ways to improve them.

The hon. Gentleman will know that our new White Paper confirms the vision set out in the social care Green Paper "Independence Well-being and Choice: Our Vision for the Future of Social Care for Adults in England" and sets out practical steps to turn that vision into reality. We talked about the need to bring far more personalised services together by improving assessment, for example by introducing individual budgets that bring five or six different income streams from across Government together in one care account for the individual to spend as they see fit. Supporting healthier, independent lives through a proper risk-management framework will be important, as will a much stronger emphasis on preventive services in the future.

Key to all of this is ensuring that the national health service, social care and other local government services, in particular housing, are orchestrated together in a completely new way. That better integration involves thinking holistically about the needs of the individual, rather than simply questioning their eligibility and finding ways to deny them service. This agenda is about empowerment. That personalisation is about listening to individuals, recognising their ability to determine what they need and then delivering the sorts of services that are necessary to them.

I want to highlight the things that we hope to sweep away, one of which was highlighted by the Commission for Social Care Inspection report "Real Voices, Real Choices" that was published this week. It stated:

"The NHS Audiology department tends to provide information about physical and health related matters, rather than social and emotional aspects of deafness. It should be able to recognise and help with all aspects."

That is exactly the sort of problem that we want to address by bringing the health service and the social care system far closer together.

This is not a trivial ambition; it is about something important. In the past seven years we have delivered the longest period of uninterrupted economic growth ever known in this country. More people are in work than ever before and we have created a couple of million new businesses. This society is far richer in opportunity, but the challenge is now for us to ensure that everybody in the country has the chance to flourish to the full, irrespective of their background or ethnicity, where they live or what circumstances they have encountered in life.

We know that disabled people are less likely to be in full-time education or in work. They are more likely to feel a lack of confidence and a lack of support. The reasons behind that are not straightforward, nor are they always related to somebody's health impairment or health condition. Attitudes in society play a significant part. How we structure our services for disabled young people is crucial. That is why the extension of the disability discrimination legislation, the establishment of the Disability Rights Commission and changing the ways in which Jobcentre Plus and Connexions work are very important. Those are ambitions that were encapsulated in our 20-year strategy set out in the "Improving the life chances of disabled people" report. Its aim is very simple but also very powerful: to ensure that disabled people will be given the maximum opportunity to fulfil their potential.

I shall talk about some of the necessary practical steps, and respond to some of the important points raised by the hon. Gentleman. First, we know that working together at both central Government level and local level is essential. That is why we set up the Office for Disability Issues, to act as a bridge between Departments at the centre by creating the mechanisms to ensure that they work together more effectively. That is not just to do with health and social care issues; it is also to do with matters handled by other Departments, such as trade and industry. The work of the Department of Trade and Industry has an important bearing on this agenda.

Examples of how that joint working manifests itself are already coming through. We are supporting services at the local level—for example, by working with a wide range of groups to develop revised eye care pathways. In addition to the certificate of vision impairment, we have developed two new documents for use in hospitals and on the high street to facilitate easier access to support services prior to certification. Why is that important? One reason is that it will help social services identify people who need support in a timelier manner, before they lose independence and confidence.

Another key way to deliver change is through changing the work force. That is why I am glad to be able to say that the Department of Health is working with the Guide Dogs for the Blind Association—in collaboration with other employers—on a project to redesign hybrid rehabilitation functions in work with visually impaired people. Also, Skills for Care and the Children's Workforce Development Council are managing pilots to look at work force reform. It is important to ensure that there are new kinds of worker with different sorts of skills because, as the hon. Gentleman highlighted, the problem of assessment is sometimes difficult.

We are backing these ambitions with significant sums of new investment. If we combine the amount of money that is going into the health service over the next two years with the extra resources going into local authorities, the total sum is somewhere north of £20 billion. That represents a significant step up in available resources, and I am proud to be able to say that it includes £80 million for the preventive technologies grant, which comes on stream in a few days; local authorities will have the flexibility to invest in a range of services. We have looked into procurement arrangements as part of the planning for the spending of that grant, and I will ask Department officials to examine how issues around deaf-blindness have been considered in the development of guidance for the spending of the money, because that could provide an important opportunity over the next one to two years.

There is strong international evidence that we can improve the quality of care through technology. The hon. Gentleman asked about that. The new and emerging applications of the technology programme cover all areas of health and social care; there is a budget of about £1.2 million to develop new and innovative uses of technology. In addition, the annual budget for the health care technology development programme is £2 million. The remit of that programme covers novel information technology that looks into how there might be significant improvements in the performance of health care technologies. Recently funded projects include many of direct relevance to disabled people, such as speech-driven environmental control systems, stair-climbing and walking aids, which are very practical applications. For a number of years, the policy research programme has provided a horizon-scanning role in relation to developments in information and communication technologies. All of these things are important, but unless they are translated into front-line practice, they will be of little benefit to the 20 to 25 people in each of our constituencies who might be deaf-blind.

We have said that we expect the directors of adult social services in every part of the country to work in partnership with a range of agencies, including children's services, and health, housing and transport organisations, in order to examine what are the strategic needs of every community. We will provide guidance on how that exercise should be best performed. We expect directors of adult social services to work hand in glove with directors of public health to make sure that there is a shared understanding of the needs of different groups in every community. I said to the House a week or two ago that, given the number of people with sensory impairments in this country, we would expect such strategic needs assessments to take good account of those needs.

One of the reasons why that is important is that we will expect local authorities to ensure that adequate arrangements are in place for people with sensory impairments or other disabilities to be able to access services in the first place. Often, those barriers to access are among the most difficult hurdles for people with disabilities to leap. To ensure that there is this emphasis on service access, the Department of Health is working closely with the Disability Rights Commission. We have jointly produced leaflets—such as "You can make a difference: improving hospital services for disabled people"—for front-line staff in both primary and secondary care. They are important because they explain, and give practical examples of, the ways in which front-line staff can meet the access requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. We are also ensuring that all health and social care staff are aware of the needs of disabled people. The Department of Health and the DRC are producing a comprehensive education and learning programme, which will be available later this year.

My final point is that, as we set about undertaking this process of public service reform over the coming years, it is important that change is not just drawn up and designed in Whitehall—or even in the House. Instead, we should listen to the voices of people who need the services as we think about how they should be configured. The CSCI is doing that by involving people who use such services in its inspection process. Its report "Real Voices, Real Choices", which I referred to earlier, considers the qualities people expect from care services and how that feeds into the inspection processes. It spoke to people who use services, and, importantly, it also spoke to their carers—there are 6 million carers in this country—and those who represent them. What it found was something that we all probably know in our heart of hearts, because it is simple: people want choice and flexibility in respect of services, as well as creative problem solving, and they also want information that is available at the right time. In other words, they want to be treated with respect by a system that is fair, and which has the capacity to treat them as grown-ups and to let them, where appropriate, take risks.

We emphasised all those messages in the Green Paper on adult social care and in the White Paper. They reflect what people tell us time and again, and we must now translate that into action, in order to make a genuine difference to people's lives.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Two o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 29 March 2006

[MR. JOE BENTON in the Chair]

Ambulance Service (Staffordshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

9.30 am

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Benton. I am sorry to interrupt proceedings.

Today, a written statement is due from the Department of Health on the proposed changes to the configuration of strategic health authorities, ambulance trusts—the subject of this debate—and primary care trusts. This morning, I went to the Library and found that it has not yet been deposited. Before the end of this debate, will the Minister make that written statement available? It may have a bearing on the subject of this very debate.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Strictly speaking, that is not a matter for the Chair. If the Minister chooses to comment, I shall allow that. However, we must proceed pretty quickly.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I shall certainly make inquiries about when the written statement will be placed in the Library. I shall report back to the Chamber on that.

9.31 am

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I am pleased to open today's debate under your experienced chairmanship, Mr. Benton. This opportunity to discuss the success of the Staffordshire ambulance service, and the concern of all who live in Staffordshire that our excellent service should be retained, is timely, given that last week saw the end of the consultation period on the reconfiguration of ambulance services.

During the past few months, there has been much activity aimed at ensuring that my hon. Friend the Minister and her colleagues in Government are aware of the desire of Staffordshire people to ensure that our superb service is retained. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) secured a debate on that issue in Westminster Hall in November. There have been other debates on the issue, as well as questions, early-day motions, petitions and meetings with Ministers, including the Prime Minister.

I am pleased to see so many Staffordshire Members here. I understand that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) would have been here but for a previous engagement. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) has a constituency engagement, but tells me that he spoke to Lord Warner in advance of today's debate.

Through representations and the large number of responses to the consultation, the Minister will be aware of the strength of feeling among people in Staffordshire, who believe that nothing should be done to undermine the first-class ambulance service that we enjoy. Indeed, we would like the achievements of Staffordshire to be echoed around the country.

Staffordshire has the best response times and resuscitation standards in the country. We also have the most economic service. Staffordshire's results are not just the best—they are outstanding. In the early 1990s, changes were made by Roger Thayne, the chief executive of the Staffordshire ambulance service. The first ambulance station proposed for closure was in Uttoxeter. That brought opposition, not least from me and other councillors. The system that was introduced positioned ambulances around the county according to the demand predicted on the basis of how the service had been used historically. However, without the introduction of community paramedic officers, piloted in Uttoxeter by Neil Phillips, such areas of the county could have had worse protection, although overall response times would have improved with the new system.

Staffordshire's powerful results come from a combination of policies. The command and control software programme VisiCAD has allowed extremely accurate predictions to be made about the likelihood of an emergency call emanating from a certain area at a particular time of day or day of the week. The process is known as system status management. Ambulances can thus be placed to meet demand, and community paramedic officers operating in cars are positioned strategically around Staffordshire, sometimes using new ambulance posts.

Some of the more rural areas of the county could never hope to have ambulances or community paramedic officers based close enough to reach emergencies in eight minutes, so Staffordshire ambulance service developed community first responder groups. There are now 17 such groups of volunteers in the county. I am very proud of the Mayfield and Ellastone first responders, who serve the residents in the northern area of my constituency, and the Abbots Bromley first responder group, which covers the area of my constituency that borders that village.

Recently, I had the pleasure of presenting a petition from the people of Mayfield and Ellastone in support of their first responder group. It called on the Government to guarantee the high standards of medical care enjoyed at present and to ensure that the community first responders would be allowed to continue to attend all the types of incidents that they attend now, without any reduction in the drugs that they are empowered to administer or in the equipment that they are allowed to use to help patients or to protect themselves. The petitioners also asked the Government to exclude Staffordshire ambulance service from the proposed reconfiguration programme until such time as its high standards were matched across the remainder of the proposed west central region.

Staffordshire is not unique in having volunteer community first responders, but ours are far better trained and empowered than those in other parts of the country. In Staffordshire, community first responders are not first aiders with a defibrillator; they are trained for nine months to the level of accident and emergency ambulance technicians. Mayfield and Ellastone first responders have two fast-response vehicles, one of which was recently purchased at a cost of £31,000. Half that sum was raised from the local community, the rest from grants.

The first responder groups in Staffordshire, all volunteers, provide cover 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. They are allowed to attend any emergency to which an ambulance would go, and use blue lights and sirens, as do full-time crews. They are allowed to administer oxygen and drugs such as glyceryl trinitrate, aspirin, adrenalin and glucagons. Indeed, I understand that the volunteers in Staffordshire are able to use more drugs than some ambulance technicians in other ambulance trusts.

The Mayfield and Ellastone first responder group has attended more than 700 cases in three years. Those first responders are understandably proud of what they do and do not want to lose any part of their role. They want to continue to treat people of all ages, including children, in all emergencies. I am aware that other ambulance services have adopted different aspects of the systems and practices used by Staffordshire ambulance service, and no doubt Staffordshire will be able to learn some things from other services. However, Staffordshire's results are so outstanding that I believe that its service should be used as an exemplar for others.

A combination of innovative measures such as the use of system status management, community paramedics and community first responders and clot-busting drugs has produced such outstanding results. The people of Staffordshire believe that lives will be lost if the county's ambulance service is forced to join a west midlands service. They understand that a rate per 1 million of the population of 231 returned to spontaneous circulation from cardiac arrest and maintained to hospital compares exceptionally well with the NHS average of 52.

Given such results, the Minister will understand why there is so much concern in Staffordshire and why people there will not accept any change that worsens their service. Having taken on responsibility for out-of-hours care, Staffordshire ambulance service is also leading the way in bringing health care to the patient. Staffordshire is successfully treating nearly 50 per cent. of all emergency patients in their own homes, significantly reducing pressure on the local accident and emergency and other hospital services.

I know that the Minister wishes to raise standards in the ambulance service—indeed, throughout the health service—to the best possible level. However, that cannot be achieved at this time through the amalgamation of Staffordshire with the other services in the west midlands.

Take the protocols that the ambulance service adopts for community first responders. At the public consultation meeting held in Burton upon Trent, no guarantee could be given by the representative of the strategic health authority that Staffordshire's protocols would be adopted by any new west midlands-wide service. There would be a tendency to dumb down, so that other ambulance services could meet the requirements of the protocols. Similarly, the use of system status management could not be introduced overnight in areas outside Staffordshire, so the two systems—the traditional one and Staffordshire's system status management—would not mix.

I urge the Minister to consider a way forward that will protect our service in Staffordshire while offering more collaboration between Staffordshire and the rest of the west midlands service. There could, for example, be some shared back-office services. However, I firmly believe that Staffordshire ambulance service should remain operationally independent until such time as it can be guaranteed that the protocols and management system used in Staffordshire will be maintained in a merged regional service. In order to remain independent it will be essential for there to be separate boards.

If Staffordshire ambulance service is allowed to remain outside the merged service in the west midlands at this time, there could be a period of working towards a fully merged service. Staffordshire could join in with the new ambulance radio technology, while, of course, retaining the Staffordshire control room. That is essential to maintain the use of medical advice, which is an integral part of the management system.

Staffordshire would, of course, retain its current operation management system and the community first responders would operate with their current protocols. There could be collaboration between Staffordshire and a west central ambulance service in the development of SSM throughout the region, as well as in clinical audit and the evaluation of patients' experiences.

I hope that Ministers will accept the pleas from Staffordshire and allow its ambulance service to remain independent at this time. It would be possible to set a date for a future review—for example, 2010—or to accept that it should be left to both boards to come forward if they felt that amalgamation were right.

It has been said that the result of the consultation is a foregone conclusion. I was saddened by the decision of Roger Thayne and his deputy, Dr. Anton van Dellen, to resign from the Staffordshire service and to take up positions in Wales. However, I believe that the Staffordshire system that they have developed is strong enough to continue with new senior management.

I know that the Minister will not be able to announce any decision today, but I hope that she will be able to take away my suggestions and those of my colleagues about a way forward that will show that the voices of Staffordshire residents have been heard by Government.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, may I remind everyone that the debate lasts for an hour and a half? On such an important subject, I hope to be able to call everyone who wishes to speak. Therefore, I ask hon. Members to try to keep their remarks as brief as possible.

9.42 am

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): One of the charming things about Staffordshire is that its Members of Parliament, regardless of party, often agree on what they think is best for their constituents. All 12 of its Members of Parliament, of which nine are Labour and three are Conservative, are unanimous in their agreement that the Staffordshire ambulance service provides a uniquely powerful service that saves lives in England and in our county. As the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) said, we strongly believe that if it is merged with the west midlands service, the service in Staffordshire will be diminished; it will be done down to a lower common denominator.

I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate. As she says, it follows up a long series of debates and meetings on this subject with Ministers and the Prime Minister. We feel strongly that there will undoubtedly be blood on the Government's hands if the Staffordshire ambulance service is not allowed to continue as it is.

The hon. Lady pointed out a statistic on resuscitations. On a rate per million of population, 231 recover from heart dysfunction in Staffordshire compared with a national average of 52. What she did not say was that in the west midlands, with which the merger is being proposed, the corresponding result is even less than 52; it is only 48. By some quick arithmetic, that represents a factor of roughly one fifth. In other words, if someone has a heart attack in the west midlands, they have only one fifth of the chance of surviving of someone who has one in Staffordshire.

I will not rehearse arguments that I have presented in other debates. Friends of mine, who both they and I thought were extremely fit, have had sudden heart attacks and have been rescued by the Staffordshire ambulance service coming to their door. It has a response time of just four or five minutes. The service has paramedics, defibrillators and other equipment, and decoagulant clot-busting drugs, which are used to save lives. Those friends of mine are alive today, and I have no doubt that if such situations had occurred in the west midlands that would not have been the case.

The response times in Staffordshire are tremendous. The Government rightly specify that for a 999 call in a life-threatening situation the ambulance should arrive within a response time of eight minutes. Staffordshire ambulance service achieves that 88 per cent. of the time. In the west midlands the figure is only 75 per cent. of the time, and its service is not always equipped with defibrillators, paramedics and the drugs that are needed to save lives. In the less serious type of emergency call, the response rate within eight minutes in Staffordshire is 85 per cent., compared with just 46 per cent. in the west midlands.

We all believe that if the Staffordshire ambulance service could merge into a larger regional service and maintain its standard while bringing everyone else up to that standard, that would be a good thing. The problem is that none of the professionals believe that is possible, which was one of the main reasons why Roger Thayne, the chief executive of the Staffordshire ambulance service, resigned. He just felt that standards would be lowered in Staffordshire. I have not met a single professional in the national health service who believes that Staffordshire would not be affected by the changes.

Given the United Kingdom's first-past-the-post system, which I support, our duty is to our constituents. My duty is to the constituents of Lichfield. The duty of all of us who are present today is to the constituents of Staffordshire. I cannot think of a more important thing than ensuring that when they fall ill, they are rescued and treated, and that lives are saved in the best possible manner. We can rejoice in the fact that the Staffordshire ambulance service enjoys the best response times not just in the United Kingdom, but in the whole of Europe. To damage that state of affairs would be appalling and there would be blood on the Government's hands.

I admire the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman). I remember that in 1994 or 1995, when things were going wrong for the John Major Administration, he said to me, "Michael, when things aren't going wrong don't do anything. Don't legislate. Don't make changes. When things ain't broke, don't try to fix them." Well, he did not put it in quite that way, because he is far too well spoken. I say to the Minister that the Staffordshire ambulance service, far from being broken, is a beacon to other ambulance services. To do anything to endanger that situation would be very wrong.

9.48 am

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on securing this important debate, because although the formal consultation has ended, the fight very much continues.

We all regret the resignation of chief executive Roger Thayne, but we must protect his legacy. Staffordshire still has his uniquely successful operating system and we must ensure that it continues to work in Staffordshire while he rolls it out to Wales. The Staffordshire ambulance service is Roger's vision, but it does not depend on just one man. The operating system that he has developed—system status management—can deliver without him, but only if it is headed up by someone who shares his vision and commitment.

During our previous debate on this issue, on 2 November, I focused on the remarkable performance of the Staffordshire ambulance service: some 88 per cent. of all emergency calls are met within eight minutes compared with a national average of 62 per cent. The rate of successful resuscitations from cardiac arrest has already been mentioned. Innovation and improvement are part of the Staffordshire ambulance service's day-to-day life.

In this debate I want to focus on another unique feature of the Staffordshire ambulance service: our community first responders. I know that other ambulance services have them, but none of them has them all trained to ambulance technician standard. They are called to every type of life-threatening emergency, including paediatric and maternity cases, and road traffic accidents. They are all volunteers, but they are not just gifted amateurs—they are professionally trained to take control of a broad range of medical emergencies. They work closely with the Staffordshire ambulance service and are familiar with all its procedures and equipment. Their vehicles are donated by local businesses or are paid for by community fundraising, and they are fully kitted out—they have all the emergency equipment that they need.

Community first responders are not an add-on. There are 355 of them—450 if we include all who are now trained. There are more of them than there are front-line Staffordshire ambulance personnel. They are an essential part of the Staffordshire ambulance service emergency response, and because they are local, they get to where they need to go in five minutes—not eight minutes. That is remarkable. No wonder Staffordshire ambulance service excels in saving lives by resuscitating people in cardiac arrest. The responders get there in five minutes because they can use sirens and flashing blue lights.

However, this could all be stripped away from 1 July. Why? Because in some areas community first responders generally operate on the first-person-on-the-scene protocol, where the most advanced level that they work to only allows them to administer oxygen and Entonox therapies. No other drugs are given, not even aspirin; there are no patients under 12; and there are no calls to road traffic accidents and only limited calls to trauma incidents. That might be acceptable to those who live in a town. However, Staffordshire, Moorlands has remote communities, including Flash, the highest village in Britain. It is rugged farming, walking and climbing country, with unpredictable weather and hordes of visitors, particularly in the warmer months.

Community first responders have consistently sought an assurance that they will be able to operate at their current level if a merger takes place, but no assurance has been given, so they fear the worst. If their protocols are watered down they will find that they are unable to give the treatment that they are trained to administer; for example, to a patient with a life-threatening asthma attack or a severe chest pain. As a result, their usefulness to the Staffordshire ambulance service would be reduced, leading to fewer call-outs, less hands-on practice and a severe loss of motivation. They would be less able to serve their communities, and it is inevitable that many volunteers would give up out of frustration. The result would be the end of a vibrant volunteer scheme that has the full support of local communities and has made a genuine difference to people in Staffordshire.

Testament to that is provided by the petition of nearly 4,000 signatures—collected in only a few hours—that I delivered to the Prime Minister last Monday. It is entitled "Save Staffordshire ambulance service community first responders", and it reads as follows:

"It is indisputable that Staffordshire Ambulance Service NHS Trust is the best in the UK. One of the key elements in this outstanding performance, in the rural areas, is the high level of Training and Skills of the volunteer Community First Responders.

We, the undersigned, oppose any changes to the existing management structure of Staffordshire Ambulance Service and the Clinical Protocols and Procedures affecting Community First Responders. Any moves to limit what the First Responders are currently authorised to do will lead to a poorer service in the rural areas of Staffordshire and lives would be affected and potentially lost."

I shall refer to two case studies from my bulging postbag to highlight the sort of work that they do. Mrs. Sheldon from Biddulph Moor writes:

"In 2001, my husband was the first person in England to receive the clot-busting drug at home. The first responder was with us in approximately four minutes and the ambulance arrived some five minutes later."

Consultant cardiologist, Dr. John Davies, said:

"Getting this drug into him so quickly could have saved his life."

It was administered by first responder, Andy Sparkes. Mrs. Sheldon said:

"My husband and I have very good reason for wanting to retain" the Staffordshire ambulance service exactly "as it is."

Another case involved Mr. and Mrs. Bowyer of Leek, who found their daughter had died of sudden adult death syndrome. Mrs. Bowyer writes:

"The first responders arrived in her bedroom within five minutes of the phone call. They stayed with us several hours, they kept me on a heart monitor for an hour. They made sure my husband, a diabetic, was okay and their counselling skills were wonderful, getting us through our initial shock."

Therefore, they do not just save lives; they also deal with the situations they find. This proves that the community first responders make a real difference.

As Labour politicians, we talk a lot about empowering the individual citizen to take control of their lives. We rightly praise the role of the voluntary sector, and all it does. The Staffordshire ambulance community first responders deliver on both those fronts. They are volunteers—very committed volunteers, whose commitment to their community leads them to undergo extensive long-term professional training, and to dedicate many hours to their service and to saving lives.

Community first responders are not just an add-on; they are integral to the Staffordshire ambulance service, which is a service that presses all the buttons that we would want a public service organisation to press. It has a uniquely successful management system, it is efficient and cost-effective, and its performance is exemplary, not only in terms of response times, but also in terms of saving more lives before people get to hospital.

It also already delivers on a new initiative recently announced by the Secretary of State to reduce emergency admissions and to save the NHS money. Staffordshire ambulance service treats 40 per cent. of emergency and urgent responses at home, saving £100 per hospital visit. That amounts to £9 million per year in Staffordshire. It also avoids unnecessary and stressful ambulance journeys to hospital, and prevents the hospital from being clogged up with patients who are better off at home.

When the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), responded to my Adjournment debate on 2 November, he described "the brilliance of Staffordshire ambulance service" and the "need for local call centres and local management autonomy and flexibility".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 2 November 2005; Vol. 438, c. 315WH.]

Nothing less than full operational independence will do. It is vital that Staffordshire ambulance service maintains its system status management operating system, and its high level of clinical protocols and procedures, including those for the community first responders. We want no dumbing down, no compromise on response times and no ending of innovation and development of staff skills.

Staffordshire ambulance service should be used as an academy of excellence for other ambulance services to work alongside and follow. Let other areas benefit from Staffordshire's trailblazing. What matters is what works, not rigid regional structures, which will kill off Staffordshire ambulance service and cost lives.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Before I call the next speaker, let me say again that I propose to start the wind-ups at 10.30.

9.58 am

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): The hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) began his remarks by saying accurately that all Staffordshire Members had been working together closely on this issue. However, a few weeks ago the Conservative party had an Opposition day debate in the Commons that was a general attack on all mergers in the health service. As is the way on such occasions, the Conservative party voted for its motion, and the Government voted for their amendment. That is fine; that is how we do things. The problem is that the Conservative party propaganda machine then converted that into the statement that the Labour MPs for Staffordshire had voted for the merger of the Staffordshire ambulance service. That was an outrageous slur and I ask that the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) to repudiate that in this debate, because it not only undermines all that we have done over the years in Staffordshire to work together on a cross-party basis, but damages our common endeavour to fight for Staffordshire ambulance service. These are important matters—far too important to play political games with.

If we found a public service that was cheaper to run and delivered outstandingly better outcomes than any comparable public service, what would we do with it? Would we cherish and nurture it, and use it as a beacon for others—an exemplar for the rest of the public services—or abolish it? I cannot overstate the extent to which the people of Staffordshire understand what an outstanding public service they have in their ambulance service. It is not often that people rally to their public services in the way that they have rallied to the defence of the Staffordshire ambulance service. They have done so not because they have been asked to, and not for any political reason, but simply because, from their direct experience and that of their families, they know that the service is outstandingly successful.

Those of us who go back a few years can remember exactly how the ambulance service became so successful. I remember witnessing its transformation at first hand. It was proposed that, instead of ambulance staff sitting around in ambulance stations waiting for accidents to happen somewhere out there, the service should be redesigned from top to bottom; that was thought outrageous at the time. The service decided to get the ambulance men and the ambulances out of the ambulance stations, to plot where accidents were most likely to happen, and to station ambulances there. That does not seem a staggeringly original idea now but, my goodness, 10 years ago it was. The effects were dramatic. At the time, the changes were quite naturally greeted with extreme apprehension by those who worked in or used the service. Ten years on, those who work in the service are intensely proud of what they have achieved. The buzz and the pride in that service has to be experienced to be believed. The feeling on the ground, from the people who use it, is unlike the feeling for any other public service that I know about.

In Staffordshire's case, it simply makes no sense to alter a service that is working so well. In some areas, it may well be sensible to merge ambulance services; somewhere down the track, when other ambulance services have reached Staffordshire's standard, it might even be sensible to consider making further efficiency savings by amalgamation. However, that is not the position now. The people of Staffordshire and the county's MPs would find it incomprehensible if the merger were to go ahead at this time. In terms of the Government's philosophy of public service reform, there is no reason at all for proceeding with the merger.

10.3 am

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on securing the debate. I also congratulate Staffordshire MPs on the way the issue has been brought to the attention of the Government in meetings with Ministers, and on how, through Parliament, we have asked the Government to listen to our view about how their reforms are taken forward. I am glad to see our regional Minister for the NHS, the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton).

This is a critical and timely debate. What we want from it is reassurance from the Government that we have been listened to and that all the important changes that have come about in Staffordshire can play a pivotal role in the measures that the Government are taking, right across the NHS. Those changes are needed if the Government are really to bring about improved health services at community level, and that is something to which all Labour Members certainly subscribe.

Staffordshire's performance—its response times, its operational standards, how the service serves people, and how it goes about doing its business—is a matter of record. I am just looking around, and I see that I am the longest serving Staffordshire MP here today—

Michael Fabricant: And the youngest looking.

Joan Walley: And the youngest looking.

It is important that we take stock of the changes that have been made to Staffordshire ambulance service. Let me set out one of my concerns. Roger Thayne came to Staffordshire ambulance service and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said, set about changing things. Many of us, including my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins), have referred to the fact that those changes were opposed in some quarters because change is uncomfortable and is not easy. Staffordshire ambulance service, under the leadership of Roger Thayne, met that change head-on. The service worked with people; it explained, it informed and it then developed its different standards. The service is now far more able to cope with health problems in Staffordshire.

[Joan Walley]

Rather than looking to merge Staffordshire into a bigger ambulance service, the Government should consider how what we have can help them in bringing about change across the board, not just in ambulance services, but in health services more widely. Over the past 18 years or so, I have had meetings with Roger Thayne, Secretaries of State for Health and senior Ministers, and it has been incomprehensible to me why we have not seized the opportunity of using Roger Thayne's expertise—much of which goes into strategic planning—to drive forward the agenda for change. I ask the Minister to please look at how we can roll that out.

I am conscious that I have very little time, but I have one other point to make. Members who have spoken so far are really concerned about rural areas or towns in Staffordshire. I represent Stoke-on-Trent, the part of Staffordshire where health inequalities are greatest, and where disease and illnesses are worst. In Staffordshire, a model has developed to meet the needs of not only the rural, isolated areas, but the urban areas with the biggest health problems. Those urban areas face a great challenge in making change, because of our particular situation as regards overspend across our hospital trusts and at our university hospital. I say to the Minister, quite sincerely, that if we merge Staffordshire ambulance service into a west midlands service, we will end up with a far worse service. We would be completely dumbed down. We should be looking at how our ambulance service, with its operational independence, can help and can be part of a partnership dealing with the change that we need. In my constituency, we really have to meet more health care needs in the home, and we have to consider how we will deal with change.

I am mindful of the time, but just want to add that consultation has to mean what it says—it has to involve listening, not least to the views of Members of Parliament, who represent so many people across our county and cities, as my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands said. I am looking at the timetables for the Government review of the consultation. I do not know how many days or weeks it will be before we get a firm outcome, but today I ask the Minister to consider how what has been achieved under Roger Thayne's leadership can be rolled out across the west midlands, and to please listen, especially to the people of Staffordshire.

10.8 am

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): I will keep my comments brief, as I am sure you will be delighted to hear, Mr. Benton. I, too, begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean). Many excellent speeches have been made, and I do not want to rehearse points that have already been put so eloquently, but I want to raise a couple of points that have not been addressed.

The first point is about the excellent work that Staffordshire ambulance service does in respect of the M6 motorway, which runs through the county. As many hon. Members will know, surprisingly enough, from time to time there are traffic jams on the M6, even though there is a relief road. Often, people are caught up in their vehicles and become unwell—perhaps they are diabetic, or perhaps the stress of the long, tiring journey brings on other ailments and illnesses. Staffordshire ambulance service operates an excellent service in those circumstances, rescuing drivers and passengers from vehicles, bringing insulin to them, and so on. I understand that that has not been taken into account when considering the service standards of different ambulance services, so I would like to make sure that that is on the record.

The other point that has not been mentioned so far is the star ratings of the ambulance services. Staffordshire ambulance service has the highest three-star rating—if four or five-star ratings were available, Staffordshire would be at the top of those. That can be compared with the west midlands service, which I understand has a one-star rating. It is worth stressing that that is not a reflection of the quality of the people in the west midlands service. I am certain that they do the best job they can in the wider west midlands region, but they do not have certain drugs or the systems, equipment or protocols in place to use them. The ratings reflect the systems and what is available, not the quality of the people, although I must say that in Staffordshire we have some fantastic ambulance crews and first responders.

Why would the people of Staffordshire want to have anything less than the excellent service that they have now? Why would somebody who had grown used to being able to phone the emergency services and request an ambulance, knowing that in the vast majority of cases one will come in less than eight minutes, want to change that for a system that was not so reliable, could not prescribe the drugs and was not so close to where an incident had taken place?

I echo the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley). I, too, represent a part of a Stoke-on-Trent, an area that has long been overlooked. Historically, health has been a great challenge there, with issues arising from people working in the mines and the steel works, and in the pottery industry, which thankfully we still have. People in the area have come to expect a high standard and have a great need for high-quality health care. That is reflected well in the fact that although there are different views on police mergers and primary care trusts mergers, there are not different views on the ambulance service merger. The people of Stoke-on-Trent and of wider Staffordshire speak with one voice on the issue: the ambulance service is the best service and we do not want to lose it. That sentiment is illustrated well by a small group that meets at Longton town hall for a tea dance on a Monday afternoon that, between its members, managed to come up with a petition of 400 signatures. That is the strength of feeling from one small group.

It is quite right that we should want to improve the ambulance service throughout the country, but the proposal that my hon. Friends have put forward in this debate is a better way forward. Let us make Staffordshire a shining light to guide others towards excellence in the ambulance service.

10.13 am

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): I shall be brief. I shall not repeat what my hon. Friends have said, but I must repeat one thing: congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on securing this debate at an important time, with the consultation completed and the evaluation taking place.

I am against the Staffordshire ambulance merger. I want to make that perfectly clear because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) indicated, when I went to speak to my Conservative-run local authority and explain my position—quite clearly, I thought—the Conservative party's spin machine in my part of the world accused me of lying and of doing one thing in Tamworth and a different thing in London, because I voted against the Opposition day motion. I do not want to pursue that point because it is now in the hands of the lawyers. The man involved is not working, unfortunately, so I shall not get much money off him. He is on his own account rather than his party's account—I am sure that I could have got a sufficient amount off the party.

The annals of this country's history show that the royal family used to have a whipping boy for the prince. The whipping boy used to play with the prince and if the prince misbehaved, the whipping boy got whipped. The belief was that the prince would not misbehave because he liked the whipping boy. One of the things that modestly surprises me is how gentle my hon. Friends from Staffordshire have been with the Minister. Although I have nothing but respect for her, I get totally incensed when somebody is sent along with a speech that has been prepared before the debate has even taken place.

I have no need to run round with a petition—believe me, I know exactly the sentiments of the people who live in my town and my constituency, because I live there. All the Staffordshire MPs and all my constituents are incensed. I was particularly incensed when I saw the new post of chief executive officer of the new, enlarged west midlands service not only being advertised but being filled even before the consultation had finished. I do not mind if that can be explained as plan B, but it stinks of a stitch-up and suggests that the consultation period was nothing but a sham. If my hon. Friend the Minister gets up and explains what she has done, and we come out even reasonably successfully, I will willingly apologise. However, I feel that she has a lot to say to convince me that we have not gone a long way down that route.

Every hon. Member will speak of the excellence of the Staffordshire ambulance service, but I when I try to find out why we are under threat I come back with my ears ringing with gobbledegook. I am told, "Technology—that's the answer. It's technology that's driving us," or, "It's a new strategic approach to the provision of service." Well, let me talk about technology. No one is opposed to a new radio system that covers not only the ambulance service, but the police, fire and all our other emergency services. When the technology is deliverable, we will grab it both hands, because then we can direct people faster to where they should be.

We can create a control room and if necessary, a back-up control room under the new area. The only control room that has gone down was the Greater Manchester one, which went down for 10 hours. And guess what? There was no back-up. Why was there no back-up? We are told that in the new, enlarged west midlands area we will have a control room and a back-up control room. Do we send the people down there, with their back-up machines and back-up staff who will be used perhaps once every six, seven or eight years when the main control room falls over? I think not. Do we rotate the staff, to have a week in the main control room and a week in the back-up control room? I think not.

If we want a control room mechanism, I can suggest one. We link up all the existing control rooms in the region, so that if one control room falls over, the work is immediately allocated to the remaining control rooms, where it is dealt with by people who are used to dealing with emergencies every day. If the reason that I have been given is the reason we are merging, it is a silly reason and should not have seen the light of day.

We are not opposed to planning. Anyone would be a fool to think that there was no need to plan on a regional basis for a disaster, large emergency or catastrophe, or to allocate resources for that. However, anyone looking at that would be a fool to think that ambulances or fire engines could immediately be brought from 30 or 40 miles away. Of course we cannot do that—the first ones on the scene are the local ambulances and fire engines. After that the ripple effect starts and we call in services from two, four and then six miles away to fill the vacuum created. We are not opposed to that. We would be stupid to be opposed to something like that, and the people of Staffordshire are not stupid by any means.

When I look at the plan, I see no realistic rationale. That is all that I ever asked for from the Government. I am not opposed to change, modernisation or reorganisation, but I am opposed to reorganisation for the sake of it. I am opposed to reorganisation when it takes valuable resources from the scarce resources of any department, which then neglects its everyday duties. We see calamity and sickness in the delivery of public services when so much time is spent on reorganisation.

I want the criteria to be laid down clearly from the start. In many areas the Government have failed to give the financial information, the criteria and the rationale for the change. That is why I am not pleased, especially when it is my Government who are doing this to us. It would be a disaster and a tragedy if we relied on a Labour Government to take the service in Staffordshire back. I do not intend to see any of our public services taken back under this Government. I urge the Minister to consider the matter and to try to convince the officials who first came up with the plan and are pursuing it that they should change their minds and do an about-turn before they run into a brick wall.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): I intend to call the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), but I indicated during his absence that I propose to start the wind-ups at 10.30.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): I apologise, Mr. Benton, for being a little late. I was tied up with another engagement.

The merger has been uniformly condemned by the people of Staffordshire. Indeed, I have presented a petition to Parliament, as the Minister knows, and I have several thousand protest letters, which I shall present shortly to the Department of Health.

[Mr. William Cash]

The whole exercise is an example of a cash-driven, vicious attack on an extremely good ambulance service. We have today heard condemnation of the Government's position. I urge the Minister to take the matter back and to give it serious consideration because the merger has been rejected by the local people. There is enormous anger throughout the county and particularly in my constituency.

I pay personal tribute to Roger Thayne, who did a fantastic job. It is well known that we have the fastest 999 response rate in Europe. We have the best ambulance service. As with the mergers of the police and other services, the suggestion that the ambulance service should be merged is part of a regionalisation process that is driven by deep and radical insistence on change to save money. All I can say is that the whole process should be rejected out of hand.

I agree with the remarks that a proper analysis is needed, which the Government have not so far succeeded in producing. For the most part, it is perhaps a little disingenuous for some hon. Members who voted against the proposals—[Interruption.] I see that the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) is huffing and puffing, but this is a serious matter. It is not something that can be washed aside. There have been occasions when some of us have voted against our own Government when circumstances have required that, and it is important to make that point—

Joan Walley: On a point of order, Mr. Benton. May I ask for some direction about hon. Members who come to the debate without having had the courtesy of listening to the opening comments? The issue was raised quite adequately by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), but the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) came blind to the debate.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but that is not a point of order. It is purely a matter for debate. I am quick to rule any hon. Member out of order if they contravene any of the rules of debate.

Mr. Cash: I am extremely grateful to you, Mr. Benton. I make the point, because it is a matter of fact.

Charlotte Atkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cash: Not at the moment. I am extremely glad that some of the comments that have been made have indicated a degree of change of mind and that is encouraging. I was encouraged by, for example, what the hon. Members for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins) and for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) said.

Charlotte Atkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cash: I will not give way to the hon. Lady.

This is a matter of profound importance to the people in my constituency who are affected by votes that take place on the Floor of the House, which is where such matters are decided. I challenge the Minister unequivocally to repudiate—

Charlotte Atkins: On a point of personal explanation, Mr. Benton. The hon. Gentleman accused me of huffing and puffing. I was merely indicating dissent because he suggested that I voted for the merger of Staffordshire ambulance service. I voted against a highly party political Opposition motion, which referred to mergers in general, not to Staffordshire ambulance service.

The Chairman: That is not a point of order, but I have allowed a point of explanation. I remind hon. Members that the winding-up speeches will start at 10.30. It has been an interesting debate and it is only right and proper that we ask the Minister and the Opposition spokesmen to reply at 10.30.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to you again, Mr. Benton.

The problem in Staffordshire can be remedied and I look to the Minister to do so. I am extremely glad to note that there has been a change of heart on the matter.

Dr. Tony Wright: I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the remarks that he made a moment ago because he does a huge disservice to the common cause that we are fighting. He knows full well that the Opposition debate and motion to which he referred made no reference whatever to the ambulance service in Staffordshire. To use that for party political purposes undermines all the common cause that we have made and are making again today. I ask him, on reflection, quickly to withdraw what he said.

Mr. Cash: I am not going to because the principles contained in that motion are applicable in this case. I am glad to note that there has been a change of heart. I am making that clear, but I am not going to deny the facts as I find them because this is a matter of profound importance to the people in my constituency who were affected by that vote in the House. Therefore, I will not retract my remarks. However, I am conscious of the fact that there have been specific examples, which I have given already, of a change of heart and that is extremely encouraging. I hope that the Minister will take that on board because the proposal is disgraceful and should be withdrawn. It is incumbent on us as Members of Parliament to spell out the facts, so that people can see what happened and take account of the feelings that have been expressed on both sides of the House.

10.28 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on introducing this important date and all Staffordshire Members who have been tigerish in defence of their cause. As an external observer, may I comment that one thing that can lessen the force of that cause and disfigure it is political division, when there should be unity in this place and on the ground in Staffordshire. From my experience of past health campaigns, I offer a friendly word of advice: that sort of behaviour leads to poor results for the people we serve.

The debate is timely. The Minister will make a statement and may pull the rug from under us, or a rabbit out of the hat, whatever the appropriate metaphor is. I shall start with a few general comments.

No one wants to have much to do with ambulance services on a personal basis, although there are occasions when we are all desperate to see one. Our fundamental requirement is that the service should be quick, efficient, effective, high-tech and well resourced. It should be human and sympathetic because it is in the front line and the public use it in situations of high stress.

Most of those remarks probably apply to the non-blue light service as well, but emergency patients are not normally much interested on such occasions in the name or structure of the trust that serves them, the badges on the ambulance, the origin of the ambulance or any of the minor administrative details. None the less, the administrative structure is not completely unrelated to delivery. I am sure that you are familiar with the situation in my constituency, Mr. Benton. There are two hospitals near each other, and the path between them is divided by two ambulance trusts. It is a woefully inefficient arrangement, and empty ambulances often cross one another on the same road. They could be using their resources far more effectively.

There is a question about the optimal size of an administrative unit—obviously, the more units and boundaries a trust has, the more issues it has to deal with in respect of boundaries—and there are questions about efficiency. There is not much of an issue in respect of the democratic accountability of ambulance trusts. There have been many debates about why a primary care trust or an acute trust is not properly democratically accountable, but there is not the same level of comment about ambulance trusts. Yet there is a genuine issue around making ambulance services efficient.

You will be aware, Mr. Benton, that the ambulance service that serves our area, the Mersey regional ambulance trust, has been accused of being less than efficient and has recently taken steps to be more effective. However, decisions on reorganisation must not be taken on the basis of temporary factors—who happens to be running the ambulance trust at the time and what the current performance data are. They should be responsive to what might be considered to be permanent changes.

For example, there has been a significant change in the skill level and competence of ambulance crews over the past few decades. They are far more competent and able than they were years ago. There is a prevalence of co-responding and looking across the piece at how emergency services integrate that did not exist before, and, with satellite navigation and so on, there is less concern about fixed bases and where ambulances are located.

That leads to certain presumptions. There is a rational and reasonable presumption, for example, in favour of co-terminosity of emergency services. There is a presumption in favour of economies of scale, as bigger units often possess better resources and have lower overheads, but it is not an absolute presumption. It needs to be tested empirically, not dogmatically, and that is what the contributions to this debate have helped to do.

There are other strong presumptions. One that I believe we all have, to some extent, is that locally based services are more locally sensitive. Another one, which has already been mentioned in the debate, is that we should not endeavour to fix something that is not broken, and it is clear that the Staffordshire ambulance service is not broken at all.

It would be easy to get out of the dilemma by spouting the usual clichés—we should not go for one size fits all, we have to consider whether things are fit for purpose—and in a minute or two I could find myself using words such as "step change" and the kind of gobbledegook that tends to cloud these debates. What we have here, and what has been argued sensibly by hon. Members, is a good prima facie case against change.

Certain factors make it a good case. Extraordinary statements have been made by the chief executive and deputy chief executive of the Staffordshire ambulance service that would not have been made were there not genuine and serious concern. Extraordinary efforts have been made by all local MPs, and that is reflected by the number of them involved in this debate. There are stark statistical contrasts between Staffordshire and the surrounding areas with which it is intended to merge, and there have been some serious accusations that the approach is completely dogmatic, relatively unreasoned and resistant to evidence.

The Government must satisfy us by demonstrating that there has been real consultation, and that the decision is evidence-led and responsive. They must be totally up front about what they are prepared to leave to local democratic decision making—or even just local decision making. If decisions are not to be made locally, if some template is to be writ large across the country, they may as well say so now. If not, perhaps we could review the criteria that are being used for this exercise and get an independent evaluation of how fairly and objectively they are being applied.

In a nutshell, the trust is making a decent, reasonable and rational case to remain a beacon of good practice. It has not been said in this debate, but I presume that there would be no detriment to surrounding areas if it did so, and that, in essence, is the case that the Minister must answer.

10.35 am

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Benton.

I believe that everyone in the Chamber feels genuine gratitude to the hon. Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) for having secured this debate, which is not only important but extraordinarily timely, following the discussions in the House.

We have heard from many hon. Members who represent Staffordshire. I would like to confirm the apologies of my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) who, but for a prior engagement that he simply could not avoid, would have been here. He supports the unanimous view expressed by Staffordshire MPs on both sides of the House.

In this age of consensual politics, I am sure that we would agree on what a perfect ambulance trust would look like. It would consistently achieve a three-star rating. Year after year, it would improve its response rates and achieve well above the eight, 14 and 19-minute targets, at both categories A and B, and the GP urgent call targets. It would be the best at resuscitation, it would balance its books—especially during this time of Government-precipitated crisis in the NHS—and it would be the most economic. In fact, within its budget, it would invest in innovative techniques and extra protocols above and beyond the statutory ones. It would employ more doctors than any other trust, its chief executive and staff would have the best interests of the trust at heart, rather than being focused on assuring their pensions. Such an ambulance trust would be looked up to by other services around the world. Indeed, its chief executive would, no doubt, travel to other countries to speak to ambulance services personnel.

Hon. Members may be surprised to learn that all those attributes of the perfect trust are, in fact, attributes of the Staffordshire ambulance service NHS trust, which serves all the people of Staffordshire. Who on earth, be it a Government or a Minister, would seek to change or scrap that if they were in their right mind?

I ask that with some feeling. Like the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh), I suffer from being in the area of the Mersey regional ambulance service, which has had a disastrous time. The ambulance service of Cheshire, a proud county, was perfectly adequate until it was rammed into Mersey against local will. What has happened? The service once had a number of stars, but it has collapsed to a nil rating. There is no surprise there, except to deaf Ministers, who were warned. They cannot pretend that it is somebody else's fault, or that it was an unintended consequence of a wider, benign idea that was dreamed up in the halls of new Labour. The change was intended, it happened, Ministers are accountable, and we all share in their shame.

Staffordshire is about to be precipitated into exactly the same crisis unless the lesson of the Mersey regional ambulance service is learned and at last the Government listen to the speeches, sincere and full of integrity, of hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is not easy for a Government Back Bencher or representative to have to find a distinction between the Government whom they have been elected to support and their decisions.

The West Midlands ambulance service, with which the Government are trying to merge the Staffordshire ambulance service, has dropped from three stars to one star since 2002. It only just makes its targets, and at month six it was running a deficit of £1.1 million—part of a deficit in our NHS that is so embarrassing for the Government that they continue to withhold up-to-date figures. The situation may be worse than I have just cited.

It is also widely agreed that a merger of Staffordshire ambulance service would cause a cut in patient care. The—sadly—former deputy chief executive, Dr. Anton van Dellen said:

> "The trust has been notified that the clinical protocols will migrate away from Staffordshire protocols to national protocols from March 2007. This will result in a decrease in the quality of care available to patients in Staffordshire".

The Staffordshire ambulance service operates 36 protocols above the national statutory ones. There is not even a great cost. Dr. van Dellen calculated that it was £11.2 million in the first year and £5.1 million in years three, four and five—all done within budget. Even the strategic health authority officials admitted at the Birmingham city council health overview and scrutiny committee on 11 January this year that > "the proposals could have a major adverse effect for the rural areas".

That point was made strongly by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) and others. It is a point I strongly relate to, having a rural constituency myself.

Many groups—health and oversight committees, the women's institute, local councils and local campaigners—are united in their condemnation of any plan to merge Staffordshire ambulance service. As we can see from today's debate, Opposition and Labour Members have united in common cause. There has been a bit of an edge in one particular area. I would give a tiny word of advice to the much respected hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright)—and I share that respect—who has been particularly aggrieved by the normal fare of parliamentary activity during Opposition-day debates. If anything has been proved during recent weeks, it is that the Government pay heed only to the squeaky wheel. It appears that rebellions can count, and it would have been interesting to think about that as a political tactic on that occasion.

Mrs. Dean: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that Staffordshire is unusual in that MPs from both main political parties have worked together for the benefit of the people of Staffordshire? Does he think that the appalling comments from the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) undermine that situation?

Mr. O'Brien: It is highly presumptuous, in trying to make a uniting point, to divide. I do not think that that was very helpful, given that there has been respect on all sides for the way in which the debate has been conducted. My point relates to the edgy point raised about the Opposition-day debate. I seem to recall that that is precisely what happened when we were in government: the Opposition-day debates were used by the Labour party in exactly the same way. Indeed, as my predecessor in my constituency tells me, local campaign material was used to that precise effect.

Dr. Tony Wright: The hon. Gentleman has one simple remedy, which is to put the record straight. He should say that the Opposition motion made no reference at all to Staffordshire. There can be legitimate argument about whether mergers of different bits of the health service should take place in different parts of the country. The motion was not about Staffordshire, but it was used by his party to traduce Labour Members with the allegation that they voted for the merger of Staffordshire ambulance service, which simply was not true. I ask him to repudiate that, then we can get on with the rest of the debate.

Mr. O'Brien: I am not going to repudiate it on the basis that the way in which people interpret the way things are done in this House—the motion is on the record—is a matter for them to deal with in their local campaigns. There is genuine and principled opposition from the official Opposition to the crass approach taken by the Government to try to ram together, by means of a regionalisation dogma, organisations that run perfectly well, whether they are part of the NHS, the police, the fire service or local authority representation. Staffordshire ambulance service is probably the biggest victim because it so excellent and such a beacon. If one can only relate, for political cover, to the particular, instead of recognising that this is taking place under a general principle advocated officially by a Government with Executive power, that is naïve. I put that on the record as a counter to what has been an unfortunate edge in this argument.

Furthermore, nothing is more transparently weak and disingenuous than saying as an excuse that we are waiting for a final decision to be made. That excuse was even made by the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's questions, when he said:

"the outcome of the consultation exercise is not a foregone conclusion."—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1451.]

We are all keenly aware that the final decision was probably made some months ago in the minds of Ministers and Whitehall bureaucrats. Indeed, it was hinted at earlier. Why else would the NHS Appointments Commission have advertised for, and appointed, a pool of nine people to be heads for the new regional ambulance services? I have had a letter from Roger Moore, chief executive of the commission, stating that it "began this recruitment at the request of the Department of Health".

Why else would the Government be misrepresenting the findings of Peter Bradley? He recommended a reduction from 31 trusts to 28, which was coterminous at that time with the number of strategic health authorities. There was no suggestion of a change down to nine, 11, 12 or whatever it may be. Ministers have used that as an excuse to reduce the number of ambulance trusts to nine, 10 or 11, just as they have invented the idea of the reconfiguration of the SHAs after the Bradley report. That is sleight of hand, it is an abuse and there is no evidence base whatever—not in Bradley's report—to support the Government's reconfiguration of ambulance trusts to regional remote bodies, which will level down to the performance of the lowest common denominator. Anyone with a scrap of management understanding knows that benchmarking to raise all to the level of best practice requires people to be separately configured, rather than merged and diluted into one.

In conclusion, we know that Staffordshire ambulance service is one of the best in the world. That is largely due to the hard work of Roger Thayne, and his deputy Dr. Anton van Dellen, to whom we pay warm tribute. Mr. Thayne felt his integrity would be impugned if he did not step down, citing among his reasons the desire

"not to land the trust with a bill of £200,000", and the premature

"appointment . . . of the transitional chief for a regional trust".

He has been effectively forced out by a process designed and managed by Ministers.

If the service is merged into a regional trust, the 36 extra protocols will be dropped. Staffordshire delivers those protocols within budget and they save lives. Trust and SHA officials have said that that will lead to a downgrading in patient care. The Secretary of State has presided over a sham national consultation, deliberately spinning Bradley's findings to support the Government's regionalisation agenda and appointing chief executives before the consultation has even finished. Unsurprisingly, that has destabilised a wonderful chief executive who has shown the way for everyone else.

If the Minister presides over the end of the Staffordshire ambulance service, she will prove that the consultation is a sham, taking into account neither the excellence of the service nor the wish of the people. The best possible single-word speech the Minister could make to every single man, woman and child in Staffordshire, and every constituent of the Members here today, is to say yes to the question I shall put to her. For the Minister, after the so-called consultation, the game is up. If she is to have a shred of credibility, she knows that the only speech she can give is yes in answer to my question. Will she confirm that the Staffordshire ambulance NHS trust will remain as it is: unmerged, independent, excellent and delivering services that the rest of the country would be proud to match?

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Benton.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) on securing the debate, which, as the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) said, has by and large been constructive. He used the word integrity in describing many of the speeches that have been made. I agree with the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh), however, that the behaviour of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), who came in late and made a speech that broke what has been quite a good consensus in the debate, was extremely unfortunate. I completely understand the fears and distress of Labour and, I suspect, Conservative Members that that approach has not helped the debate. It does a disservice not only to the hon. Gentleman's constituents but to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Burton. It is no wonder that they feel disturbed by that approach.

We are talking about an excellent ambulance service. I know that, because I visited Staffordshire ambulance service with my hon. Friend the Member for Burton. I was extremely impressed as we walked through the tents and into the hall and met so many of the members of staff, who were clearly incredibly committed to providing such an excellent service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) talked about changes that had been controversial. In my own constituency, after some of the changes were put in place, ambulances were not necessarily in the ambulance station, but in different parts of the area. As he said, those changes have been accepted. Staffordshire has led the way with a three-star rating, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) noted. It is a tribute to the work that has been done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) said that we must consider how we can transfer best practice to different areas. That is what we have been doing. I visited Staffordshire when I had ministerial responsibility for ambulances, and I feel strongly that there has been almost a revolution in the way in which ambulance services are delivered. We considered them closely, because they had an impact on waiting times in accident and emergency departments. The ambulance services are much more integrated with the general emergency services, and so much a part of the way in which we ensure the transfer of best practice to other areas. I agree with my hon. Friend that we must do that.

[Ms Rosie Winterton]

NHS ambulance services handle about 6 million 999 calls each year, and spending on ambulance services has increased by about 75 per cent. Response times and patient care have improved significantly, and some revolutionary changes have been made. We need to build on those achievements. We needed to consider how we could review ambulance services to ensure that improvements in service delivery were consistent throughout the country. That is why we published a service review last year.

The implementation of that review will be one of the biggest transformations of the service for more than a decade, and I think that it will deliver good services to patients in terms of the range and quality of care that they receive. To support those improvements, the way in which ambulance trusts are structured and managed needs to change. We must consider the capacity to plan for tomorrow, as well as to deal with today. They could do that if some of the perceived artificial barriers were removed. We must consider how to improve regional resilience, integrate planning and service delivery and ensure that there is co-terminosity with other service providers.

In that context, I turn to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) about the written ministerial statement. The Secretary of State for Health published it at half-past 9 this morning. Essentially, it confirms that the strategic health authorities will submit reports on the consultations on ambulance trust reconfiguration proposals by 5 April. Decisions will be announced as soon as possible after that, with the intention that new ambulance NHS trusts will be established from 1 July. I have copies of the written statement. I did not want to hand them round earlier, but with your permission, Mr. Benton, I should be perfectly happy to do so.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): It might be appropriate if the hon. Lady were to place the statements on the Table.

Ms Winterton: I shall certainly do that.

Mr. O'Brien: Although we shall obviously read the detail of the statement, in light of what the Minister has just said and given the NHS Appointments Commission appointments to which I referred, all that is required from her now is to find out whether from 1 July—a date that comes as no surprise, because it had been canvassed before—there is any prospect of Staffordshire retaining its independent, stand-alone status, or are we all shadow boxing?

Ms Winterton: I shall come to some of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, but a pool of people has been appointed because we want to ensure that, when any changes are made and if any new trusts are set up, they can get moving as quickly as possible. It has been perfectly clear in all the adverts that change depends on the outcome of consultation.

All hon. Members have paid tribute to the work of Roger Thayne and his deputy, and reference has been made to their resignations. I assure hon. Members that Shropshire and Staffordshire strategic health authority is working with the ambulance trust to secure robust management.

My hon. Friends the Members for Burton and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) praised the work of local community responders. They are important people, and the recent ambulance review envisages such schemes being a key part of the increased flexibility and type of responders whom ambulance services dispatch. I assure my hon. Friends that we expect the community responders scheme to continue if the proposed merger goes ahead.

I shall finish by addressing some clinical practice issues. I assure my hon. Friends that the strategic health authority has already, as part of normal contingency planning for any proposed merger, set up a group to consider the procedures and protocols throughout all trusts in the west midlands. I am confident that it will help to ensure that future practice will be the best for all patients, including those in Staffordshire.

My hon. Friends have made some constructive suggestions about the way forward, and I am grateful to them for having put forward those ideas. I shall take them forward and ensure that my noble Friend Lord Warner receives details of them. I am sure he will consider those issues with interest, as we are keen to ensure that all views about the proposed merger of ambulance services in the west midlands and, indeed, nationally are given proper consideration before any decisions are made.

I thank hon. Members who have been present for the whole debate for their contributions. As I said, I shall pass on their views to Lord Warner.

Brick Industry

11 am

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): The stimulus for this important debate was my recent visit to the Carlton brickworks in Grimethorpe in my constituency. Grimethorpe is my place of birth, and I am proud to be associated with such a great place.

I remember Grimethorpe in the 1970s and 1980s, when everything in the village revolved around the colliery. Not only did we have the pit; we had a Coalite plant, and a power station provided electricity not just for the pit but for the local communities. The area was powered not by the national grid but with local coal. We also had a fluidised bed plant, a clean-coal technology technique that was then funded by 20 countries. It is a pity that we did not keep that plant open, and now, with the present energy situation, we are reaping the results of the mis-advice that led to its closure. Also, of course, we had the Carlton Main Brickworks. Altogether, there were more than 4,000 jobs in Grimethorpe, a village with a population of about 6,500.

The only industry to survive from that era is the brickworks. It opened alongside Grimethorpe colliery in the mid-1890s, and has been producing quality bricks for well over a century. Indeed, Carlton Brick is the largest independent brick manufacturer in the United Kingdom, producing approximately 5 per cent. of all British bricks. It produces 34 million bricks a year, in more than 30 styles. An average house requires about 10,000 bricks.

The brickyard currently employs about 80 staff, and for the past 30 years or so the kilns have used gas rather than the original heat source of coal. Therein lies the main reason for today's debate. It can be summed up succinctly in the letter that I recently received from Carlton Brick, thanking me for my recent visit. Oliver Stevenson, the company chairman, wrote to me on 30 January. He said:

"It was a pleasure to show you around the factory and to introduce you to so many of our staff; the feedback has been very positive! We also appreciated the time you gave us in the office, when were able to describe to you our concerns over the cost of Energy and Gas. As you know, this has become a major problem for the brick industry, as well as for all sectors of energy-intensive manufacturing. We feel very threatened by European competitors who manufacture in a much more benign environment. As we discussed, it is not only the high of Gas that is causing us trouble, but also the volatility of the market, which has rendered planning almost impossible."

Before expanding further, I want to explain why bricks are so important to British manufacturing and the British economy. Bricks have been used since ancient Egyptian times, so they are a very old construction product. Bricks are the most reliable fundamental building material; they stand the test of time; they do not deteriorate; and they improve with age. They do not biodegrade, unlike other construction products such as timber. They are reusable if salvaged well, and they are ecologically neutral. Their life expectancy is greater than any other building product. They have a good thermal mass, so they provide good heat and sound insulation. Brick houses are built to last, especially compared with the timber-clad and vinyl-clad houses in New Orleans which were seen floating away in the floods after hurricane Katrina last year. Bricks are adaptable. They can be used successfully with all other construction materials, including concrete, glass and timber. Bricks will work in the future.

The UK brick industry employs more than 6,500 people in its factories. On top of that are the plant and machinery manufacturers, subcontractors and truck drivers, plus 115,000 bricklayers. Only yesterday I was speaking to my good friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When he asked what I was doing, I said that I was going to the Library to put the finishing touches to my speech on the future of the brick industry. He said, "It's funny you should say that, because I was at Battersea power station yesterday talking to a group of young women who have trained as bricklayers." Even the Chancellor is on board.

I return to the problem of energy prices. In November 2005, the price of gas quadrupled, and since then the market has been volatile. The cold weather in March and the supply problems caused by the shut-down of the Rough gas field have made the price rocket again, and on 15 March we saw the highest day-ahead price of 227p per therm. The high cost of gas has been crippling for all industries, not just for brick companies. Manufacturers in the energy-intensive sector have raised their prices in order to combat those increased commodity prices. I shall not confine myself to the brick industry. The problem affects also the steel and glass industries. The latter is important to the future of Barnsley, as a number of big glass manufacturers operate in the area—not, unfortunately, in my constituency but in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley). The cost of energy is just as important to the glass and steel industries as it is to the brick industry.

One method of combating the energy crisis is to reduce production, and therefore the consumption of gas. That is bad news for the UK's GDP, and also for local employees who have seen their hours and wage packets reduced accordingly. The wild swings in price from one day to the next have put industry into a new environment, where planning for the future has become nearly impossible. Those swings in price mean that we are unsure of how to plan costing and pricing budgets.

Capital investment planning is difficult because of the uncertainty caused by that volatility. It is known that larger companies with multinational manufacturing plants now prefer to invest in their European factories rather than in Britain. The greatest cause of concern is that the problems of the UK gas market are not being experienced by our European counterparts. That environment has seriously disadvantaged our industry, and it is known that bricks have been successfully imported from Europe, where the manufacturing cost base is less onerous.

Why has this been happening? The reason for the high prices in the UK is that our gas market has been liberalised in a way that the European markets have not. This means that third parties such as banks and traders are able to buy and sell gas speculatively, and the price is driven up and down according to the sentiments of the day. Those sentiments may be based on fundamental facts, such as cold weather forecasts and shortages in the gas fields, as in the Rough field to which I referred earlier, or they may be based on rumours such as forecasts of very cold winters, as was the case last November. It is of paramount importance that the market becomes more appropriate to the needs of industry, including the needs of the electricity producers; it should also be more in line with the markets of our European counterparts.

Industry is struggling to deal with the European emissions trading scheme legislation. That fits on top of our legislation dealing with the emissions that our factories send out into the environment. We are ahead of the rest of Europe in implementing that legislation, but we are doing it without first removing our own legislation. As a result, our industry is likely to be faced with two legislative hurdles rather than one. Furthermore, the burden of bureaucracy being placed on manufacturers is hard to bear.

Many brick companies are struggling to deal with that extra work, as it takes an ever larger proportion of management time. Not only that, but elements of the European emissions trading scheme are not fair; for instance, it puts great pressure on companies to reduce their emissions and, perversely, it is an incentive for companies not to reduce emissions before the legislation kicks in. Furthermore, if a large company such as Ibstock shuts an inefficient plant but at the same time starts up a new state-of-the-art brickworks, the new brickworks cannot adopt the emission permits of the old works.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Ibstock village is right next to my village. We are a major construction products constituency. As my hon. Friend said, gas prices quadrupled in November from 31p to 128p per therm, and have since gone up further. Does he agree that if the Minister does not reply to this point today, he should approach his ministerial colleagues to tackle the dysfunctionality in the European energy market, not just in terms of liberalisation, but in terms of the mergers and takeovers that have taken place, which mean that the market is damaging important firms such as Ibstock in my constituency, and Heather, my home village?

Jeff Ennis: I thank my hon. Friend for making those salient points. I hope that the Minister was listening because I shall certainly reinforce them later.

The Carlton Bricks of this world are much smaller than the Ibstocks. The brick industry is a broad church. We want to ensure that it remains so, and that it can maintain brick manufacturers of the size of Ibstock as well as smaller manufacturers such as Carlton Brick.

In a recent report commissioned by Centrica, Global Insight calculated that users of gas in Britain will pay an extra £10 billion this year because energy markets in continental Europe are failing to liberalise fully. That figure is half of the total gas supply bill for the UK. The report said that since the opening of the European gas interconnector, British Gas spot prices have been highly influenced by movements in European gas contract prices, which were directly linked to changes in oil and oil product prices. Trevor Sikorski, the lead author of the report, said:

"Our analysis shows that there can be little doubt that UK consumers are paying the price for Europe's failure to sufficiently open its energy markets as we become increasingly dependent on gas imports."

The Minister knows that I wrote to his colleague, the Minister for Energy, about this problem on 6 December 2005. I am grateful for the Minister for Energy's response, dated 20 February, which intimated some of the initiatives that the Department has embarked on to try to resolve this issue, including the establishment, in 2004, of the gas prices working group, which is chaired by the Secretary of State. I know that the Minister for Energy met representatives from the industry at No. 10 on 9 November 2005. His letter states that "at the end of November, Ofgem announced the steps it was taking to ensure that the causes of recent movements in wholesale gas prices reflect changing supply and demand factors rather than market abuse or other distortions."

The letter then details those steps, the first of which is "writing to the European Commission asking them to investigate why the interconnector has not been flowing at full capacity when UK gas prices are much higher than those in Europe".

The second step is "asking the Commission to look at market arrangements in other countries that may be distorting trade"

in gas.The third step is

"asking National Grid to make sure that arrangements are in place to allow other companies to deliver"

gas

"through the Isle of Grain if the companies who bought capacity at the terminal are not using it."

The last step is

"asking Interconnector UK to provide us with information about who holds import capacity this winter to assist our ongoing analysis."

EU energy market liberalisation has to be a key priority as we become a net importer of gas. We need fair network access and greater integration of national energy markets, including more cross-border infrastructure to establish a level playing field across the whole of Europe. I hope that in his response, the Minister will expand on what progress is being made in this regard and what further steps need to be taken.

I opened the debate by talking about the industries in Grimethorpe that were closed under the Conservative Government: the pit, the Coalite works, the power station and the fluidised bed plant clean-coal technology. In its last six weeks of production in 1993, Grimethorpe colliery made an operating profit of a quarter of a million pounds. Clearly, that pit was closed because of political dogma rather than economic necessity. There are 60 million tonnes of known workable coal deposits embedded in the ground beneath Grimethorpe, which, hopefully, will be used at some point in the future. It would be ironic if the one long-established industry left in Grimethorpe which survived the Thatcher years were to close under a Labour Government because we could not establish a properly regulated, competitive energy market across the European Union. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): It is a pleasure to speak under your chairmanship, Mr. Benton, which is benign but strict, as ever.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis) on securing this debate. I should refer to him as the hon. Member for Grimethorpe, as he has conjured up images of the industrial skill and hard graft for which that area is famous.

I appreciate the difficulties faced by companies in the brick manufacturing industry. As my hon. Friend acknowledged, many parts of UK industry have experienced significant energy price increases. Domestic and industrial energy prices have an impact on both fuel poverty and international industrial competitiveness. We can take a certain amount of pride in the way the liberalisation and deregulation of the gas and electricity markets and the introduction of full retail competition have enabled market mechanisms to ensure competitive prices in the long term. However, there are some immediate problems, to which my hon. Friend has rightly referred.

Clearly, energy prices are linked to the competitiveness of industry. The Government share concerns about the potential loss of jobs and investment, but we must view the spike in prices that was experienced in the latter half of 2005, and the current pressures on the energy market in the UK, in the wider context. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Minister for Energy, who is taking forward the energy review, take the situation seriously, as do I, especially in relation to the industrial sector and the building industry. We are seeking solutions that reduce the impact on industry, especially energy-intensive users such as brick manufacturers.

My hon. Friend will acknowledge that as we become a net importer of energy—there has been an acceleration of that process in the past few years with gas in particular, which was faster than anticipated—we need to consider energy supplies in the long term. That is the underlying theme of the energy review policy, which the Minister for Energy is taking forward vigorously. That needs an intelligent debate. The slogans that come from some quarters—that nuclear is the total answer, that nuclear needs to be excluded, or that wind power is an answer and so on—are not helpful. We need an objective, well informed debate. I know that my hon. Friend and many other Members, on this side of the House at least, want such a debate.

David Taylor: The Minister will be aware that there were pre-existing trends in the brick industry that were not encouraging. Between 2000 and 2005, the delivered number of bricks fell by about 11 per cent. to 2.6 billion. Naturally, people who work in the industry and depend on it are especially concerned and will welcome today's debate.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is right. That was the underlying theme of the opening remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough about the trends that we face as we become a net importer of energy being compounded by the short-term problems to which I have referred, and the fact that high-energy users such as the brick industry were already under pressure before those conditions occurred.

Jeff Ennis: The energy review is very important. The consultation will end midway through next month, if my memory serves me correctly. My right hon. Friend mentioned nuclear, but not coal. Does he see a future for coal as a major long-term energy provider in this country?

Alun Michael: My point was that we need to look objectively and afresh at all sources of energy to get balanced answers. I do not want to trespass outside my brief to speak for or against any of the options. I was merely encouraging hon. Friends to take seriously the objectivity of the consultation, as I know my hon. Friend does. As he knows, we have made a considerable effort to engage with all parts of industry ahead of this winter and with the more immediate problems to which he has referred.

Officials from the Department of Trade and Industry have held regular discussions with industry since the start of 2005 through the gas prices working group and more recently through the demand side response working group. The brick industry is represented on these bodies through the energy intensive users group and is directly represented on the business and Whitehall climate change group.

In addition, we have endeavoured to keep industry informed about the gas supply situation this winter by issuing a frequently asked questions pack in mid-December and again in early February. UK gas supplies are likely to be tight over the remaining part of this winter and, to some extent, next winter as the UK switches to being a net importer. Reliance on gas imports is not a new feature of the UK energy supply mix, but the scale of dependence will be higher.

There is evidence of projects coming forward to meet the gap between Great Britain's gas demand and the UK's continental shelf production as projected over 10 years from 2005, which include a 50 per cent. increase in the Bacton-Zeebrugge interconnector capacity on top of the doubling already completed in November 2005, two new pipelines from Norway and the Netherlands and two major liquefied natural gas import terminals in addition to the new Isle of Grain terminal, which is already open.

In the short term, we have raised issues with the European Commission and want to see the competitiveness of the energy market across Europe encouraged vigorously by appropriate action from the Commission. Gas is one of the key fuels used to generate electricity in the UK, so higher gas prices will inevitably lead to higher electricity prices.

In January 2006, prices in the UK were below the EU median for both domestic electricity and gas prices and will remain so even after the increases. Up to October 2005, industrial prices were no higher on the EU median. Provisional January 2006 estimates will be published in March 2006. In some parts of industry, particularly those that have already felt the impact of high energy costs and have had to deal with emissions issues such as those that have been referred to, energy prices were at the top of the agenda.

[Alun Michael]

I find that different parts of the industry have different responses. Some look, as they have for a long time, towards a mix of short and long-term purchasing of energy. Others appear to be reliant entirely on spot purchases, which mean lower prices, but they were disproportionately affected by the steep rise in prices in the spike towards the end of last year. It is clear that not only do the Government need to pay attention to energy prices, but industry needs to consider the long-term viability of its supplies.

Indications are that industrial gas prices are likely to be around the 1988 level in real terms, while industry electricity prices, including the climate change levy, are likely to be around 1997 levels in real terms. Provisional 2005 estimates for industry will, of course, be published in March 2006. In real terms, international oil prices are still below the levels reached in the late '70s and early '80s. Petrol and diesel prices, including tax in cash terms, have both fallen from the peaks reached in September 2005. There is a difficult area of volatility. We know that it is a problem, but the extent of the problem for different parts of industry is perhaps a little more difficult to define precisely.

It is also important to look at the future of the brick industry in terms not only of energy prices but of what is going on more broadly in the construction sector of which it forms a part. Bricks have been a key building block—I am sorry about the pun—of the sector for centuries. However, buildings are evolving and the brick industry needs to do so as well. It needs to be a core part of the industry improvement agenda, which is an active one. The brick industry is central to the future of our construction industry, which I regard as a success story.

I have had a lot of contact with the construction industry over many years. I chaired the planning committee of Cardiff city council. I was involved in the training end of the industry with young unemployed people, and I had experience as a client when we built St. David's hall and, more recently, during the preparations for the Cardiff Bay opera house.

From that period, and coming back into direct contact with the construction industry in my role as the Minister responsible for construction, I have been struck by how much more professional the industry is. It operates more through teamwork and has a better focus on the supply chain issues than was the case even a few years ago. It has responded very quickly, for instance, to the opportunity offered by the Olympic games. An industry committee, which I invited Peter Rogers to chair, has come back quickly with propositions to put the industry in the frame and to use the Olympic games in 2012 as a showcase. The construction industry obviously needs to be at the front of that, and we hope that all industries will take that major opportunity for a showcase.

It is important for the brick industry to engage in integrated teams to ensure that it understands what clients really want and need; what the issues are for project teams that use specific products within the construction industry; and how the sector can address such issues and delight those who use its products. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that the brick industry does not want its products to be counted merely on the number it takes to build a house, impressive though that is, but for the quality and texture of the material used for the best.

Perhaps I can take one example of that engagement with the wider interests of the industry. I know that the brick industry has had a love-hate relationship with the concept of modern methods of construction which the Deputy Prime Minister has promoted so hard. I can understand industry concerns that a prescriptive view of what comprises a modern method of construction should not be taken by Government. However, the approach has its roots in the Egan agenda and its purpose is to encourage innovations in construction to produce more and better housing in less time. It is not about promoting one particular system of technology.

Modern methods can include a range of approaches both on and off-site, using all materials: steel, timber, concrete and brick. My Department is working closely with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the National Audit Office to see whether a performance-based definition can be devised that picks out key facets, such as productivity, quality, safety and sustainability. Industry will be deeply engaged in that work. We will be looking to industry to take a challenging view of the measures and benchmarks that might be used for the benefits of clients and society as a whole. I see it as a way to encourage innovation and continuous improvement. I welcome initiatives from the brick industry, such as the development of brick slips for use with off-site manufactured panels, as a way for the brick industry to engage with wider industrial development.

The problem is that people sometimes view the construction industry as a mature, low return, dangerous and, perhaps, from a City viewpoint, unexciting industry. That could not be further from the truth, as I know only too well from my engagement with the sector, which started when I worked on a building site in Berlin in 1964, if anybody really wants to look back.

Single Payment Scheme

2.30 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Welcome to the Chair, Mr. Benton; it is a privilege to appear before you this afternoon.

I am delighted to have secured this important debate. I refer hon. Members to my declaration in the Register of Members' Interests and draw their attention to my claim during the last election to have been the champion of the countryside. I said then that I would campaign to promote farming in the countryside; I invite the Minister to state what similar claims he made at the last election.

I shall give a little history to put the debate in context. On 9 March, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), assured me in the House that the bulk of payments under the single farm payments scheme 2005 would be paid by the end of March. That has clearly not been the case. Before that, on 7 March, the Under-Secretary, in response to my written question, stated that he was "pleased to report that the first Single Payment Scheme (SPS) payments were released from the Rural Payments Agency (RPA) on 20 February 2006. RPA is continuing in its efforts to make the bulk of payments by the end of March, and all payments are expected to be made before the 30 June 2006 regulatory deadline."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 7 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1258W.]

In the interim, the Secretary of State announced that the fiasco of the non-payment had led to the removal of the RPA's chief executive, who would be replaced, and that the review would be overtaken. As recently as Monday of this week, the House learned that as yet the Government do not seem to understand the gravity of the situation and the distress that it causes. That is the issue that I wish to explore.

The Government have presided over an unprecedented crisis of confidence in all sections of the countryside, from the foot and mouth epidemic to the latest fiasco of the non-payment of single farm payments in North Yorkshire and throughout England. The Government seem incapable of legislating on and administering farm matters.

The Rural Payments Agency is based in Reading, and that speaks volumes. I have nothing against Reading or its inhabitants, but how can someone who lives and works there be expected to have an understanding of and sympathy with the issues that concern those living in rural North Yorkshire? It beats me.

A number of my right hon. and hon. Friends who served with distinction in the former Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Fisheries are in the Chamber. I have consistently argued that since that Ministry was replaced, any person starting work at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, or one of its agencies such as the RPA, should work in a trainee capacity for at least three months in every aspect of farming. They should visit auction marts, haulage firms, abattoirs and farmers markets and also supermarkets to see how the end products are sold.

Those officials are immensely powerful. They advise Ministers on what rules can and should be passed in both Westminster and Brussels. We now know the extent to which EU directives can be and are being ultimately embellished and gold-plated by quite low-placed officials. On top of that, they can never be contacted easily. Like every other Government agency—the Inland Revenue with its tax credits and the Child Support Agency with its child support payments—the RPA has descended into such a shambles. The Secretary of State had to sack the RPA chief executive.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the most astonishing things for those of us who have served in a Government is that DEFRA Ministers were not carefully monitoring the workings of the RPA? Will she press the Government on how Ministers could have been unaware of the catastrophe that was building up? Further, does she agree that this is a matter of ministerial responsibility? An Under-Secretary at least should go—probably the Secretary of State as well.

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that powerful and eloquent contribution. One of the sadnesses is that on numerous occasions in this sorry saga, a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends and other hon. Members have impressed on the Government, DEFRA and its Ministers that the payments were not being made and would not be made in time.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): The situation is slightly worse than my hon. Friend has just explained. The Government were warned by a proper report of a Committee of this House, but they ignored that and relied on officials instead. The dangers were brushed aside; a Minister went on the radio to say that the warnings were a nonsense and that the Select Committee Chairman did not know what he was talking about. However, it seems that the Chairman knew what he was talking about and the Minister did not.

Miss McIntosh: I could not have put that more eloquently myself. We are fortunate in having the Select Committee Chairman and the rapporteurs with us this afternoon.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Will my hon. Friend also note that an earlier report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee flagged up concerns in October 2003 about the capability of the RPA, the process of change on which it had embarked and the state of its IT system?

Miss McIntosh: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, and the House is grateful for the Select Committee's excellent reports. I have not had the benefit of reading all of the 2003 report, but should like to highlight two of the conclusions from the most recent report. They highlight the failure of the computer system, which led to cost overruns, and question the whole contract. Conclusion 7 speaks for itself:

"We are deeply unimpressed by the failure of Defra and the RPA to plan properly for the process of administering payments under the Single Payment Scheme."

That lends huge support to what my right hon. and hon. Friends have said.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): The factor that should have loomed large in the Secretary of State's mind was that she had chosen to use a more complex system than that used in Scotland and Wales, where farmers had been paid. Having made that decision, she should surely have been aware of the extra effort needed to make the payments system work.

Miss McIntosh: I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that he will support our call for Lord Bach at least to be removed from office.

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Before the Secretary of State sacked the chief executive, I had tabled named-day questions asking how many applications for payment had been received and how many payments had been made, nationally and in Devon. That was a pretty straightforward question, but I am still waiting for the answer.

Miss McIntosh: I hope that my hon. Friend receives that answer this afternoon.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) and I had the pleasure of being the rapporteurs on the Rural Payments Agency during the first inquiry and the immediate aftermath in early 2006. Does the hon. Lady not acknowledge that the problems with the computer system's specification, design and implementation are unique neither to this Department nor to this Administration? The public sector especially contains senior civil servants and Ministers who are particularly susceptible to the blandishments of the snake oil salesmen who populate the computer software package industry. That is at the heart of our problem.

Miss McIntosh: The only issue that I would raise with the hon. Gentleman is that the Government seem to be developing expertise in making computers that do not appear to be fit for purpose.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I thank the hon. Lady for being generous with her time. The chief executive has rightly gone. The computer system has failed. However, the bottom line is that this is about the plight of farmers, who are not receiving their income. I want a contribution from those computer firms that have let farmers down. Compensation ought to be paid on late payments to ensure that farmers do not suffer. Does the hon. Lady agree?

Miss McIntosh: I am sure that the Minister is better placed to comment on that particular aspect.

May I also draw attention to the Committee's conclusion and recommendation 8? It states:

"Most significantly, we were staggered that, so close to the proposed date for making payments, and nearly a year after that date was announced by the RPA, the Minister could still not give us a definitive statement about when payments would be made, or whether they would be full or partial payments."

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and his honourable rapporteurs on that Committee will agree that one of the most sinister developments, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) just alluded, is that Ministers are distancing themselves from holding any degree of responsibility for agencies such as the RPA. That is totally unacceptable.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Ministers have given, as recently as this week, an undertaking in the House that payments would be made by the end of March. Does any Member in this House know of any farmer who has received a payment? I do not believe that a single farmer in the land has received a payment. If payments have not been made by the end of this month, Ministers must account for that.

Miss McIntosh: I endorse what my hon. Friend said. To my knowledge, not one farmer in the Vale of York or North Yorkshire has been paid. I have proposals to put to the Minister to correct that situation. The Minister must agree that there has been a catalogue of errors and misunderstandings leading up to the present fiasco of farm payments, ranging from applications being lost to maps being woefully mismanaged by officials. My hon. Friend alluded to the fact that that has resulted in most farmers in England simply not being paid, whereas in Scotland and Wales farmers have been paid in full. Our farmers have been paid not a penny piece.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I grateful that the hon. Lady has been incredibly courteous in giving way so often. I do not want to pile on the agony for my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know is a conscientious and diligent man. However, I must ask the hon. Lady whether, in addition to the catalogue of errors that she is listing, there has not also been a woeful absence of common sense in dealing with these problems. May I draw her attention and that of the Minister to the case of one of my constituents who has been engaged in a protracted negotiation with the RPA about a tiny amount of land? The difference between them is 0.02 hectares, which makes a difference in the payment of £4.40. The protracted wrangling over such a tiny sum cannot be cost-effective for the Department and it is stopping my constituent receiving any payment whatsoever. Surely common sense could be applied in such cases and some payment could be made.

Miss McIntosh: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support my argument that the people involved do not have a sense of the countryside, are failing it and should spend time in it working with its various aspects. I lend support to his comments by quoting an RPA response to correspondence from a constituent of mine who farms at Kilburn in the Vale of York. It stated:

"It is true that the Customer Service Centre (CSC) in Newcastle experienced some problems in the immediate months following its creation in February 2005."

I pause because of that understatement. It continued.

"An unprecedented number of calls and a shortage in experienced staff led to some farmers experiencing difficulties. RPA has addressed these issues and is working to ensure that all 'front-line' staff are able in future to answer the majority of SPS questions put to them. I am sorry that this was not previously the case for" your constituent.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an absolute bottom line that we need to achieve from this debate? At this very moment some farmers are receiving demands, not least from their landlords. If they do not pay their rent, they will be given a notice to quit and they will lose their entire livelihood. Will she press the Minister to ask the European Community to release some money immediately so that, in such cases of real hardship, payments can be made as soon as possible?

Miss McIntosh: My understanding of the legal position is that that will not be necessary and that the situation is quite the reverse; the Government have the money available and are not releasing it, but they will face a penalty if it is not paid before the end of June. My hon. Friend has identified the problem for tenant farmers in particular. They have no assets against which they can borrow.

On resuming—

Miss McIntosh: There is a catalogue of errors and misunderstandings, spanning a considerable time, leading up to the present fiasco with farm payments. Those errors range from applications being lost, to maps being woefully mismanaged. That left most farmers in England not being paid, whereas Scottish and Welsh farmers have been paid in full. The hybrid approach taken in England has proved unnecessarily complicated; it amalgamates historical payments based on those paid to individual farms in 2001–02, and is paid on a regional basis.

In Wales and Scotland, a far simpler historical calculation has been used alone, meaning that farmers there have been paid in full, as I understand it. That has had the perverse effect of Scottish and Welsh farmers coming to auction marts in Thirsk and elsewhere in Yorkshire and outbidding English farmers, as they can pay more per animal on the back of their single farm payments. To compound the plight of the local farmer, most farmers in other EU countries have by now been paid the single farm payments in full.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept the point made by Mrs. Rosemary Eady, a farmer in my constituency, who writes to me to say:

"Given that HMG received EU funding for the SFP in December where is that money now? Why cannot it be paid before validation? . . . Who is profiting by the delay in payment? The answer must be the Exchequer"?

Miss McIntosh: I await with bated breath the Minister's response to that intervention.

3.16 pm

On resuming—

Miss McIntosh: Those developments were against the background of a new scheme that was meant to be simpler and easy to administer. Farmers face hardship locally and nationally. Why have 91 per cent. of Scottish farmers received their single farm payments when only 2.4 per cent. of English farmers had received theirs by the beginning of this week and, I understand, between 13 and 23 per cent. of them have as of today?

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): With the benefit of hindsight, everyone would say that the hybrid payments were a dreadful mistake, even the Select Committee. However, that does not excuse the fact that historical payments are indefensible in this day and age, because the common agricultural policy needs to be reformed. Does the hon. Lady know who the 50 per cent. additional claimants are? I have been trying to ascertain why the numbers are so drastically wrong and why that was not built into the calculation.

Miss McIntosh: The hon. Gentleman has rightly identified why the scheme is so complicated. Our constituents would be happier if we reverted to a system that was more akin to the devolved Administrations', so perhaps the Minister could throw some light on that.

Fewer than 2,500 farmers in England had been paid their allocation by the end of February 2006, whereas the Scots farmers had been paid in full. A well known local farmer, Mr. Woodhead of Felixkirk, has asked me to raise a case of which the Minister is perhaps not aware. There are number of auction marts in North Yorkshire, not least the one in Thirsk, where the single farm payments have led to an unacceptable distortion of the market. The Scots and the Welsh farmers are outbidding our local farmers because they have cash in hand from the farm payments.

Mr. Hogg: That could be readily cured by a payment of interim payments.

Miss McIntosh: Indeed—my right hon. and learned Friend pre-empts my concluding remarks.

As one farmer told me, the single farm payment was supposed to reduce the bureaucracy associated with the old integrated administration control system. It was meant to replace myriad farm subsidies, premiums and special payments, and it was meant to be simpler, but to date that has not happened.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): For all its faults, the old Integrated Administration and Control System at least allowed for a margin of error and for the Government to recover moneys paid in error. The new system seems to depend on such a level of precision that the money is never actually paid. Surely the Minister understands that. I appreciate that he has perhaps taken his eye of the ball, but now—[Interruption.] The Minister says that that is not his fault—"It's not me, guv"—but that is often the cry of people in such circumstances. Urgent action is now needed. Payments need to be made on an interim basis, with any minor discrepancies sorted out later. People in Lincolnshire and elsewhere are desperate. They want strong action from a Minister who desperately needs to recover his reputation.

Miss McIntosh: I would go further and add that the Minister and the Government need to accept ministerial responsibility.

[Miss McIntosh]

Farmers Weekly of 24 March said that farm debt had broken the £10 billion mark. The level is estimated to be increasing by £13 million a month in interest payments alone. As I have mentioned, 90 per cent. of English farmers are waiting for the single farm payment to be paid. Farmers are struggling financially to keep their businesses afloat and the knock-on effect on the agricultural supply trade is dire. Farmers still have to pay bills as they come in but they have received no payments for up to a year and face growing debt with emotional and financial pressure on all concerned. That is particularly so for tenant farmers who are unable to borrow because they have no assets against which to borrow.

I want to share with the Chamber representations from the agricultural industries confederation, which is the trade organisation for the agricultural supply industry. It wants us to be mindful of the need for farmers to fund the purchase of inputs ranging from animal feeds to sprays and fertilisers when they face a major hole in their cash flow due to the lack of single farm payments. To date, DEFRA does not seem to have grasped the seriousness of that.

A rule of thumb in the view of the confederation is that the industry has a month-on-month level of indebtedness of around £50 million. That figure was established with some certainty at the time of the foot and mouth outbreak in 2001. It relates to bills that farmers have outstanding at any one time in normal monthly credit arrangements. During the foot and mouth epidemic, that monthly figure rose to £80 million and the confederation believes that there has been a 35 per cent. increase in the level of indebtedness between farmers and their suppliers since the end of 2005. That is in addition to the increased level of borrowing reported by clearing banks. Lloyds TSB recently estimated that increased borrowing due to delayed payments was costing the agricultural industry around £8 million a month. That scale of increase inevitably will place severe pressure on the agricultural industry's fundamental ability to operate and the agricultural supply industry is concerned that that artificially created situation will inflict lasting damage on the UK's agricultural industry and the livelihoods of those working in it.

I want to ask the Minister a number of questions reflecting what right hon. and hon. Members have said this afternoon. Why did Ministers not act sooner to address the problems at the Rural Payments Agency? We and a number of stakeholders gave information on a number of occasions, not least from the Select Committee report onwards. Will Ministers now apologise to farmers for the real stress and financial costs of the delays? What lessons will be learned from the announced RPA review and why is the review not examining what went wrong over the past year? What assurances can be given that the same mistakes will not be made again? Why is there no stakeholder representative from the industry on the review team and why is the chairman of the review someone from DEFRA rather than an independent person outside government? Will the review be published in its entirety and promptly when it is finished and will Parliament have the opportunity of debating it?

The Government must ensure that farm payments are paid immediately and in full. An interim payment of 80 per cent. in the next three weeks would be particularly welcome. It is disappointing that the Secretary of State in response to an urgent question from my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) this week did not promise interim payments and has so far stated only that windows for payments remain open until the end of June. Will the Minister confirm that there will be immediate payments or that the payments will be made in full? It is unacceptable, but inevitable, that tens of thousands of applicants will have unvalidated entitlements from the 2005 single farm payments and not be paid by the time they must apply for 2006.

Farmers feel badly let down. The Government gave an undertaking that 96 per cent. of the first single farm payments would be paid by the end of March. Farmers consequently budgeted on that promise and have been very badly let down.

Possible solutions, which I hope the Minister will share with us this afternoon, are that payments will be made immediately and, if necessary, the Government will override the computer system so that payments can be made manually. Emergency measures are required and payment within the next three weeks is vital. At the very least, the Government should consider paying interest for the delayed loans. Many farmers owe the banks serious money because of the chaos.

I am delighted to have secured this debate and I look forward to hearing what my right hon. and hon. Friends, other hon. Members and particularly the Minister have to say.

The Chairman: Before I call the next speaker, I shall take the opportunity of reminding right hon. and hon. Members that I propose to start the wind-ups at 4 o'clock. If speakers could be as brief as possible, I shall try my best to call everyone.

3.25 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I shall be brief because I have rehearsed the two points that I want to make.

This has been a disaster and the hybrid idea should never have been allowed to be taken forward. To be fair, the hybrid did not come from the Government. It came because farming organisations looked at compromises in the systems that apply to different parts of the industry. I well remember receiving representations one week from the potato committee of the National Farmers Union which was desperate to have area payments in place. The following week I received representations from my dairy farmers who were desperate, particularly those in the south-west, to keep the historical model in place.

I think the Government made a mistake. Fudges never work and this fudge has, with the benefit of hindsight, been an unmitigated disaster. I hope that we shall learn from that.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The mid-term review and further changes in the common agricultural policy will inevitably mean new and different forms of payment. Is not the lesson to be learned from the experience that policy must be backed by good practice and management?

Mr. Drew: I agree entirely and I hope that the Government will learn that lesson wholesale. We must go forward. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) that farmers are suffering. They have been suffering for some time because we have already delayed the payments considerably. Under the old system the payments would be being banked. Farmers have already had to wait and I have never been satisfied with the idea that the banks are expected to take the strain. When farmers are indebted through no fault of their own, they have to go to the banks and build up large debts on which they are expected to pay interest in the long term. The hon. Lady's call for some compensation and understanding is morally justifiable and I hope that the Secretary of State will take account of it.

I have already rehearsed my other point about who is entitled to claim the payments. It is depressing that, according to the figures, we are dealing with a much greater number of people than was calculated when the IT system was set up. Someone, somewhere got that wrong and there is a real problem in the way in which we define farming in this country. It was bad enough under the old system, but we seem to have found another system whereby people whom I do not define as farmers and who do not need the income to be able to carry on with their everyday life are putting in claims. The problem is that one claim cannot be settled until they have all been settled. That is a fundamental flaw in the system. I knew that interim payments would not be popular, but at least that was a way of guaranteeing that those farmers who had received payments in the past and needed the payments to carry on with their everyday farming would receive them. There should have been some way in which that system could be brought forward. Yet many new people are now seeking entitlement and I have serious misgivings about the quasi-market that is developing whereby people farm entitlements, not produce. We have learned nothing from milk quotas: we are creating disaster for the future, when the entitlements will be worth something but potentially will be divorced from the land.

I know that it should not happen that way, and that the Select Committee has been assured that the system will be so clever that it will work. However, the way that it has been set up so far has not been a great success. I shall leave the issue, as I know that others want to say much more about it, but I am not at all confident about relying on an IT system to deal with policy, or to deliver the policy to fruition. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) have looked at this much more carefully, and I hope that they will catch your eye in due course, Mr. Benton. What we learned was that perhaps it is unfair to blame only the IT company, as it was forced to deal with attributes that were different from those that were originally set up.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): The Minister stated in a letter to the Select Committee that the original contract signed in January 2003 identified that there was to be a mid-term review and that the Commission's proposals had been published, and we were told that "the impact of reform would not be significant on the overall IT solution".

It was anticipated that there would not be that much difference, yet the annual cost more than doubled, from £18 million to £37.4 million.

Mr. Drew: My hon. Friend has done the numbers. I do not pretend to have the same detailed understanding, but it does say something that we are entirely dependent on the IT system.

The question was asked earlier as to whether we could go back to a manual system. If only it were that easy. To be fair to the Rural Payments Agency, the staff have been working day and night to try to shift the figures. The system itself is fallible, the way in which we approached the policy was wrong, and, dare I say it, the definition of "farmer" ought to nailed down so that we pay money to those people who genuinely need it and who are doing a job that we want them to do, rather than to people who pick it up as spare cash. That is unacceptable.

3.32 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on securing this debate. I rise not only as someone who has a fairly large farming community in their constituency but as a former member of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee and a Front-Bench spokesman on farming. I shall start with some broad issues and then quickly come down to some specifics.

First, there is the question about the competence of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The second question is about the impact on the farming community. It was unfortunate that the hon. Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson) made comments about farmers having their snouts in the trough in the debate on the urgent question. The third question is for all of us who are taxpayers, as we are talking about public money.

Angela Browning: As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I suggest that Sir John Bourn and the National Audit Office should investigate the matter and do the analysis that is needed. Would my hon. Friend support that suggestion?

Mr. Simpson: Yes. To be fair, instead of amateurs like us, a body such as the Public Accounts Committee should have a look at the issue.

I would not mind so much if the problem had not been flagged up years ago. In fact, I participated in the Committee wherein the old intervention boards were abolished and the Rural Payments Agency was set up. The verbatim account of that Committee indicates that other hon. Members and I put forward two sets of questions to the then Minister, now the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment. The first was about who was accountable. The Minister said that it was, of course, the chief executive of the RPA, but that responsibility and accountability ultimately lay with

[Mr. Simpson]

Ministers. So let us not have any shuffling off of responsibility. I am not getting at the Minister who happens to be sitting in the seat on this, but there is a case for ministerial accountability.

Secondly, we flagged up the whole business of whether the RPA could manage the computer system. The Secretary of State got the wrong end of the stick when I made this point during the urgent question. She said that we were dealing with an entirely different system that had to be brought in because of the single farm payment, but she missed the point. Five years ago, we were raising questions about a relatively simple system, not a complex one. I agree with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). I believe that there is something in the culture not just of Whitehall but of DEFRA that needs to be examined. It could not manage even a simple system.

I would have thought—there are colleagues here who have been Ministers—that, given that track record, just out of self-preservation, they would have asked some difficult, hard-nosed questions. It is not enough for the Secretary of State to say that she has taken responsibility by sacking the chief executive. That is not my definition of taking responsibility. After all, she introduced the single farm payment scheme, and she is ultimately responsible.

I would like to put a few brief questions to the Minister, very much along the lines of those asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York. As we all know, the key issue is that the payment window closes at the end of June 2006, yet when pressed on that in the urgent question, the Secretary of State stated:

"I cannot give him"— that is, my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice)—

"a pattern of payment between then and now."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 545.]

The question is, why not? At what stage does the timeline run out? We are discussing not just the livelihoods of thousands of farmers but the wider rural community, and, as hon. Friends have said, we are running up against next year's scheme as well. There is a timeline, and Ministers must have some idea. Perhaps they could share that with the House.

The second issue—non-validated interim payments—has already been raised. It has been put to me by many farmers in my constituency. Once again, the Secretary of State's comments during the urgent question were inadequate. She stated:

"We are not ruling out the potential for interim payments, but we are reluctant to make interim payments if there is any possibility of their jeopardising the time scale for making full payments."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 545.]

When will the Minister know that the timeline has been passed? Officials in the RPA must have some idea. My fear is that they will realise that the system will not work but will be unable to make interim payments in time to stop many farmers going bankrupt. We all have large numbers of such cases in our constituencies.

What conversations and discussions have Ministers had with the major banks about tiding farmers over during this period? Evidence has already been produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York that the deadline was 25 March for the half-yearly payment for a large number of tenant farmers. We really are up against the wire.

The Minister is carrying out a review, but what confidence can we have that the IT will be able to cope with the mapping, which now seems to be the key issue? It is not something that will make any difference to the current crisis, but it is something that we must get right.

My final comment is from Mr. William Brigham, a farmer in my constituency who e-mailed me. He spoke briefly about the e-mail, paper and telephone chase that he had been having over the past few months. He was not angry. I believe that he is like an old soldier—he just expects such problems. He concludes by stating:

"It is interesting to note that our area"—

mid-Norfolk—

"is covered by the Northallerton office, we sent our application to Carlisle, and all the latest contact is with Exeter."

I rest my case.

3.39 pm

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): We must not lose sight of the fact that, irrespective of how many tonnes of metaphorical slurry we dump over the heads of civil servants, and irrespective of how many Ministers are transferred to the silo of the Whips Office or the wide open spaces of the Back Benches, the people who are suffering are our constituents: farmers who went into the system in good faith. Of course, post mortems do not revive bodies and I am pleased to hear from farmers present that DEFRA has started to prioritise what seems to be a reasonable group. It has decided to prioritise the middle range of historical claimants, but will not yet be drawn on what the exact definition of that band is. It would be useful if the Minister were to tell the House what those definitions are later on.

Regarding the rate at which payments are made, we heard yesterday the statement that around 23 per cent. of claims by volume had been paid and about 13 per cent. of payments by value, so an awful lot of money is still to be paid to people who have been really hard pressed for a good number of years.

Tony Baldry: The debate has quite rightly focused on payments, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said, we must have some focus on mapping. Many farmers still cannot get at the payments until the mapping is sorted out. In a typical case, one farmer in my constituency has had 10 different sets of maps sent to him—all inaccurate—and has been threatened with prosecution because a 0.01 error is alleged against him. That is crazy.

David Taylor: I acknowledge that. I spent three decades in the world of information and communications technology and large-scale systems. We do not have the time to deal with that but my fellow rapporteur, whom I shall call my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), looked in particular detail at that when we went to Reading.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made the point that the complexity of the system is at the very heart and root of the problems experienced, which is partly true. It was always possible for the Government to have a hybrid system where in year one the historical element was 100 per cent. In other words the transfer and increase in area payment could have started in year two. That was always a possibility and it was always likely that there would be problems in such a system on the scale we have seen.

It is easy to be wise after the event, but I have never encountered such a large-scale system in which the estimates of resource required were taken directly from the volumes of people in receipt of historical payments. It would have been professionally desirable or even expected to take small samples of land holdings in various parts of the country, analyse the expected volume and complexity expected to arise and then extrapolate from that. That would have produced a far more accurate picture of what the RPA was facing, so I do not accept that the hybrid element is necessarily at the root of the problems.

It is very much a human tragedy for some farmers. I quote from an e-mail that I shall anonymise:

"At a recent NFU meeting at Oaks in Charwood (where there were around 120 farmers) not one farmer had had their payment and not one had had a validated entitlement form either!"

The e-mail continues:

"I have had to take out more borrowings from the bank to bridge the difference in my cashflow, and to keep my business afloat. I am not on my own. I have outstanding invoices from other farmers dating back from last November as they cannot afford to pay me."

A particularly incestuous spiral is being pressed down because of the enormous amount of inter-trading that goes on in agriculture.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): On my hon. Friend's point about compensation, given the fact that the bulk of farmers had a clear expectation that they would receive full payment by the end of March, does he agree that there is a reasonable case for compensation to be made by the Government in at least the form of an interest payment on bank overdrafts that have to be carried from April until payments are received?

David Taylor: I have a great deal of confidence in the Minister and I have every expectation that in a masterly winding-up speech he will lead to a climax that announces just that sort of compensation. It is morally necessary and economically required for the reasons I gave.

Like other MPs with a rural or mixed constituency, I am in regular contact with the National Farmers Union and its members in my area, and during my nine years in this place, I have never encountered the depth of concern and angst now being experienced. I include a comment from Pat Stanley, the chairman of the North-West Leicestershire NFU:

"To make matters worse, the helplines that the RPA has put in place, have proved ineffective. There is now a growing sense of frustration and anger over the RPA's inability to make the system work. The RPA and Ministers have made a series of promises about the performance of this new scheme and all the evidence to date suggests that these are being consistently broken."

She concludes:

"It is vital for the farming industry that the payments get to producers as soon as possible. Please can you do whatever you can to impress upon Defra and the RPA the difficulties which their non performance is causing for the industry and the need for immediate action to put matters right."

That is the purpose of this debate.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is speaking with characteristic candour and clarity about the matter. Farmers in my constituency, such as Tony Gent and Robert Congreve, have also been in touch, and I wonder whether farmers in his constituency are pressing him in a similar way to ask the Government for a timetable for what is about to happen. Spring is coming up with all its associated costs, such as farmers' input costs, rent charges and so on. It is vital that we get action and a timetable for action quickly because cash-flow problems beset our farmers. Has the hon. Gentleman received such representations? If so, will he pass them on to the Minister in his speech?

David Taylor: That is a fair point, and the Minister will have heard it.

In my experience the 80–20 rule comes into play. Once the system is broadly in place, perhaps 20 per cent. of the administrative effort will handle 80 per cent. of the cases that the system is designed to process, but substantial and disproportionate amounts of effort will be needed for some of the more complex cases. It would be a serious and fundamental mistake to extrapolate the situation at some date in late May, mid-June or whenever from the figures that I cited earlier about 23 per cent. of claimants having been dealt with by yesterday.

I shall make two further points, and then sit down because so many people want to speak. The RPA and its senior management massively and negligently underestimated the work involved. That was clear from day one, from the first few seconds when we walked through the door of the RPA office in Reading. I do not hold responsible the middling ranks of staff at the RPA in Reading and elsewhere. They have worked tremendously hard under the worst possible circumstances, such as the threat of redundancy, the use of agency staff and a lack of clear information. That process was driven by Accenture, which I hold rather more responsible than my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud does. The fact that its revenue costs have doubled during the development period of the system is absolutely dreadful.

I hope that the Minister and the Government will learn from that, and cool their ardent love affair with the private sector in the design and implementation of large-scale IT systems. I ask the Minister to listen to the people in the departments concerned, and involve them in the process. They have given their lives, careers, energy and commitment for a very long period to their area of interest: in this case, the RPA IT application system. Listen to them; do not be too persuaded by the blandishments of firms like Accenture. I do not hold responsible the middling ranks of people in the RPA.

Finally, the farming community, this House and the taxpayer deserve a full explanation of why interim payments could not have been made and could not have been built into the timetable for all claimants. The fact that there was a need to calculate all payments before any payment can be made was absolutely barmy. It flies in the face of logic and the face of finance. It would have been possible to pay three quarters of the estimated amount and allow for the fact that there would be a variability in other things still to be calculated. That was wrong, and I hope that future Ministers in other Departments and in other Administrations will learn from the debacle we have seen during the past 21 months.

3.49 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I shall try to keep my remarks as brief as I can. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on securing this excellent and important debate. I remind the House of my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I am a partner in a farming business, which, incidentally, received a letter of entitlement indicating that we farm 90 hectares more than we do. As a consequence, we are in the category of the unvalidated—or the great unwashed.

I deeply regret that we are having to have this debate at all. I shall not dwell on the reasons for the chaos in the Rural Payments Agency, because they have been well catalogued by other hon. Members. I should like to touch on the scale of the complexity and the numbers from the perspective of my constituency.

We are told by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs that there are 120,000 farms in England. I think that it means 120,000 holdings, and there is a difference between farms and holdings, which may in part explain the confusion about numbers. I am led to believe that only 68,000 of those farms are more than 20 hectares. Some Labour Members have referred to the fact that farms below that level are, in many cases, hobby farms, although there are some specialist farmers who farm small acreages. It is the larger farmers for whom the payments are so critical to the viability of their business.

There is a business in my constituency, Farming Online, which maintains a database of about 35,000 mostly larger, arable farms. Its director, Peter Griffith, told me when I was preparing for this debate that the survey he has conducted through Farming Online's website indicates that, of 2,210 respondents as of this morning, only 140 have been paid their single farm payments—a mere 6.3 per cent. of respondents. That compares with the Government's statistic, in the Library briefing, that 32.5 per cent. of farmers have been dealt with correctly. There is an enormous discrepancy between those numbers. An even more startling figure is that, of those who replied to the survey, 86 per cent. have received unvalidated entitlement letters.

The chaos in the Rural Payments Agency is apparent to all of us from constituency cases. I shall illustrate a couple that have come to my attention. At a meeting of the National Farmers Union West Midlands last night, DEFRA was considered as much a part of the problem as the RPA. Previously, a farmer could at least rely on being dealt with by one case officer at DEFRA or its predecessor, the Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Fisheries, however unhelpful they may have been, but now, papers get shuffled from one office to another—in the case of one of my constituents, from Crewe to Reading to Exeter. No individual case officer is responsible, so no one takes responsibility for a case, and there is no telephone line to follow it up.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I, too, have a declarable interest as a receiver of payments. Does not my hon. Friend agree that the questions that Ministers must face also relate to the fact that there has been a complete lack of common sense? At a time when it is introducing a complex system, the RPA is being forced to close two of its offices, and it is reducing staff numbers, as we have heard from Labour Members, and employing large numbers of temporary staff and contract labour. Does not my hon. Friend agree that Ministers must consider how a system could be brought in when such bizarre employment practices are being carried on?

Mr. Dunne: My hon. Friend makes a good point. There is a clear difficulty in bringing in large numbers of contractors who have not been properly trained to operate systems that do not work properly. Inevitably, there will be chaos.

Tony Baldry: Is not one of the many problems for farmers the fact that they cannot find anyone to talk to? When they get in touch, they are either told to go to the website or sent another form. They find that it adds insult to insult.

Mr. Dunne: Indeed. There is a paper trail going wrong in every direction. One office cannot speak to the other, and it has no idea where the files are. I have a good example. Mr. Howard Fish, a farmer in my constituency, rang the RPA in Newcastle and was informed that it still had outstanding issues with the digital map that he submitted, which he needed to correct. It was suggested that he contact the Reading office, which he duly did, only to be told by Reading that his map was correct. One side does not know what the other is doing.

One of my constituents is so angry with the delay, she is thinking of charging DEFRA interest on the monies due to her. She is prepared to go to court to do so. I hope that the Minister will address that when dealing with the points made by Labour Members.

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that farmers in less favoured areas are suffering even more than average, not only as a consequence of the nature of their business, but because the majority of them have yet to receive their hill farm allowance, irrespective of the fact that single farm payments have yet to be made. Will he comment on that?

Mr. Dunne: The hon. Gentleman speaks with some authority on that subject, as he is chairman of the all-party group on hill farming, on which I have the pleasure to serve. I completely agree. That issue must be addressed, and I hope that the Minister will pick up on it in his winding-up speech.

Several hon. Members have discussed the fact that this is a critical time for the business viability of farms. Tenant payments and fertiliser payments are due, and hon. Members must remember that the single farm payment relates to the entirety of 2005. For many farmers, their support payments have been pushed back and back, year in, year out. People used to receive their payments in November. Then it was pushed to December, then it became January, then we were told March, and now I am told by somebody who attended the NFU meeting last evening that the talk is of August. At that point, the Government will incur significant EU penalties. I hope that they do not go down that route.

I should like to touch on the human consequences of this tragedy, because they are not purely financial. Last week, I hosted in this House a meeting of the Rural Stress Network, chaired by the former Bishop of Hereford, in whose diocese my constituency lies. The network covers five rural counties in the west midlands: Shropshire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire and Staffordshire. The caseload of that group, which is staffed almost entirely by volunteers, is rising dramatically. Farmers are under particular pressure at this time of year, with lambing and calving as well as land work, and the financial situation is giving rise to severe stress and mental concerns.

The network brought to my attention a particularly tragic case. Less than a month ago, a farmer in north Herefordshire, who lived not far from where I farm, got in touch with the network, because of his increasing distress over the non-arrival of his payments. I am afraid to have to tell the House that he committed suicide at the end of February. A female Rural Payments Agency officer who was in touch with him was, understandably, extremely distressed by the consequences of her discussions with him. If DEFRA cannot offer farmers any apologies or support, will the Minister at least give some assurances that RPA personnel get support for the circumstances with which they have to contend?

I should like to ask the Minister a few quick questions. First, we have already heard that, in Wales, interim payments of 80 per cent. were made on the basis of historical entitlements, and that 94 per cent. of them were paid by 2 March. We learn today that all have now been paid. Will the Minister, as a matter of extreme urgency, now authorise immediate payments to those farmers in England who have had their entitlements validated? Secondly, will he instruct payment of an interim award of 80 per cent. of historical entitlements to the vast majority of farmers whose claims have been returned as unvalidated?

Thirdly, does the Minister recognise that the failure to make those payments for 2005 is having a serious knock-on effect for the whole rural economy, much of which depends on the cash flows generated by farmers? Does he agree that it is appropriate to pay compensation to farmers who have suffered additional substantial interest payments? Finally, when will the appropriate Minister take responsibility for this fiasco?

3.59 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on securing this debate at such an appropriate time.

For once, I can speak about agricultural matters without declaring an interest, because payments in Wales have already been made, so I am unaffected by the problem. However, it does not in any way lessen my concern for the farming community in England, which has been so badly served. Indeed, a series of mistakes has been made not only by DEFRA but by the Rural Payments Agency.

The Minister may say that other countries have used other systems, but Ireland has paid 98 per cent. of its farmers. In historical terms, Austria has paid 100 per cent. of its farmers, Belgium has paid nearly 100 per cent. of its farmers and Sweden, which uses a hybrid system, has paid 90 per cent. of its farmers. Germany, which presumably uses a dynamic hybrid system similar to DEFRA's, paid 80 per cent. of its farmers by December, and Denmark has paid 98 per cent. of its farmers. I have not heard of riots in France, Spain or Italy. I do not have figures for those countries, but I assume that the farmers there have received the majority of their payments.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the differences is that risk has been loaded on risk when trying to address the problem? The Department went through major change a few years back, with new IT systems that did not work properly—this is not the first late payment problem that farmers have faced through the RPA—and then a new complex system was loaded on to that. The loading of risk upon risk increases the risk of failure. That is what we face.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I was about to say that the contract was given to Accenture in 2003, before the announcement that there would be a single farm payment scheme in February or March 2004. Indeed, the mid-term review turned out to be much more radical than anyone expected; many of us thought that it would tinker at the edges of the schemes to support farmers. The new firm was given the challenge of dealing with a new scheme. During our inquiry into the RPA, the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and I were told that DEFRA changed the details of the scheme 60 times between initiating the contract and finalising the scheme. At its heart, the problem lies with DEFRA as well as with Accenture and the RPA.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I am grateful to my hon. Friend and to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire for serving as rapporteurs on that inquiry. Did my hon. Friend find any evidence that information on how the crisis was growing was being passed back up the chain—that it was being passed from the highest level in the RPA to DEFRA? Ministers said that everything was fine and that there were no huge problems, and they expected payments to be made. Is my hon. Friend sure that the evidence was passed up the line?

Mr. Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. We were told that there was regular communication between DEFRA and the senior management of the RPA but, as a result of the failure to deliver the programme, further work needs to be done.

[Mr. Williams]

Indeed, we have already heard that the Select Committee and perhaps even the National Audit Office may make further inquiries into how it happened. Certainly, the relationship between DEFRA Ministers and the RPA needs to be examined in detail.

The point has been made that, even if payments were made by the end of February, as promised, it would be late in the agricultural year. Many of the payments that were in place before the single farm payment was initiated would have been made already—in September for the sheep annual premium, and in October and November for arable aid, advance payments for the suckler cow premium and the beef special premium.

Farmers have found it difficult to accommodate problems with cash flow. Mention has been made of paying bills, but at the end of this week interest payments will be due on most accounts. That money will be taken out of the farmers' accounts. They will not have to make a conscious decision about it; the money will be removed from their accounts. That may take them above the level that they have agreed with their banks, and they will suffer the financial consequences—not just additional interest, but the other costs involved.

Mr. Hollobone: Given that the EU has given the Government funding for the scheme, interest is accumulating on that money in the Exchequer. Should not that interest be used to facilitate some emergency payment for our farmers?

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I am sometimes told that the money is drawn from the EU as it is paid, but even if the Government are not accruing interest, the European Union certainly is. The money is being kept somewhere. Interest accrued should surely be passed on to farmers. A large window was set by the EU for payments, between 1 November and 31 June, but it was not the intention that it should be used to delay the main payments under the scheme. The window was set so that some of the difficult and complex applications that would result from a new scheme could be dealt with. It was always intended that payments should be made at the beginning of the window rather than the end.

It was always open to DEFRA to delay the implementation of the scheme for a year. DEFRA decided against that, even though it was clear that the scheme was more complex than previous schemes. Some countries decided not to decouple during the first year—France is one. I believe that DEFRA took the decision because it was at the forefront of advocating a decoupled system, and it felt that it had to implement it in full rather than delaying it for a year. However, DEFRA did not do the necessary investigative work to find out how many applicants there might be for an entirely new scheme—for instance, potato growers and horticulturalists who keep land not entirely for agricultural purposes.

Mr. Todd: I have two hectares of land, and I have been urged by local farmers to make a claim. I have chosen not to do so, but a large number of others in similar circumstances might have done. The RPA appears not to have spotted that substantial burden, but it was widely known in the farming community because those conversations took place a year or even 18 months ago.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes the point that even Members of Parliament are now in the scheme. It is certainly widespread.

Mr. Todd: I didn't do it.

Mr. Williams: No, the hon. Gentleman did not. However, it seems that many chartered surveyors will have made a lot of money. That dilutes the money available to the farming community, a point made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

The Government have a duty, because of their complicity in the problem, to ensure that farmers are adequately compensated for the money that has been taken from their accounts in interest and other fees. As the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) said, there is a huge amount of stress in the farming community. There is also the question of how we can encourage young farmers into the industry if they see the Government failing to deliver. They are always asked to provide business plans, yet they are confounded when the Government, let alone the various organisations, do not produce the money. The Government have failed English agriculture, and they have a duty to recompense farmers.

4.9 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I shall try be brief because the Minister has a large number of questions to answer. I know that he looks forward to doing his best.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on the excellent way in which she introduced what has been a sombre and serious debate—and a timely one. She set the tone by highlighting the long history of problems, of which many hon. Members were fully aware before the proverbial hit the fan earlier this month. One of the great mysteries is why the Government and Ministers appear to be unaware of problems about which hon. Members were fully aware because they were told about them many months ago by farmers in their constituencies.

This has been a good debate with interesting contributions. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) was critical of the hybrid scheme that the Government chose to adopt. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said that he flagged up these issues many months ago, and talked about something going wrong in the culture of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. He also raised the vital issue of the banks, which are yet again being prevailed upon to be tolerant. They are being tolerant, but there is a limit to the tolerance that we can continue to expect of commercial banks.

The hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) made a moving contribution in which he spoke about a local farmer who has severe financial problems. There are such cases across the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) spoke about the tragic consequences that can occur as a result of financial hardship and other pressures on the farming industry.

Ministers have recognised that this is a serious problem, but have not said what exactly the problem in the Rural Payments Agency is. We all know that there is a problem and are seeing the consequences of it, but it would help if the Minister told us precisely the nature of the problem; he owes that to the House.

We have heard moving stories about the difficulties caused to the farming community, which has borne with enormous fortitude, over many years, the accumulating problems posed by declining farm incomes, the chill wind of globalisation, and the relentless pressure from supermarkets on one hand and increasing EU regulations on the other.

This debacle illustrates the important point that there is a lack of even-handedness in the way in which the Government deal with the farming industry. Whenever a farmer makes a small mistake, the weight of authority comes down on them and they are penalised, but when the Government make a large mistake, they seem to go unpunished. The current situation is that the Government have made a serious mistake, the exact nature of which is unclear, but who is paying for it? The farmers, not the Government. That raises disquieting moral questions about how DEFRA has conducted its affairs for many years. Indeed, it goes back to before the creation of DEFRA, to the old culture of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): I, too, declare an interest as a receiver of payments.

Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a crucial question for the Minister to answer regarding the massive incidence of inaccurate statements of entitlement? We are coming to the period when we need to start filling out forms and making applications for 2006, and I want to know whether farmers will be penalised for those inaccuracies in 2006, in the way in which my hon. Friend describes. Will the Minister give an assurance today that they will not, and that the inaccuracies inherent in the statements that they have been receiving will not be held against them in 2006?

Mr. Ainsworth: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point, and asks an important question. I hope that the Minister will answer it, if I allow him time to do so, along with the many other questions asked this afternoon.

I add to the point made by many hon. Members about making partial payments soon—manually if necessary—to tide over farmers with immediate problems.

Paddy Tipping: It is essential to have a repair programme. Might not interim payments delay final payments? Should not we wait for the report of the new chief executive to take us forward?

Mr. Ainsworth: The Secretary of State made that point earlier in the week. If there are genuine problems of that kind, they need to be taken into account. Whether or not interim payments are made, there is a strong case for making interest payments on money that rightfully belongs to farmers and not the Government. I hope that the Minister will reconsider the Government's position on that.

I want to touch on the question of ministerial accountability and responsibility. We accept that Ministers can work only with the information that they receive, but it is an important part of their job to make sure that the quality of information being provided is sound and accurate. There are no fewer than five former Agriculture Ministers present on the Opposition Benches who will know that that is an important task for any Minister. That is part of the Minister's job. Ministers cannot be absolved from all responsibility when things go wrong.

The Secretary of State's remark earlier in the week should go down in the annals of history about ministerial responsibility. In answer to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk, she said, "As for Ministers taking responsibility, I am taking responsibility, which is why I removed the chief executive."

We Opposition Members are fair-minded people, but I cannot understand how Lord Bach can expect on this issue to command the respect of Parliament or, more importantly, the farming community with whom he must have day-to-day contact. It always seems, with this Government, that when something goes wrong, it is someone else's fault. Lord Bach should consider his position, and if he is not prepared to do that, the Prime Minister should consider it for him.

4.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): This has been a good, serious and constructive debate, and I will endeavour to cover as many of the points and questions raised by right hon. and hon. Members as possible. If I fail to address them all, I promise that I will get my noble Friend Lord Bach to write to hon. Members on any outstanding questions.

I apologise that the Minister who speaks on these issues in the Commons, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), is unable to respond to the debate, because he has commitments in the main Chamber on the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill.

As the Secretary of State made clear in her response to Monday's urgent question, she deeply regrets the circumstances in which we find ourselves and profoundly understands the distress that many farmers feel. I am sure that she would extend—

Mr. Jack: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman because he is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, but I hope that hon. Members understand that I have to make some progress.

Mr. Jack: I am grateful to the Minister. In the light of what he has heard, and his opening remarks, does he think that Lord Bach was justified in saying that my Committee's report on this matter was misleading and that it created unnecessary concern and uncertainty in the farming community?

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall come to that point in a little while, but my noble Friend has already responded to that point.

I was about to extend my sympathy—I am sure that hon. Members will join me in this—to the family of the constituent of the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), about whom he told the Chamber a terrible story. I also want to reassure the hon. Gentleman regarding the support being given to Rural Payments Agency staff. I have been involved only on the edges of this issue because it is not my area of responsibility, but one of the first questions that I asked when this blew into a major crisis two or three weeks ago was whether the RPA staff were feeling more demoralised. I urge hon. Members on both sides not to add to any possible demoralisation. The staff have done a fantastic job in difficult circumstances.

As accusations and challenges have been made regarding my noble Friend in the other place, I remind hon. Members of the sequence of events that preceded the decision on Wednesday 15 March to remove Johnston McNeill, the chief executive of the Rural Payments Agency, from his post. Ministers had repeatedly been assured that it would be possible to implement the English model of the single farm payment scheme within the EU's payment window. As long ago as early 2005, the RPA announced that it would commence payments this February, and that 96 per cent. of payments would be made by the end of March. In mid to late January, the RPA advised that the 96 per cent. figure would not be achievable by the end of March due to "unforeseen complexity" in validating the claims, but that the worst case scenario was that the bulk of payments would be made by the end of March.

On 20 February payments began to flow as had been forecast. However, on Friday 10 March, after fellow Ministers had requested a qualified update of actual payments being made, the RPA still advised that 51 per cent.—one could argue that that represented the bulk—would be made by 3 April and that 96 per cent. would be made by the end of June. Just four days after that, on Tuesday 14 March, at a meeting with the Secretary of State, the RPA chief executive reported for the first time that the forecast of the bulk of payments being made by the end of March would not be met. He reaffirmed that 96 per cent. of payments would be made by the end of June. The next day, on the advice of the DEFRA permanent secretary, Mr. McNeill was removed from his post.

Mr. Hogg: Will the Minister tell the Chamber what reasons Mr. Johnston McNeill gave for that shortcoming?

Mr. Bradshaw: The reason, as I understand it, was that although the payments had begun, the speed of the payments could not be ramped up because of the complexity of the task. I will come on to some of the action points that have been taken to rectify that since.

On the following day, Thursday 16 March, the decision to remove Mr. McNeill was announced, along with the appointment of the new acting CEO for the RPA, Mark Addison, a senior DEFRA civil servant. He was our acting permanent secretary for several months recently and is a man with extensive experience of delivery in both the public and private sectors.

Within four days of his appointment, by Tuesday 21 March, Mr. Addison had compiled an initial report that recommended a number of actions aimed at speeding up payments while retaining proper regard for the disbursal of large sums of public money. Those actions were set in train immediately. They were outlined in the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to Monday's urgent question, and I will remind hon. Members briefly of them.

First, disproportionate checks will be removed from the payment authorisation system in order to speed up the flow of payments once claims have been validated. Secondly, the validation of claims will be prioritised to release the maximum value of payments as quickly as possible as opposed to the maximum number of individual claims, which will mainly benefit the large number of middle-sized historical customers. I am afraid that I cannot give the exact figure to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). The farming industry does not want the figures given out either, because the figures are not rigid. We do not want people to expect their payments to happen quickly and for them not to happen.

Thirdly, key mapping work associated with clearing validation at the Reading office will be centralised. Fourthly, the RPA's capacity will be strengthened in key areas and its structure will be changed to streamline command and control.

Mr. Addison gave his second progress report to Ministers yesterday evening. It showed that payments had reached more than 13 per cent. of the total value or 23 per cent. of the number of payments.

Miss McIntosh: Why was a DEFRA official appointed to such a sensitive position to carry out the review? Will the Minister explain why no timetable for delivery has been given and whether the computerised mapping system will, in the Department's view, ever work properly?

Mr. Bradshaw: I will come to the mapping system in a moment. If the hon. Lady is asking about the immediate review by Mark Addison, the new chief executive, he was appointed because the Secretary of State, on the advice of the permanent secretary, thought that he was the best man for the job. In the meetings that I have had with him on the issue, although it is not my area of responsibility, and in the meetings that he has had with the industry, the feedback has been very positive. He is an excellent public servant and the actions that he has already put in place have shown that he is getting to grips with the challenges that he faces.

I was about to tell the Chamber that Mr. Addison's figures mean that, under the latest payments, £119 million has been paid out in the past seven days, compared with only £85 million in the first four weeks after payments started on 20 February. That shows significant progress. Mr. Addison, having managed in less than two weeks in the job to visit every RPA office in the country and listen to front-line staff, had a number of further recommendations that he made to Ministers last night that have now been approved. They will address, I hope, some of the concerns raised during the debate.

First, RPA processes should be reformed to deliver greater customer focus by dedicating teams of staff to work on individual claims in their entirety. That was the point raised by the hon. Member for Ludlow. That would replace the task-based approach, which meant that bits of paper were being sent round from one office to another.

Secondly, as part of that change, processing staff should be allowed to contact applicants directly on the telephone, to work through any outstanding issues. Thirdly, a discrepancy tolerance of 2 hectares, or 3 per cent. of the total area claimed, whichever is lower, should be implemented for the validation of claims. Fourthly, the over-pedantic quality checking processes should be stopped so that staff can concentrate on processing the claims.

Fifthly, the people who do the mapping work should be in the same office as those who process the claims so that they can talk to each other when there is a problem. Sixthly, where mapping correspondence is outstanding, payments should be made on the basis of the information that the RPA already has from farmers. There will be further discussion with the industry on the mapping issue next week.

Mr. Todd: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: I want to get to the end of my list, and then I will give way to my hon. Friend. I still have a lot of questions to get through. I have lost count, but Mr. Addison's next recommendation was that a senior manager should be appointed to take charge of the delivery of 2006 claims—another area for concern that has been raised. Finally, the potential obstacles in the current employment procedures of the RPA that would prevent the retention of experienced staff should be addressed.

Mr. Todd: As someone who ran a major processing operation, I am startled that those seem earth-shattering statements. I welcome them; they seem entirely to be common sense. However, it is alarming that they have not been applied many months before.

Mr. Bradshaw: They seem to be common sense to me, as well. That is why what I said what I did about the abilities of the new chief executive of the RPA, who has been in the job, as I say, for less than two weeks.

Mr. Ainsworth: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I will not. I have only four minutes left to cover a great many questions, and I would rather get through as many as I can.

A number of hon. Members have called for partial or interim payments. The Government have made it absolutely clear that we do not rule out the possibility of the need for such payments if there is no alternative. I remind hon. Members—this was acknowledged by the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), I think—that that has potential disadvantages, including the impact on the 2006 payment timetable. I would like to add that at every turn in the past two weeks the industry has been kept fully informed. My hon. Friend, Lord Bach, and Mr. Addison met the industry leaders last Wednesday. They met again earlier today to take stock of the situation and to discuss the actions points that I have just announced. After today's meeting, I am told, the industry said that it welcomed the steps that had been taken. It thought that they would be helpful.

The hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), and a number of others, raised the question of whether the way in which we have chosen to pay the single farm payment was part of the problem. They are right to say that we adopted a different system in England, but I would describe it as more sustainable rather than more complex, as some have described it. The system was supported during the debate on Monday's urgent question by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) as a system that was chosen correctly.

The hon. Lady was right to point out that Scotland and Wales have chosen different historical systems but, as she and other hon. Members will be aware, a number of member states chose to adopt the historical system and are beginning to wonder whether they made the right decision. In 10 or so years' time, would it be sustainable for farmers to be paid money based on what they had received 10 years before? We made the judgment that would not be sustainable, which was supported by the official Opposition Front Bench if not by the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). However, we still think that that was the right system.

The hon. Member for East Surrey asked for my judgment of the problem with the RPA. As a Minister who has come to the subject relatively fresh in the past few days, nearly having to stand in for the Secretary of State on Monday and having to answer to today's debate, my judgment is that it was a problem of leadership trying to manage a complex organisation and a real problem of aversion to risk.

Mr. Ainsworth: How confident is the Minister that all payments will be made by the June deadline?

Mr. Bradshaw: One of the things that we and the new chief executive of the RPA are absolutely not going to do is to put down another timetable, given the fact that it has become patently obvious over the past few months that the RPA has over-promised and under-delivered. Mr. Addison is determined that he should not repeat that mistake. He and Ministers are determined that the payments should be made as quickly as possible, and they will be.

A number of hon. Members asked whether the Government would consider compensating farmers for late payments. I remind hon. Members—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order.

Prisoners (Early Release)

4.30 pm

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the issue of the early release of prisoners. The essence of my argument is simple: all forms of early release—whether on licence, probation or parole, whether due to the end of tagging or the end of the probation service itself—should end.

Before I start, it is only fair to say that I do not entirely blame the Government for our situation today. As the Minister will know, early release has been around for many years. It started off as a means of offering an incentive to prisoners to reform themselves while in custody, but it seems gradually to have become the norm. The percentage served of a sentence has become lower and lower during the past few years.

I do not intend to waste time debating who is responsible for the current system, and I hope that the Minister will not do so either. However, it is important to recognise that the current system is an abject failure and that the sentences given in courts are completely meaningless and bear no relationship whatever to the time that the offender will serve. As a result, the general public have rightly lost confidence in our system of justice.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. I agree with every word that he has uttered. Survey after survey of residents in my constituency demonstrates time and again that 95 per cent.—if not more—of local residents want prisoners to serve their full time in prison.

David T.C. Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comment.

Things are about to get much worse under the terms of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, a briefing on which stated:

"offenders serving sentences of 12 months or more will be released automatically on licence at the half way point of their sentence (subject to early release on home detention curfew . . .)"

Until now, prisoners have been automatically released halfway through their sentences only if they were serving up to four years. Under the terms of the 2003 Act, prisoners serving more than four years will be "released automatically on licence" halfway through the sentence.

Let me give an example of what the combination of early release and tagging means when a sentence is passed. A prisoner sentenced to three months will spend just one month in custody; a 12-month sentence will result in just three months in custody. Somebody sentenced to two years for a crime will spend just seven and a half months in jail, while somebody sentenced to four years' imprisonment will spend just one year and seven and a half months inside. As the Minister knows, four-year sentences are not handed out lightly; usually, they are given only for the most serious offences. If the public knew that when a judge said four years he actually meant just over one and a half years, there would be an outcry.

Written answers to questions that I have tabled on life sentences show that the term is totally meaningless. In 2004, somebody served 2.3 years on a life sentence; in 2003, somebody on a life sentence was released after just 14 months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the likely reason for those releases is that they resulted from successful appeals and so on? We need to look at the average time served for life sentences, rather than at those very unusual cases.

David T.C. Davies: When the Minister winds up, perhaps she will tell us the average time for a life sentence and comment on the case in which a convicted rapist on a life sentence was released after a short period. That was reported in The Sunday Telegraph this week.

My proposals will bring honesty back into the sentencing process by ensuring that every sentence is served in full. They need not necessarily mean longer prison sentences, because if a judge feels that somebody's crime merits seven months in prison they would currently have to sentence them to two years' imprisonment.

My proposals would allow the judge to make a decision about what they think would be an appropriate time for someone to spend in prison and to state clearly and openly what that sentence will be. That will give the public the confidence that when they read about a sentence being passed they know that that sentence will be served. They will not be deliberately misled, as currently happens.

I have heard two major arguments against my proposals. The first is that prisoner behaviour would deteriorate if early release was ended. Even if that were true, it would still not be an argument for releasing prisoners earlier. Such an argument effectively says that these people are so bad that the best we can do is to let them loose on the general public instead of keeping them under lock and key because that will make life easier for the prison system. That is nothing more than a form of appeasement.

I do not accept that ending early release would necessarily automatically lead to a decline in prisoner behaviour. It is possible to maintain incentives for good behaviour by giving more or less access to privileges such as Sky television, PlayStation and the other recreational facilities with which our prisons are increasingly being filled. It should also be expected that where offences are committed by people in prison, the offender should be charged, brought back to court and, if convicted, should have extra time added to their sentence.

Incidentally, to go off at a tangent, I shall discuss something in relation to people who are either under supervision in prison or outside under the supervision of the probation service, which is a bit of an oxymoron. On the subject of tagging, according to the Minister there have been nearly "700 cases of offenders on Home Detention Curfew who had damaged their electronic monitoring equipment. Any offender who is found to have deliberately caused such damage will be in breach of his or her licence conditions and recalled to prison."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 14 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 1980W.]

Yet, when I asked the Minister on 28 February how many of the 700 people who had damaged their tags had been recalled to prison she was unable to say because the information was not available centrally.

The second argument against my general proposal is cost. I would be the first to accept that if all forms of early release were ended, there would, in the short term, be a need for more prisons to be built and that that would impact on cost. Speaking as a Conservative supporter of low taxation, I can honestly say that I would not mind in the least paying a little more in taxation if it meant that I could walk the streets of London at night without peering over my shoulder every minute wondering whether I am about to be attacked or mugged.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. May I draw his attention to early-day motion 1064, which I tabled in November last year? It, too, called for prisoners to serve their sentences in full and I tabled it after making a discovery in a written answer by the Minister. It stated that "since 1997 1,167 people released on parole have been charged with further crimes before the end of their sentences and that 6,714 crimes have been committed by people on home detention curfews;"

Those crimes included four killings and 134 assaults on police officers.

Does my hon. Friend agree that those crimes and the victims of crimes they created were unnecessary? The agencies had done their job; the police had caught the criminals and the courts had sentenced them. It was only because of this nonsensical system that those thousands of victims of crime have had to suffer unnecessarily.

David T.C. Davies: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend's comments. He might be pleased to know that I was the second signatory of his early-day motion, and that it brought the whole matter to my attention.

If we ended early release, it is debatable whether the overall costs to the public would increase in the longer term. Currently, 20 crimes are committed for every one that secures a conviction. We spend vast sums investigating crimes, bringing prosecutions, and offering legal aid, court time and all the rest of it to people who have committed offences while on early release, as my hon. Friend said. We also spend millions of pounds on the probation service and on schemes such as tagging, which currently costs about £30 million a year. I think that the Minister will tell us that there will shortly be a reduction because of a change in contracts. Regardless of that, all of that is money that would be saved by ending early release.

More importantly, others would be deterred from committing crimes if they knew that a conviction would lead to a fixed spell in prison. In any case, many crimes are committed by people who should be in prison. In the long term, there could be a significant cost saving.

This is the important question on cost: how much are people's lives worth? It has been the proud boast of the probation service—it is a pity that nobody from the service is in the audience to listen to this—that only 0.6 per cent. of prisoners whom they classed as dangerous and were let out on early release were convicted of the most dangerous offences, such as rape, murder and arson, while they were in the care of the probation service; the service has been saying that on the radio. However, that figure does not include those who committed a crime while out on early release, but who were not convicted of a crime until after their period on supervision ended. Also of course, it often takes quite some time to bring the most serious offences to court, so it is very likely that a period of supervision will have ended by the time such a crime is brought before the courts.

Those who commit less serious crimes—I use that term guardedly—such as muggings and house burglaries are also not included in the probation service figure. So far as I can see—perhaps the Minister will clarify this—it does not include those who are not classed as dangerous by the probation service, but who in any case go on to commit violent crimes while on early release. Using this measurement, the killers of Mary-Ann Leneghan were in fact a success story for the probation service, because although they carried out their crimes while under some form of supervision, they were not convicted until after that supervision ended.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on that point. What happened to Mary-Ann Leneghan was an outrage. I absolutely stand by the probation service figure—although, in fact, it is 0.4 per cent. The hon. Gentleman has a reasonable argument, but he must use his facts accurately in making it.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister says that I am wrong. Of course what happened to Mary-Ann Leneghan was an outrage; nobody disputes that, and I am certainly not saying otherwise. However, the Minister has not stated that anything I just said was factually incorrect.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman suggested that the delay between the period of supervision and a case coming to court meant that serious further offences would not be treated as serious further offences in the probation figures. Let me assure the hon. Gentleman that they absolutely are.

David T.C. Davies: Well, let me tell the Minister that the probation service is going around saying that only 0.6 per cent. of the people that it deals with are convicted of serious crimes while under its supervision.

Fiona Mactaggart rose—

David T.C. Davies: I will give way in a moment. The point I am making on that probation service statistic is that if it covers conviction rather than crimes committed within the supervisory period, the killers of Mary-Ann Leneghan would not be counted in the 0.6 per cent.

Fiona Mactaggart: Let me assure the hon. Gentleman that the figure—it is 0.4 per cent. but I do not want to quibble about it—includes all serious further offences committed while people were under probation supervision. Therefore, the killers of Mary-Ann Leneghan would be included.

David T.C. Davies: I am grateful for that clarification. Therefore, the probation service would be well advised to make it clearer that it is talking about crimes committed rather than crimes of which people are convicted.

Philip Davies: Does my hon. Friend agree that any crime committed under these circumstances is too many? I draw his attention to a recent case in my constituency. A convicted murderer, Stephen Ayre, was released on licence from prison back into my constituency and was recently convicted again of abducting and raping a young boy. Such crimes are completely unnecessary and would not be committed if people were locked up to serve their sentence in full; in this case, if a life sentence meant life. Does my hon. Friend agree that any such crime is more than enough? It does not matter whether the figure is 0.4 per cent. or 0.6 per cent. as any crime is one too many.

David T.C. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Basically, the probation service has admitted that 79 people while under its supervision committed the most serious forms of crime, such as rape, murder, arson and armed robbery, leaving behind a trail of ruined lives, such as those of the victim my hon. Friend just mentioned, and they did this while they could and should have been in prison.

Frankly, if British Rail or one of the rail companies had allowed 79 people to be seriously injured or killed on its railway lines, we would quite rightly demand that billions be spent putting the problem right. However, we seem quite happy to allow a situation in which 79 people go around committing the most atrocious crimes, and we are not prepared to do anything very much about it. Either way, for the probation service to present that as a success is an exercise in mendacity that renders those presenting the statistic as being unfit for their positions, frankly.

To sum up, our justice system should contain four major elements. It should, of course, contain the element of rehabilitation of offenders, and involve giving them the opportunity to address their behavioural problems, get off drugs, gain qualifications and generally improve their outlook on life. That, of course, cannot be done in a matter of months; it takes time for the most serious offenders. Rehabilitation is just about the only part of the justice system to which we give credence at the moment. We have lost all sight of deterrence. Prison sentences should be long enough to make people think twice before they commit a crime. At present, criminals view prison sentences as no more than a minor inconvenience, and I sometimes think that the Treasury views them as a rather more major inconvenience. We seem to have forgotten the concept of justice for the victims and punishment of the transgressor. That may sound a little old fashioned but, to be honest, the moment that one loses sight of that concept, people lose sight of the justice system and start taking the law into their own hands.

Most important of all is the protection of the public. Mary-Ann Leneghan, Marian Bates, John Monckton and Robert Symons are just a few of the many people whose lives were needlessly ended by prisoners on early release, and who leave behind grief-stricken loved ones whose own lives will never recover. We owe it to those innocent victims to learn from the mistakes of the past, for which all of us, as legislators, are to some extent responsible if we do not address the problem. That is why I make one simple appeal to the Minister; end all forms of early release and make Britain a safer place in which to live.

4.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I am glad that the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) raised this matter, because I share his view that it is very serious. Indeed, I share his view that there is an absolute obligation on the state to protect the public. I also share his perturbation that figures of 0.6 or 0.4 per cent. for serious further offences committed could be regarded as a success; they are not a success. We have started with the matters on which we share a view, but now let us focus on facts and evidence.

The first fact that I should like to bring before the House is that we are less likely to be victims of crime now than at any time in the past 20 years; that is an important thing to know. The second fact is that offenders actually spend longer in prison than they used to. The third fact is that the only change, in terms of reduction of sentences, is the introduction of the home detention curfew to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I, too, am concerned about some of the ways in which that scheme works, and I will address the matter in a moment.

We agree that public protection is the first duty of the prison service. That is one reason I am very proud that for nearly a decade now there have been no category A escapes; we are actually increasing the security of our prisons. We should feel good about that. Also, it is important that we make sure that we protect the public by reducing reoffending. That is absolutely at the heart of our five-year strategy. The hon. Gentleman claims that rehabilitation is all that we are concerned about, but he is quite wrong; the first thing that we are concerned about is public protection, and that is one of the reasons for our focus on escapes. The second thing that we are concerned about is reducing reoffending. There are two ways that we do that: partly by the way in which we reduce the likelihood of an individual's reoffending, and partly by ensuring appropriate sentences and sentencing behaviour for the prisoners who are most likely to offend and those who are most dangerous.

Let me first turn to the home detention curfew scheme. The hon. Gentleman claimed that the fact that we did not collect figures on how we deal with breaches suggested that we did not deal with them; he is wrong about that. The scheme is devised for suitable low-risk offenders. Release under the scheme can provide opportunities for successful resettlement by enabling offenders to resume employment or training earlier. It can be one of the first steps in helping offenders to lead a law-abiding life by enabling them to take responsibility for their lives and support themselves and their family.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that for some people there has been a failure in doing that. We need to ensure that we have better systems in place to identify those who are at the greatest risk. Shortly after we introduced the scheme, we identified a series of offences that automatically makes people unsuitable for it. I could read the list, but I see that the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene.

David T.C. Davies: I was talking about written questions that the Minister herself answered. She agrees that there have been 700 cases of people damaging their tags, but she cannot say how many, if any, have gone back into custody. Does she not think that she should know the answer to that question?

Fiona Mactaggart: I cannot answer that question without excessive public expenditure because of the places where those two pieces of information are kept, but the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear what we are doing about recalls and bringing people back to prison. If I can be honest, I think that he misunderstands some aspects of how our system works. He does not know enough about how effectively we are using recall to prison and how it is making a substantial difference. It is part of ensuring that people serve a longer part of their sentence.

I said earlier that the only change was the home detention curfew scheme, but in fact another change is in purview. At present, some offenders who are on home detention curfew have no supervision—the hon. Gentleman referred to the short sentence offenders who are released without supervision. In future, under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, that will be wholly changed. Under custody plus, offenders who are sentenced to less than 12 months will be supervised on release and liable to recall. Until now, such offenders were not supervised or liable to recall if, for example, they breached some of the conditions that could be put on their case. Now we have a more active mechanism for managing such offenders in the community and ensuring that they return to prison.

Early release is not a new concept. Under the Criminal Justice Act 1991, prisoners who were serving a custodial sentence of 12 months or more, or less than four years, would be released at the halfway point of their sentence. If they were serving four years or more, they could apply for early release on parole at the halfway point of their sentence. They had to be released at the two thirds point and the assessment of their suitability for parole, as conducted by the parole board, depended on whether they could be safely managed in the community. All prisoners were on supervision until only the three-quarter point of their licence.

That was what we inherited we came into government in 1997. We believed that it failed to offer adequate safeguards to protect the public. It made no distinction between prisoners who presented a risk of harm and those who did not. Those serving a sentence of four years or more could be released at the halfway point, but they had to be released no later than the two-thirds point.

We are now implementing the provisions of the 2003 Act, which makes important changes. Anyone who has committed a serious sexual or violent offence is now liable to imprisonment for an indeterminate period. I do not have to hand the number of such sentences that have already been handed down, but I recall that it is more than 700 since April last year. There has been quite significant use of that sentence by the courts to protect the public. The provision underlines the Government's belief that dangerous and violent offenders should be let out of prison only if it is clear that they are no longer a risk to the public. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that fact. It is a significant change.

David T.C. Davies: I understand what the Minister is saying and we will have to see how the sentences are used. The fact remains that, according to what the Library told me, anyone on a determinate sentence will be eligible for automatic release halfway through. Can she answer this simple question: does she think it right that someone who is sentenced to four years or just under four years in prison may spend just one year and seven and a half months in custody? Does that sound like the sort of justice system in which the public can have confidence?

Fiona Mactaggart: What is important is that anyone who is serving a determinate sentence of 12 months or more will serve the first half in custody and the whole of the second half on probation supervision, during which time they will be liable to recall. They will not serve up to two thirds; they will serve the whole of the second half. That compares with the previous system in which the last quarter of the sentence was served without supervision and without conditions.

There are 679 offenders who have been sentenced to the indeterminate public protection sentence that I referred to. In addition, there is the extended public protection sentence, which is for other sexual and violent offenders whose offences are not so serious but who are considered to present a risk to the public. That requires them to undergo extended periods of probation supervision. Of those sentences 679 have been passed since April this year.

Those sentences are better sentencing and they are just one strand in delivering effective public protection. We are also committed to delivering better assessment of risk and better risk management using the offender assessment system, OASys, and other systems to identify risk.

It is shocking that we do not always successfully identify risk. It is horrific that people who have been offenders go on to offend again and that so far we have not sufficiently protected the public from them. That is why we must continue to improve our assessment of risk and the quality of reports to bodies such as the parole board to ensure that they are excellent in every case and to ensure that the risk to the public is the paramount issue considered by the parole board and any other releasing body before allowing people to be released into the community.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister is being very generous in giving way. The whole point is that the parole board does not have public confidence because it has been wrong so many times.

Fiona Mactaggart: I absolutely agree. We need a step change to ensure that we do improve. We are doing that, for example, by strengthening our multi-area public protection arrangements, which are helping to protect us from some of the most dangerous offenders and which involve collaboration between the police, the probation service and so on.

[Fiona Mactaggart]

The hon. Gentleman made a point about supervision not working and recall not working. I hope that he will be reassured, as I was, by finding out that in 1996 only 500 prisoners a year were recalled to prison. That does not suggest to me that the process was working terribly well. During the past year, 11,000 were recalled to prison. I might not be able to identify centrally how many of those were on home detention curfew, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that one in four people under probation supervision are now recalled to prison for breaches. Those breaches include breaking curfews, not turning up to appointments, failing to attend drug treatment, and so on. We are being more effective in ensuring that a sentence is a real sentence and that while part of it might be served under supervision in the community, under the 2003 Act, 100 per cent. of the sentence laid down by the court is served by the prisoner, part of it under supervision in the community and part of it in prison, and if there is breach when under supervision in the community the offender can be brought back.

The point that I share with the hon. Gentleman is the view that we must step up the quality of public protection. It is not acceptable—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order.

Fairfield Hospital, Bury (Maternity Services)

5 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the situation in respect of the current public consultation being promoted by the Greater Manchester strategic health authority, "Making it Better", which concerns proposed changes to health care services for children and young people, parents and babies in Greater Manchester. My interest is particularly and understandably in the hospital that serves my constituents, Fairfield hospital in Bury, but I want to make some remarks that spread a little more widely.

In the north Manchester area at present we are going through a considerable period of change within the NHS. For example, the chief executive of the Bury primary care trust will retire this weekend and a new chief executive will be appointed in due course. The chairman of the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust resigned some weeks ago. We have a temporary chairman, and a permanent chairman will be appointed in due course. The chief executive of the Pennine trust will be leaving his position in a few weeks' time. The merger of primary care trusts is moving forward and a number of neighbouring PCTs will be amalgamated in the near future.

The Greater Manchester strategic health authority, which has driven the process of consultation, will be abolished in the near future. The current chief executive and chairman will be moving to new positions or to pastures new and the Greater Manchester SHA will be absorbed into a new regional strategic health authority. Given the scale and pace of change in structural organisation in Greater Manchester, and of changes of leadership in the primary care trust and north-east sector and in many neighbouring primary care trusts, is this the right moment to embark on an additional, radical phase of reform, some elements of which have not been thought through in sufficient detail?

Fairfield hospital is the hospital in which the vast majority of my constituents were born. Most families in Bury will have seen relatives die in that hospital. I was born there. Many of my relatives were born there and have worked there, and most of my relatives have died there. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) was also born in Fairfield general hospital, as were his children and the children of the constituency assistant of my hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin).

You understand, Mr. Benton, the close personal interest that my colleagues and I have in the future of the maternity services at Fairfield. Our interest is enhanced by many distinguished people having being born there, not least the Prime Minister's wife. She was born in Fairfield a number of years after me. We were delighted that Mrs. Blair was able to reopen the new, refurbished and enhanced maternity unit just five years ago. To most members of the public and to most of my colleagues, suggesting that a unit that was reopened merely five years ago should now be closed and transferred to another hospital makes little sense.

The current consultation process is the third attempt in six years to consider the future of maternity and paediatrics. The first attempt was stifled at birth, because it took the form of an internal report by the former regional health authority, before the Greater Manchester SHA was established. That came to the conclusion that the Fairfield hospital should maintain its maternity and paediatric service.

That report did not see the light of day, but the debate continued until mid-2004, when a public consultation was launched with a different set of recommendations. In particular, it was suggested that Fairfield should lose its maternity and paediatric services but that Rochdale infirmary, the second of the four hospitals in the Pennine acute trust, should maintain its services. That public consultation was withdrawn following criticism by me and my hon. Friends the Members for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), for Heywood and Middleton and for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) concerning the lack of detailed information supporting those conclusions.

Following the withdrawal of that consultation, there was a further period of informal consultation from early to mid-2005, which culminated in the publication of the current consultation document in January 2006—it was launched on 12 January. Fortunately, it has been extended for an additional month, to mid-May, so today's debate is very timely, as we are moving towards the final weeks of consultation.

The thrust of the proposals in the document are in many respects welcome and entirely in line with the views of most Greater Manchester Members and large sections of the general public. We are talking about a major expansion in primary care, and we welcome hugely the proposal to build 35 new primary care centres throughout Greater Manchester, seven of which will be in the borough of Bury and four of which will be in my constituency of Bury, North. The general drift of the proposals for primary care and the improvement of services outside hospitals is completely to be welcomed.

We recognise the need for rationalisation in maternity and paediatric services and units. Most people accept the need to reduce the number of separate units. We are not arguing against the principles underlying the consultation. We are arguing against the specific choice of Fairfield hospital as one of the hospitals that will lose its maternity and paediatrics in-patient services.

When the first consultation was launched in 2004, there was considerable public reaction in Bury: a major petition was launched and a march was held. The best part of 5,000 people marched through the centre of the town to express their opposition to the proposal. That was in early 2005. Next Saturday, another march will be held in the centre of Bury, and I imagine that several thousand people will march against the proposal to close the maternity unit at Fairfield. In addition, at least 30,000 people have signed a petition supporting the retention of maternity services at Fairfield.

I stress again that the general direction of the proposed reforms has considerable public support. We are all in favour of the expansion of primary care, and we recognise the need for rationalisation following the closure of two of the older children's hospitals and the formation of the new tertiary children's hospital in the centre of Manchester. Change has to take place.

We recognise the imperative of the working time directive and the pressure on doctors' rotas. We recognise the problems that will be caused by a shortage of midwives—or problems with their age profile, as a considerable number will be retiring in the not too distant future. We understand all the pressures on maintaining a well-staffed and safe service across a large number of sites, and Greater Manchester is fortunate in having a larger number than many regional cities. Nevertheless, we argue that it is wrong to choose to close Fairfield.

I shall outline some of the reasons for our opposition. The process through which the consultation has developed was questionable in one key respect: it started with the designation of sites. Once the sites that should continue had been designated, criteria were established to test the validity of that choice. That puts the process the wrong way around; it puts the cart before the horse. In a normal decision-making process, one would reasonably expect to establish criteria before making a decision about the options. In this case, the SHA has chosen the options before agreeing the criteria. Subsequent to the options being chosen, they were tested against the criteria, but certain options that were excluded from the start might also have satisfied the criteria that were agreed. It is important to stress that there is a serious flaw in the process that was established earlier. Owing to that, our hospital has not been given the full opportunity to demonstrate its case against the agreed criteria.

The consultation document published this year is detailed. One could not criticise the SHA for not attempting to provide a substantial amount of information. The document is not completely accessible, and aspects of the layout and the presentation of the information could have been done better, but by and large we have no criticisms.

In addition, a considerable amount of information has been published on the website. The information is relevant to the process, the choice of options, the establishment of the criteria and the pre-consultation carried out, and it contains details of clinicians' internal meetings and the arguments made. The SHA has gone out of its way to offer considerable information to the general public to help formulate their decision.

However, certain key areas of information are neither included in the consultation document nor properly presented on the website. For example, one element of the website deals with staffing. It identifies for all hospitals in Greater Manchester the numbers of whole-time equivalent staff in paediatrics, for example, so that we can find out how many paediatricians or whole-time equivalent paediatricians work at each hospital. However, we do not get the same information for midwifery and nursing staff, so there is a significant gap in the information on staffing. There is also no information about how the proposals for the new reduced number of maternity units would be staffed. Again, that is a significant gap, and it limits the extent to which people can form a reasoned judgment about whether the series of proposed options is workable and justifiable.

As I recall, one item on the website says that the work force strategy and action plan, which will presumably determine how the proposed new units are staffed, will be presented to the task force in April. If the consultation has been under way for the best part of two years, and the current phase was launched in early January, but the decisions about the work force strategy are not to be taken until April, there seems to be something wrong with the time frame of the process.

Another gap in the background information on the website is the revenue and capital cost implications of the proposals. It is not just a gap; it is a hole. There is no information about those implications. Evaluating whether it would be better to maintain services at Fairfield general or another hospital—

5.14 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.29 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Chaytor: I shall attempt to continue seamlessly from the point at which I left off. I was discussing the question of revenue and capital costs in the consultation document, or, more accurately, their absence from it.

If we consider the papers on the website relevant to paediatrics and maternity for the Pennine acute trust, there is literally a gap when we come to the proposals for maternity. There are no financial costings, just a simple comment that the "Pennine (and the constituent hospital sites) are working up a variety of schemes that encompass a range of outcomes from the NE and Children's consultations."

That seems to me an interesting comment on the view of the possible sites from within the Pennine acute trust itself.

To many of my constituents, one of the biggest contradictions in the proposals seems to be on the question of choice. My hon. Friend the Minister knows what great emphasis the Government have placed in recent years on patient choice in developing their policy. That featured prominently in our general election manifesto and, more recently, in the document "Creating a Patient-led NHS". It will be appreciated that for thousands of people in my constituency who were born in Fairfield, and who continue to expect that their children and grandchildren will be born there, the idea of patient choice rings a little hollow if the overwhelming choice expressed about the hospital in which they wish to give birth is taken away from them.

I stress the point that if we, as a Government, are serious about patient choice then it makes no sense whatsoever to take away what is an enormously popular choice for many people in my constituency, Bury North, and its neighbouring districts, especially in significant parts of Rochdale, Heywood, Middleton and Rossendale.

In the district that Fairfield supports, everyone would accept that Fairfield and Rochdale infirmary are both smaller hospitals. We also accept that Bury and Rochdale are two of the smaller towns within the Greater Manchester conurbation. However, to deprive both hospitals of their maternity and in-patient paediatric services would leave a gaping hole in the north of that conurbation, unique when every other part of it would remain well served in maternity and paediatrics by local hospitals. We find that gaping hole unacceptable; for local people, it would result in severe deterioration of both services in and accessibility to the NHS.

We also know that while Bury and Rochdale are two of the smaller towns, their combined population—with the neighbouring district of Rossendale—is greater than that of the city of Manchester, which brings me to my final point. The consultation document offers four options for the future, none of which include Bury or Rochdale. I believe that to consider an amalgamation of Bury and Rochdale's in-patient paediatric and maternity service on the Fairfield site would be an ideal fifth option, and one which is increasingly supported by wide numbers of local people, and particularly by clinicians, nursing staff and doctors working in the Pennine acute trust.

That amalgamation would have several advantages. First, it would create an in-patient service and maternity unit large enough to deliver the economies of scale and critical mass of patient through-put to ensure that staff working in the unit were faced with the full range of clinical problems that they would need in order to maintain the quality of their clinical practice. Were we to amalgamate Bury and Rochdale it would, by dealing with the necessary critical mass of patients, mean that we would be talking broadly of 13 births per day compared, for example, to 12 in the neighbouring hospital at Bolton or seven at North Manchester. If talking of maternity out-patients we would be talking of over 400 compared, for example, to 100 at North Manchester or 310 at Oldham. I could go through a long list of figures to demonstrate that merging the two units would create a more than viable single site.

A second point is that in terms of choosing between the two locations, given that Fairfield hospital is the last building in my constituency and immediately adjacent to the border with Rochdale—if it were moved 50 yards further to the east it would be in the borough of Rochdale—it is ideally suited to serve the population of my constituency and other parts of the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South, and also most parts of Rochdale and the district of Rossendale to the north. The central geographical location of Fairfield hospital is also a powerful case for my fifth option.

We welcome the consultation document published by the strategic health authority and the considerable amount of work that has gone into it. We recognise the serious attempt to hold an open and transparent consultation; we value the information that has been provided; we support the general direction of policy in the rationalisation of the total number of units and the concentration on centres of excellence and the massive expansion of primary care. However, we think that the SHA has made the wrong decision in the choice of site and therefore I, and a considerable number of my constituents—I mentioned the 30,000 who have already signed the petition, and several thousand will demonstrate on the streets of Bury on Saturday—will support the fifth option, the amalgamation of in-patient paediatric and maternity services in Fairfield hospital in Bury.

5.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) on securing this debate on maternity services. He advanced a powerful argument. I thank him for bringing the debate to the Floor of the House and for his consistent argument with Ministers on behalf of his constituents off the Floor of the House. I want to put on record my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, for his contribution to the debate. My final words of thanks are to the Bury Times and to the Manchester Evening News, which have consistently kept the debate, and the facts, in front of the local community. Their approach to the subject showed again that they are effective voices for local people.

The starting point of the debate is the extraordinary changes that have happened in the national health service in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North since 1997. They have happened not by accident, but because we doubled, and are on our way to tripling, health service investment, which has meant more than 360 extra consultants, 2,500 extra nurses and 3,700 more health care assistants for Greater Manchester since 1997. As a result, waiting times for the health service in his part of the country and in the rest of England have fallen dramatically. In 1997, about 18,000 people had to wait more than six months for in-patient treatment in Greater Manchester, but today that figure has come down to none—no one waits longer than six months.

The improvements in the NHS generally are also true for maternity services. Last year, we achieved our target of recruiting an extra 2,000 midwives. The vacancy rate for midwives throughout the country has come down from about 3.3 per cent. in 2000 to 1.8 per cent. My hon. Friend mentioned some concerns about the number of midwives who are coming up to retirement age. I am pleased that there has been a 44 per cent. increase in the number of students entering training to become midwives, which is great news.

It is no surprise, therefore, that the vast number of women—80 per cent.—who use the NHS when they have a baby are overwhelmingly satisfied with maternity services. The satisfaction rate for men is not equivalent, but it is not far off. As someone who has three children aged five and under, I have spent some time in maternity wards in the not-too-distant past, and the service is first class.

The most important figure is that of infant mortality. We now have the lowest ever rate of infant mortality in England—5.1 deaths per 1,000 live births—because of the big investment we have made. As my hon. Friend said, reform has to go alongside that new investment over the months and years ahead. I am grateful for his measured presentation of the arguments in his part of the country.

Fairfield hospital is part of the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS Trust, which is involved in two of the biggest health improvement programmes in the country. The geography of my hon. Friend's area is unique. The pattern of mill towns that developed there over the 19th century has meant that many of the hospital services are small and unique in their configuration. My argument is that, although those services worked extremely well in the past, in the 21st century, they have to change.

Part of the change must be to the organisation of maternity and obstetric services. The reorganisation is not proposed for the sake of reform; it reflects three important principles. I am referring to principles that we set out in the White Paper on health and social care, to which my hon. Friend alluded. That is important because, in the 21st century, people want an NHS that is available not only around the clock, but around the corner. We therefore have far more to do on moving in-patient services out of hospitals—their traditional location—into the community. Quite significant services can be moved into the community, where they are far more convenient, particularly for people from more deprived communities, who often lack access to public services in general and to services such as transport in particular.

The position that I have described has an important bearing on how maternity services will be organised in my hon. Friend's constituency. In particular, we will ask PCTs to go about developing and implementing the national service framework for maternity services quickly. At the last election, we knocked four or five years off the deadline for implementing that framework. We now have plans in place for its implementation and we hope to see a big expansion of community-based midwifery services. They are particularly important to ensure that people from all corners of the community have access to early antenatal care, which is vital to the baby's future health and to the mother's health. Dr. Foster estimates that about 40 per cent of births are unassisted and could be safely delivered in a midwife-led unit or at home. That is the first issue.

The second issue is the pattern of 24-hour in-patient services, which are spread quite thinly across the hospital sites in Greater Manchester. That results in pressures on staffing. I understand that maternity units across the review area were closed on 90 separate occasions over a 12-month period to March 2006. Those closures ranged from a few hours to an entire day.

Thirdly, it is important to create strong 24-hour in-patient services, because they allow a critical mass of patients to come together and they allow clinicians to develop particular types of expertise. Why is that important? The infant mortality rate in central Manchester is eight per 1,000 babies—I am referring to babies who die before their first birthday—compared with a rate of only two per 1,000 in mid-Surrey. There are great inequalities in the infant mortality rate, and we must reflect that in the services that we organise.

Those are all big questions, and that is exactly why the consultation is so important. I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend for highlighting fresh and innovative proposals that were not put on the table in the consultation. I will personally write to the chief executive of the strategic health authority to make sure that those proposals are taken into account as the consultation unfolds.

My hon. Friend made a central point about criteria being developed after the configurations were proposed. I will look into that and write back to him on it. He also made some important points about gaps in information. I am grateful for his thanks for the way in which a lot of detail was presented but, if there are gaps in information, I will see what we can do to remedy that. He mentioned that there is an ongoing debate that has captured the attention of the entire community, and I understand that there are marches this Saturday. I want to make it clear that, where there are petitions and where there is a public response of that kind, we will absolutely make sure that those voices are heard as the consultation draws to a close.

I wanted to make one final point. I know that there has been some debate about—

It being fifteen minutes to Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 30 March 2006

[MR. DAVID MARSHALL in the Chair]

Small Claims (Courts)

[Relevant documents: First Report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee, Session 2005–06, HC 519, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6754.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Kevin Brennan.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I glad that you, Mr. Marshall, and a significant number of hon. Members, as well as the Minister, who has taken on new responsibilities, have stayed behind on the last day before the Easter recess to discuss the small claims track, which is important to many of our constituents.

The report produced by my Committee gives a general commendation to the work done on the small claims track of the county court. It provides a genuine and valued service to large numbers of people with minimal effort, cost and complication and it is genuinely appreciated. We said in our report that the system

"generally works well in providing a low cost, good quality procedure for large numbers of litigants. The procedure is informal and quicker than ordinary proceedings. It assists litigants to appear in person by providing greater judicial intervention and support and enables people to avoid incurring substantial legal costs in order to pursue small monetary claims."

We went on to say that we identified some problems, and I will refer to those in my speech.

We visited county courts in various parts of the country individually, in places that were convenient to us. We talked to district court judges, who also gave evidence. We listened to cases from start to finish and took evidence from judges, personal injury lawyers, Citizens Advice, the Law Society and Ministers.

We identified four issues. The first was the information technology situation in the county courts, particularly as it affects the small claims track. When we visited the county courts, we found the IT systems in a dreadful state. Judges admitted that they were using their computers merely as word processors. Even more concerning was the fact that we were informed that new software was performing poorly. The listing software, which could be accessed by the clerks and administrative staff, could not be accessed by the judges because of compatibility problems.

We concluded that the Department must place greater priority on providing adequate IT facilities to the county courts. Although the provision of IT equipment and electronic document management software might be expensive in the short term, there would be scope for greater efficiencies if the current paper-based system were at least partially replaced, and the service to the public would be improved.

The Government response includes the interesting phrase:

"We start from a low technology platform"—

"current investment in improved infrastructure, electronic scheduling, centralised data and future plans to develop electronic service channels will provide us with the opportunity to streamline the process further."

Wonderful weasel words. The Government are saying not that they are actually going to do it, but that once they have done all that—even that is in doubt—they will have the opportunity to do more. The response said, of course, that financial constraints dictate the speed of progress, and that a "programme to roll out a modern IT infrastructure to our large civil courts" should have been completed by today—the end of March 2006. It continued:

"details of the scope and timetable for further developments is commercially sensitive."

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the Select Committee discovered that the Department for Constitutional Affairs spent £9 million on consultants last year. I recently received a reply to a question on where that money was spent. Some was spent on IT consultants. Does he agree that it would be useful to know exactly what those IT consultants did for the large amount of money that the Department spent?

Mr. Beith: Indeed it would. I expect that a further letter in amplification of the hon. Gentleman's persistent and necessary questioning on the subject might follow from the Department. Were the consultants on whom so much money was spent involved in trying to sort out the county court IT provision? If so, that does not seem to have produced the results that we need. It is clearly an issue for the Department and it should show more urgency, we felt, than it has.

The second problem area, which is reflected in the experience of hon. Members when trying to help their constituents, is in the enforcement of judgments. If someone gets a judgment in the small claims court and comes out thinking that they have recognition that wrong was done and will be compensated, and then find that they cannot enforce it, that is extremely frustrating. It is such a common experience that, in its literature, the Department advises people how to find out whether the person against whom they have a claim already has undischarged county court judgments, as it might not be worth pursuing another claim against that person. It is a counsel of defeat: do not bother taking a case against that defendant, because his record of paying is so bad that it is not worth while.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In the parable of the good Samaritan, the victim fell amongst thieves. I am an accountant who has fallen amongst lawyers, by the look of things.

As an accountant, I found that the small claims court, or the small claims track as it is now called, worked in terms of clarity, speed and helpfulness, as the right hon. Gentleman said, but it hit the buffers when it came to enforcement. The measures suggested by the report are good, but I am not sure that they will have any impact on the "won't pays", the people who move around and are not in settled employment. That is where I encountered the most persistent problems when I tried to claim to assist clients.

Mr. Beith: I am not a lawyer, although there are quite a few around. Having an accountant present encourages me to invite him and his colleagues to come up with some more ideas as to how we can improve the enforcement process. The Government have some good ideas that they want to carry forward, and we commend them in the report. However, we are worried about the time that it will take to achieve such things.

The Department has laid out a number of proposals, including widening access to charging orders, fixing tables on attachment of earnings orders and information sharing with other Departments, but many of those require legislation. Despite our recommendation that the new powers should be introduced expeditiously, the Department has suggested that they are likely to feature in the draft courts and tribunals Bill, which we will consider later this year. There may be measures in that Bill that ought to go through the draft process, but we have been discussing these powers for a long time. I would rather have seen them in the current legislative timetable than put off for another Session. An awful lot of people will not get help to have their county court judgments enforced if we have to wait that long. That is a worry.

The third issue, which is not a problem about the small claims track but an issue for the future, is the limits on claims for personal injury and housing disrepair. There is a lower limit of £1,000 on the value of claims for personal injury and housing disrepair that go through the small claims track, which has been in force for a long time. We felt, as did the Better Regulation Task Force, that the limit needed to be reviewed and raised to £2,500.

In preface, perhaps I should say that virtually all our witnesses agreed that the most important issue was that the parties had proper information and advice before they came to court, rather than when they were represented at court, so that they knew whether it would be appropriate for their case to go through the small claims track, or whether they ought to be properly represented and not go through that track. Of course, one can be represented legally in the small claims track, but the cost structure does not make that an attractive or appropriate option for many people who might want to pursue claims. A more complex case should not go through that process. However, claims for personal injuries at the lower level could certainly be considered under the small claims system without unduly disadvantaging claimants.

The same issue could be raised about housing disrepair cases. It is important that vulnerable tenants, for example, have access to advice to find out whether their case can reasonably be resolved in the small claims process. It might be a lot easier for them if it is dealt with in that way, but it could be more complicated to do so.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The National Accident Helpline is based in Kettering, in my constituency. It has written to me to say that, on its estimate, at least 30 per cent. of total personal injury claims would be included in a £1,000 to £2,500 bracket. It cites evidence from the Association of District Judges, which acknowledges that "lay people would be disadvantaged if they had to arrange for investigation of the medical aspects of their claim, in all but the smallest cases, without the assistance of legal representation."

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman mentions the essential qualification—

"all but the smallest cases".

In a moment, I shall come to medical reports as they relate to personal injury claims and I hope to deal then with the concern that he expressed.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Before the right hon. Gentleman moves on, I would like to clarify something. I take his point that all claimants should have proper advice before going to court, but does he recognise that there are concerns about the disproportionate benefits enjoyed by defendants, who will almost always be legally represented throughout the process, whereas many claimants will not be represented in court, particularly if the limits are raised? The defendant therefore enjoys a disproportionate advantage. Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise those concerns?

Mr. Beith: That is a very proper concern in more complex cases. When I say more complex, I have in mind the complexity involved in dealing with an injury with a high prospect of recurrence, not the massive complexity that one might normally associate with a legal argument. In the case of such injuries, someone should be represented.

However, the hon. Gentleman's argument neglects the judges' active role in a small claims court and the pains to which they go to ensure that unrepresented claimants are not put at a disadvantage. Indeed, if a district court judge thought that that were going to happen, he would not want the case to go down the small claims track at all. It can happen that one side is represented and one is not, but the judges who deal with such claims—we have observed this in action—are very experienced, have often practised in this area and are at particular pains to ensure that any inequality of arms is not reflected in the way in which the matter is handled. That is because of the more interventionist way in which they can proceed.

Keith Vaz: As a member of the right hon. Gentleman's Committee and someone who signed the report, I say this in no way to sound disloyal, but we may have made a mistake in recommending that the limit be raised to £2,500. Since the report was published, I have had representations from many groups, saying that we got things wrong and that raising the limit, as the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) suggested, is much more unfair to unrepresented litigants. Has the right hon. Gentleman had the postbag that I have had on that issue?

Mr. Beith: I have indeed, but mainly because my hon. Friends and other hon. Members have passed letters from personal injury lawyers in their constituencies on to me. One or two personal injury lawyers in each constituency have dutifully written to their Members of Parliament, as they are quite entitled to do, to express their view and to advance their arguments. The Government must now consider the various cases that have been put to them about whether, and if so by how much, the limit should be increased, and they will obviously want to take account of those representations.

A curious feature of several of those representations, however, was that they appeared to be based on the principle that £1,000 was the appropriate limit in personal injury cases for all time. One or two bodies, including the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers, conceded that, in its view, no personal injury cases should ever go down the small claims track, or should ever have done so. We should bear it in mind that we are talking about a limit over which cases have drifted during the period in which it has been in force. We had better come clean about whether we believe that no personal injuries should be dealt with using the small claims track, or that there is a limit, which must be set at an appropriate level, and I shall come to some of the arguments about that.

Before I go much further on that, however, let me highlight the testimony from the Association of District Judges. Its view is that parties would not be unduly disadvantaged if the limit were raised to £2,500. Such judges are often solicitors who may have practised in this area of law and who are in a good position to judge how litigants would cope with the support that judges gave them. They have had plenty of opportunity to observe represented and unrepresented claimants.

In its report, the Committee referred to the potential complexities faced by claimants who need to obtain medical reports—a point that was raised earlier. We made it plain that it may be proper to draw a distinction between more complex injury claims, which require a medical report, and those in which injuries clear up within months, in which the only available evidence is likely to be from the general practitioner or physiotherapist, and in which there is no continuing problem with the injury. In the latter circumstances, it would be more sensible for the GP's letter to be adduced in evidence, avoiding the cost of medical reports and lawyers to interpret them.

Our subsequent inquiry looked into whether there was a compensation culture. Incidentally, for the benefit of those who wrote to us suggesting that we thought that there was a compensation culture, let me say that we said precisely the opposite in our subsequent report. In our inquiry, insurers told us that they would be prepared to accept reports from GPs in such small cases. The current process can lead to cases in which the legal costs and disbursements involved in bringing a claim exceed the damages that the claimant receives, fuelling the impression of compensation culture.

One should recognise that some minor injuries and effects are well out of the way by the time people get to the small claims court. Such injuries and effects fall well within what judges refer to as the green book limits, which are in the £1,000 to £2,500 range, or at some other suitable level around there. I have in mind the minor injuries, the trips and the slips, the broken finger or the very minor scarring. If one looks at the green book and at the injuries that fall within that range, one sees that compensation for the loss of, or damage to one front tooth falls in the £1,250 to £2,150 range. Compensation for work-related upper limb disorders, which relate mainly to tendons and where there is complete recovery in a short period, are in the £1,250 to £1,900 range. Compensation for trivial thumb injuries that have caused severe pain for a short time, but which have been resolved is in the region of £1,250. Compensation for all those things is just over the present limit.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I hope to catch your eye later, Mr. Marshall, but I am extremely concerned about some of the right hon. Gentleman's examples. Has he ever tried to fight an upper limb disorder case? They are incredibly difficult on liability, never mind quantum. One of my concerns about his recommendation is that it assumes that insurers will automatically admit liability in every case, but work-related upper limb disorder cases are incredibly difficult and complex to fight.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman is a very experienced personal injury lawyer who has fought many such cases, but I am not. I am focusing on the fact that several injuries fall within the small range that I mentioned. If, at the end of the day, the claimant gets £1,250, one wonders why he has to go through the much more elaborate procedure. The hon. Gentleman, I am sure, fears that the injury will be more complex and cause recurrent problems and will therefore deserve much higher compensation. In that case, it clearly should not be in the small claims track.

Mr. Dismore: The right hon. Gentleman is missing the point. The difficulty with the recommendation is not the value of the claim, but the complexity of establishing liability in the first place. Insurers will deny liability, and the victim of the injury will not be able to obtain justice as a result of this recommendation, because specialist legal knowledge is required to fight them.

Mr. Beith: If the hon. Gentleman is arguing that all the cases that have hitherto gone down the small claims track should not have been dealt with in that way, he should have been arguing for a long time to remove them entirely. What we actually have is an argument about the right level.

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry, but the short answer is that I resisted the introduction of personal injury claims in the small claims track in the first place. My basic position is that they should not be there, but as they are, they should stay where they are.

Mr. Beith: At least we now have the cards on the table. The hon. Gentleman should be arguing for all small cases to be taken out, but that is unreasonable in terms both of the perception of what judges will do in the small claims court and of the treatment of those whose injuries have undoubtedly been dealt with and who would quite like to go through a fairly simple procedure, rather than the lengthier one. However, the Government are listening to the arguments and will make the decision; we are simply contributing to the debate. That brings clearly out into the open the fact that most of those who argue that the limits should not be raised at all appear to believe, as the hon. Gentleman did in previous years, that none of these cases should ever go down the small claims track.

[Mr. Beith]

Of course, one could advance the same argument about much of what goes on in the small claims court. One could say that consumers are not in a position to understand the complexities of tort or contract law, yet the limit for such claims is set at £5,000, without obvious difficulties. If complex medical reports are eliminated from the equation, it is not easy to identify why claimants should not be able to set out the basic facts before a judge about how they came to be injured.

The European small claims procedure became a live matter while we were examining the issue. We concluded that it could be of real benefit in cross-border cases, but we were concerned that the claiming of disproportionate legal costs and the unrealistically low limit of £2,000 could undermine its value. We saw no reason to extend the European small claims procedure to wholly domestic cases, where the existing system is available with lower cost risk and has been shown to work relatively well. We were quite worried that people might mistakenly suppose the European small claims procedure to have something to do with European human rights and therefore believe that they would be better off using it. However, doing so might prove to be a more expensive and time-consuming way of dealing with their case. We saw the attractions of the European procedure in cross-border cases, which are increasingly common as people travel more widely and buy things on the internet from sources abroad. The complexities of modern life make it highly desirable to get such a system up and running effectively.

The Government's response said:

"The Government, during its presidency of the European Council obtained agreement on the need for proportionate costs and to limit the procedure to cross-border cases."

The issue is apparently still under discussion in the European Council's working group. I am not sure that the limit is absolutely firm, so it would be helpful if the Minister could let us know. The response continued:

"The Government will continue to press for a procedure which is practical, straightforward, fast and effective."

In the meantime, the House of Lords European Union Committee has published a report on the European small claims procedure welcoming the initiative, particularly in respect of cross-border cases.

Members of our Committee found it rewarding to look closely at the small claims track and at the grass roots of consumer disputes, housing issues, and minor accidents and personal injuries. I still treasure the image of a district court judge arranging dinky toys on the court desk while the parties, both of whom were represented, explained precisely where the cars and the bus were at a crucial moment. I asked the judge in one case how long she thought it would have taken if the parties had not been represented. She said about half the time. Judges operating in district courts have a pretty good and shrewd way of ensuring that unrepresented defendants have their cases properly dealt with.

All human life was there. We saw the emotions and cross-currents that run through the often hotly contested disputes between private individuals. I watched an argument about a fireplace that had been removed, with the judge attempting to resolve the difficult situation and the husband and wife parties not agreeing on how it should be resolved—one was prepared to pay and the other was not. Many of the cases operate at the level where personal difficulty and emotion complicate arguments about relatively small sums of money. However, those sums are significant to those who have had to bear the burden of the cost of a repair, consumer mistreatment or whatever.

The system is a credit to our judiciary, but it is capable of significant improvement, particularly in enforcement, and there probably needs to be some adjustment of the limits in personal injury and housing cases—we wait to hear what the Government think appropriate in that respect. It is a system that should be valued.

2.54 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I wish to raise only one aspect of the report and that is paragraph 54, which contains the recommendation on limits for small claims in personal injury cases.

Before doing so, I declare an interest. Prior to the general election in 1997, I practised as a personal injury lawyer for almost 20 years, mainly working with trade unions. I remain a consultant with my law firm, which is listed in the Register of Members' Interests, but I have not handled any cases since being elected, as I do not think that I could do that and work as an MP.

I have kept in close contact with the personal injury world. I am a founder member of the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers and a former member of its executive committee, and I handled its damages special interest group from its foundation until my election. I was also appointed by the Law Society as an accreditation assessor for its panel of specialist personal injury lawyers, and have sat on appeals against refusals of accreditation. Although I say so myself, in the Legal 500, the peer-group review, I was rated in the top five personal injury lawyers in London for three years running, until I was elected to this place. I have handled many thousands of personal injury cases in my career: high-value cases, complex cases in the House of Lords and many cases of lesser value—the sort of cases that we are talking about today. It is fair to say, although I say so myself, that I know a little about the subject.

Today, however, I hold no brief for the legal profession; I hold a brief for my constituents who may be the subject of personal injuries. Having said that, I recognise that no law firm will become particularly rich dealing with relatively low-value cases, as they do not make a lot of money, despite what the insurance company might say. My job is to stand up for victims.

The basic error into which the Select Committee has fallen is to suggest that personal injury cases are somehow on a par with consumer cases. There is a real difference. If someone's washing machine does not work, they know how much it cost to buy and how much it costs to repair. They have a good idea of how much money they are looking for. Similarly, if a garage has not repaired a car properly, the owner knows how much is involved. However, the average person in the street has no idea what a personal injury claim is worth. I am amazed that the Committee even suggested that the comparison should be considered. That reveals the power of the insurance industry lobby today—it has the ear of the Government and the ear of the Committee, too.

Despite the Committee's previous findings on compensation culture and all the statistics showing otherwise, the same compensation culture arguments are still trotted out all the time. The Committee's report came to a different conclusion, which I welcome, but the tabloid press churns out such arguments, which, despite the facts, nevertheless chime with the judiciary and the powers that be.

Mr. Beith: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think again if he is suggesting that the Committee came to its conclusion because of the lobbying power of the insurance industry. If any group of people influenced the Committee significantly, it was probably the judges themselves, explaining what they believed their courts could cope with. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the unworthy suggestion that the lobbying power of the insurance industry—whatever it may be—is any more significant than the obviously quite notable lobbying power of the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers.

Mr. Dismore: I am afraid that I have to disagree. I am not casting aspersions on the right hon. Gentleman, but having seen the amount of time, effort and money that the insurance company lobby spent on trying to reduce the value of personal injury claims and take money away from accident victims, as compared to the resources available to the APIL, I can say that the two do not bear any comparison whatever.

I am concerned that as a result of the lobbying we are seeing an assault on the rights of personal injury victims, and I am not talking about cost regimes. For example, there is the disgrace of clause 1 of the compensation Bill, which will come before the House soon. It is an unworthy Bill that will do significant damage to the rights of accident victims. We have seen an attack from the Home Office on the criminal injuries compensation scheme. In fact, one of my last big cases was in the House of Lords against the then Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), when he tried to implement similar reforms. Now we see from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) a suggestion over small claims. Even worse, the judiciary is in on the act too, with some disgraceful recent decisions in the Court of Appeal, such as in the pleural plaques cases, which take away the rights and compensation for injured and deserving workers.

To return to small claims, we hear the arguments advanced for an increase. The Committee says £2,500, the Better Regulation Taskforce said £5,000 and the insurance industry says £5,000. Interestingly, however, the Civil Justice Council, the trade unions and the consumer groups say that there should be no increase whatever. One argument that has been prayed in aid concerns inflation. If inflation were the test, the level would go up to £1,500—if the retail prices index was applied, it would be £1,480. However, that assumes that personal injury damages have in fact kept pace with inflation, yet they have significantly failed to do so since the 1960s. There is not a great deal in that argument.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Does it not matter from what date one applies the start of the inflationary period? The small claims track was looked at in 1998, only eight years ago, so the inflationary increase is probably even less than that.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman is right. When I was writing a paper for the Law Commission in the early 1990s, I undertook an analysis, based on the retail prices index, of personal injury damages going back to the 1960s. The sums being awarded in the 1990s were only a third of what they should have been had inflation been properly applied since the 1960s. It may be a matter for the Minister on another day, and another campaign, but not today. However, there is a strong case for saying that damages are too low.

I put that to one side, however, and turn to what is happening in Europe. Strong discussions are taking place on a European procedure for small claims. A limit of €2,000, or £1,300, has been suggested, with the safeguard of free legal advice to consumers who use the system. The Committee talks glibly about £2,500, but it does not realise that that is a lot of money to many people—especially to those who are the victims of accidents. For those on the minimum wage, that sum represents a quarter of their annual income. It is a significant amount of money. Although it may be a flea bite to the insurance company, it can make a significant difference to those who have been injured on the roads or through consumer products.

If the reform were to go ahead it would deprive victims of the right to legal advice, assistance and—I disagree with the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed on this point—representation in court. We already know that only one third of valid personal injuries result in a claim. Many more will be deterred from seeking access to justice. That may result in an infringement of article 6 of the European convention on human rights, which provides the right to a fair trial, because injured people faced with the barrage put up by the insurance companies will not get a fair trial.

Mr. Beith: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the existing £1,000 limit in all cases is at risk of being regarded as an infringement of article 6?

Mr. Dismore: One could argue to that effect, but I am not making that argument today. I am not arguing for the removal of the small claims limit for small cases. As I said when I intervened on the right hon. Gentleman, I campaigned against it, but it is a fact of life. Many people lost out as a result of that change. Many injured people do not bother to claim because they do not know how to do so. I shall advance that argument in more detail shortly.

Mr. Hollobone: The national accident helpline, which is based in Kettering in my constituency, did some quantitative research with 182 individuals who were pursuing claims through the fast track claims process. It found that 91 per cent. of people did not know what their personal injury claim was worth; that 96 per cent. did not know how to pursue their claim without legal help; and that 73 per cent. did not know how to get an independent medical report.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those figures. They do not surprise me. They are slightly higher than figures that I found elsewhere, but I am grateful for the intervention, as it reflects the reality of what happens in the outside world rather than in the hallowed corridors of the Palace of Westminster.

The argument advanced by the insurers is one of disproportionate cost. According to the Committee's report, they claim that the costs are equivalent to 65 per cent. of the value of claims and some 40 per cent. of the total pay out. The question is why those costs are so high. It is because the insurance companies fight claims tooth and nail. They hope to deter claimants from bringing cases to court. They deny liability when they should not, they make silly offers, and they take cases too far along the track and then to court when they should have paid up earlier and properly. If they did so, the costs would not be so high. The cost of bringing claims is high because that is what it takes to make the insurance companies pay out. If the insurance companies want to limit their costs, they should accept liability and pay up early.

There are other solutions. The Law Society's briefing for today's debate makes it clear that discussions are ongoing to try to simplify procedures. We have already seen the introduction of various protocols and more can be done in that direction to try to reduce legal costs. For example, we have seen fixed costs in road traffic cases. That is another way to reduce costs.

In the end, not all legal costs will be eliminated, not even in the small claims court. A medical report will be needed—one from a GP may be satisfactory—as will a police report. All that will cost money, and that will have to be factored into the insurance companies' equation come what may. The insurance companies are not going to pay out on a road traffic case without a police report, and the cost of that now runs into three figures. To suggest that it is all down to thieving lawyers is a misrepresentation of how legal costs accrue.

What will be the effect of the increase? If it were to go up to £5,000, 75 per cent. of personal injury claimants would be deprived of legal advice and assistance. If it were to go up to £2,500, as the report proposes, 52 per cent. would be deprived of that right. It would pose a far greater risk of injustice for the ordinary man or woman in the street than to the mighty insurance companies if the latter had to pay costs in cases that, by definition, they would lose and on which they should have paid up earlier.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that, in a survey carried out by Unison last year, 63 per cent. of people who were supported through the legal system said that if they had not been represented they would not have gone forward with their case as they would not have felt confident in representing themselves before a judge?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an entirely apposite point. I was about to deal with it, but I did not have those figures, and I am grateful to hear about the Unison survey. That is undoubtedly a deterrent to claims being brought in the first place, which is illustrated in a vast quantity of research.

The Association of Personal Injury Lawyers conducted a poll—it was done through MORI, so that it was properly validated—showing that about two thirds of those who suffered injury would not pursue their cases through the small claims court without the help of an independent solicitor. If 64 per cent. of people will not bring a claim without independent legal help, it means that two thirds will fail to get justice.

Those who decide to go to claims farmers could lose a third or more of their claim through contingency fees for representation that is at best second rate, but without proceedings there is less leverage for getting better compensation out of insurance companies. That underestimates the real fear that the average person has of the legal system. The man and woman in the street are terrified of going to court. People, particularly professionals, lawyers and others who are used to dealing with bureaucracy and that sort of environment, or used to the environment in the Palace of Westminster, can underestimate the fear that the average person has of dealing with such a situation.

I welcome the more interventionist approach of district judges, but unfortunately most cases would not get anywhere near a district judge because they would not get to court. When I did assessments for the specialist panel of the Law Society, not many district judges held that qualification. Not many of them are experts in that field. Some may go to a citizens advice bureau, but it is not properly equipped to advise people. People come to my surgery from time to time for advice, which I give for free. I advise people of the basics of making a small claim, but I am not sure how many follow it, even though the advice is probably worth rather a lot of money. The fact remains, however, that I would not be able to represent people in court because of other demands.

The difficulty is that we end up with a lack of equality. People are unlucky to have an injury; they are even more unlucky to have a claim and no lawyer to present it. For most, an accident is a one-off event. Most people never have accidents, but some do. However, the insurance claims assessors, whose job it is to minimise claims, are answerable to their bosses and shareholders, have no duty to the victim or the court—unlike solicitors, who have a duty to both the court and the victim—and deal with dozens of such cases day in, day out. In my early days as an articled clerk—I think that they are now called trainee solicitors—I remember having to meet claims assessors from the Municipal Mutual Insurance, Zurich Insurance, and other particularly bad companies, who tried to put one over on me in my naivety as a trainee. They were tricky individuals. If they try it on in that environment, I wonder what they do when dealing with the cases of ordinary, unrepresented people.

This is not just a question of quantum—the value of the claim—it is also about liability. Perhaps I can illustrate this with some hypothetical cases that are typical of the cases that I dealt with. Let us consider Mrs. Patel, a pensioner, who trips on a broken pavement, falls over and breaks her cheekbone, or Mr. Smith, who has impaired sight, falls on a bus that pulls away from the bus stop too quickly and breaks his nose, or take Mr. Jones, who is clipped by a car when running across the road when the green man is flashing. What would those people do? It would be difficult to prove liability in those cases, which are not worth a lot of money—certainly less than £2,500—but which have a value. Where would those people get legal advice? How would they know who to claim against? Most people do not know how to track down the claims department in their local council or bus company, and do not have the wherewithal to take down the car number plate, if they have been hit, and track down the insurance company. Even when people make a claim, insurance companies often do not bother to reply; they hope that claimants will go away. How should such people write to them or find them? What about the language barrier for a pensioner like Mrs. Patel, who probably does not speak English or does not speak it well. Would the CAB be able to help them? That is unlikely.

What about collecting evidence to support such cases? Most people who trip on a pavement might think about taking a photo of it, but how many people know that a photo is no good if it has nothing in it to show the scale, such as a matchbox, coin or ruler, to prove how big the trip is? That is the sort of basic advice that a person needs at the beginning of their case if they are to pursue successfully a personal injury claim for tripping on a pavement. There is some more free legal advice for those who might need it. How many people know how to keep track of witnesses, how to get witness statements for their claims and to keep in contact with those witnesses?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman has to answer his own question. If someone who lacks all that essential evidence goes to a local solicitor and says, "Will you take my case?", he then has to deal with solicitors, but they are now managing risk in terms of the likelihood of winning cases.

Mr. Dismore: Those three cases are of the sort that I handled and won compensation for the victims.

Mr. Beith: But the hon. Gentleman is not there any more.

Mr. Dismore: I am not there any more, but there are many other good personal injury lawyers—members of APIL, for example—who are and will take on such cases on a conditional fee basis at no cost to the claimant.

What happens if the insurer—if the claimant has managed to track them down—writes back denying liability? How is such a person to assess whether they even have a claim if they do not know the basic principles of the laws of negligence or statutory duty? What if the insurer alleges contributory negligence? Does everybody know what that is and how to assess the percentage that someone might be to blame for tripping up if they were not looking where they were going? In such circumstances, the claimant would drop the case.

When I was in practice, there was an empirical rule of thumb—a sort of four-thirds rule: only a third of cases came anywhere near us in the first place, a third of which had no hope and should not be brought, a third of which were pretty certain to succeed, and a third of which needed work to build up the case, find the evidence and establish liability. The average person in the street is not able to do that. It goes on. Let us assume that the case finally gets to court. The claimant has to fill in the forms and find the medical evidence—the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) mentioned that. Would they know how to do that? Suppose that they managed to get a case under way and the insurer says, "Okay, we'll give you 500 quid"? How would they know whether that is enough, particularly if there is an allegation of contributory negligence?

The public's view of damages bears no relationship to reality. When I was doing some research for a Law Commission paper, we did some focus group work, which was very popular in the 1990s, and found that the average person in the street thought that the value of the injury, excluding any financial loss, was three times what they would actually get from a court. Therefore, people might take cases further and pursue them for longer because they are not told that they are not worth as much as they think. That is very counterintuitive, from the insurers' point of view, if the case were to get that far.

Frankly, from the Committee's report, it seems that it has no idea of the value of claims either. The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed referred to paragraph 52 of the report, but someone who is off work with injuries for months would claim more than £2,500 anyway. It is suggested that such a case should go ahead on the basis of a report from a GP or physiotherapist; one would not get on the personal injury panel of the Law Society with that sort of assessment of a case. That is not how they would be fought. They would potentially be worth rather more than that.

APIL's MORI research showed that 80 per cent. of people felt that they would not be offered enough by an insurance company, so even if the insurer offered the right value in those sorts of cases, the offer would not be accepted because people think that cases are worth more than they are. We have the Judicial Studies Board guidelines, which give brackets and ranges for personal injury damages. Most people think that their case should be in a higher bracket than it is, and that it is worth the top of the range in that bracket, which it will not be.

It is not just a matter of the injury itself; another consideration is the special damages—the financial losses. Who advises on whether one can recover for damages to one's clothing and if so how to assess the amount? Who advises how to get money for broken spectacles and how to assess the amount? It is not the replacement value. Who advises a pensioner who is incapacitated from doing household chores and needs extra help about the home that if they hire a home help for a week or two, they can recover that cost? The insurance company certainly will not tell them that.

People have an utter fear of courts, which I mentioned earlier. Even when they are represented, they are terrified of court. I have taken many clients to court and one of the first things that I always do is take them into the courtroom before the judge gets there to show them where everybody sits. I try to put them at ease. People are like a cat on a hot tin roof when they think that they will have to give evidence in court, even in the relatively informal circumstances of a small claims court. Even lawyers get nervous about representing people before a judge.

How would Mrs. Patel cope if her case got that far? Would she know how to find an interpreter? Would she really be able to put her case against a seasoned insurance company representative? Would Mr. Smith, with his visual impairment, or Mr. Jones, an ordinary person who has been clipped by a car, be able to put their cases? Such cases are everyday occurrences for insurance claims assessors. They are trained on processes, evidence, how to cross-examine and evaluations. An interventionist judge is not the answer.

We also have to bear in mind that the outcome of one of these cases is in full and final settlement. What happens if the claimant turns out to be more injured than they thought and did not realise that they could consider that particular aspect? A lawyer would make sure that the medical evidence was right and would look at the long-term consequences.

I have been speaking for far too long on this issue, but I feel passionately about it. I believe that the recommendation will victimise people thrice over: first as victims of the injury, secondly as victims of the insurance industry, and thirdly, and perhaps most seriously, as victims of a legal system that will manifestly fail to give them justice. If we must have a small claims limit for personal injury cases, it should stay where it is.

3.18 pm

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): My remarks will also be confined to the limits in personal injury cases, and much of what I say will echo the comments of the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore).

I must declare an interest, as revealed in the Register of Members' Interests. I am a member of the Law Society, but have not practised as a personal injury lawyer for many years, although there was a time when I did a considerable amount of PI work—much of it for trade unions. Therefore, I have a certain degree of knowledge on this matter.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the small claims level for personal injury cases was instituted for a good reason: the nature of personal injury cases is very different from other small claims court cases. I have no doubt that small claims courts have been a highly desirable development and have had a significant beneficial effect in promoting access to justice. A large percentage of the cases that come before those courts involve the recovery of small personal debts, or consumer claims.

The small claims procedure is well suited to such cases. The evidence required in them is not normally so complex that most claimants would feel uncomfortable in pursuing their claims themselves. Frequently, that consists simply of producing the relevant documentation—or in many cases explaining the lack of documentation—and telling the claimant's side of the story. The interventionist approach adopted by the courts, to which witnesses who came to the Committee referred, means that any small procedural lapses can be quickly and easily attended to. Frankly, they are not normally of great moment in any event.

Personal injury cases are very different. In such cases, it is frequently difficult and complex to demonstrate the negligence of the other party. As the hon. Gentleman said, a number of factors need to be considered. There is the evidence. Frequently, the degree of liability of both sides has to be considered. There is the question of quantum, and the production of the medical evidence, which can in itself be a major part of the exercise. My concern is that a large number of such potentially complex matters will be a significant disincentive to people to run a case. To raise the small claims limit significantly would, in effect, deprive injured people of the benefit of legal advice and therefore access to justice.

Mr. Hollobone: Given my hon. Friend's strong trade union links, I am sure that he will be interested in the statistic that the TUC uses, which is that 30 to 50 per cent. of all personal injury claims are in the £1,000 to £2,500 bracket.

Mr. Jones: I am sure that that is correct. Again, as the hon. Member for Hendon stated, damages for personal injuries have not increased significantly over the years, so in many respects the question of inflation is not relevant.

The position would be exacerbated substantially if the small claims limit were significantly increased, because most injury cases arise from motor accidents. The motor insurance industry has effective, and frequently very aggressive, in-house negotiators operating on its behalf. Such people know exactly what their job is, and frequently it is to intimidate the claimant into not pursuing his claim. It is very difficult for a claimant facing such an aggressive negotiator to take his courage in both hands, go before the court and argue his case himself.

The report refers to evidence from District Judge Walker on the level of damages that are awarded in straightforward injury cases. He talks about damages in the region of £1,000 to £2,500. However, cases are not always so straightforward, and some much more complex injuries result in relatively small damages. The Law Society has pointed out that a whiplash injury giving rise to pain for many years can result in an award of only £2,000 or £3,000. Anyone who has been involved in personal injury cases knows that whiplash injuries are frequently extremely difficult to prove, but can be very painful for the unfortunate claimant.

Another matter was touched on by the hon. Member for Hendon. Although the claims in many of the cases that we are considering are small in absolute terms, they can be a significant matter for the claimant. The Law Society has pointed out that a personal injury claim for £2,500 represents 10 weeks' earnings for someone on the minimum wage. Although in absolute terms that is not a large sum of money, for the individual claimant, it is a matter of great importance.

The system of tracking is designed to ensure that litigants have their cases disposed of as efficiently, speedily and inexpensively as possible. There is no evidence that handling personal injury claims on the fast track does not work. Indeed, the fact that costs will potentially be awarded at the end of the day makes it, in my experience, all the more likely that the litigators on both sides will want to conclude the litigation as quickly as possible. The vast majority of cases under £5,000 are road traffic cases and they are usually settled without going to court at all.

What is required is to continue to encourage the efficient handling of small claims, which is not necessarily the same as saying that more cases should be allocated to the small claims track. What should be encouraged is the early settlement of disputes. For that purpose, in cases of personal injury, the intervention of lawyers at an early stage is important. If the limit is raised significantly, that will be a positive disincentive to claimants to take their cases to court, and justice will not be served. If that happens, it will reflect no credit on this House or on anyone else involved in the process.

3.26 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): First, I declare an interest as a solicitor and a member of the Law Society.

The debate has focused on the Select Committee's recommendations on the proposal to increase the limit in respect of personal injury claims and the small claims track. Before coming to that, however, I should like to talk about a couple of other issues that were dealt with in the Committee's report.

The first issue is, on the face of it, relatively minor. It is the administration and operation of the small claims court and, in particular, the customer-facing side of that. Having practised law but not in the county court or small claims court, I found it extremely informative, as part of the Committee's work, to see and appreciate the operation of that court and the way in which it deals with people. One debate that we had was on the manner in which cases are disposed of. I am referring to the way in which people are dealt with when they turn up at court. There was debate on whether there was a need for people to have fixed times for attending court to have their case disposed of. On balance, the Committee felt that that was not appropriate. That view is borne out by my own experience of attending court, and observing the work of a deputy district judge in the context of the small claims procedure and the way in which cases are dealt with at court.

A number of claimants and defendants arrive at the same time at an appointed hour in the morning, and the role of the clerk to the court is pivotal. I did not fully appreciate that until I was there. I am talking about the way in which the clerk to the court handles the people arriving there, assessing the complexity of cases in conjunction with the deputy district judge to try to ensure that the time allowed for cases is such that they run smoothly. There is an assessment of how much time will be needed for evidence to be given to the court and for a matter to be disposed of. It may seem as though there is a lot of hanging around for the people involved, but normally the clerks intervene quite early and agree with the deputy district judge or the district judge the order in which cases will be taken, depending on the availability of witnesses and other parties and how long a case is likely to take. I found it informative and interesting to see how well that system can work on the basis of a good clerk.

What would be helpful before people come to court is information and notice of how things will proceed, but from what I have seen so far—this view was shared by other members of the Committee—I do not think that there is a feeling that individual appointments should be booked for individual claimants or individual cases. It is a question of ensuring that the court's time is used efficiently and effectively. On balance, the current system works, albeit that there is a need for greater investment in IT and to ensure that claimants and defendants are well aware of what will happen when they get to court and the way in which the case will be dealt with. It was interesting to see how that is still working in practice.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) highlighted the point about enforceability. This debate has centred around limits, but for me the most fundamental and pressing issue is enforceability. We have heard a lot about access to justice during the debate, but if someone goes through the court process, has their day in court, obtains a judgment in their favour but finds that the judgment cannot be enforced, the system falls. It fails and the litigant does not get justice. The strongest point that came out of the inquiry for me was people's sheer frustration and exasperation when they obtained a judgment that told them that they were right and entitled to compensation, but were unable to execute that judgment.

The problem has existed for some time. In the Department's evidence to the Committee, it noted that the problem has existed since 1998, when the review of civil enforcement was embarked on. Recommendations came forward in July 2000 on the steps that might be taken. The civil procedure rules came into effect in March 2002 and dealt with secondary legislation on the implementation of some of those recommendations, but we are still without the primary legislation to give teeth to additional enforcement powers such as charging orders, attachment of earnings orders and, most interestingly, data disclosure orders, which are essential to give people the information and ammunition to be able to track people down and to get the court to follow things through. I am sure that many hon. Members feel that frustration when constituents come to them and say, "I cannot track this person down, so I cannot physically enforce the order and I cannot get the court to do it either."

Justice and ensuring that people are given direct access to it is about legal advice and the ability to argue a case in court, but it is also about ensuring that a court judgment is followed through and that justice is not only done but is actively seen to be done. That is not happening at the moment and will not happen until we have the primary legislation to give effect to the important recommendations that have already been made. The Department for Constitutional Affairs stated in the report:

> "Changes requiring primary legislation will be taken forward as soon as Parliamentary time allows".

I am sure that the Minister wishes that that were the case, but she is not the custodian of parliamentary time and how legislation comes through in this House. However, the strong message that needs to come from this debate, as came from the Select Committee's recommendations, is that the matter must be prioritised. We must put the enforcement powers properly on the statute book as soon as we can to ensure that those rights are properly put into place and that people are not disadvantaged and fed up because the system lets them down and court judgments are not put into effect.

We have had a good debate on the suggested increases in the small claims limit in personal injury cases, which in many ways has highlighted the various arguments. As the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said forcefully, the insurers will always seek to increase the limit as much as possible as a means of blocking justice. The Association of British Insurers stated:

> "Due to the financial constraints to lawyers and because the limit has never been changed very few cases are assigned to the small claims track."

[James Brokenshire]

It would say that, wouldn't it? The legal side could also say, "Well, it is too high already." The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) argued eloquently that justice would be denied if any changes were made. It is interesting that many of the points that have been made this afternoon apply equally to the present limit. The hon. Gentleman rightly gave his objections to any limit and I understand the purity of his argument.

We need a debate on the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering referred to the National Accident Helpline and some of the points that it made. It recognised in its report that there is a case for raising the limit to £1,500, but that any further increase must be part of a wider review of the claims process. It also recognised the express concerns of genuine claimants who are currently seeking redress.

That shows that a review is needed and I am pleased that the Select Committee report has sparked discussion of whether there is a need to look at the limit and to increase it. We may have differences of opinion with regard to inflation, but the NAH came up with a figure of £1,500 and the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers came up with the same figure. The limit was set in the early 1990s and it should be reviewed to see whether it remains fit for purpose and whether it should change. The Better Regulation Task Force has, to use the words of the hon. Member for Hendon, been even more in the pocket of the insurance industry in recommending £5,000.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman referred to inflation, but he has not responded to my main point: whether, irrespective of the retail prices index, damages have kept pace with inflation. They have manifestly failed to do so for decades. Just looking at the RPI is too simplistic.

James Brokenshire: That is a fair point in terms of the number of cases disposed of and the value of damages awarded. I am saying that we need to look at the limit and whether there is justification for increasing it, considering where we were in the early 1990s when the £1,000 limit was set. We should look at inflation, what damages have been during that time and whether it is appropriate to increase the limit.

The Association of District Judges said in its evidence:

> "Since the £1,000 limit has been in place for over 14 years, the Association does consider that there may be a case for increasing the £1,000 exception in personal injury cases slightly, perhaps to £2,000 or £2,500."

It recognised that the matter is not cut and dried and that there are legitimate arguments and concerns, as we have heard during this debate. I do not deny that. Indeed, any proposal to increase the limit would need to be closely linked with a proper review of the procedures and the way in which cases are dealt with in court. Much of that goes to the evidence and the way in which matters such as medical issues are dealt with.

Another piece of evidence to the Committee was given by Professor John Baldwin, head of law at Birmingham university, who has undertaken research into the small claims court for years, going back to the 1990s. It was interesting that he highlighted medical reports and said:

> "In my interviews with district judges, many have told me that they feel the financial limit for PI claims should be raised well beyond £1,000 and that large numbers of PI cases could easily be treated as small claims. Having a medical report available to the court is critical in resolving PI cases: as one experienced district judge told me, 'Once you've got this, most cases resolve themselves.'"

I appreciate that that may be anecdotal and simplistic, but perhaps we should be looking at those issues and assessing the evidence that is presented to the court, to ensure that justice is done more speedily and effectively in such cases.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's reference to the National Accident Helpline, which has written to me to say that it would be happy with a limit of £1,500—he was quite right—and that it uses the inflation tables in Kemp and Kemp. That probably means more to other people in this Room than it does to me, but apparently it is an authoritative journal. According to those tables, the level would be £1,433 in 2006. The NAH cites evidence from the Judicial Studies Board publication, "Guidelines for the Assessment of General Damages in Personal Injury Cases", which also demonstrates the effect of inflation on that level. Those guidelines are widely used by judges when assessing damages.

James Brokenshire: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for highlighting that information from the NAH. I am not a personal injury lawyer—I am sure that my learned hon. Friends in this Room will quickly pick me up on this—but my understanding of Kemp and Kemp is that it is part of a guide that measures the award of damages that may be available. In some ways, it would deal with the point that the hon. Member for Hendon made. I see that he wishes to rise, and I am sure that he will correct me immediately.

Mr. Dismore: Having written a chapter of Kemp and Kemp, I would simply say to the hon. Gentleman that it is written for lawyers, not lay people.

James Brokenshire: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Having met some of the NAH's representatives since our inquiry, I know that they are knowledgeable and learned in such matters and use the publication as an authoritative text to come up with their assessment of a reasonable increase in allowances under the small claims track.

It is good that we are having this debate and airing some of these issues. The small claims court has existed for many years, and it is important that we have an opportunity to consider how the justice and service that it offers can be improved. It is, and should be, the direct link that most of our constituents have with the courts when they need small claims dealt with effectively and appropriately.

Our report made recommendations on the advice that might be given. The Department for Constitutional Affairs says that it is piloting a scheme to try to give more advice, and to increase understanding of how the court operates and of the papers that need to be prepared in advance of any hearing. That is essential.

Another thing that struck me and, I am sure, all hon. Members who have been to the small claims court and seen it in operation, is the fact that many people are not informed. As the hon. Member for Hendon rightly said, they do not necessarily even know which papers they must produce to support their case. Because of the inquisitorial nature of the court, the role of the district judge is essential once one gets to court—I welcome that and believe that it needs to be strengthened—but it is important at the outset that, as much as possible, assistance and guidance through helplines and so on are given to ensure that people know which documents they need to produce, whether they be contracts, letters or other information that support their case and give them the best opportunity to explain to the district judge what their case is about and whether it is made out on the facts and the evidence.

Our report provoked some strong views and interests, and I welcome that. I also welcome this debate and the focus that we have had on the small claims court. I look forward to the Department's taking forward the issue of enforcement, focusing on the valuable and important work that the small claims court does and ensuring that we support the small claims track, so that it can continue to provide real justice for our constituents who have small claims. We must ensure not only that justice is done but that it is seen to be done.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. I apologise to you, Mr. Marshall, and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) for being delayed by a constituency engagement.

As this is the first time that I have taken part in a debate on a Constitutional Affairs Committee report since I took up my present responsibilities, may I pay tribute to the Government for their restructuring of the Departments? We now have at least a stepping stone towards a department of justice, and I hope that before too long we will have the department of justice for which many of us have pressed for a long time. I also pay tribute to my right hon. Friend and his Committee for their diligent work on this and other issues, and for regularly producing significant reports on what he described to me as a range of initiatives from the Department. This is an important report among them.

I appear to be in a minority among those who have spoken so far, as I do not have a registrable interest to declare. That may or may not give me more credibility in arguing the case. However, just so that nobody can say that I am concealing something that may be relevant, I should say that in my earlier life I used to deal as a member of the Bar with cases such as those we are considering today, as have others in their legal professions. Although recently I have not been in and out of the courts as frequently as I used to be, I believe that I know the subject area relatively well.

The issue that has engendered the most interest in this debate has been the threshold for claims, particularly personal injury claims. I shall come back to that in a moment after making some preliminary points.

First, I was slightly troubled to hear the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) imply that people would not get good advice if they knocked on the door of their local citizens advice bureau. The Minister and I share the same borough. I do not know of her experience as a constituency MP, but mine is that the CAB is an excellent front door for accessing services. It points people in the right direction, even if it does not directly give advice itself. Various agencies in our borough are extremely helpful in ensuring that people go to the right place to get good advice.

Mr. Dismore: Perhaps I could clarify what I said. First, the citizens advice bureaux are horrendously overworked already and therefore do not have the capacity to take on this work. Secondly, they do not have the expert knowledge that they would need effectively to advise people on such subjects. Indeed, my local CAB tends to send people to my surgery.

Simon Hughes: I do not want the CAB, which I love dearly, to knock on my door to say that I have sent it twice as much work as it already has. My point was that citizen advice bureaux are extremely competent. They do not do the detailed work themselves for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman gave, but they point people in the right direction. The experience in my borough is a good one, and other advice centres and agencies also do well in pointing people in the right direction.

The second point is that even further down the scale than the small claims system is mediation, of which I am a great fan. I believe that people should first go to mediation, whenever possible. There is an extremely reputable mediation service in Southwark. It principally does other things, but, in terms of access to justice at the lower level of the court system, the more that people can have matters mediated to a conclusion, the better. [Interruption.] I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene, but he appears to be unsympathetic towards the mediation service.

Mr. Dismore: Certainly not. The trouble is that insurers are not usually interested in it.

Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman is right about that, but I am trying to describe the justice pyramid. The more that people can avoid courts and lawyers, the better. Yes, insurance companies often are resistant.

A third general point is that finding lawyers who are able, willing and not too overworked to deal with such cases is difficult. There are reputable lawyers and law firms that are very good about taking up cases on behalf of ordinary citizens in my borough, but my experience over years of referring people for personal injury matters is that they are very overworked. A general weakness of the system and one of the difficulties of the world we live in—a world in which the compensation culture is growing—is that the number of requests for help from the legal system is growing, so we are at risk of requiring more and more legal firms. The proportion of people in our society and in the world at large who are going to end up as lawyers seems to be growing all the time. I do not see that as a healthy sign. It appears to be inevitable that we are going down that road, but I wish that it was not.

Mr. Dismore: I have two points. First, people do have access to personal injury lawyers: a wide range of firms do such work quite effectively and competently. People need only consult the Law Society directory or the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers if they want to see an expert. Secondly, and more importantly, the hon. Gentleman trotted out the myth of compensation culture yet again. If he had been here earlier he would have heard the comments of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, whose Committee has denounced the compensation culture as a myth. All the statistics show that it is a myth and that the number of claims is going down, which goes completely against what the hon. Gentleman said. He has fallen for the tabloid press again.

Simon Hughes: That is not my experience, and I can speak only from my experience and the general experience. I shall deal with both of the hon. Gentleman's points. I know where to look for the list of those lawyers who hold themselves out to do personal injury work, and I have made the case that there are some good and competent ones, but when as a London MP I send people to seek assistance from local personal injury lawyers, or they visit themselves, they are often told that the firm is too busy to take on their case. The pressures on those good practitioners is extreme.

There are also practitioners doing that work who are no good, and in my career I have never been able to say that the substantial number of solicitors or solicitors' firms approved by the Law Society do not include a significant number who are not up to the job and who do it poorly. One of the great failures of the past 25 years has been that there have been many poor lawyers, or people who purport to be lawyers but turn out not to be when one investigates further, because they are simply individuals who work for a law firm in which there may be only one lawyer. The representation across the board is not very good, and in some areas it is worse than others. The complaints system has been significantly inadequate over the years in dealing with complaints about when people go to the lawyers in the first place.

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry to keep intervening on the hon. Gentleman but he is trotting out wide assertions that bear no relationship to reality. The fact is that in the old days, personal injury law used to practised by people on the high street who dabbled in it but did not know what they were doing. The Law Society introduced the accreditation panel, on which I was an assessor, as I mentioned. We now have the College of Personal Injury Law and standards have risen dramatically. Indeed, if work is not done well and effectively under the new costs regime through conditional fees, firms simply cannot do it. They have to know what they are doing to make any money out of it. The hon. Gentleman's experience is way out of date.

Simon Hughes: Again, I am sorry, but I have been an MP for an unbroken period far longer than the hon. Gentleman. I can tell him that things have improved, but if he believes that all is right in the garden of solicitors he is severely misguided.

Mr. Beith: Another aspect of the problem my hon. Friend describes is that, in the world of contingency fees, an increasing number of solicitors have to make difficult judgments to turn down cases where the evidence is weak and the case has reached the margin of sustainability, because they have to make ends meet.

Simon Hughes: There is a set of issues, and I appreciate that this is not a debate about the profession of solicitors. Perhaps we could have that debate, which I would welcome, because although things have improved, the insistence of the Law Society on self-regulation and so on has not been in the public interest. Things have got better, including in the field of personal injury. However for the reasons given by my right hon. Friend and others, all I can report is that, because of the demand on those who are good, it is still sometimes difficult for people to get the advice they require, when and where they need it, at no cost if they cannot afford it or at a cost they can afford. I do not know about other hon. Members, but I select from my own experience—and what other people retail to me—those solicitors whom I recommend because they have done a good job and done so competently, but I do not include every person who holds themselves out to do such work. That is a difficulty and a weakness.

Those were meant to be entirely introductory, foothill-type, points, but they have clearly engaged the hon. Member for Hendon and there is further debate to be had. In response to his intervention, I say that I understand the debate about whether the compensation culture is overstated and about the number of people involved. The reason why a lot of people do not go down the road of taking action is that they find it too difficult, or are thwarted as they go. However, there is still a culture—one has only to look at commercial advertising on television—of encouraging people to make complaints and to think that everything ought to be risk-free, whether it is the local children's playground, a swimming pool or whatever else. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) suggested, in a controversial move, legislation for regulating the temperature of baths, which I thought was on the wrong side of the argument.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman obviously has not read the evidence or seen the material produced by my hon. Friend with which she made an extremely cogent case. The day before, a 10-year-old child received severe burns all down her leg and will suffer terrible consequences for the rest of her life. It is the old McDonald's coffee case argument. If people knew the facts of the McDonald's coffee case, they would know that McDonald's had superheated the coffee to such a degree that it caused third-degree burns. Most people do not know the facts.

Simon Hughes: I have heard and read the record of the short debate on the subject yesterday, but I was not persuaded by the hon. Lady's arguments. I think that we legislate far too much and we ask for legislation far too much. If we were much more cautious about thinking and holding out the idea that this place is the answer to everyone's problems, we would provide a far better service. In fact, if we legislated for only one year in two, we might do the public a much better service. It is normally administration, not legislation, that we need. I have a strong view about the belief that the law is the answer to everybody's problems. We should encourage people in society to take more responsibility. People can take risks, and if things go wrong, take the consequences.

I reinforce the first of the four points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, which concerned the failure of IT. Friends and colleagues of mine who do this sort of work tell me that the system is entirely inefficient. There are basically two IT systems that are not joined up, and until they are, the system will not work well. I have a note from a friend of mine, who does such work on a regular basis. She says:

"The small claims track is particularly inefficient regarding listings. . .If time is money, it's often a costly method of organising the case load. Also, it can be costly in terms of justice."

That leads into a separate but linked point:

"Some, not all, District Judges are so stressed out by having, for example six cases in their list that morning. . .they don't pay attention to points that are properly being made to them."

She goes on to make the wider and very valid point that if judges are stressed and the system is not sustainable, people do not get justice, because the judges are impatient, particularly with litigants in person. Litigants in person tend to test the patience of judges much more than those representing the insurance companies.

It is true that there are some excellent district judges, but there are some who are less good. Their general reputation around the courts is one of a very variable service. I am sure that those responsible for the appointment, supervision and management of district judges are alert to that. It is a difficult task: I have been in enough courts to see how difficult litigants in person can be, and how the imbalance of justice does not work to their advantage. However, we still need to make progress on efficiency and the quality of judges.

My right hon. Friend's second point, which he made the burden of his speech, was about enforcement. The system is of little use unless we can enforce the judgment. If one goes to court for £500 or £1,000 and nothing happens, or it takes months, the system is inefficient. The Government have said that they will respond, and it would be helpful if the Minister indicated how soon that will be.

I note what the report says, and we must be able to enforce the judgment, in effect, immediately. The inquisition about enforcement ought to be concluded there and then, at court, as the Minister and I know from our constituency experience. That is one reason why I have always argued for a merger of the tax and benefit system, because in the debate about ability to pay, people can and do deceive courts regularly. There ought to be before the judge adequate and integrated information about what people can pay. The simple proposition is that there should be a fixture no later than one month after a judgment in which enforcement is worked out, and people should be expected to attend.

That is why I have a very big stick to wave over the corporate sector—the defendants who are liable to pay. They should be required to turn up with the money in court one month later. If they do not, a very large penalty could be imposed so that it was not in their commercial interest not to turn up. We must find a way in which enforcement takes place more quickly and more effectively.

We ought to raise limits logically and gradually at least to keep pace with inflation. I shall not extend that debate at length. I take a technical view: it is probably wise to raise the limit, but only to one in line with inflation, which is about £1,500. It may be only lawyers who read Kemp and Kemp, but it would be foolish to go beyond that limit without consensus. There may have been much lobbying on both sides in the evidence given to the Committee —insurance companies and personal injury lawyers—but the insurance industry is clearly reluctant to help in many cases. I understand why personal injury lawyers want to ensure that justice is done. When the insurance companies pitch up with their lawyers and the individual has no representation, it is often easy for the company to win the day. Observations from colleagues throughout the country suggest that parity is often not achieved, because an individual against an insurance company often produces an inequitable result, in which the company is significantly advantaged.

I support the Committee's proposal for the European procedure. Cross-border cases are the only logical circumstances in which it should be used.

May I flag up the question about the cost of medical reports and the difficulty of getting them? I think I am right in saying that doctors invariably charge for medical reports.

Mr. Dismore: They have always done so.

Simon Hughes: No, they have not always done so. GPs did not always charge for medical reports. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman keeps saying that they did, but GPs did not always charge for medical reports. GPs are now considerably better paid, but they charge and charge more. I guess that we are bound to go that way, and it is reasonable that they are paid. However, if one asks one's GP for a medical report, it is important that they be obliged to provide it within a limited time. They do not always do so; it often takes a long time to receive a medical report. It would be helpful if they were provided quickly.

I want to reinforce a point made throughout the debate. For the considerable numbers of people who go into the legal system, these sums of money are significant. People can become obsessed about small sums, but they are significant. In relation to an injury or another matter, people can, rightfully, become upset. When Mr. and Mrs. Citizen take on a big—sometimes not so big—company, they feel that they are entitled to their argument, to be treated decently and quickly, and to receive the remedy quickly. The fast-track small claims system is unarguably a good idea. It is better we have that than the old rigmarole of people going through the procedures with lawyers on both sides.

The Committee addresses several significant measures that will improve the system. The Minister, with her commitment to access to justice, will I hope ensure that the Government respond as quickly as possible. We have not got the system right, and there are good suggestions about how we can make it better. We can do other things, and I hope that by the end of this decade we shall have better access to civil justice than we have ever had. If we do, I hope that the ordinary citizen will feel that getting justice does not involve such a ridiculously difficult system as they often feel it does at the moment.

4.6 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I start by declaring my interests as they appear in the Register of Members' Interests, but I state that I have never undertaken personal injury work as a practising solicitor.

The report has provided a useful and insightful analysis of the small claims system. I welcome its overall findings and congratulate the Constitutional Affairs Committee on its work. We have had a good debate and we have heard some valuable contributions. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, the small claims system is a low-cost, speedy and informal way of allowing litigants to bring claims for small monetary amounts. The system provides greater access to justice, as people are encouraged to bring their claims by the speed and informality of the small claims track. Many claims have been successfully pursued, when, without the small claims system, claimants may not have deemed it worth while resorting to legal action for such a minor amount of money.

The report, however, highlights certain problems with the small claims system which require rectification. First, the report raises the issue of the current claim limits for personal injury cases and housing cases involving a landlord's failure to repair the property. There are clear justifications for increasing the maximum amount for which such claims may be brought in the small claims system. The current figure of £1,000 was introduced in 1991, and after a 15-year period, it is outdated. As a consequence of inflation, very few personal injury claims can now be brought in the small claims system.

As the report states, within the Judicial Studies Board tariff guidance there are only five types of injury for which damages start at under £1,000. Claims for several minor injuries, which by right should be brought in the small claims track, are now being brought in alternative tracks. That means that the small claims system is not used frequently enough for personal injury cases.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman talks about the Judicial Studies Board guidelines. Would he care to tell me how much a broken thumb is worth?

Mr. Djanogly: I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman what a broken thumb is worth. If he will let me continue, he will hear that I found much of what he had to say to be of value. It is not a straightforward issue of right or wrong; it is more complicated than he made out, in his valuable contribution.

Mr. Dismore: To finish my point: if the hon. Gentleman cannot tell me the answer to that question, how does he expect the man in the street to be able to do so?

Mr. Djanogly: By looking it up in a book. It is not the hardest thing to find. If the hon. Gentleman wants to run through every claim, I will not be able to give him the answer.

As I said, the situation means that the small claims system is not used frequently enough for personal injury cases. It has resulted in the needless clogging up of the court's fast-track system, and the expense of bringing a claim is now often disproportionate to the amount of the claim. As figures provided to the Committee by Norwich Union highlighted, in personal injury cases in which damages are more than £1,000, costs represent 65 per cent. of the damages paid—or 40 per cent. of the total sum when damages and costs are paid. That situation needs to be addressed, and the Conservative party supports the Committee's proposal to raise the small claims limit.

There is also a problem of a compensation culture, and it is not the role of the state to fuel that culture by subsidising litigation. The Government's compensation Bill recognises that there is a compensation culture, but does not even scratch the surface of the problem. We recognise, however, that the extent of the increase in the small claims limit is a valid subject for debate.

Raising the limit too much could have detrimental effects. One significant problem could be that claimants would not be legally represented. The small claims system actively discourages parties from being legally represented when they should be. There is a good reason for that policy: if litigants represent themselves, the cost of cases is reduced. The discouragement can be seen in the fact that the winning party in a small claims case is unlikely to be able to recover the costs of their legal representation. The no-win, no-fee offers, so well marketed by personal injury lawyers, are rarely an option for claimants in small claims cases; solicitors will rarely agree to enter conditional-fee arrangements if legal costs cannot be recovered from the other side. The provisions have resulted in most litigants not having legal representation in small claims cases.

The consequences of an increase in the small claims limit for legal representation would be clear: claimants in personal injury cases might find that obtaining legal representation was not viable. An increase of the limit to £5,000, as recommended by the Better Regulation Task Force, a Cabinet Office-sponsored organisation, would result in the allocation of most personal injury cases to the small claims track.

In written evidence to the Committee, the Law Society stated that most personal injury cases are for less than £5,000. Even if the limit were increased by £2,500, as the Committee recommends, that would, according to figures published by the TUC, result in 30 to 50 per cent. of personal injury cases being brought under the small claims system.

Will the discouragement to potential litigants from employing legal representatives result in their being denied access to justice? In some cases, it might. As has been said, if a potential claimant is unable to enter a no-win, no-fee arrangement or recover their legal costs if their claim is successful, they are more than likely not to instruct a solicitor.

Could the claimant not bring the claim as a litigant in person? Yes, sometimes; but in some cases that would not be feasible. As the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) said in their well considered speeches, the complex nature of many personal injury cases means that it is often inappropriate to expect litigants in person to deal with such cases. Tasks such as acquiring and understanding medical reports, assessing the actual value of a claim, determining liability and preparing an accurate claim can make cases difficult for them.

A MORI Omnibus poll on behalf of the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers indicates that 64 per cent. of people who suffer an injury through someone else's negligence would not pursue a claim through the small claims court without legal assistance from a legal representative. As has been recognised, given that defendants in personal injury cases are often insurers, which will almost certainly be legally represented, the disadvantages to litigants in person could be even greater. John Wells, president of the Institute of Legal Executives, sums up the problem. He has said that litigants in person

"are unlikely to know whether a settlement offer is a reasonable one and may feel obliged to accept an offer which is considerably lower than the value of their claim. This difficulty will be enhanced particularly in complex cases. There will be no equality of resources between the parties. Insurers would basically have carte blanche to settle claims for as little as they could possibly get away with."

The problems that claimants will face if they have to bring a claim without legal representation could discourage some from pursuing their claim. Thus, they could be denied access to justice, and that would be a direct contradiction of the Government's stated aim of guaranteeing all litigants continued fair and equal access to justice. That problem may have been the cause for the Government's relatively short response to the Committee's report. There seems to have been indecision on the Government's part, and some direction and leadership on the issue would be welcome. I look forward to the Minister's comments.

Given the strong arguments both for and against raising the small claims limit for personal injury and housing disrepair cases, we believe that a compromise solution can be found. It is clear that an increase of £1,000 to the limit is necessary, as the current figure is outdated and results in disproportionate expenses being incurred in claims for relatively minor amounts.

How can that increase be achieved without denying justice to certain people? Providing adequate and improved court advice could be decisive. As the evidence to the Committee provided by both the Law Society and Citizens Advice noted, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) made clear, the crucial factor in supporting parties to an action is providing them not so much with legal representation, but with adequate information and advice before they come to—and, I would add, while they are in—court.

Evidence indicates that the advice available to litigants in person is inadequate. Citizens Advice, which often advises litigants in person, has noted that clients frequently cannot fill in small claim forms and allocation questionnaires. Furthermore, court leaflets are often deemed difficult to understand. As the evidence given by Citizens Advice to the Committee noted, even in small claims cases "claimants can be left in serious financial difficulty if they do not get appropriate help and advice in preparing their case".

If the claims limit is to be raised, and more claimants are to find themselves without legal representation, those problems must be remedied by better guidance. I note with interest the progress being made by the pilot small claims scheme at Reading county court. The scheme, designed to assist parties without legal representation, provides for a dedicated support officer to supply in-depth advice to both claimants and defendants. I should be grateful if the Minister commented on the success or otherwise of that scheme.

The courts will have the burden of being more proactive to ensure that potential claimants have all the information and can understand the information required to bring a claim. Likewise, unrepresented defendants must be suitably informed to enable them to defend the claim against them. Appropriate advice must be supplied on matters such as filling out forms, gathering together and interpreting medical reports and determining the liability and quantum of claims.

If quality and easy-to-understand advice can be provided, and district judges can continue their existing constructive interventionist approach to small claims cases, that, hopefully, will negate much of the harm caused to parties who under the present limit would instruct a legal representative, but would be forced by an increase in the small claims limit to represent themselves.

Despite a sharp increase in the quantity and quality of advice to litigants in person, they will often be in a weaker position without legal representation. For that reason, recommendations from some quarters to raise the limit to £5,000 may be inappropriate. The Conservative party supports a doubling of the limit from £1,000 to £2,000, which would take into account the rising levels of personal injuries damages inflation. That figure, the same as that recommended by Citizens Advice, should not result in people being denied access to justice. We would remain open to the debate on whether the limit should be up to £2,500, but do not feel that a higher limit than that is appropriate at the current time. Most complex personal injury cases, in which a claimant would struggle to bring a claim without legal representation, are for more than £2,000 and will therefore still be allocated to the fast-track system.

The report also raises a second issue of the possible introduction of a European small claims procedure. A proposed EC regulation will introduce the procedure, which will intend to simplify, speed up and reduce the costs of litigation for small claims across the EU. The Committee's report broadly welcomed the implementation of such a procedure, noting the benefits that will be provided to parties involved in cross-border cases. That point was reinforced by the words of the Committee Chairman, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, this afternoon.

However, there were two significant reservations to that welcome. First, a successful party will be able to claim their legal costs from the losing party, which, as I said, is the exact opposite of the situation in the small claims system in England and Wales. It could mean that disproportionate costs could be incurred in order to claim a relatively small sum. A second problem noted by the Committee is that the procedure will be available only to claimants whose claims are for less than €2,000. In comparison with the levels used in England and Wales, that amount is low.

The benefits of introducing a European small claims procedure for cross-border cases are very much the same as those for domestic cases. The procedure will be particularly beneficial given the growing number of consumers choosing to shop abroad, and the increase in travel between member states. It may provide benefits through more choice and lower prices, but it could also lead to cross-border disputes. The quantity of such disputes is escalating rapidly. If consumers are to have the confidence to shop abroad, they need the assurance that if something goes wrong there is a viable means of redress.

There are various problems with pursuing a claim in a foreign country. Language difficulties, geographical distances, instructing two sets of lawyers, additional travel and communication costs, and a lack of information regarding local consumer rights and applicable laws all make it a difficult process to pursue. Potential claimants to actions for small amounts may think that they are better off cutting their losses and forgetting about pursuing legal action. Evidence provided by the Commission indicates that that is largely the case at the moment. To solve those problems, the introduction of a simplified and speedier system for contested small value claims is to be welcomed.

However, as the report noted, the ESCP has some problems in its current form. If the procedure is to have a limit of €2,000, which is roughly the equivalent of £1,400, many cases that could appropriately be dealt with under the system would be excluded. The figure that is set must be large enough to attract a sufficient amount of cases. As the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants has pointed out, few small or medium- sized UK-based enterprises will benefit from the procedure. That is due to the majority not being involved in cross-border trade, and of those who are, in a third trade principally outside the EU. The procedure appears therefore to be a mechanism for the benefit of individuals. If individuals are constrained in their ability to bring an action because its value must be below a €2,000 threshold, the number of cases expected to be brought under the procedure is relatively few.

Although the level is clearly too low, there is also a danger of setting it too high. That could have the effect that cases complex enough to warrant a full discussion or trial in a court of law will not receive that, as they will be capable of being brought under the accelerated small claims procedure. That problem needs to be addressed further.

A potential problem I have spotted with the proposed regulation is that the €2,000 limit applies only to the value of the original claim when the procedure is commenced, and not to the value of the final judgment awarded. The regulation is silent in the event that the claim later turns out to be for a much higher amount, for example, if the damage incurred by the claimant later turns out to be greater than originally believed. The lack of an automatic power granted to the national court to transfer such a case from the procedure to the national court system could lead to an injustice being committed against either party, or both.

In conclusion on this particular issue, the best course the Government could follow is to demand that the €2,000 limit be raised. I appreciate that the procedure must take into account the varying small claims limits and living standards in all the member states. To take account of those differences, an alternative solution might be to permit member states to set their own limits. That would allow the courts in England and Wales to set the limit at €7,000, equivalent to the £5,000 limit currently employed in our small claims system.

I referred to a second problem: the losing party having to pay the winning party's costs. The right will not apply in terms of a loser who is unrepresented having to pay the other side's legal fees; the wording used in the proposed regulation refers to the fact that a "natural person" who is not legally represented will not be obliged to "reimburse" the legal fees "of the other party". That could create an atmosphere of injustice, as parties will often not be on a level playing field. Furthermore, such a provision discriminates against companies bringing claims, as they cannot come within the definition of a "natural person", and against those individuals, for example minors or the mentally impaired, who would find it difficult, if not impossible, to bring a claim without being legally represented. If the procedure is to have such a costs rule, special provision must be made for those types of situation.

Many cases will involve both parties being legally represented, and therefore the general rule employed in the court system of England and Wales that the loser pays the winner's costs will apply. The provision will cause one of the problems which I have discussed in respect of why the limit for personal injury and housing repair cases in the small claims systems of England and Wales should be raised: disproportionate costs being incurred to claim back a small monetary amount.

Mr. Dismore: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the problems about costs and disproportionality is the way in which the insurance companies defend the cases—by running up costs, taking cases far further than they should and not paying up? If the insurance companies admitted liability and paid up earlier—as by definition they should, because otherwise they would not be paying compensation in the first place—the costs would be nowhere near as high as they are.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. I recognise his experience in this area. He made the point in his earlier remarks and he is defending the established system. There were interesting aspects to the sparring match that he had with the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), who was at least saying that perhaps we should consider this matter in a slightly different way—he mentioned mediation. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) mentioned the courts giving further help. With respect, the attitude of the hon. Member for Hendon is a little one-sided—

Mr. Dismore: It is born of experience.

Mr. Djanogly: I understand the hon. Gentleman's experience, but we could slightly broaden our horizons on this matter.

If a claimant brings a claim for about €1,000, the legal costs for such a cross-border action, which would generally be higher than for a purely domestic case due to its international nature, could run into several thousands of euros. Claiming back that amount, which far exceeds the amount of the original claim, could be highly disproportionate, and unfair to the other party. That would defeat the entire object of having a small claims procedure: to provide a simplified and accelerated cross-border procedure, with lower costs. Potential claimants will know that they run the risk of having to pay the other party's costs in the event that they lose their case. That will discourage individuals from bringing a claim under the procedure, unless they are provided with certainty about the maximum amount they may have to pay.

Several reports, including those conducted by the EU, have noted that cost is the main reason why individuals choose not to pursue legal claims. I believe that during the UK presidency of the European Council the Government sought to rectify the problem by proposing that the ESCP should allow for the recovery of costs, including legal costs, even where the unsuccessful party is not legally represented—the benefit apparently being that costs could be claimed only if they were proportionate to the claim.

Although I welcome a proposition that costs should be proportionate, the Government's proposal could do more harm than good. Many potential claimants who may have contemplated bringing a small claim in another member state, and may have been willing, for the sake of saving costs, to represent themselves, will be reluctant to bring a claim if there is the potential for their having to pay any costs at all, even a proportionate amount.

A second problem with that proposal is that it could be unfair if an unsuccessful litigant in person would be just as liable for the legal costs of the other party as an unsuccessful party who had legal representation. One of the best features of our domestic small claims system is its rules on costs, which are the cornerstone of a simplified and speedy process. While a person bringing a small claim knows they may not get all their costs back, they also know that if unsuccessful, they will not be burdened with a large costs bill. Having to pay costs will act as a deterrent to people bringing small claims, so a costs rule that entitles a winning party to claim back only a fixed amount of costs may be beneficial, and that fixed amount should include only the costs of court fees and the loss of earnings to the party and witnesses. They are the exact costs that can be claimed back in the small claims system in England and Wales, regarded in the Government's response as "a leader in the field of small claims litigation".

The introduction of a procedure that contains the two problems I have been discussing will not, in itself, be detrimental to the British people. However, it would be a missed opportunity to introduce a respected and useful cross-border small claims system. Too few people will seek to utilise the procedure due to the problems, so that its potential benefits will be severely constrained.

Having reviewed the proposed regulation, we think that a couple of points might have been overlooked by the Committee, and I would be grateful for the Minister's response on them. First, I note that the system is to be based on written procedure, which in the context of saving time and money, is to be commended. However, no account is made for those with low literacy skills. Although the regulation allows for an alternative procedure at the court's discretion, it may be preferable to allow parties automatically to request an alternative procedure, with a presumption that the request is to be accepted unless the court has good reason to refuse. There must however be some mechanism so that a party cannot for tactical reasons demand that an oral hearing take place, thereby potentially placing the other party at a financial disadvantage.

The regulation also states some of the alternative methods of taking evidence, which obviously must take into account the greater distances cross-border cases will entail for parties and witnesses when compared with national cases. The methods stated include telephone and e-mail conferences, and such methods raise serious security concerns for obvious reasons. I would be grateful if the Minister told us how that will be addressed.

I was disappointed in the Government's lacklustre response to the Committee's comments about the listing procedures. The fact that many litigants arrive in court to find that they may have to wait hours before their case is heard is unfair. The Committee noted that problem, and although it accepted that there were practical difficulties in listing cases for the convenience of both the judiciary and parties, it recommended that the interests of parties should not be overlooked. The Government's response explicitly ignored that recommendation, stating that, as the current system is supported by the Association of District Judges, it should remain in place.

Although I accept that the court's time should not be wasted, a more constructive compromise could be found. A system could be adopted that provides for shorter time slots—for example, two or three slots per day, in which parties would appear. Hopefully, that would mean that parties would not have to wait for too long. On the other hand, the amount of judges' time that is wasted should be kept to a minimum. If litigants or their witnesses do not show up or their case is settled, then there will still be other cases to fill up the court's time within the relevant slot.

On enforcement of judgments, it is shocking that up to a third of successful claimants in small claims cases never see a penny of the amount they have been awarded. That undermines the entire small claims system. I welcome the Government's good intentions in respect of their proposed legislation to solve that problem. Such measures as data disclosure orders and an attachment of earnings information gateway seem in principle to be good ideas to enforce judgments. However, it is a shame that it has taken so long for those measures to be proposed, and I am aware of no action having been taken to enact any of them.

The Government's response fails to set out even a rough timetable or estimate for the proposed legislation. I note that since the Government's response was published the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs has announced the Government's intention to create a national enforcement service, but from the research I have conducted it appears that that service will work primarily to enforce criminal judgments. I would be grateful if the Minister told me whether I am right about that.

It is unclear whether the service will be for the benefit of parties wishing to enforce a civil claim. It barely gets a mention in the Department for Constitutional Affairs press release, while Her Majesty's Courts Service website makes one reference. It states that the service will "amalgamate civil and criminal enforcement activity" and yet the

[Mr. Djanogly]

"feasibility of this needs further testing".

It would seem to be a good idea for the national enforcement service to assist successful claimants to enforce judgments against defendants who are refusing to pay. From my knowledge of the service, that does not appear to be its priority, or even on its list of aims. I would be grateful if the Minister provided clarification on that. If I am correct, it would be a missed opportunity to rectify a serious problem in our small claims system, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch suggested.

Simon Hughes: It appears that we agree that this is a hugely important part of the system's current failures and that a remedy is needed. Has the hon. Gentleman considered a remedy such as the one I proposed, which is that the defendant—the person who then has to pay—is required to come back at a fixed time to show that they have paid, to pay then, or to give evidence of how they are going to pay? Once they are let out of the clutch of the court, chasing things up becomes far more expensive, far more long-winded and far less successful.

Mr. Djanogly: The hon. Gentleman's proposals deserve to be put into a pot for a broader debate. However, off the top of my head, I can think of other sides to the story: for example, if the judgment was for a significant sum and the company was small, having to pay it all at once might simply bust the company, so nothing would be payable.

Simon Hughes: These are small claims.

Mr. Djanogly: I appreciate that these are small claims, but, conceptually, these are issues that would have to be addressed, as would the impact on companies generally. However, the hon. Gentleman has a good point that should be looked into.

Simon Hughes: Often, one of the reasons why such sums are not paid is that the company—which may be a small company—that finds itself in difficulty has its own legal fees to pay as well as the judgment. When it pays its own legal fees is a matter for it to resolve later; the crucial thing is that it quickly pays the judgment sum to the person who deserves it. That should be the priority, and it should be done within a fixed period.

Mr. Djanogly: Yes, and we must recognise that there are existing execution methods, and as much as looking for new methods we would need to discuss the extent to which they are not adequately used. We should question the use of bailiffs and sheriffs and so forth, who have mixed effectiveness rates—that varies in different parts of the country. There is a great debate to be had on this issue. It is right to put the hon. Gentleman's point into the pot, and I would be grateful if the Minister addressed whether we can have such a debate, because it would be an important one.

I apologise that my speech has taken so long, but these are important issues that deserve attention. Small claims are a valid, worthy and well-established part of our court system. Although I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments, so far I fail to see the evidence that the Government are giving this important area the attention it deserves. That is a shame—and possibly also a missed opportunity to extend access to justice.

4.35 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): The small claims track is one of the cornerstones of civil justice, providing access to justice for both consumers and business that is simple and quick to use, and where liability for costs is limited. I thank the Constitutional Affairs Committee for selecting its report on small claims for debate. This is the second time a report of the Committee has been debated in this Chamber and, yet again, the discussion has been excellent and the attendance high, considering that this is the last day before a recess.

The Members who have spoken have different areas of expertise, but we all know—from constituents' visits to our surgeries, for example—that this is an important issue above all for people seeking access to justice. Members have made many insightful and important points, and I will try to respond to them.

Litigation should be used only as a last resort, but if somebody cannot get redress by other means, they must be able to make a claim. The vast majority of claims made end in a default judgment—the defendant has not acknowledged service of the claim or provided a defence—and then enforcement proceedings can begin. However, a relatively low-value defended claim will be allocated to the small claims track.

I thank the Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) for his recognition, which was echoed by other Members—possibly with the exception of the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly)—that the small claims track is well regarded, and I thank everyone who makes that the success that it is, including the district judges, the court staff and the advice sector.

Although the small claims track is well received, we are not complacent about it. For some, the courts will always be intimidating, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) rightly said. They will find filling forms a problem, the procedure daunting and knowing where to seek advice or assistance far from straightforward.

We recognise the problems and are continuing to look at ways of addressing them. We are not being complacent; we want to improve the existing provisions and to introduce new ones. The community legal service has worked with the Department to ensure that court staff can correctly identify sources of advice and refer people to them. We already provide information through leaflets at courts and via Her Majesty's Courts Service website for litigants, and provide assistance to litigants at courts. The hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) referred to that.

However, we can do more. We continually review the leaflets to see if they can be improved and we are looking at how we can change our website to make it more user-friendly. The small claims support service pilot in Reading will provide practical assistance to litigants in person in bringing or defending their claim. Our money claim online service has been a major initiative. It allows people to bring and defend claims online for up to £100,000.

We know that attending court can be difficult, time-consuming and costly, which is why we are expanding the types of hearing that can be dealt with by telephone. Those who do not know what to expect can contact their local court, not only for information and assistance, but also to see what is involved. Those with special needs can contact the court for help. This all indicates the thought and effort that is being put into the civil justice system to ensure that it continues to be highly regarded by the people who need to use it.

The Chairman of the Committee, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, asked us to consider four points: IT enforcement, the level of payments for personal injury, housing and Europe. I will address them in the order in which he raised them.

On IT, we recognise the need to invest in technology and modernisation to support effective delivery of justice, including in the small claims court. We have provided an additional £75 million for IT projects in the civil and family courts over the past three years. We have ring-fenced a further £25 million in funding for each year of the current spending round specifically for modernising IT in the civil and family courts.

Through the courts and tribunal modernisation programme, we have delivered a range of IT projects, including money claim online, an award-winning online claims service; the LINK project, which installed new IT infrastructure in larger county courts and the royal courts of justice; a new generation of laptop computers for all judges, including district judges and those sitting in the small claims courts; a pilot of an electronic appointments diary in the civil and family courts; and the online forms project, which makes 20 of the most popular civil court forms available for completion online. Also, a wide range of other IT projects are under consideration. All that is not enough; we have done quite a bit, but there is much further to go.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) asked a question about consultants. The Department is doing a great amount on IT in the criminal courts, but we acknowledge that we need to do more in the civil courts, beyond the criminal justice system. One of the biggest issues is money. If anyone has any ideas about what else we could cut in order to put more into IT, or about ways in which we could do better with our IT, cheaply, we will definitely be interested to hear it.

Mr. Djanogly: I believe that the Department has just announced 8 per cent. cuts; will that impact on the IT spend?

Ms Harman: We have not announced an 8 per cent. cut.

The second subject raised by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed was enforcement. The hon. Member for Hornchurch rightly said that if court judgments are not enforced, it adds insult to injury. First, a person receives a wrong; then, they make the effort to go to court; and then the person who did the wrong cocks a snoop at the whole system and refuses to pay. That is a major problem. We ought to recognise that the problem is that many people think that they just do not have to pay. Many agencies and organisations have to spend time chasing people who think that even though they owe somebody something—because they owe them a debt or have done them a wrong—they can just walk away from it. We should all condemn those people who do a wrong to someone and think that they do not have to provide recompense.

Enforcement has a crucial role to play in the small claims system. There is no point obtaining a judgment if it is unenforceable. I realise that enforcement is not as effective as it might be; that is why we are considering further possibilities. We are currently drafting provisions for a Bill to improve enforcement. The intention is to legislate as soon as parliamentary time allows, and to allow the greatest possible scrutiny. I can only say that our debate on the subject will reinforce the recognition that we need to bring that legislation forward. It has been useful to have the opportunity to debate enforcement. There is much agreement about what needs to be done on the matter; we just need to get the parliamentary time to bring that legislation forward.

Simon Hughes: There is obviously consensus that enforcement is a big issue. Will the Minister consider talking to business managers about whether we might have a debate on the wider issue in Government time? If we do have such a debate, will she facilitate some correspondence before then about ways of securing enforcement that are much more practical than a long-winded, eight-stage regulatory process—which, to be honest, will cost a lot and may not deliver?

Ms Harman: I think that we have had a useful debate about enforcement here. Also, there was a lot of good debate throughout the Select Committee's inquiries on enforcement. I cannot offer to suggest to the business managers that we have another debate about enforcement. We know what the parameters are; what we need is to find parliamentary time actually to do something about enforcement.

Importantly, the Select Committee highlighted for debate the limits for payments in personal injury and housing disrepair cases, and it has ignited more discussion and consideration of the subject. The matter is not just about getting compensation for an individual who suffers a personal injury as a result of a negligent act or omission; it is also about having a deterrent, to make sure that there is accountability among people, including employers or local authorities. If there is accountability, it is a deterrent to people acting negligently in a way that results in others being injured. We should understand the public interest side of effective personal injury claims, as well as the point of view of the individual who needs compensation.

As hon. Members have said, the small claims limit of £1,000 for personal injury cases, established in 1991, was last reviewed in 1999, when it was decided that that limit should remain. We are currently reviewing all the case track limits, and we are considering the Select Committee's recommendations in the context of that work, which is being informed by information and representations from a range of sources. The Select Committee's report has generated many further representations from interested individuals and organisations. As we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East, the debate is still going on, even within the Select Committee. He said that at first he agreed with the limit, but he has since received so many further representations that he has changed his mind. That is an ongoing debate. As today's debate demonstrates, there are strong views against, as well as for, an increase in the limit for personal injury claims.

James Brokenshire: The Minister is highlighting the right points about our debate. She says that her Department is reviewing the matter and is taking on board the Select Committee's evidence, as well as subsequent evidence. Could she give any suggestion of the time scales to which the review is working?

Ms Harman: I cannot give an actual date, but I can say that the review is progressing with the appropriate speed. We are considering the matter and are talking to people about it. It is not that nothing is happening about the subject. It is not just sitting gathering dust on a shelf. We are actually looking into the matter. Many people are still making representations and further discussion is under way. Let me give some of the arguments as we see them so far.

We recognise that there are concerns about the lack of legal advice or representation if the limit is raised. Representations point to the fact that when people make a claim for personal injury, it is more than likely that they will be up against professionals—insurers, lawyers, claims managers, employers or local authorities. They will need to establish whether they have a valid claim; obtain and understand medical and other expert evidence; and then be able to prove their case. They will also have to assess the value of their claim. Those could all be difficult for a claimant without advice or representation, and lawyers say that offers made to non-represented defendants can increase by £1,000 or more once the services of a lawyer are engaged.

However, the insurers and local authorities have concerns that the costs of conducting lower-value cases have become disproportionately high. Costs often exceed the amount of compensation, sometimes by a considerable amount. They believe that that could be addressed by increasing the small claims limit so that legal costs are no longer recoverable, although my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon points out that the issue of those costs could be addressed by people settling earlier and not fighting claims that they are likely to lose.

The Government are considering all those arguments carefully. We are clear that claims must be settled in a way that is timely, proportionate and cost-effective. That is not always the case at present. However, an increase in the limit to £2,500 or even £5,000 would affect tens of thousands of cases, so before considering such an increase we must consider its impact fully and be sure that we are increasing, not reducing, access to justice. For example, conditional fee agreements have improved access to justice, and mean that more people can pursue their claims. An increase in the limit would affect the viability of conditional fee agreements. It might also open up the possibility of claimants having to pay for legal advice through a large fee being deducted from their compensation, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon said.

The Select Committee report comments on the importance of the availability of early advice. I have already set out some of the initiatives under way to provide assistance and better information. As part of our review of the personal injury limit, we need to establish whether the voluntary advice sector could cope with a large influx of new cases in an area of litigation that both involves a high level of expertise and hardly features in the current small claims regime at the moment.

Although, as the Select Committee rightly points out, district judges will help the claimant in person, many cases never reach a judge, as they are settled before litigation is commenced. Even where litigation is begun, most cases settle before they reach a trial, if we leave aside the point about settlement being at a lower level without the assistance of a lawyer for the claimant.

There is also the issue of what any increase should be. Obviously, all such limits are to some extent arbitrary. As others have pointed out, an increase in line with inflation would not take us above £1,500 and an increase to £2,500 or £5,000 would bring some injuries into the small claim track for the first time. We ought to consider whether such an increase can be justified on grounds other than inflation. I note the point made by the hon. Member for Huntingdon about splitting the difference.

So far as housing disrepair cases are concerned, as the Select Committee recognised and as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed mentioned, such cases nearly always involve some of the more vulnerable members of society. We are taking that into account in our review.

A numbers of hon. Members ventured into a discussion of small claims in the European context. That is quite a challenge. For many people, the idea of even getting to their local court, issuing a claim and making progress seems daunting enough; the idea that one should advance into Europe and litigate for a small amount is even more so. Europe is on to it; it is in hand.

With holidays, travel and buying abroad, including via the internet, on the increase the number of disputes will rise, as the hon. Member for Huntingdon said. Citizens Advice already does sterling work, acting as European consumer centres for the UK and helping to resolve cross-border disputes that arise in the EU. Sometimes disputes cannot be resolved so easily and, at present, litigating across borders can be costly, lengthy and time consuming. It is regarded by most people as downright impossible. We believe that the European small claims procedure will be a significant improvement, providing as it does a simple common procedure that does not involve a judgment having to be recognised in another member state before it can be enforced.

We are continuing to negotiate with our European colleagues to achieve the best possible outcome. Already, we have secured agreement over significant aspects of the procedure that it should apply to cross-border cases only. Obviously, that makes sense. It should normally be a written procedure. Perhaps most importantly, the cost of the procedure should not be disproportionate to the value of the claim.

A number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Huntingdon, mentioned listing. Most public service organisations are moving away from block booking. Obviously, it is right that that is reflected on. We recognise the problems that block listing small claims can cause litigants. The reason for block booking is that it is regarded as the most efficient use of judicial and court resources. We have to strive to reach a better balance between the providers of the service and its users.

We are reducing the number of hearings in court wherever possible by extending the scope for telephone hearings. Hopefully, there will not be block booking of telephone hearings. That will save litigants not only waiting time but also time and money spent travelling to court. We will continue to discuss with HM Courts Service the points that have been made about block booking and listing.

As I have said, our small claims system is already well regarded. However, we are not complacent. It provides a low cost and generally effective system for a large number of litigants. There are still problems with IT. We have much further to go. Enforcement will never be an easy nut to crack, but we must do more about it and we must get parliamentary time for it. As far as raising the limits is concerned, the debate that has followed the report has shown that it is not straightforward by any means.

Mr. Djanogly: The Minister will appreciate that everyone here knows that that is not straightforward. That has been reflected in every speech. However, the issue has now come to a head, as shown by the letters that we have received. For the Minister to leave without some indication of where the Government are coming from, after having heard the figures that both Opposition parties are coming from, and for practitioners not to have some idea of where they are leading is not a good reflection on the Government. Can she give us some more idea of where we are headed? At what point in time will she give a decision so that there is certainty and people know what will happen?

Ms Harman: I have set out what I think the considerations are. I have explained that we are deliberating about the matter, that we are considering it and that we are receiving representations. The hon. Gentleman would not want us to act precipitately. It is important and in due course, as soon as we can, we will come forward sensibly and set out our proposals. We will continue to listen to hon. Members' comments about the day-by-day processes and where we can improve them, and to work harder to make a good system, run by dedicated people, even better.

Mr. Beith: With the leave of the Chamber, I want to thank hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, especially the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire), who makes such a valuable contribution to the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), with his ideas on enforcement, which have been a valuable addition to our discussion today, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), who gave general support to the belief that we have to reconsider the limit and may need to raise it, although we must work out what would be a sensible increase, and the hon. Members for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) for their extremely eloquent defence of the views of many personal injury lawyers and some trade unions.

As I listened to the hon. Member for Hendon, there were moments when I feared that I might trap my finger on my way out of the Chamber. In such circumstances, it would clearly be essential that I obtained the services of the hon. Gentleman or of the small number of lawyers who are known by him to be up to his standard. I dare not read Kemp and Kemp, from which he is going to give me the chapter, because that was not written for people like me. There was a moment when he sounded a little like the lawyer in the Lady Chatterley case, challenging the jury to think whether this was a book that they would want their servants to read. I am sure that you will now scurry home to read it, Mr. Marshall.

I turn to the Minister's response. I shall want to pursue her on three unanswered questions. When will a fully-integrated IT system be in place in the county courts? How soon can we get effective action and enforcement? When, as the hon. Member for Huntingdon asked, will we get the difficult but necessary decision about the limits? It should not take too long now that all the arguments are out in the open.

I hope that the argument about the personal injury limit will not in any way detract from the importance of the other issues that we have talked about: the benefits and advantages of the small claims track, and the need to equip it adequately with IT and ensure that its judgments can be enforced.

Question put and agreed to.
